The Rundschau was the paper of the Russian Mennonites for decades, and still carries something of this general character, although on Oct. 24, 1945, it came into the ownership of a company composed of men from the M.B. Church who have made it more of an M.B. organ, though it is not yet conference-owned. The rise of other periodicals for the Russian Mennonites, such as the Bote of Rosthern, Sask. (since 1924), has naturally divided the field. Editors of the Rundschau have been as follows: John F. Harms 1880-85; 1886-96 no one was officially listed as editor, J. F. Funk himself presumably carrying the responsibility; D. F. Jantzen 1896-98; G. G. Wiens 1899-Aug. 26, 1903; M. B. Fast Jan. 27, 1904-Oct. 12, 1910; C. B. Wiens Oct. 19, 1910-June 9, 1920; William Winsinger June 16, 1920-Oct. 10, 1923; Hermann H. Neufeld Oct. 17, 1923-Oct. 17, 1945; H. F. Klassen Nov. 14, 1945- . Publishers and places of publication have been: Mennonite Publishing Co., Elkhart, Ind., to July 8, 1908; Mennonite Publishing House, Scottdale, Pa., to Oct. 17, 1923; Hermann Neufeld through the Rundschau Publishing House, Winnipeg, Man., to Oct. 24, 1945, in which the Mennonite Publishing House retained a substantial financial interest for a number of years, but which was legally owned by H. H. Neufeld, which changed its name to Christian Press, Ltd., on March 27, 1940, but was sold to a stock company Oct. 24, 1945, which has continued to publish the Rundschau under the same firm name. Changes in size and format of the Rundschau have been frequent: 4 pp. to the end of 1898, with format 1884-Sept. 1890 of 13 x 13 in., Oct. 1890-98 of 14½ x 21½ in.; 8 pp. 1899-Nov. 6, 1901, same format; 16 pp. Nov. 6, 1901, with change to 10½ x 14 in. format until Sept. 2, 1908, when it was changed to 9½ x 12 and probably 20 pp. (definitely known as 20 pp. beginning January 1909), and continuing in this size and format to Oct. 17, 1923, when it became 16 pp., and on June 9, 1926, changed in format to 10½ x 13½. In 1942-50 it was 8 pp. with three changes in format, 1942—12½ x 17 in., 1947—13 x 19 in., 1950—13½ x 20 in. In 1951 it again became 16 pp., with format 11¾ x 15¼ in. From Nov. 1901, the Herold der Wahrheit was combined with it until the latter's discontinuance Sept. 2, 1908. The Christlicher Jugendfreund, published 1878-1951, became a department of the Rundschau in June 1951. The circulation of the Rundschau in 1957 is 7,400.

An English companion to the Rundschau called Mennonite Observer is being published by the Christian Press as a 12-page weekly beginning Sept. 21, 1955. H.S.B.

Mennonitische Siedlungshilfe e.V. (Mennonite Settlement Aid, Inc.), was founded on July 24, 1953, at Ludwigshafen on the Rhine, Germany, and registered there as a charitable organization on Sept. 18, 1953, with the purpose of promoting the construction of dwellings, meetinghouses, and rural settlements for Mennonite refugees and other needy persons, also the gathering of scattered Mennonites into community settlements and counseling and aiding them in economic, cultural, and religious matters. It furnishes financial aid through loans with funds secured primarily from the American Mennonites through the MCC. It also serves as an advisory council for the MCC Pax units working at home-building in Germany. It played a major role in the creation of the Mennonite settlements at Backnang near Stuttgart, Bechterdissen near Bielefeld, Enkenbach near Kaiserslautern, and Wedel near Hamburg. Its work in this field of home building continues.

Through the help of the MSH hundreds of Mennonite refugees from Danzig and West Prussia have been gathered together again into communities and congregations, and have again found a home, spiritual fellowship, and a solid base for living. R.He.

Mennonitische Studentenhilfe (Mennonite Student Aid). During the period of inflation of German currency, 1922-23, an association was formed in Munich, South Germany, with this name, whose objective was to lighten the economic need of Mennonite students and to offer them a home in which they would have inexpensive living and opportunity for Christian association. In January 1922 the association secured a four-story house between the Institute of Technology and the University of Munich, in which Mennonites and non-Mennonites could live. When living quarters were put under state control in 1926 the association could no longer function. It was nevertheless possible to assist several Mennonite students with loans of several thousand Marks, making it easier for them to attend the university. (ML III, 109.) Hege.

Mennonitische Vierteljahrschrift, an attempted quarterly review edited by John Horsch, of which only one number appeared, in October 1900, with 16 pages, 7 x 10 in., published at Berne, Ind. H.S.B.

Mennonitische Volkswarte (since 1937 Mennonitische Warte), an illustrated monthly magazine of 32-40 pages, was published and edited for four years (1934-38) by Arnold Dyck at East Kildonan, Man. The magazine made a unique contribution in making full use of Mennonite art, photography, fiction, poetry, etc., for the first time in American Mennonite history, in presenting the various aspects of culture of Mennonites of German background. Many of its contributors, like the editor himself, were writers, artists, and teachers. The magazine placed more emphasis on the cultural aspect than the specifically religious, which is taken care of in the traditional Mennonite publications. The magazine built up a storehouse of information during its brief existence and influenced and inspired Mennonite Life (q.v.). Lack of support and sufficient circulation made it necessary for the publisher, who sacrificed heavily, to discontinue its publication. The Warte-Jahrbuch (q.v.) followed the same pattern, but likewise did not survive. (ML III, 109.) C.K.

Mennonitische Warte: see Mennonitische Volkswarte.

Mennonitische Welt, a 24-page, 8 x 10½ in. monthly, which was the successor to Mennonitische Lehrerzeitung (continuous volume numbering), and which appeared from July 1950 to December 1952. With the issue of January 1951 the publisher was indicated as Canadian Mennonite Publishers, Ltd., Winnipeg, Man. (changed in May 1951 to Mennonite Publishers of Canada, Ltd., also Winnipeg). The editor was Victor Peters of Horndean, Man., until May 1951, when Walter Quiring and Victor Peters appear as joint editors, Peters dropping out with the April 1952 number. The last number published was dated December 1952. The journal combined literary and cultural interests with religious and historical, maintaining the Mennonite faith, life, and work as its focus, but not competing with the regular church organs. It announced a policy of serving German-speaking Mennonites everywhere and solicited contributions internationally. H.S.B.

Mennonitischer Freiwilligendienst (Mennonite Voluntary Service), usually known as MFD, is an international European Mennonite organization whose purpose is to give young people, on a Christian and Mennonite basis, opportunity to render aid to needy persons or communities in the name of Christ and thereby to give a testimony of their desire to serve sacrificially in the cause of peace and construction. The organization was composed in 1957 of the following official conference representatives: Germany—Richard Hertzler, France—Jean Jacques Hirschy, Netherlands—Lenie de Groot, Switzerland—Samuel Gerber, MCC in Europe—Milton Harder. MFD arose out of the voluntary service work of the MCC in Europe in building houses after World War II, which in 1948-51 operated an average of four short-term summer work camps annually in a total of seven different countries with a total of 1,537 participants. In 1950 the MCC created a council for the summer work out of representatives appointed by the conferences, which then became an independent organization, the MFD. The MFD also joined AIG (Arbeitskreis Internationaler Gemeinschaftsdienste) and UNESCO.

The work of MFD is carried on through an executive secretary who was Lamarr Kopp in 1954-57, an American Mennonite loaned by the MCC, with headquarters at Kaiserslautern since 1956. Finances for the organization are provided by appropriations from the participating conferences. Direct support of the summer work camps is given by the MCC through relief food shipments and by appropriations from the German government through its Bundesjugendplan (Federal Youth Plan). Although the camp leaders are Mennonites, most of the participants are non-Mennonites. In 1956 one third of the 256 participants were Mennonites, the rest being from 24 denominations and 15 countries. In recent years the following have been among the work projects: clean-up work (1) in the Swiss Alps following an avalanche catastrophe and (2) in Holland following the coastal flood disaster; construction of homes for refugees in Germany, construction of children's homes in France, and reconstruction of a damaged Protestant high school in Austria.

The significance of MFD for the Mennonite brotherhood lies first of all in the fellowship of Mennonite youth from various countries, then further in the opportunity for contact with Christian youth from other countries and circumstances, but also in the privilege of putting into practice the command of Christ to love one's neighbor as himself, and to give an example to others of this spirit. R.He.

Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein (Mennonite Historical Society). Research in Mennonite history, begun in the middle of the 19th century by German historians, has revealed the bias with which the origin and growth of the Anabaptist-Mennonite brotherhood has been treated in most works of history. This revelation stirred up a desire in Mennonite circles for further information on their own history.

The constitution of the Vereinigung (q.v.; i.e., Conference of German Mennonite Churches) provided for the publication of historical material; its support indeed made the publication of several historical works possible. At a meeting of this conference on June 20, 1932, in Altona (q.v.), the task of promoting the publication of historical materials was put in the hands of a committee organized for that purpose, and in April 1933 the Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein was founded. The executive committee of four members was composed of Christian Neff of Weierhof, Ernst Crous of Berlin, Christian Hege of Frankfurt, and Hendrik van Delden of Gronau. Five other members of the society were chosen to work with the executive committee: A. Driedger of Heubuden, Erich Göttner of Danzig, Fritz Kliewer of Berlin, B. H. Unruh of Karlsruhe, Walther Köhler, an outstanding Reformation scholar of the University of Heidelberg. The society has its seat at Weierhof. The general meeting of the society was in the beginning regularly held in connection with the Mennonite Day (Mennonitentag).

The constitution defines the work of the society as collecting documents and copies of material on Mennonite history, publishing source material and articles on this history, collecting and distributing works on Mennonite history, supporting the publication of works on the subject, and the promotion of family history. The annual fee is a minimum of two marks. By 1939 the society had 280 members.

Since 1936 (suspended 1941-48) the society has published the biannual Mennonitische Geschichtsblätter (q.v.) with 60-100 pages, which the members receive free of charge. The periodical presents matter on various events in the changing history of the Mennonites. For more exhaustive treatments provision is made in a special series of pamphlets, the Schriftenreihe (Historical Series). The first issue of this series appeared in 1938 with the title, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Mennoniten, Festgabe für D. Christian Neff zum 70. Geburtstag. (ML III, 110.) HEGE.

Before the German collapse in 1945, five issues of the Geschichtsblätter were published (1936-40), and three numbers of the Historical Series (Schriftenreihe) (1938-41) appeared. The first volume of this series is mentioned above. The second was Beiträge zur Geschichte rheinischer Mennoniten, Festgabe zum 5. Mennonitentag (1939). The third contained Horst Penner's Ansiedlung Mennonitischer Niederländer im Weichselmündungsgebiet von der Mitte des 16. Jahrhunderts bis zum Beginn der preussischen Zeit, and Gustav E. Reimer's Die Familiennamen der westpreussischen Mennoniten (1940). Reimer's active solicitation resulted in a membership of over 800.

After the political collapse and the death of Hege (1943) and Neff (1946) the work was resumed in 1947 by a general meeting at Thomashof. Membership reached 856, but after the currency reform (1948) receded to about 600. In 1948 the general meeting was held at Gronau in Westphalia; here the Göttingen Mennonite Research Center (Mennonitische Forschungsstelle Göttingen) was established; in 1952 a new constitution was adopted; in 1953 legal rights acquired. In 1949-56 eight issues of the Geschichtsblätter appeared (Nos. 6-13), and in 1954 the fourth number of the Historical Series, viz., Paul Peachey's Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer in der Reformationszeit. In 1955 the general meeting held at Göttingen elected the following executive officers: Ernst Crous, Horst Quiring, Paul Schowalter, Gerhard Hein, and Gerrit van Delden. An assisting council was also elected: Harold S. Bender, Abraham Fast, Samuel Geiser, Fritz Hege, Kurt Kauenhoven, Cornelius Krahn, Gustav E. Reimer, Walther Risler, Otto Schowalter, Erich Schultz, B. H. Unruh, and N. van der Zijpp. E.C.

Mennonitischer Kirchenkonvent: see Molotschnaer Kirchenkonvent, and Chortitzer Kirchenkonvent.

Mennonitischer Lehrerverein: see Mennonite Teachers' Association.

Mennonitischer Verein Deutsche Muttersprache (Mennonite Association for the German Mother Language) was founded in Winnipeg, Man., in 1952, to aid Mennonite families of German background in preserving their German language and culture by encouraging the use of High German in their homes and churches, by organizing German classes, by offering a German correspondence course, encouraging the establishment of German libraries, etc. The officers of the organization are elected at the annual meeting usually held in the fall. Minimum membership dues are $1.00. Some of the leading ministers and educators are actively participating in the cause. In 1955 it had a membership of 1,500. C.K.

Mennonitischer Zentralausschuss (Mennonite Central Committee) was established in 1950 at Frankfurt, Germany, to serve as a liaison between the Mennonite Central Committee (of the United States and Canada) and the German Mennonite churches. The latter are represented on the committee by one representative delegated by each of the three German Mennonite conferences as follows: Vereinigung (q.v.), Verband (q.v.), and Elders' Committee of the Conference of (former) West and East Prussian Mennonite Churches. The European director of the MCC usually serves as chairman. The members in 1957 were Cornelius Wall, Ulrich Hege, Abraham Braun, and Otto Wiebe. Meetings are held as needed to review the MCC program in Germany and its relations to the German Mennonite brotherhood and its work. H.S.B.

Mennonitisches Gemeindeblatt (until 1918 with the added phrase "for Austria"), the official organ of the Mennonite brotherhood of Kiernica-Lemberg in Poland, was founded in 1913 as a 4-page 10 x 13 in. monthly paper, published in Lemberg (q.v.). Its purpose was to inform the scattered Mennonites of Galicia concerning events in the brotherhood and to preserve their love and loyalty to the church and to the entire Mennonite brotherhood. The contents of the paper were chiefly composed of news of their own congregations, preaching services, changes of address, reports on meetings and their organization. In addition it contained religious meditations and articles from the field of Mennonite history and literature.

The first editor was Arnold Bachmann (d. 1920). At the outbreak of World War I in August 1914 the paper had to suspend publication for several years, resuming publication in December 1917 with Heinrich Pauls as editor. In 1920 Leopold Gesell took it over. It appeared irregularly until 1928, when Alfred Bachmann became editor and published it quarterly. In 1932 Arnold Bachmann became editor. He served until 1939, when the paper ceased publication, the Mennonites in that year having been resettled in the Warthegau (q.v.). The last number extant is Vol. XXV (1939) No. 2. The paper was read for the most part by members of the group whose organ it was, but it also had a number of subscribers among the Mennonites in other countries. (ML III, 110.) A.BA.

Mennonitisches Jahrbuch, a Russian Mennonite annual reviewing current Mennonite activities in the area of missions, charitable institutions, schools, and general church life, edited 1904-11 by Heinrich Dirks (q.v.), elder of the Gnadenfeld Mennonite Church (Molotschna settlement) and former missionary, then in 1913-14 by D. H. Epp, under the authority of the Allgemeine Bundeskonferenz (Conference of Mennonites in Russia). Epp greatly enlarged and enriched it with numerous historical articles on Mennonite congregations, institutions, etc., in Russia together with the annual minutes of the conference sessions. The 1914 (10th) issue (for the year 1913) had 226 pages. This was the nearest approach to a scholarly or historical journal published by the Mennonites in Russia. The prohibition of German publications brought its career to an end. (ML III, 111 f.) H.S.B.

Mennonitisches Jahrbuch is a 48-page yearbook edited by Cornelius Krahn and published by the General Conference Mennonite Publication Office in cooperation with the G.C.M. Board of Missions since 1948, when it replaced the Bundesbote-Kalender (q.v.). The Jahrbuch aims to present illustrated articles of interest to its Mennonite readers in Canada, South America, and Germany. Many of the articles deal with the problems of Mennonite refugees, resettlement, relief, and progress and developments in the religious, educational, and economic aspects of Mennonite life in general and in the above areas in particular. C.K.

Mennonitisches Lexikon. One of the great enterprises of Mennonite historical scholarship is the Mennonitisches Lexikon, an encyclopedia of the Anabaptist-Mennonite movement from its beginning in 1525 to the present day, covering all countries to which the movement has spread. An invaluable mine of information, thorough, authentic, comprehensive, it is an indispensable tool for students of Anabaptist-Mennonite history and a landmark in Mennonite historiography. Christian Neff (1863-1946) of Weierhof in the Palatinate, Germany, and Christian Hege (1869-1943) of Frankfurt, Germany, the founders and coeditors of the Lexikon until their death, and writers of a majority of the articles, served also as publishers. The two men formed a well-balanced team, with Hege the managing editor, carrying on together with devotion and sacrifice for over thirty years, until death called them both from their unfinished task. As they worked, what had been originally planned in 1913 as a two-volume work to be completed in ten years, grew into a three-volume work, each volume containing fifteen installments of 48 pages each, of which two volumes and six additional installments (a total of 36) had appeared by September 1942, extending into "Ob."

During the thirty years of their endeavor, the courage and faith of the editors of the Lexikon were put to severe tests and disappointments. With but slender resources of their own, and compelled to pay for many of the contributed articles in accord with European custom, they had to depend heavily on advance subscriptions and on donations from churches and interested groups and individuals. The Dutch Mennonites, who had the wealth and might have aided the enterprise strongly, failed to do so. The Russian Mennonite churches, which were among the heaviest original supporters, were early eliminated as a result of World War I, which broke out less than fifteen months after the first installment appeared in May 1913. The German currency inflation of 1922-23 was a heavy blow. If it had not been for direct financial assistance from friends in the United States and Canada at that time, promoted largely by H. P. Krehbiel and H. H. Ewert of the General Conference Mennonite Church, the enterprise would have failed financially. When Hege lost his private income in 1934 (except for a small pension) as financial writer on a Frankfurt newspaper, the German Mennonites, primarily through the organization known as "Mennonitisches Hilfswerk Christenpflicht," led by Michael Horsch, came to the rescue with a regular, though slender, monthly stipend to enable Hege to continue his editorial work unhindered for the remaining years of his life.

World War II was the final catastrophe. Both men sacrificed practically all their personal resources to keep the Lexikon going, and upon their decease no resources were available to continue the unfinished project. Many of the original contributors had died in the course of the 35 years since 1913, and a number of the promising younger German Mennonite scholars fell on the battlefields. The end of the war left the German Mennonites in a seriously weakened state, financially and otherwise. A great work seemed destined to remain incomplete, although approximately 75 per cent of the remaining articles from "O" to "Z" as planned by the original editors, had been assembled in wholly or partially complete manuscript form, and a considerable body of notes intended for the supplementary volume of revisions and additions had also been gathered, all of which fortunately survived the devastation of war, since Hege had retired from Frankfurt to the relative security of Eichstätt in central Bavaria, and Neff remained in the rather remote village of Weierhof in the Palatinate. Eberhard Teufel of Stuttgart-Fellbach became the custodian of Hege's materials after his death, including the remaining manuscripts and supplementary notes.

At this stage, in 1945-46, soon after the close of the war, the American Mennonite scholars and publishers interested in the publication of the MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA drew up plans which included sufficient financial and moral support to make possible the completion of the Lexikon in a reasonable time, provided German Mennonite scholars would resume the leadership in the project laid down by Hege and Neff. The MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA organization offered to furnish the paper for printing and whatever financial subsidy was needed, in return for translation rights in the English language, giving the Lexikon in turn translation rights for the ENCYCLOPEDIA. Fortunately H. S. Bender, as the representative of the ENCYCLOPEDIA, was able to negotiate such an agreement in September 1946 in Germany with Christian Neff and with the surviving heir of the late Christian Hege, his daughter Adele Hege of Eichstätt, Bavaria. Bender, one of the coeditors of the MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA, was designated by Neff to be coeditor of the Lexikon in place of Hege. Upon the death of Neff in December 1946, Ernst Crous, a German Mennonite scholar, formerly librarian in the Prussian State Library in Berlin, now living in retirement in Göttingen, Germany, was designated to be the successor of Neff as the other coeditor.

Since the new editors were unable to finance the enterprise themselves and therefore could not serve as publishers as their predecessors had done, they secured the agreement of the two Mennonite church conferences in Germany to take over this function. This was done through the creation of a "Lexikon Committee" composed of six men, viz., the two editors, plus one official representative of each conference, Abram Braun of Ibersheim for the Vereinigung der Deutschen Mennoniten-Gemeinden, and Fritz Hege of Reutlingen for the Badisch-Württembergisch-Bayerischer Gemeindeverband, and two co-opted members, namely Gerrit van Delden of Gronau as treasurer, and Heinrich Schneider of Karlsruhe as printer. The two conferences guaranteed to underwrite one half of the possible deficit (Vereinigung two sixths and Verband one sixth), while the MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA assumed the other half. The Lexikon Committee became the official manager of the enterprise and publisher, but with no functions in the field of editorial control. To aid them in the editorial work the editors secured the assistance of a board of associate editors composed of the following scholars: for Germany, Emil Händiges of Monsheim, B. H. Unruh of Karlsruhe, Horst Quiring of Stuttgart, Otto Schowalter of Hamburg, Gerhard Hein of Sembach, and Eberhard Teufel of Stuttgart; for Switzerland, Samuel Geiser of Brügg bei Biel; for Holland, N. van der Zijpp.

Ernst Crous has carried the main burden of the editorial work, with H. S. Bender as assistant and counselor. After an interruption of slightly more than eight years publication was resumed in January 1951 with installment No. 37; No. 41 appeared in the summer of 1957, reaching the letter "R." The new printer is the Mennonite firm of Heinrich Schneider in Karlsruhe. The size of the edition was formerly some 3,500, but since 1951 has been less.

The coverage of the Lexikon has been strong in strictly historical articles, particularly in Anabaptism and European Mennonitism, less strong in the field of American Mennonitism and in the areas of missions and education, and the social, economic, and cultural aspects of Anabaptist-Mennonite history and life. H.S.B.

Mennonursing, since 1947 called The Christian Nurse, an 8-page 6 x 9 in. journal, the official organ of the Mennonite (MC) Nurses' Association, printed at Scottdale, Pa., was founded in March 1945 as a quarterly and changed to a bimonthly in 1949. The first editor was Verna Zimmerman, followed by Elizabeth Erb 1945-46, Orpah Mosemann 1946-51, Mabel Brunk 1951-52, Clara Headrick 1952-54, Ruth Lederach 1954-56, and Margaret Brubacher Ashley 1956- . M.Sw.

Mennoscah, Camp, located on the Ninnescah River one and a half mile southwest of Murdock, Kan., with a camp site of 160 acres, was acquired in 1948 as the General Conference Western District Young People's recreation grounds. The camp was opened in 1949. By 1954, six cabins had been built in addition to the dining hall and kitchen. The camp is in use throughout the summer, primarily by young people but also by other groups such as Mennonite Men (q.v.). The first managers and caretakers were Mr. and Mrs. A. Theodore Mueller. C.K.

Loris Habegger, "Realizing a Dream," Menn. Life IX (January 1954) 16-18.

Menno-Stiftung (Menno Endowment). Heinrich Neufeld (q.v.), the pastor of the Ibersheim (q.v.), Palatinate, Germany, Mennonite congregation, published in commemoration of the third centennial of the death of Menno an appeal to all the Mennonite churches in the Old World and the New to create a general fund for the support of the widows of Mennonite ministers and a large endowment for Mennonite students of theology (Menn. Bl., 1859, 23). Carl J. van der Smissen, pastor of the Friedrichstadt congregation, took up the idea and named it Menno-Stiftung. He envisioned a comprehensive world-wide federation of Mennonites. The proposal was warmly welcomed by Johannes Risser (q.v.) and Johannes Molenaar (q.v.), with the amendment that a fund be established in each congregation for church expenses and needs under this name. Christian Schmutz (q.v.) of Rappenau, however, rejected the idea. Only the Friedelsheim congregation has a "Menno-Stift," which has served the congregation well. (ML III, 112.) NEFF.

Mennoville Mennonite Church (GCM), near El Reno, Canadian Co., Okla., now extinct, was established about 1891 as the first Mennonite church of Oklahoma. In 1893 the congregation built a small frame church, which is located southwest of the Darlington Mennonite mission station. For a while it was a fair-sized congregation, but most of the members moved away. The last service in the church was held in 1952. The original church building, the oldest in Oklahoma, is now in custody of the Western District Historical Committee. C.K.

Marvin Kroeker, "Mennonites in the Oklahoma 'Run,'" Menn. Life X (July 1955) 114; files of the Western District Historical Committee.

Meno (Okla.) is a small town about 16 miles west of Enid in Major Co., Okla., in a wheat-growing area. Most of the 175 inhabitants are Mennonites of Polish and Russian Mennonite descent, and members of the New Hopedale Mennonite Church (GCM). The Oklahoma Bible Academy (q.v.) is located here. "Meno" is a corruption of "Menno" (after Menno Simons). The town has a grain elevator with a capacity of 190,000 bu. and can easily handle 300,000 bu. per year. It handles also flour, feed, coal, fertilizer, and other commodities. It also has a good bank which has deposits of $707,354.93 and the depositors are guaranteed up to $10,000. H.U.S.

Men-O-Lan, Quakertown, Pa., is the camp site of the Eastern District Conference (GCM), located one mile east of Finland, Milford Twp., Bucks Co. Development started in 1938 with twenty-three acres of woodland donated by J. Walter Landis, which was increased to ninety-two acres in 1954. The first camp program was held in July 1941. Equipment, buildings, and land were evaluated at $74,410 in 1956. Developments include three workers' cabins, seven cabins, auditorium, dining hall-kitchen, washrooms, nature trails, artificial lake, two wells, caretaker's apartment, and the Landis Memorial Chapel. Weekly Sunday-school services are held in the chapel. Program planning is the responsibility of the Retreat Committee. The camp is administered by a Board of Managers of nine members elected by the Eastern District Conference. M.SH.

J. E. Fretz, "Retreat Camp Grounds Men-O-Lan," Menn. Life II (July 1947) 6 f.; Report of the Eastern District Conference, 1938, 1956.

Menonit, Der, a drama by Ernst von Wildenbruch (1845-1909), a superpatriotic German author, written in 1877. It has for its setting the Mennonites of East Prussia during the Wars of Liberation from Napoleon (1806-13), and as its theme a young Mennonite's conflict between patriotic duty and conscience, loosely based on an actual incident in which a young Mennonite who had served in the army was refused membership in his congregation. The drama, poor in literary quality, shows not the least understanding of the position of the Mennonites, portraying them as self-centered and stupid egoists. The play reached the Mannheim stage in 1882. Mennonite reaction was prompt. Articles were published in a number of Mennonite journals, written by Mennonites such as H. van der Smissen and H. G. Mannhardt, and a letter by Wildenbruch written in reply to the protest by the consistory of the Danzig Mennonite Church was published in the Mennonitische Blätter. (See Literature.) E.H.B.

Berthold Litzmann, ed., Ernst von Wildenbruch, Gesammelte Werke VII (Berlin, 1912) 135-233; "Der Menonit," MQR XVIII (January 1944) 22-35; H. van der Smissen, "Die Mennoniten auf der Bühne," Menn. Bl., XXIX (November 1882) 86 f.; H. G. Mannhardt, "Die Mennoniten in der dramatischen Literatur," Jahrbuch 1883, 23-73; idem, "Der Bischof Eylert und die Mennoniten," Menn. Bl., XXXI (March 1884) 17-20; "Noch einmal der Menonit, Correspondenz zwischen dem Vorstand der Gemeinde zu Danzig und Ernst von Wildenbruch," Menn. Bl., XXXV (1888) 61 f., 74 f., 97 ff., 110 f., 119; "Amerikanische Urtheile über Wildenbruchs Menonit," Menn. Bl., XXXVIII (1891) 142.

Mensingeweer, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, in the former Marne (q.v.) region. In 1607 Jan Cornelissen is called the "bishop and preacher of the Mennonites at Mensingeweer." There was, however, no congregation here. The Mennonite congregations in this region greatly decreased both in number of congregations and in membership in the 17th century. On Nov. 11, 1816, Houwerzijl (or Vliedorp), Ulrum, den Hoorn, Rasquert, and Obergum merged. A centrally located church was built at Mensingeweer, dedicated on April 4, 1819, and soon also a parsonage. An organ was acquired in 1899. The baptized membership numbered 21 at the time of the merger; 75 in 1861; 95 in 1900; 75 in 1956. The first minister was S. K. de Waard, serving here 1821-26, followed by J. Leendertz 1832-37, I. de Stoppelaar Blijdenstein 1838-39, W. Bruin 1840-44, D. S. Huizinga 1846-47, H. ten Cate Hoedemaker 1849-50, H. A. van Gelder 1851-53, J. P. Müller 1854-57, A. Vis 1861-63, J. A. Oosterbaan 1863-66, G. Vrijer Azn. 1868-73, A. Sipkema 1874-81, F. J. de Holl after a long vacancy 1897-1900, T. J. van der Ploeg 1901-3, E. Pekema 1904-7, C. C. de Maar 1907-10, F. H. Pasma 1913-16, P. Vis 1917-20; after another period of vacancy it was served by the pastor of Noorbroek 1924-45, and the pastor of Uithuizen 1946-50; since 1954 J. Lange has been the pastor of the Mensingeweer congregation. Recently a new parsonage was acquired at Eenrum. There is a ladies' circle. vdZ.

S. E. Wieling, Inwijding van de Nieuwe Kerk der Doopsgez. Gemeente Mensingeweer (Groningen, 1819); P. Vis, "Gedenkrede" (Ms. 1919); DJ 1850, 59 f.; ML III, 115.

Mental Hospitals, Mennonite. The earliest beginnings of Mennonite interest in the care of the mentally ill are hidden in obscurity. We know, however, that the first Mennonite mental institution, and the only one established in Europe, was "Bethania" (q.v.), founded in 1910 by the Allgemeine Bundeskonferenz (q.v.) of the Mennonites of Russia, and located near Alt-Kronsweide in the Choritiza district. Motivated by a spirit of Christian compassion and of mutual aid and modeled after the Bethel institution near Bielefeld, Germany, Bethania built up a truly honorable record of service. But the disruptions of World War I, the following Communist revolution, and finally the flooding of this area by the large Dnieprostroy dam brought this great Mennonite venture to a close in 1927. Mennonite patients were given preference in the Bethania program, but as a matter of fact it cared for many non-Mennonite Russian and Jewish patients. Its treatment program followed the most enlightened practices of the time. It admitted as patients the mentally ill, both acute and chronic, epileptics, and the mentally retarded.

In the United States and Canada the pioneering years reveal little interest in an institution for the mentally ill. But as Mennonite communities stabilized and the interest in missions and education increased and the conference organization and program of service became more effective, there emerged an increasing concern for the mentally ill. This interest asserted itself in hospital circles and in sessions of conference. However, considerations of cost, the lack of leadership trained in this service, and especially the lack of a great inner compulsion caused hesitation and checked all positive action.

The only exception to this was an indirect continuation of Bethania, the Bethesda Mental Hospital (q.v.), of the Mennonite Brethren Church of Ontario, at Vineland, Ont. It was begun in 1932 by Mr. and Mrs. Henry Wiebe, who had formerly worked in Bethania and came to Canada in 1924. They took the first patient into their home near Stratford, Ont., in 1932, then purchased a farm near Vineland in 1937 where they began their work in the full sense as a private institution. In 1947 it was taken over by the Ontario District M.B. Conference.

World War II in an unexpected manner focused Mennonite attention on the tragic plight of the mentally ill and made them sensitively conscious of this field of human neglect. Some 1,500 young Mennonite conscientious objectors in the United States who were drafted into the Civilian Public Service program sought service in mental hospitals in order to relieve the critical shortage of attendants in these institutions. Seeing the need and seeking to meet it "in the name of Christ," they caught a vision of a great service of Christian love the Mennonite church could and should render.

When this concern was presented to the MCC annual meeting on Dec. 27, 1944, it received a sympathetic hearing but it was thought best to refer this matter to the MCC "constituent groups for whatever expression they may have to give." The General Conference Mennonite Church, convening for its triennial conference session in North Newton, Kan., in June 1945, was the first to take action. It urged the Board of Christian Service "to co-operate with the MCC" in establishing a mental institution and to proceed independently if the MCC failed to act. Other conferences in due course took similar favorable action.

This strong resolution was presented to the MCC Executive Committee at its next session only four days later. Greatly heartened by this initial response the Executive Committee appointed a Study Committee ". . . to ascertain the extent of mental illness and mental deficiency among our people, and thus the need for church-administered institutional care; second, to survey the types of institutional care which can best be provided; and, third, to present the informational bases upon which decisions can be made as to whether there should be a joint conference effort in this institutional program."

The extensive study which brought together the results (1) of a questionnaire mailed to 1,070 Mennonite ministers, (2) of investigations of various types of mental institutions, and (3) of interviews with heads of mental health departments of state and federal governments, gave a survey not only of the extent of mental illness in the MCC constituency, but also of the probable cost of a mental hospital program and the available resources of personnel. It was a sobering and yet challenging report.

Plans matured slowly but events pressed for decision. A master plan was adopted by the MCC annual meeting on Jan. 3, 1947. This plan, now realized, envisioned the establishment of three small mental institutions strategically located in the east, the west, and in the central area. Brook Lane Farm (q.v.) near Leitersburg, Md., with a capacity of 23 patients, was dedicated in November 1949; Kings View Homes (q.v.) near Reedley, Cal., with a capacity of 31 patients, was opened in March 1951; and Prairie View Hospital (q.v.) near Newton, Kan., with a capacity of 40 patients, was dedicated March 14, 1954. Various improvements and enlargements have since been made in all three institutions. Plans are now being drawn for a fourth institution in the North central states area, with a probable location in Indiana.

The emphasis in these institutions has been on treatment rather than on custodial care, but a limited number of chronic patients have been admitted. Psychiatrists had to be recruited from non-Mennonite ranks but great care was used to secure a staff sympathetic to Mennonite Christian concerns in this undertaking. Voluntary service personnel used as attendants and staff workers wherever possible likewise had to measure up to certain standards of character, motivation, and quality of service. Mennonite patients are to receive preference but to date considerably more than half of those admitted have been non-Mennonites.

The management of the MCC mental health institutions has been placed under an incorporated board called Mennonite Mental Health Services (q.v.).

The Lancaster Mennonite (MC) Conference also established a mental hospital, Philhaven (q.v.), near Lebanon, Pa., as an outgrowth of the experiences of CO's in World War II. Established in 1952 and since enlarged, it is now the largest Mennonite mental hospital, caring for both chronic and acute cases.

A small mental hospital was established in Filadelfia in Fernheim Colony, Paraguay, which to the present has been only a home for custodial care. Plans are now being made, with the help of MCC, to replace it with a modern type of mental health facility. (Menn. Life IX (July 1954), Mental Health Issue.) H.A.F.

Mente Jan Heynendochter (Clementia Heymen), wife of the Anabaptist martyr Bartholomeus van den Berge (q.v.) of Dieteren, now Dutch province of Limburg, was arrested with her husband on the charge of Anabaptism. Whereas Bartholomeus remained steadfast, Mente recanted. She did not, however, save her life thereby; on Feb. 1, 1535, she was drowned in the Maas River at Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg. Her confession during the trial reveals some facts concerning the Anabaptists: the water with which she had been baptized was taken from a pump; Leenaert van Ysenbroeck (q.v.), who had baptized her in Dieteren, pronounced the baptismal formula according to Matt. 28:19; the Anabaptists did not observe holidays, for "one day is as good as the other." vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 114; Mellink, Wederdopers, 306.

Meppel, a city in the Dutch province of Drente, where there has been a Mennonite church since 1880. On Jan. 11, 1880, the congregation dedicated a church, for which Tj. Kielstra (q.v.) of Zwartsluis preached the dedicatory sermon. An organ was installed in 1897. Kielstra served the two congregations at Meppel and Zwartsluis (q.v.) until 1886, and was followed by H. Koekebakker, who also had charge of both churches. Since 1893 the Meppel congregation has had its own preacher. B. P. Plantinga served until 1897 (during his term a congregation was organized at Assen (q.v.), which the Meppel minister looked after), A. Binnerts Szn 1897-1902, W. J. Kühler 1902-5, and Th. H. van Veen 1905-40. In 1942-46 the Meppel congregation was served by the pastor of Steenwijk. In 1946-49 W. J. Fleischer served at Meppel, H. R. Keuring 1950-52, and L. Laurense 1953- . The union with Assen lasted until 1916. In the next year this congregation secured a pastor of its own. In 1918-40 the Meppel ministers also had pastoral charge of Zwartsluis, and since 1950 again of Assen. In 1896 the membership was 78; in 1939 it was 90, and in 1956, 145. A new parsonage was acquired in 1946. There is a women's circle, a Sunday school for children, and youth groups for ages 12-16. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 272; DB 1880, 166 f.; ML III, 115 f.) vdZ.

Mepsche, de, a noble family of governors in the Dutch province of Groningen. Whereas most of them, and particularly Johan de Mepsche, in the 16th century were ardent Catholics and devoted servants of the Spanish regime of the Duke of Alba (q.v.), which was persecuting the Anabaptists and Mennonites, a cousin, also named Johan de Mepsche, of Den Ham, joined the Mennonites about 1580, and leaving his country, his property, and his social rank for his faith he fled to Danzig, Prussia. He is said to have died of the plague at Danzig in 1588. The hypothesis that he may have been the ancestor of the Mennonite Hamm family in Prussia is probably tenable. (DB 1906, 35, 44; Gesch.-Bl. VIII, 1951, 33.) vdZ.

Meran (Italian, Merano), a city (pop. 22,000) in the Adige Valley, Austria (now Italian), until the beginning of the 15th century the capital of the Tirol and an important center on the trade route between Germany and Italy over the Jaufen pass through the Passei Valley. In the upper Adige (q.v.) Valley, the Vintschgau, Anabaptists were found in 1527. Cardinal Matthäus Lang (q.v.) of Salzburg notified the authorities of Meran and the villages in the Vintschgau of their presence. Upon the proclamation of Ferdinand's mandate of Feb. 24, 1528, offering pardon to all Anabaptists who would voluntarily report to the authorities, recant, and ask for mercy, a few appeared. In Meran several Anabaptists were brought before the magistrate, but the records do not indicate the outcome of the trial.

In May 1529 Georg Blaurock preached here as he passed through the town on his way to the Eisack Valley to take charge of the congregation there, which had been orphaned by the execution of its preacher Michael Kürschner (q.v.). His visit did not lead to the establishing of a congregation in Meran. (Loserth, Anabaptismus, 463 f., 485; ML III, 116.) Hege.

Mercer County, Pa., bordering Ohio, has two Amish (one now Mennonite) settlements. The Old Order Amish settlement northwest of Jackson Center, consisting of 109 baptized members in 1956, began in 1942 when Jacob J. Byler with his four brothers and families moved there from Atlantic, in Crawford County. Other families left Atlantic for the Jackson Center settlement because of the munitions plant established two miles from Atlantic. Eli K. Byler of Geauga Co., Ohio, served as their first bishop. In 1956 the bishop was Henry M. Miller. For an account of the Mennonites (MC) near Hadley in the same county, see Maple Grove Mennonite Church. J.A.H.

Mercken, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on Nov. 23, 1566, at Gangelt in the duchy of Jülich, Germany, just across the Dutch border. At least one other woman died with her; an old chronicle indicates that a number of Anabaptists were executed here at the same time. Mercken was (re)baptized about 1550 by Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.) at Langenrade in the district of Born, now Dutch province of Limburg. After her baptism she is said to have moved to Lübeck, Germany, with Palmen (i.e., Peter Palmen) and Heilcken (the wife of Jacob, of Heel). vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 406; II (The Hague, 1941) 364 f.; DB 1909, 121, 126.

Mercy Hospital, Inc., Moundridge, Kan., is a nonprofit institution of the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite. The conviction that the total work of the Church of Christ includes caring for the sick was shared by many of its members. A large house was purchased and remodeled into a 15-bed hospital equipped with modern facilities for major surgery and obstetrics and dedicated Oct. 15, 1944, and officially opened four days later. In 1953 a new brick fireproof addition was added, which included a clinic, emergency room, six patient rooms, an operating room, a dining room and kitchen, an office, and a waiting room, all modern and air-conditioned.

The staff consists of a resident doctor, administrator, board of directors consisting of three executive board members and four regular board members. The personnel including two to three registered nurses numbers sixteen.

The nurses' home is located across the street from the hospital. The first budget (1944) was $20,000; the present (1956) assets total $104,771.88. The hospital board is responsible to the over-all board, which in turn is responsible to the C.G.C. General Conference. P.G.H.

Mergriet Horstmans, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned at Utrecht, Netherlands, on June 11, 1539. She was the widow of Anthonis van Aldenberch, from the Bishopric of Münster, Westphalia. No further information about her was available, except that she had been (re)baptized. (Berigten Hist. Genootschap Utrecht, IV, 1851, p. 139.) vdZ.

Meridian Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located two miles east and two north of Hesston, McPherson Co., Kan., was organized by David S. Holdeman soon after he moved to this area from Indiana in 1873. Religious services were at first held in his home and later in the district schoolhouse. He was a benefactor of the community in various ways. In 1874, when many Mennonites immigrated from Russia to Kansas, he was chosen treasurer of the Kansas Relief Committee (q.v.). His sons John A. and Daniel B. were ordained to the ministry in 1882. A church was built in 1907 and enlarged in 1921 to a seating capacity of 300. It was replaced in 1953 by a new church, capacity 450. Nine ministers and four deacons have been ordained by the congregation, of whom the following are serving in 1957: Frank H. Wenger, Harry D. Wenger, Paul D. Wenger, and Milferd Wenger, ministers, and A. L. Yost, Orville E. Wiggers, and G. H. Dyck as deacons. The background of its members is largely Pennsylvania-German. The ministry is unsalaried. Religious services consist of Sunday morning and evening worship services, midweek Bible study, and Sunday school. The Sunday school was organized in 1909. Footwashing with close communion is practiced. The membership in 1957 was 194. A.L.Y.

Merlanders (or Meerlanders, i.e., Moravians) are said to have founded a small congregation near Aachen, Germany. They were "standing by themselves" and practiced communism, calling themselves the "Dutch congregation." Apparently this account concerns a congregation of Hutterites (q.v.) at Aachen, which was founded there by Hans Raiffer (q.v.) in 1557. A note concerning these "Merlanders" is found in Nicolai's insertions in the Dutch edition of Bullinger's Der Widertöufferen Ursprung. Nicolai calls them also "Apostolic Anabaptists." In 1612 Elder Jan Gerritsz (q.v.) of Danzig identified the Merlanders as Hutterites. (BRN VII, 461, 467; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2926.) vdZ.

Mersch, van der, a Dutch Mennonite family of Flemish descent. Lieven van der Mersch (b. about 1545 at Lendelede, West Flanders, d. about 1580 at Haarlem, Holland) fled to Vlissingen in the Netherlands about 1575; then he lived at Dordrecht for some time and thereupon settled at Haarlem, where he joined the Mennonites. It is not clear whether he belonged to the Mennonites before he left Flanders. Johannes van der Mersch, lord of Zuidland and Velgersdijk (Haarlem, 1679-Amsterdam, 1775), married to Petronella van Oosterwijk, was a descendant. He was a wealthy merchant at Amsterdam, a shipowner and one of the principal wholesale dealers of the Dutch East Indies trade. A few members of this family served as deacons of the Mennonite church. Jan van der Mersch (q.v.), a weaver, a native of Kortrijk, Belgium, who died there as a martyr in 1569, probably did not belong to this family. Since the name van der Meersch (q.v.) is often incorrectly written van der Mersch, it is sometimes not clear whether a person whose name is spelled van der Meersch really belongs to this family or to the van der Mersch family. (Ned. Patriciaat VIII, 1917, 298-302.) vdZ.

Merten Perboom, an Anabaptist, baptized about Christmas of 1534 by Leenaert van Ysenbroeck (q.v.) in the Palmenhuys near Born, in the duchy of Jülich, now Dutch province of Limburg, upon his arrest and trial at Maastricht, Limburg, on Jan. 29, 1535, recanted and was beheaded at the Vrijthof square of Maastricht on Feb. 1, 1535. His confession is remarkable for its information about early Aanabaptism: Merten was baptized after Leenaert had read from a book (a New Testament?). Anabaptists did not believe in purgatory. They believed that if one party of a married couple had not been rebaptized they were living in adultery. For this reason Merten had forced his wife to be baptized against her will. He also gave some information about a plan of the Anabaptists to meet in Ysenbroeck and to march to Amsterdam. This shows that early Anabaptism in this region was largely infected with revolutionary ideas. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 73, 114 f.

Mertz, Joachim: see März.

Mertz, Melchior, of Mentzingen, the unknown author of an Anabaptist hymn: "Wacht auff ir frommen Christen Vnd greiffets dapffer an." (Wolkan, Lieder, 242; ML III, 116.)

Mesdag (Mesdach, Mesdagh, Mestach, Van Mesdag), an old name of frequent occurrence in Flanders, which was also borne by many Mennonites. A Mennonite martyr of this name was Jacob (Jaques) Mesdag (q.v.), a miller and weaver of Poelkapelle, who was arrested for his faith at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Belgium, on March 1, 1566, put into heavy chains, and after 20 months of bitterest imprisonment, was burned at the stake together with three Mennonites in front of the courthouse on Nov. 8, 1567. In prison he wrote a long, deeply moving letter of farewell, full of sincere, immovable faith, to his "dear and greatly beloved chosen sister Susanneken," on Sept. 9, 1567 (Mart. Mir. D 358-366, E 715-21). This Susanna Mesdag, later living in Haarlem, Holland, was a member of the Flemish Mennonite congregation and died there about 1603.

In the course of the 16th and 17th centuries a number of Reformed and Mennonite emigrants from Flanders bearing a variant of this name are encountered in the Dutch and Frisian cities, as in Middelburg, Leiden, Haarlem, Alkmaar, Bolsward, and Harlingen; in the 17th century a portrait painter Salomon Mesdach (Reformed; d. 1644) lived in Middelburg, whose self-portrait is in the national museum in Amsterdam.

Concerning the early Mennonites of this family: About 1580 Vincent Mesdag, a miller near Kortrijk in Flanders, fled to Haarlem; his son Gillis Mesdag, a weaver, later a cloth merchant, moved to Leiden, where he played some part as a member of the Vincent de Hondt (q.v.) congregation. About 1600 another Pieter Mesdag (1537-1604) and another Gillis Mesdag, both flax merchants, moved from Flanders to Harlingen. Jaques Mesdag, a nephew of the martyr Jaques Mesdag, a thread twister, left Dixmuide, Flanders, and settled at Alkmaar. One of the descendants of this thriving Mesdag family in Holland, which has produced many respected merchants, industrialists, bankers, physicians, and pharmacists, was the attorney Taco Gillisz Mesdag, who lived in Bolsward 1752-1814; one of his daughters was the grandmother of the famous painter Sir Laurens Alma Tadema (1836-1912), who lived in London after 1870. The descendants of Taco Mesdag settled mostly in the province and city of Groningen. Of this Groningen family mention should be made of the following:

Hendrik Willem Mesdag, b. Feb. 23, 1831, at Groningen, baptized Oct. 20, 1850, d. July 10, 1915, at The Hague, a gifted painter of marine scenes, belonging to the Hague School, founder of an important collection of modern painting, in which especially the impressionistic art of Holland and France (the schools of Barbizon and The Hague) are represented in well-selected pictures; in 1903 the collection was given as a gift to the nation. He was not only very wealthy, but also a strong, leading, and farsighted personality, who promoted the essential interests of art and artists with a generous hand and clear judgment. Also as the energetic president of the artist club "Pulchri Studio" in The Hague he performed meritorious service for many years. For a long time before he devoted himself to art (1866) he had been in his father's bank; then for two years he studied under the Dutch landscape painter Willem Roelofs in Brussels (on the advice of his cousin, L. Alma Tadema, who lived there until 1870, and who also belonged to a Mennonite family) and settled in The Hague in 1868. In addition to marine pictures he painted a large panorama of Scheveningen. In Groningen a street and a public square were named for him, and in The Hague a street.

Taco Mesdag, a brother of the above, b. Sept. 21, 1829, at Groningen, baptized Oct. 20, 1850, d. Aug. 4, 1902, at first a banker and grain dealer at Groningen, then moving to Scheveningen, near The Hague; he was a landscape painter of mediocre talent. One of his pictures adorns the church council room of the Mennonite church in Groningen.

Sientje Mesdag, nee van Houten, b. Dec. 23, 1834, baptized March 28, 1852, d. March 20, 1909, wife of H. W. Mesdag and sister of the statesman, minister, and philosopher Samuel van Houten (q.v.), painted landscapes and still life, the latter showing more talent.

Geesje (Gesina) Mesdag, née van Calcar, b. at Hoogezand on July 21, 1850, d. at Scheveningen April 12, 1936, the wife of Taco Mesdag and painter of landscapes and interiors. To this family also belonged Willem Mesdag, b. Rotterdam 1896, Mennonite pastor at West-Zaan-Zuid 1924-29, Zijldijk 1929-34, Sneek 1934-46, and Zeist 1946- .

H.F.W.J., vdZ.

G. Mesdag, Jr., Het Geslacht Mesdag (Groningen, 1896); G. van Mesdag, Het Geslacht Mesdag (n.p., 1943-46); Jierboekje fan it Genealogysk Wurkforbân (Ljouwert, 1955) 67 f.; DB 1901, 211; ML III, 116 f.

Meshovius, Arnold (1591-1667), professor at the University of Cologne, wrote a book in 1617 about the Anabaptists: Historia Anabaptistica, Libri septem. He was an orthodox Catholic and the intention of the book is to "frighten Catholics away from the pestilence of these disgusting people," and "confirm them in the faith, in the doctrine, and in the practices of the Catholic Church more and more." A glance at his sources—Ambrosius Blaurer, Bullinger, Cochläus, Oecolampadius, Luther, Zwingli, Melanchthon, etc.—shows that this is a piece of propaganda. Anabaptists are revolutionaries; he discusses Carlstadt, Thomas Müntzer, Hutten, the Münsterites, and ends with the year 1536. He has nothing to say about the peaceful Anabaptists. The book was given recognition by the Catholic Church and was probably the basis for suspicions against the Mennonites in Polish Prussia. The author announced the planned continuation of his book to cover the period 1536-1618, likewise in seven books. Apparently he did not get this done. (ML III, 117.) H.Q.

Messchaert (Messchert), an old Dutch Mennonite family, whose progenitor Dirk Messchaert (b. 1555) came from Meenen, West Flanders, Belgium, and settled in Haarlem, Holland, in 1580. Later the family was distributed in Rotterdam and Hoorn and several villages in North Holland. In Rotterdam, more than 20 members of this family have served as deacons since 1658. They belonged to the Waterlander congregation. Dirk Jans Messchaert, who had been chosen as deacon with some other members, opposed the church board about 1665 because of their complacent attitude to the Collegiants (q.v.). In Hoorn the Messchaert family belonged to the strict conservative Mennonites. In the 18th century some of them were in sympathy with the pietistic views of the Moravian Brethren (Herrnhuter). Dirk Messchaert of Hoorn, married to Janneken Beets, in 1736 joined this group and sent their son Peter to the Moravian school at Herrnhut. Nicolaas Messchaert of Hoorn in 1771 received a visit from the Count von Zinzendorf (q.v.). To this family also belonged Nicolaes Messchaert, b. July 19, 1774, at Hoorn, died of the plague July 13, 1833, at Utrecht, who had not studied at a university or the Amsterdam Seminary, but was trained by P. van Dokkumburg (q.v.), pastor of Koog-Zaandijk; he was pastor of the Mennonite church at Noordzijpe (Oude Sluis) 1794, Blokzijl 1796, Grouw 1800, and Rotterdam 1802-33, and was also a writer and school inspector. In the library of the Amsterdam Mennonite Church some of his sermons are found. He published De zegen van den openbaren Godsdienst (Rotterdam, 1825) a sermon preached at Rotterdam on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the church; a sermon preached at Rotterdam May 6, 1827, commemorating his 25 years as a minister in Rotterdam entitled De Aanmoediging en het Loon van den Getrouwen Evangeliedienaar (Rotterdam, 1827); Leerredenen ter verklaring van het Evangelie van Johannes (Delft, 1825-31); and Onderzoek naar den inhoud en het wezen des Christendoms (Rotterdam, 1835).

Willem Messchert, b. March 3, 1790, at Rotterdam, d. there Feb. 14, 1844, was a brewer, later a bookdealer, also writer and poet of mediocre talent. He joined the Réveil (q.v.), a revival movement in Holland, about 1825, and leaving the Mennonite Church he joined the Reformed Church in 1829.

Johannes Martinus Messchaert, b. Aug. 22, 1857, at Hoorn, baptized there in 1876, was a concert singer, professor at the conservatory in Amsterdam (1881-1905), the conservatory at Frankfurt (from 1905), the University of Berlin (from 1911), and at the conservatory of Zürich (from 1920). He was a high-minded, gifted, and distinguished artist, who made incomparable achievements in the field of the oratorio as well as the song in all the capitals and music centers of Europe and earned great fame. In Hoorn a monument was erected to him on May 24, 1930; a street had already been named for him both in Hoorn and Amsterdam. His portrait by Jan Veth is in the museum at Amsterdam. In 1885 he married Johanna Jacoba Alma, of an old Mennonite family in Friesland. He died at Zürich, Switzerland, on Sept. 10, 1922. H.F.W.J., vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 63; II, 99, 143 f.; Ned. Patriciaat XVI (1926) 212-36; N.N.B.Wb. II, 907; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, Nos. 400-12; DJ 1840, 111; DB 1864, 120; 1895, 122-25; 1901, 21; 1911, 70; Catalogus Amst., 294, 313, 319; J. H. Letzer, Muzikaal Nederland 1850-1910; P. Frank, Kurzgefasstes Tonkünsterlexikon (1926); W. Lütjeharms, Het philadelphisch-oecumenisch streven der Hernhutters, . . . (Zeist, 1935) 56, 78; ML III, 117.

Messenger of Truth is the official organ of the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite. It began as a monthly 4-page supplement, 8 x 11 in., to the Botschafter der Wahrheit in January 1903. John D. Dueck was acting editor for three years. On Feb. 18, 1906, F. C. Fricke was chosen editor, which office he filled for 36 years. Reuben J. Koehn became the editor Jan. 1, 1943. During the 54 years of its existence the Messenger of Truth has been printed in Hillsboro, Kan., Ithaca, Mich., Scottdale, Pa., and Newton, Kan. It is printed at present (1957), by Herald Publishing Co. of Newton, as a biweekly of 12 pages, 8 x 11 in. The circulation is a little over 3,000. P.G.H.

Messiah College, located at Grantham, Pa., was founded in Harrisburg, Pa., by the Brethren in Christ Church in 1909, primarily in response to a need for trained workers in foreign mission work. This foreign mission program, which had been started on a small scale in the 19th century, had grown to such an extent that the need for missionaries with a broad educational foundation was apparent. The church responded to this need by launching the institution under the name Messiah Bible School and Missionary Training Home. In 1911 the school was moved from Harrisburg to Grantham, eleven miles south, with a more suitable environment and a less limited site. At the time, in addition to religious and Christian service education, it provided courses in secular fields including education for public school teachers. In 1920 junior college courses were added, and in 1921 the first class to complete a junior college program of study in the state of Pennsylvania was graduated from Messiah Bible School.

The growth of the institution and the expansion of the program made desirable a change in name. Consequently on May 12, 1924, the school was rechartered as Messiah Bible College. Pennsylvania State University accredited the junior college division in 1928. On May 6, 1946, the Pennsylvania State Council of Education officially approved the institution as a junior college.

The growth of the College has been steady and continuous. Upon recommendation of a study committee surveying higher educational needs in the Brethren in Christ Church, the general conference of 1948 requested the college to provide more adequately for the education of ministers, missionaries, and Christian workers by providing a five-year theological course on the collegiate level leading to the Th.B. degree. To meet this demand the educational program was expanded and the financial standing of the institution strengthened. The court approved amendments to the charter on Jan. 15, 1951, changing the name to Messiah College and granting legal authority to confer degrees. The Pennsylvania State Council of Education approved Messiah College as a degree-granting institution on Feb. 12, 1951.

The College is governed by a board of fourteen trustees appointed by and subject to the General Conference of the Brethren in Christ Church.

The Messiah College campus consists of 72 acres located on the eastern edge of the town of Grantham. Its educational plant consists of five buildings as follows: the administration building, a large four-story brick structure erected in 1911, containing offices, classrooms, chapel, library, and rooms for seventy men students; Hill View, remodeled in 1946 from a private residence, housing the music department; Science Hall, a two-story building erected in 1914; the auditorium-gymnasium, with an auditorium seating 1,000, erected in 1935; and Musser Industrial Arts Building, a two-story building erected in 1940. Four additional buildings are used for housing: the women's dormitory, a four-story building with rooms for eighty women students, erected in 1948; the apartment hall, providing six family-unit apartments, erected in 1952; the president's home; and Lawn Annex, a combined apartment and dormitory building. A new library is in process of construction. When it is finished, Messiah College's investment in buildings, grounds, and equipment will exceed $700,000.

In 1956-57 Messiah College had a teaching faculty of 23 and a full-time enrollment of 111. Seventy per cent of the enrollment is from Pennsylvania, but twelve states and several foreign countries contribute students. Three fourths of the students are members of the Brethren in Christ Church, as are four fifths of the faculty. The school publishes the bimonthly Messiah College Bulletin and a student annual called The Clarion.

Presidents of the school from the beginning have been S. R. Smith, 1910-16; C. N. Hostetter, Sr., 1917-22; Enos H. Hess, 1922-34; C. N. Hostetter, Jr., 1934- . H.S.B.

Metamora (Ill.) Mennonite Church (MC), originally known as the Partridge Creek or Springbay Church, was organized in 1833 by Christian Engel in the home of his son John Engel one mile west of Metamora. Christian Engel, the first Amish bishop in America west of Ohio, served as bishop of this congregation until his death in 1838. The Partridge congregation at one time had 13 ordained ministers, four of whom were bishops. Services were held in the homes until 1854, when the Partridge brick church was built, which served until 1889, when a frame building was erected one mile east of Metamora. For many years services were held every other Sunday, alternating with the Roanoke Church.

The Metamora and Roanoke congregations together purchased an abandoned Baptist church building seven miles north of Eureka in 1905, rebuilt it, and called it the Harmony Church. When the Roanoke congregation built its own meetinghouse it left the Harmony work in charge of the Metamora congregation. Services were held regularly each alternate Sunday in the Metamora church. On intervening Sundays the congregation divided between the Union church near Washington, Ill., and the Harmony church. In 1929 the Harmony and Union churches were closed. The Harmony building was moved to Pleasant Hill, near Morton, and is being used by the congregation there as a house of worship. The membership of the Metamora congregation in 1955 was 388, with Roy Bucher as pastor and Howard J. Zehr as bishop. The congregation is a member of the Illinois Conference. H. R. Schertz (1886-1954) served as minister in 1917-54, bishop 1941-54, and outstanding leader of the Metamora Mennonite Church, with the exception of a period of about three years (1920-23), when he served as superintendent of the Chicago Home Mission. (ML III, 117.) H.R.S., H.S.B.

Metken, an Anabaptist martyr, wife of Jacob Vrencken, born at Roosteren, Montfort district, in the duchy of Gelre, now province of Limburg, was baptized in 1535 by Jan Smeitgen van Tricht (q.v.) in the home of Herman van den Berge (q.v.), heard Menno Simons preach in 1545 in Visschersweert (q.v.), where she lived, was imprisoned at Valkenburg (Dutch province of Limburg) on Aug. 22, 1547, and soon afterward, remaining steadfast, suffered a martyr's death; her two sisters and her brother had been executed earlier. She was the mother of five children and 35 years of age. Her husband, also a Mennonite, had left Visschersweert five or six days before she was arrested. Her confession gives interesting information about the Mennonite faith and Mennonite practices and doctrines. Metken's daughter Mariken of about 12 years, was also examined. She reported that she had often seen her mother reading a little booklet, "which she called the New Testament." Mariken, though she had never been in a church, knew the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' Creed in the Dutch language. Her parents had also taught her a prayer (to be spoken before the meals), which she then recited. This is indeed a fine example of true Christian education. NEFF, VDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 343; DB 1864, 147 ff.; 1890, 56, 60; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het Bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 325-27, 398-401; ML III, 118.

Metselaer, Gommer de, an Anabaptist martyr: see Gom(m)er de Metser.

Metselaer, Jacob de, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jacob Daneels.

Metselaer, Jelis de, an Anabaptist martyr: see Gillis van Havre.

Metselaer, Peter, an Anabaptist martyr: see Peter Witses.

Metzler, a Lancaster Mennonite family. Yost Metzler, who came to Philadelphia on Sept. 9, 1738, and his son Valentine, aged 12, settled in Lancaster Co., Pa., the father dying early. Valentine (Feb. 14, 1726-July 24, 1783) was married on Nov. 19, 1749, to Anna Nissley (Nov. 3, 1727-March 29, 1793). He lived on the site east of the present Stehli Silk Mill, Lancaster. He was ordained in the 1760's as minister and in 1778 as bishop. His children included (1) Maria, wife of Bishop Jacob Hostetter, (2) Abraham, who lived at Metzler Meetinghouse, W. Earl Twp., Lancaster County, (3) John, (4) Henry of Strasburg, a preacher, (5) Ann, wife of Christian Hess, a preacher in the Hershey (Hess) congregation in the Pequea, (6) Christian, an active church worker of Roseville, (7) Martin of Warwick, and (8) Elizabeth Fry of Landisville. At least by 1831 descendants of Abraham were living in Beaver Twp., Columbiana Co., Ohio, where the Metzler congregation was founded in neighboring Mahoning County. From here Noah Metzler went to Yellow Creek, Elkhart Co., Ind., where he became a preacher. Other descendants of Abraham in Pennsylvania were Bishop Abram of Martinsburg and his sons, Isaac Metzler of Glade, Md., and Abram J. Metzler of Scottdale, Pa. Abram Metzler (q.v.), superintendent of the West Liberty Children's Home, was also a descendant. I.D.L.

Metzler, Abram (1854-1918) a native of Mahoning Co., Ohio, was a progressive worker in the Mennonite Church (MC), being especially interested in Sunday-school work and in the young people's Bible meetings. In November 1899 he was chosen as superintendent of the Mennonite Orphans' Home at Smithville, Ohio. A few months later the home was removed to West Liberty, Ohio, and he accompanied the children to the new location. It was he who succeeded in establishing the children's home at West Liberty financially and in every other way. He wrote articles and poems for the Herald of Truth, and juvenile stories for the Beams of Light and the Words of Cheer. He resigned in 1917 because of a breakdown in health, and died Oct. 27, 1918, during the influenza epidemic. J.C.W.

John Umble, Mennonite Pioneers (Elkhart, 1940) 21-38.

Metzler Mennonite Church (MC) in West Earl Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., a member of the Lancaster Conference, was named for Jacob Metzler, who on May 6, 1927, donated 60 perches of land to the trustees of the congregation. This was the home district of Bishop Christian Burkholder (1746-1809). Earlier the members had worshiped in private homes or at Groffdale, which was always a part of the circuit. Jacob Weber and Jacob Stauffer, two of the ministers here, led the schism which resulted in the Stauffer Mennonites (Pike meetinghouse) in 1845. The Metzler meetinghouse was enlarged in 1864. A new one 40 x 62 ft. was built in 1897 and renovated and enlarged in 1952. In 1956 the congregation numbered 235, with Eli G. Sauder, John S. Martin, Amos H. Sauder, and Paul S. Wenger as preachers. I.D.L.

Meulen, Jacob ter, b. Oct. 3, 1884, at The Hague, Holland, a Dutch Mennonite, married to Wilhelmina Bosboom, studied history and was librarian of the Peace Palace at The Hague 1924-52. He is particularly known for his publications on the Dutch Pacifist Hugo de Groot (Grotius), collaborating with P. J. J. Diermanse in publishing Bibliographie des écrits imprimés de Hugo Grotius (The Hague, 1950). He was one of the first Dutch pacifists and an active member of the Mennonite Peace Association (Arbeidsgroep, q.v., tegen de Krijgsdienst). Jacob ter Meulen is the son of François Pieter ter Meulen (1843-1927), who after studying Latin and Greek lived at The Hague and became a painter; he was an active president of the painters' association Pulchri Studio.

Hendrik ter Meulen (1841-73) was an uncle of Jacob ter Meulen. He studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and served as pastor at Hoorn on the island of Texel 1865-68 and at Rottevalle-Witveen 1868-73. In the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen he published a paper, "Iets over de Gezangen bij de Doopsgezinden." VDZ.

Meulen, van der (van der Muelen, van der Molen, Vermeulen), is a common family name in Flanders and the Netherlands, both Mennonite and non-Mennonite. There were two martyrs by this name: Pieter van der Meulen (q.v.) and Tanneken van der Meulen (q.v.), both of Gent. Jacob Pietersz van der Meulen (q.v.) was a noted elder of the Old Flemish Mennonites at Haarlem, Holland. Quirijn van der Meulen (q.v.) (Krijn Vermeulen) was an elder at Danzig, Prussia; Jacob van der Meulen (q.v.) a preacher at Leiden, Holland. In Leiden too there were in the 17th-18th centuries a number of deacons by this name. In recent times Karst Sybrand van der Meulen (b. 1838 at Sneek, d. 1927 at Amersfoort), educated at the Amsterdam Theological Seminary, served as pastor at Terschelling 1863-65 and Nieuwe Niedorp 1865-1904; in 1904 he retired. His son Sipke Inne van der Meulen (b. 1889 at Nieuwe Niedorp) studied at the university and the seminary at Amsterdam and was a minister of Terschelling 1913-16, Balk 1916-22, Ytens 1922-29, Akkrum 1929-43, and Heerenveen 1943-54. In 1954 he retired. vdZ.

Meulen, Jacob Pietersz van der (also Vermeulen, van der Muelen, van der Mullen, van der Moelen, van der Molen) (d. after 1631), was an elder of the Old Flemish (Huiskopers) Mennonite congregation of Haarlem, Holland. About 1590 he and Hans de Wever (Hans Busschaert, q.v.) banned the "Bekommerden" (q.v.) and their leader Quirijn van der Meulen (q.v.) of Danzig, and also Paulus Bussemaker (q.v.) of Danzig and his group called "Heylsamen" (q.v.). But in 1598 he was banned himself by Hans de Wever, because he refused to exclude a member of his congregation for bankruptcy. Then Jacob Pietersz and his followers, called Vermeulensvolk or Bankroetiers, formed a congregation of their own. Yet he was the man who, perhaps having become wise by experience, sought to restore peace; in 1600 when Hans de Ries (q.v.), the Waterlander elder, wrote a letter to him to make peace, he eagerly took up the idea. After the negotiations had been carried on for some time by letter, a conference was held at Haarlem on June 29, 1605, between de Ries and his followers and Jacob Pietersz and his adherents. Here the different views of both groups concerning intermarriage, marital avoidance, ban, rebaptism of members of other churches who wished to join the group were discussed. Apparently the Waterlanders could not agree with the rather conservative principles of the Vermeulensvolk; at any rate the negotiations were broken off. A second meeting of Jacob Pietersz and de Ries in October 1606 likewise failed to heal the breach between the two groups.

Concerning the private life of Jacob Pietersz there is little information. He was probably born in Flanders and died at a very advanced age. He was probably a businessman, because he is said to have once stayed for a long time at Vilna, Lithuania, on business. Kühler is of the opinion that he was "one of the cleverest and most versatile of the educated Mennonites" of this period. With a sympathy rarely found at that time, he spoke about the poor Indians of America, who were victims of the covetousness and fanaticism of the Spaniards.

Jacob Pietersz, believing that the rise of Catholicism in the Netherlands about 1600 represented a danger, wrote a remarkable book on the Apostolic Succession. The title reads: Successio Apostolica, Dat is, Naecominghe oft de Naetredinghe der Apostelen . . . (Alkmaar, 1600). In this book he defends the thesis that true apostolic succession is not guaranteed by an unbroken line of consecrated clergymen (as taught in the Catholic Church) who are warranted to administer the holy offices of the church, but that the "apostolic successors" are those who follow Christ and obey His commandments; they are not committed to any succession of place or person, but only to the succession of the evangelical confession. The Christian church is apostolic, not on the basis of the succession of its ministers, but on the basis of its spiritual relationship with the church of the apostles, and the true Christian is not the one who belongs to a church in which there is a continuous chain of ministers from the days of old, but the one who knows the voice of the Good Shepherd and who bears witness of the forgiveness of sins. Whoever thus believes is a member of the church, and the church is found wherever such believers have united. All the rest are the synagogue of Satan.

Van der Meulen's Successio Apostolica was countered by two Catholic authors: the Jesuit Fransciscus Costerus wrote Toetsteen van de versierde apostolische successie eens wederdoopers Jacob Pietersen van der Molen (Antwerp, 1603) and V. P. (probably Simon Walraven, q.v.) published Successio Anabaptistica, Dat is Babel der Wederdopers, eensdeels in Duytsland, maer principael in Nederlandt, . . . (Cologne, 1603, reprint Cologne, 1612, re-edition in BRN VII by S. Cramer with introduction, The Hague, 1910).

Besides his Successio Apostolica Jacob Pietersz van der Meulen published a number of books: Een gantsch Claer Grondighe bewijsinghe ende Onderrechtinghe van der Doope (1581, reprint Haarlem, 1627); Verantwoordinge eender Requeste (1597); Defensio, wt de Heylighe Godlijcke Schriftuere, dat strijdende Menschelijcke Vernuft, opinie ende schadelijcke dwalinghe wech neemt, . . . (Alkmaar, 1599); Ondersoeckinge der Pausgesinde Leere (1600); Declaratio, oft Openbare vertooninghe . . . teghen sekere gedichte Calumnien, . . . (Alkmaar, 1600); Collatio: S. Scripture, Dat is, Verghelijckinge der H. schrifturen in verscheyden geloofs-saken, . . . (Dordrecht, 1602, reprint with appendix, Dordrecht, 1602); Vertoogh aen de Succesoors des Jesuijts D. Francisci Costeri, . . . (Alkmaar, 1604); Dialogus, Dat is een t'samensprekinghe tusschen verscheyden persoonen, . . . (Dordrecht, 1602); Ontschuldinghe oft Nootelicke verantwoordinghe tegen Lasterlijcke Schriften (1603); Christelijcke Onderrichtinghe, oft een clare Onderwijsinghe, met grondighe Belijdenisse der voorneemste Poincten der heylsamer Leere, . . . (Alkmaar, 1609); Historia Ecclesiastica. Een Kercken Historie, . . . (Haarlem, 1614), with an appendix to this work entitled Historia der Kerckenhandel . . . (Haarlem, 1614), in which Kerckenhandel he also gives an account of two disputations he held with Catholics at Haarlem in 1614, the first on Jan. 14, the second shortly after. He published further: Apocalypsis, ofte de Openbaringhe Joannis (Haarlem, 1614); Proeve van de Kerckelijcke Regeeringhe, ofte Ordinatien der Ghemeynten Christi (Haarlem, 1621); Evangelische Expositien (Haarlem, 1623); Veilighe Wech ofte Raet om hem in't bannen ofte veroordelen niet te vergrijpen (Amsterdam, 1631). His book Verclaringe uyt de Godtlycke Schriftuere, Hoe haer de Gemeente Christi moet bewysen neffens die Broeders die (na datse haer in de Gemeenschap der Geloovigen hebben begeven) wederom vervollen zijn, published after his death in 1645, apparently is the reprint of an older writing from the time of his quarrels with the Bekommerden or the Heylsamen (about 1590). VDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 495-98, 500, 507, 510-14, 516, 518; M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745) 67 f.; Catalogus Amst., 193, 194, 195, 197, 212, 213; BRN VII, 8 f. 64 f., 69 f., 74 f., 79, 82, 87; DB 1876, 35; 1910, 31; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 2, 126-30; ML III, 118.

Meulen, Jacobus van der (d. 1693), apparently a physician, was the preacher and later the elder of the Waterlander congregation at Leiden, Holland. On May 5, 1670, he was appointed preacher, but on Sept. 16 of that year he was suspended because he had preached publicly at Rijnsburg (q.v.), the Collegiant center. On Dec. 16, 1675, he was readmitted to the pulpit and on July 24, 1679, he was called to the eldership in the congregation, serving until his death on Oct. 22, 1693. At his instigation catechetical instruction was started in 1682. A number of his relatives were deacons of the Waterlander and from 1701 in the United Leiden congregation. VDZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 805, 840; L. G. le Poole, Bijdragen tot de kennis van het kerkelijk leven onder de Doopsgezinden te Leiden (Leiden, 1905) 64, 71-73, 79 and passim.

Meulen, Quiryn van der (Crijn, Krijn, Cryn Vermeulen), was the elder of the Danzig congregation following Dirk Philips (q.v.) in the last decades of the 17th century. His letters that were preserved in the records of the Heubuden (q.v.) church were signed by his Flemish name Cryn Vermoolen. In the disputes on the ban which divided the Dutch Mennonites into two camps he was on the side of the merciful use of the ban. (H. G. Mannhardt's judgment, p. 45, concerning Cryn's severe rule in the church is based on error.) This generosity led to tensions within the Danzig congregation and beyond in the West Prussian churches, who on the basis of a correspondence with the leaders of the Flemish wing in Holland placed the milder Frisians under the ban.

In 1580 Cryn still had the confidence of all the Mennonites of West Prussia. He was one of several delegates sent by the West Prussian churches to the conference of elders in Haarlem and Emden. He was saddened by what he heard about the strife between the Frisians and Flemish. "I confess that in Haarlem I showed my feeling, which was inclined to peace, though in my worry I received no help." He requested that men be sent to Danzig to teach the brethren that which he himself could not understand, and declared that if he was proved to be in error he was willing to be dismissed from his eldership. When these men came to Danzig, he expressed himself freely on his concern upon their request that he do so.—The name "Bekommerden" (q.v., i.e., Concerned Ones) for the lenient wing of the Frisians is derived from their concern or worry about the severe application of the ban.

Van der Meulen's frankness aroused offense in Danzig. He was accused of having destroyed the peace of the congregation. On the advice of the Haarlem church representatives of the three Frisian congregations of Montau, Elbing, and Olde Tooren (Thorn), a total of 35 brethren met and confronted Cryn and his friend Hans van Schwindern with their charge of guilt, and presented to them a confession they had worked out in advance. It contained six charges: (1) Cryn and Hans had criticized the elders in the west and had thereby created disturbance in the brotherhood. (2) In spite of the wishes of the West Prussians that they attend a conference of elders in Holland they had not complied, but had rather burdened the Danzig church with "weaknesses and liberties." (3) Cryn had promised in Haarlem that he would remain quiet, but did not do so. (4) Cryn and Hans had censured the deceased Dirk Philips (for his strict conception of the ban) against the will of the congregation. (5) Cryn and all those who thought as he did did not rebaptize those who joined the brotherhood from some other branch, and did not apply the strict ban. (6) In addition to this charge, there was his "peculiar understanding" of the truth.

Cryn defended himself in a letter. The tone and content of this letter show his superiority. The charges had no justification, and as to his view of the ban, he maintained, "We would prefer to have matters go according to Christ's teaching and take their course after fraternal discussion." His personality and the strength of his conviction caused many of his opponents to waver. The confession of guilt was probably read to the 35 delegates of the three churches in Danzig in the home of Harmen Borgerlinck (Sept. 25, 1586), but they did not yet dare to pass judgment on Cryn and his supporters. But when they arrived in Holland and there received sanction the committee met once more in Danzig early in 1588; however, the representatives from Elbing and Thorn left at once. And so Hilchen Smit (Schmidt), the elder of the Montau congregation, with his delegates and 55 brethren from the Danzig congregation, was obliged to carry out the expulsion of Cryn and Hans van Schwindern. The act was direful. The cleavage between the Frisians and the Flemish, which was bridged over by Cryn and men like him, now became open. As early as March a protest was made to the leaders by the Elbing congregation, disapproving the hard course taken by the Montau group. They begged for patience and long-suffering toward Cryn.

Cryn continued to live in Danzig as an ordinary member of the congregation. Alenson's Tegenbericht (BRN VII, 190) reports that in a colloquy with Wolff Uohll, who had come to Danzig from Moravia with Jan Gerrits, Cryn upheld Menno's view of the Incarnation. He applied his energy to writing. The Amsterdam Mennonite Library and the Danzig Church Library each have a copy of a beautiful Schottland Bible which he had printed at his own expense. The foreword contains the statement, "Men vindse te koop bij Krijn Vermeulen de jonghe, Cramer, woonende opte lege zydt van Schotlandt bij Danswick 1598" (To be bought of Krijn Vermeulen, Jr., merchant, living on the lower side of Schottland at Danzig, 1598). (Mannhardt, op. cit.)

Krijn van Vermeulen is not to be confused with the Danzig Mennonite alchemist Krijn van Mollem (q.v.). H.Q.

Succssio Anabaptistica and Alenson's Tegenbericht, BRN VII, 65 and 190; H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919); ML III, 118 f.

Meurs, van, a Dutch Mennonite family, found in the 17th and 18th centuries at Rotterdam, where its members originally belonged to the Flemish congregation. Aelbert (Albregt) van Meurs (son of Huybrecht van Meurs), b. ca. 1640 at Rotterdam, d. there March 9, 1712, was banned from the Flemish congregation in 1669 because he had attended services and taken communion with the Waterlanders. He then joined the Waterlander congregation, becoming a deacon in 1673 and a preacher in 1675. Until 1700 he served in the Waterlander congregation and after their merger with the Flemish, he served this united congregation.

His son Aelbert van Meurs de Jonge was a deacon of the Rotterdam congregation 1711-15. In 1718 he and Jan Suderman protested the appointment of David van Heyst, of Amsterdam (see Jan Suderman and Aelbert van Meurs, Protest, gedaen tegen de maniere van't beroepen van den Heere D. van Heist . . . nevens eene korte verantwoordinge van hun gedragh diesaengaende. Rotterdam, 1718), as preacher. They were opposed by M. van Oudenaerden and Adriaen van Alkmaer of Rotterdam and Herman Schijn and H. van Dam of Amsterdam. vdZ.

K. Vos, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Rotterdam (1907, repr.) 24, 25, 26, 27, 44, 47.

Meurthe et Moselle, a departement in northeastern France, in the former province of Lorraine, composed of parts of the two departements Meurthe and Moselle, after the rest had been ceded to Germany in 1871. Two Mennonite churches in this area, Repaix and Lunéville-Dieuze, were thereby divided into two groups, but continued to have their meetings on both sides of the new border, the former until it was dissolved and the latter until World War I.

The Mennonites of Meurthe et Moselle are descendants of refugees from Switzerland who settled in Alsace and were driven out by Louis XIV. In the east-central part of Lorraine, later the departement of Meurthe, they formed the "Welschland" congregation, and in the northeastern part, later called the departement of Moselle, the German-Lorraine (Deutsch-Lothringen) congregation. The former congregation extended farther and farther westward. Families from Salm and Le Hang in southeastern Lorraine were added, thus forming congregations throughout the southern part of Meurthe et Moselle. Living scattered among the French-speaking Catholic population had a disintegrating effect, so that some of these congregations could not maintain themselves. In 1939 Christ Seul (q.v.), the official church organ, was sent free of charge as a means of evangelization to all known Mennonite addresses in this area, a total of 155. Many of these families had no connections with an organized congregation. In 1939 three small congregations were still in existence: Baccarat, many of whose members lived in the adjoining departement of Vosges, Lunéville-Repaix, and Toul, which also extended into the departement of Meuse. In 1955 the membership, including children, of these three congregations was 220. (ML III, 119.) P.So.

Meuse (German, Maas), a departement in northern France, formed from the former province of Lorraine. Many Mennonites settled there after the beginning of the 19th century. They came from the east from various parts of Lorraine. As long as the German language was in use they called themselves the "Welschland" congregation; in 1880 an elder signed his name as Peter Kennel, "elder from the Welschland congregation." When French predominated the name became "Assemblée de la Meuse." For a long time its seat was the town of Vaucouleurs. An old list, probably from the first half of the 19th century, names 27 meeting places in the region around Vaucouleurs extending north beyond St. Mihiel. Meetings were held in the homes of the more prosperous members. As the urge to go west continued, an independent congregation was organized in the departement of Haute-Marne. On account of the great distance the Mennonites around St. Mihiel also organized, but this group disappeared after the death of their elder André Greabill about 1870. A division occurred in 1885, strife among the elders led to the organization of the Toul congregation. All of this, in addition to emigration to America, weakened the congregation. The great distances between members also had a paralyzing effect on the spiritual life. The center of the church in 1939 was the town of Ligny-en Barrois, 10 miles southeast of Bar-le-Duc, the captial of the departement. Only ten places of meeting were left, scattered from Vaucouleurs to Revigny, west of Bar-le-Duc and north as far as Clermont-on-Argonne. In 1954 the membership, including children, was 90, with Emile Muller as preacher. (ML III, 119 f.)

P.So.

Meuslin, Wolfgang: see Musculus.

Mexican Mennonite (MC) Mission Work. The Mennonite Church (MC) began mission work in Argentina in 1917. Growing interest in Spanish-speaking people resulted in the appointment of D. H. Bender and S. E. Allgyer by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities to investigate mission needs among Mexicans from Brownsville, Tex., all along the Mexican border to California. This investigation was carried out in February and March 1920. Recommendation to open mission work in Phoenix, Ariz., was brought to the annual meeting of the Board in May 1920. Fifteen years later, in 1935, another committee was appointed to make a similar investigation. T. K. Hershey and William Detweiler served on this committee and made an extensive investigative tour along the border. As a result T. K. Hershey spent the winter of 1936-37 with a trailer preaching and distributing literature among Mexicans along the Texas border. In May 1937, Amsa Kauffman took over the responsibility for the work. Small groups of believers were established in several

MENNONITE SETTLEMENTS IN MEXICO
AND CHURCHES IN SOUTH TEXAS
0 25 50 75 100 200 300
Scale of Miles
● Irapuato Mennonite Colonies
TEXAS
MEXICO
PACIFIC OCEAN
GULF OF MEXICO
El Paso
Ciudad Juárez
(See insert map)
Chihuahua
Cuauhtemoc
Houston
Corpus Christi
Mathis (MC)
Premont (MB)
Laredo
La Gloria (MC)
Los Ebanos (MB)
Grulla (MB)
Lull (MB Mission)
Monterrey
Brownsville
Chihuahua (MB)
Torreon
Saltillo
Agua Nueva
Patos
Durango
Mazatlan
San Luis Potosi
Rascon
Tampico
Valles
Irapuato
Mexico City
Vera Cruz
GUATEMALA
HOND.
Trujillo (MC Mission)
Tocoa (MC Mission)
HONDURAS
NICARAGUA
El Paso
Ciudad Juarez
Santa Clara
Santa Clara Colony
Namaquipa
Los Jagueyes
(Quellen Colony KG)
Campo 45 (Bethel, CGC / La Junta, CGC)
North Colony
Chihuahua
Swift Current Colony
Cuauhtemoc (GCM)
Manitoba Colony
Parral
State of Chihuahua
0 25 50 75 100
Scale of Miles

towns, but finally the center of the program was located at the town of Mathis.

Other workers followed Kauffman after his call to serve as pastor in Indiana, some attempting to support themselves as they sought to witness in a voluntary capacity. The program was greatly strengthened by the setting up of a Voluntary Service unit at Mathis in 1952, activities of which included housing construction, kindergarten, maternity home, crafts, and other community service. A small church was built in 1949, and a new and larger one was begun in the winter of 1954. J. Weldon Martin has been the pastor since 1951.

In addition to this Mexican program in Texas there are Spanish language churches for Mexicans in La Junta, Col., Chicago, Ill., and Archbold, Ohio. The work in La Junta was organized in 1923; David Castillo has been pastor since 1940. The membership in 1955 was 44, with an average attendance of approximately 56; a weekly radio program is conducted over the local station. The Mexican work in Chicago was opened in 1932 by J. W. Shank, missionary on furlough from Argentina. Mario Snyder has been pastor since 1953; the membership in 1955 was 53, and the average Sunday-school attendance 107. The work at Archbold, Ohio, has largely been the fruit of the labors of William S. Florry. He began Sunday school and services among the migrant Mexicans of his community in 1940 and now the Mexican congregation worships in a building of its own. The baptized membership is only three, but the attendance much larger. In 1956 and early 1957 work was opened among Spanish-speaking people in Corpus Christi, Tex., with Don Brenneman as pastor; Los Angeles, Cal., with Bernard Kroeker as pastor; Defiance, Ohio, with Victor M. Ovando as pastor.

J.D.G.

Mexico is a federal republic of North America, though it belongs geographically partly to Central America. It extends southward from the United States to Guatemala and British Honduras. The Rio Grande River is its northern boundary line. The Sierra Madre mountain ranges extend in the north-south direction shaped like a huge wishbone with two forks reaching north from Mexico City. Between the ranges lie a number of valleys and plateaus of differing altitudes. The country has great diversity of climate because of its location in both temperate and tropical zones and its varied altitudes. Annual rainfall varies from three inches in northern Lower California to 82 inches in the tropics. The country as a whole suffers from a lack of natural water supply. Large areas of Mexico are unproductive. In 1940 only 7.6 per cent of the land area was under cultivation. Of the unproductive land 80 per cent is known as "seasonal" land in that it will produce crops only during the rainy season, which in most parts of the country is from May or June to September. Only about 6.5 per cent of the land does not require irrigation. Much of the farming is done on plateaus at altitudes of 5,000 feet or over. The drop in altitude along the mountains is so sudden that streams tend to flood quickly during rainy seasons and to revert to dry gullies in the winter. Few streams of any length are found on the level plateaus and for this reason in many areas the possibilities for extensive irrigation projects are limited.

Politically Mexico has had a stormy history. Being a Spanish colony, it was for years exploited under the imperialistic colonial system. It has had its national heroes who struggled valiantly to emancipate the country and bring political freedom to its people. The United States governmental organization has been generally the model after which Mexico has patterned. The government, both national and local, is less stable and democracy less mature than is the case in the United States and Canada. Nevertheless, noticeable progress has been made in the second quarter of the 20th century, in that revolutions have been fewer and orderly elections have become more commonplace.

The significance of Mexico for Mennonites is in the settlement of over 16,000 Mennonites there. In 1922-27 several thousand Mennonites from the Old Colony and the Sommerfelder Mennonites in Manitoba (and some from Saskatchewan) emigrated to Mexico. These groups represent the most conservative elements of the Mennonites who had come from Russia to Canada in the 1870's. They left Canada out of protest to the secularization processes, the chief of which was the Canadianization to which they were being subjected in the public schools. The Mennonites were opposed to the requirement to conduct their schools in the English language, which they considered an abrogation of a privilege granted them originally when they immigrated. Rather than surrender what to them seemed freedom of education, they decided to emigrate.

A delegation of six men investigated colonization possibilities in a number of South American countries, but nowhere but in Mexico were they able to secure the desired privileges. Alvaro Obregon, the president of Mexico at that time, by presidential decree granted them the privileges they sought, such as freedom from military service, freedom from the swearing of oaths, freedom to conduct their religious life and observe their church regulations without molestation or restrictions, freedom to establish and conduct their own schools and select their own teachers without hindrance from the Mexican government, and freedom to dispose of property or establish any economic system which they might voluntarily adopt. The largest Mennonite settlement in 1950 was located in the state of Chihuahua, consisting of over 12,000 Mennonites, more than 90 per cent of whom are Old Colony Mennonites. About 6 per cent are Sommerfelders, a slightly less conservative branch. There are also a few Church of God in Christ and General Conference Mennonites. A small settlement of Old Order Mennonites and Old Order Amish from Pennsylvania established in the state of San Luis Potosi in 1944 failed. Some 3,000 (1950) Old Colony Mennonites are located in the state of Durango, 500 miles south of the Chihuahua settlement. A new settlement of Swift Current, Sask., Old Colony Mennonites and a Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) group of Manitoba originated in 1948 on the Los Jagueyes ranch northwest of the Cuauhtemoc settlement. The total Mennonite population of Mexico in 1950 was about 16,000. Almost without exception the Mennonites in Mexico are engaged in agriculture. Their pattern of settlement is according to agricultural villages very similar to the pattern brought from Russia by way of Canada. New land has always been bought in large blocks and redistributed to the purchasers in family-sized farms. The chief crops produced are oats, some corn, beans, and dairy products. A generally diversified type of farming is most common. Mennonites have contributed much to the production of such commodities as butter, cheese, beef, pork, oats, and beans for the commercial market. Fruits and vegetables are grown only in limited quantities on irrigated lands. The few Old Colony Mennonites that engage in business and industry in towns are not considered members in "good standing." Few of them have shops and stores in the rural villages. The Mennonites engaged in industry and business are members of the G.C.M. group. The Church of God in Christ Mennonites have a flourishing mission station in rural Mexico in the central region of the Old Colony settlement.

The future of the Mennonites in Mexico seems somewhat uncertain. Some think of Mexico as a somewhat temporary stopping place on a pilgrimage to a yet unknown land, others as a permanent place of settlement. The entire Mennonite settlement in Mexico presents an interesting experiment in the contact of two different cultures. Mexico has a Latin culture, which includes the Spanish language, the Roman Catholic religion, and many moral standards and customs alien to those of the Mennonites, who are a Germanic Protestant group with generally higher standards. The influence of the Latin culture is felt by the Mennonites, and outsiders can notice many adaptations that the Mennonites have made to it. The Mennonites, though a minority group, have made a significant impact on the Mexicans, especially in agricultural methods, and have introduced modern farming machinery and highly superior types of livestock. Slowly Mexican neighbors have been imitating these examples. The process of cultural interaction is continuing. The privileges which the Mexican government granted the Mennonites have been scrupulously upheld up to this time. The severe drought of 1951-54 placed a very heavy strain on the economic welfare of the settlements. Several hundred returned poverty-stricken to Canada in 1954-55.

Since 1947 the Mennonite Central Committee has carried on a program of social welfare and relief, largely for the Mennonites, with headquarters in Cuauhtemoc. Hospital service, primarily in Cuauhtemoc, has been a major part of the program. In the drought period considerable direct relief was given, particularly in seed wheat. (See also Old Colony Mennonites.) J.W.F.

J. W. Fretz, Mennonite Colonization in Mexico, an Introduction (Akron, 1945); W. Schmiedehaus, Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott. Der Wanderweg eines christlichen Siedlungsvolkes (Cuauhtemoc, 1948); W. Quiring, Im Schweisse deines Angesichts, Ein mennonitisches Bilderbuch: Paraguay, Brasilien, Argentinien, Uruguay und Mexiko. Mennonite Life published the following articles on Mexico: Vol. II (April 1947) contains the articles: J. W. Fretz, "Mennonites in Mexico"; A. D. Stoesz, "Agriculture Among the Mennonites in Mexico"; C. Wiebe, "Health Conditions Among the Mennonites in Mexico"; P. C. Hiebert and W. T. Snyder, "Are the Doors of Mexico Open to Mennonite Immigrants?" W. Schmiedehaus, "Mennonite Life in Mexico"; Vol. IV (October 1949): W. Schmiedehaus, "New Mennonite Settlements in Mexico"; P. J. B. Reimer, "From Russia to Mexico—The Story of the Kleine Gemeinde"; Vol. VII (January 1952): Charles Burkhart, "Music of the Old Colony Mennonites [in Mexico]"; ML III, 120-23.

Meyer, a common family name, found also among the Mennonites. As early as 1526-32 a number of Anabaptists in the Swiss cantons of Zürich, Schaffhausen, Bern, and Lucerne had this name. Among them was Hans Meyer (Pfistermeyer, q.v.), an active preacher. Later there were Anabaptists in the canton of Aarau, most of whom emigrated to Alsace and the Palatinate in the 17th and 18th centuries, and from there to America. Several members of this family served as preachers at Immelhausen in Baden, Germany, in the 18th century. One Meyer family emigrated from Switzerland to the Netherlands in the early 18th century. Dutch ministers with the name Meyer, but not related to the above family, are Joost Jurriaensz Meyer, a preacher of the Old Frisian (Arke Noach) congregation at Amsterdam 1709-d.49, and J. A. A. Meijer (b. 1913), pastor at Ternaard 1940-46 and Zutphen 1946- . (See also Moyer.) vdZ.

Paul Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer in der Reformationszeit (Karlsruhe, 1954) 113, Nos. 91-94; 117, Nos. 188 f.; 121, No. 259; 133 f., Nos. 536-50; Delbert Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 47, 89; Naamlijst, issues of 1766-93.

Meyer, Christian (1842-1916), a German archivist, son of a forester, began his career in the national archives in Munich and in 1871 was appointed city archivist for Augsburg, Germany. He published numerous works on the history of Bavaria, especially of Augsburg, Prussia, and the Hohenzollerns. Among his early historical works was a study, Anfänge des Wiedertäufertums in Augsburg, published in the periodical he edited, the Zeitschrift des Historischen Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg I (1874) 207-53, in which he gave information on the Anabaptist leaders in Augsburg (Hans Denk, Hans Hut, Jakob Gross, and Siegmund Salminger) and published 22 documents from the city archives of 1526-27. The publication of archives on the Anabaptist congregation in Augsburg was continued by Friedrich Roth in the same periodical, Vols. XXVII and XXVIII. Another of Meyer's noteworthy contributions to the study of Anabaptist history from a chronicle of Augsburg in the Bavarian State Library was published under the title, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberschwaben" (Ztscht für Kirchengesch. XVII, 1896, 248-58). (ML III, 123.) HEGE.

Meyer (Meyger, Meiger), Fridolin, a notary in Strasbourg, Alsace, united with the Anabaptists there in 1528. He was baptized by Jakob Kautz (q.v.). His home became the occasional meeting place of the members, and he was one of their preachers. Meyer seems to have had earlier connection with persons who later became Anabaptists or were akin to them in spirit. In 1523 he had, for instance, published a booklet by Otto Brunfels (q.v.), Von der Zucht und underweysung der Kinder, Ein Leer und vermanung (Röhrich, 36). On Dec. 15, 1528, he was cross-examined by Bucer and Capito on baptism. No records of the interrogation have survived, but bound into excerpts from the cross-examination is a four-page manuscript leaflet on the oath that is said to be from Meyer's hand (Röhrich, 36). Meyer was released from prison upon promise not to return to the city, but was seized again at a meeting of the Anabaptists at which Hans Bünderlin (q.v.) and Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.) were also present (Cornelius, 275). In a hearing on March 16, 1529, Meyer denied the intention of the Anabaptists to hold all things in common. He was pardoned, but unless he would desist from his belief he was to leave the city (Cornelius, 273). HEGE.

J. Adam, Evangelische Kirchengeschichte der Stadt Strassburg (1922); C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II (Leipzig, 1860); T. W. Röhrich, "Zur Geschichte der strassburger Wiedertäufer," in Ztscht für die historische Theologie, 1860; ML III, 123.

Meyer, Hans: see Pfistermeyer, Hans.

Meyer, Sebastian (1465-1545), a Reformed theologian, of Neuburg on the Rhine, Germany, a former Franciscan, who had occasionally worked in Strasbourg, Alsace. At the very beginning of the Reformation he was inspired by the evangelical spirit. He came to Bern, Switzerland, and was the first to preach Reformation doctrine. In 1523 he participated in the colloquy of Zürich. But Catholic power prevailed and he was expelled from Bern in 1524. He went to Basel, left the Franciscan order, married and then went to Augsburg, where he preached for a long time. After the Reformation was accomplished in Bern he returned to fill the gap caused by the death of Berchtold Haller (q.v.) and Franz Kolb (q.v.).

For the Anabaptist movement Meyer was of importance in that he represented the Reformed Church in the disputation at Bern (q.v.) March 11-17, 1538. He sought to establish the nature of the true church on the basis of Ephesians 4, and made serious charges against the Anabaptists, accusing them of having forsaken the true Christian church and as self-chosen prophets having set up a synagogue of Satan; but they had not succeeded; the Reformers had opened entire cities and countries to the Gospel. In strict contrast to this position was that of the Swiss Brethren. Their conception of the church could not be one of church politics. They replied to Meyer that Christianity was not a matter of an external confession by entire cities and kingdoms, but an inward personal life. Sebastian Meyer participated actively in the campaign to wipe out the Anabaptists. To what extent he was responsible for the violent measures passed against them cannot be determined. S.G.

Manuscript record of the Anabaptist Disputation of 1538 in U.P. 80, state archives of Bern; E. Marti, Menschenrat und Gottesrat. Geschichte der Berner Reformation (Karlsruhe, 1931); S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); ML III, 123 f.

Meyere, Boudewijn de (d. 1651), a colleague of Jacques van Maldegem (q.v.), left the Catholic Church to join the Anabaptists, was ordained preacher in 1633, and elder in 1638; he served until his death in 1681. De Meyere at first lived just outside Aardenburg, probably being a farmer. He was apparently a wealthy man, for in 1654 he made a liberal contribution for the building of a new meetinghouse in Aardenburg. During his ministry the Aardenburg congregation had many difficulties with the Reformed city governors; in 1643 they prevented the members living outside the town, including de Meyere, from entering the town to attend the church services. Then a petition signed by de Meyere was sent to the States-General at The Hague, with the result that the city magistrates were required to give all members free access to the church. In 1654 there were difficulties concerning the erection of the new meetinghouse. In the spring of 1649 de Meyere had a debate with the Catholic Arnout van Gelouwe (q.v.), who with two other Catholics attended a Mennonite service at Aardenburg conducted by de Meyere. At the close of the service van Gelouwe accused de Meyere of errors in dogma. They disputed for some time in the meetinghouse, and in the afternoon in de Meyere's home, which was then in the hamlet of Eede, two miles from Aardenburg.

For nearly a century members of the de Meyere family were devoted members of the Aardenburg Mennonite congregation. Jan de Meyere, probably Boudewijn's brother, was a deacon; Boudewijn's daughter Susanna was married to the preacher Ghysel Hebberecht (q.v.). (DB 1876, 81, 112; 1877, 1-42 passim; ML III, 65.) vdZ.

Meyli (Meili), Hans, an old man, a Swiss Brethren preacher, of the canton of Zürich, Switzerland, was imprisoned in 1637 with his sons Hans and Martin for about three years. vdZ.

Ein wahrhafftiger Bericht von den Brüdern im Schweizerland, 11; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 383; Mart. Mir. D 812, E 1111.

Meylin, Barbara and Elizabeth, apparently the wives of Hans and Martin Meili, were imprisoned in 1639 at the Oetenbach prison in Zürich, Switzerland. They, however, managed to escape. (Mart. Mir. D 813, E 1112.)

Meyn (Mein, Mayn, Main), a Dutch Mennonite family found at Zaandam, North Holland, where some members of this family were preachers: Cornelis Gerritsz Meyn, serving 1663-81; Gerrit Pietersse Meyn, serving from 1693; Cornelis Gerritsz Meyn 1727-75, and perhaps Gerrit Cornelisz Meyn, all of the Frisian congregation. A number of the Meyn family also were deacons. Some members of this family belonged to the Flemish congregation of Zaandam, and after 1687 to the United Flemish and Waterlander congregation of West-Zaandam (Nieuwe Huys); of these mention should be made of Meyndert Arendsze Meyn (d. March 4, 1704), who in 1673 organized a support action among the Mennonites of the Zaan district in behalf of the Dutch army, then at war with England and France. This action, launched in gratitude for the exemption of the Dutch Mennonites from military service, brought in a sum of about 30,000 guilders besides a large quantity of clothing for the common cause. This Meyndert A. Meyn was a merchant; in 1695 he was appointed as one of the directors of the Dutch Whaling Company. vdZ.

S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 18, 26, 29, 31, 102 f., 189-97; DB 1873, 170-74.

Meynardt (Meynart, Meyndert) van Delft: see Meynart van Emden.

Meynart van Emden (or van Delft), a Dutch Anabaptist elder and leader of the revolutionary Münsterite (q.v.) wing, who was extremely active in various parts of the Netherlands. In November 1533 he was one of the 12 "apostles" sent out by Jan Matthijsz (q.v.) of Haarlem. He baptized at Amsterdam, The Hague, Brielle, and other places. The martyrs Anneken Jans of Brielle, Jan Everts of Middelburg, and Cornelis Cornelisz Kelder of The Hague were among those baptized by Meynart. He was still living in 1548; about his further life and his death nothing is known. By trade he was a weaver. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 203, 205; Grosheide, Verhooren, 23, 181-84, idem, Bijdrage, 95, 97; DB 1917, 98, 105 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim; Groningsche Volksalmanak 1909, 72.

Meynert, Hermansz (Harmenszoon), an Anabaptist martyr, a sawer of wood from Balk in Friesland, Netherlands, who was burned at the stake with five brethren in Amsterdam on Aug. 6 or 8, 1552; he had been baptized by Gillis van Aken (q.v.). Further particulars are lacking. (Mart. Mir. D 142 f., E 535; ML III, 124.) vdZ.

Miami Amish Mennonite Church, unaffiliated, located in the southern part of Miami County and serving the Amish Mennonite community of Miami and Howard counties, was organized in 1939 with 18 members. At first, services were held in homes but in June 1946 a brick school was converted into a church. In 1956 the membership was 49. Levi Sommers was the first minister of the congregation. On April 18, 1948, Ezra Miller and Enos Miller were ordained to the office of minister and a year later Ezra Miller was ordained bishop. In 1956 they were still serving. E.Mi.

Miami County, Ind., organized as a county in 1834, was named for the Miami Indians. What is now Howard and Miami counties was part of the Miami Indian Reservation which was created in 1826. The Indians who did not wish to come under civil law were obligated to migrate to Kansas by 1845. Beginning in 1848 Amish settlers from Ohio began to locate in the Howard-Miami (q.v.) area. The first congregation organized was what would now be called Old Order Amish, though it was not until 1854 that the division between the Old Order Amish and the less strict Amish Mennonites occurred in the Howard-Miami area. The latter built their first house of worship (MC) in 1871 along the Howard County line, in Section 31 of Harrison Township, Miami Co. The membership of this congregation in 1956 was 378. The Old Order Amish have a congregation in Miami County with 32 members, and the Beachy Amish one with 49 members. J.C.W.

Glenn L. Troyer, et al., Mennonite Church History of Howard and Miami Counties (Scottdale, ca. 1917).

Miami Hutterite Bruderhof, located near New Dayton, Alberta, was founded in 1923. George Waldner, who was chosen to the ministry in 1906, left the Milford Bruderhof to found this Bruderhof. P. Hofer was chosen as minister in 1927. In 1957 the Bruderhof had a population of 120, with 17 families and 43 members. D.D.

Michael Matschilder, an Anabaptist martyr: see Matschidl, Michael.

Michael Sattler: see Sattler, Michael.

Michaelsburg Mennonite Church of the Fürstenland Mennonite Settlement, Ukraine, was a subsidiary of the Fürstenland Mennonite Church (q.v.), which in turn was a daughter of the Chortitza Mennonite Church. The school building of Michaelsburg served as a place of worship. In 1905 there was a total population of 255, of whom 97 were baptized members. (Dirks, Statistik, 1905, 60.) C.K.

Michailov, Peter, pseudonym of Peter the Great while he lived for several months in 1697 in Zaandam, Dutch province of North Holland, and Amsterdam as a worker in order to learn shipbuilding on the dock of the East India Company, where he came in contact with the local Mennonites. (Menn. Bl., 1911, 45; ML III, 124.) HEGE.

Michalin Mennonite community and church was located near Machnovka in the province of Volhynia, Polish Russia. The community was settled in the later years of the 18th century by families from the Graudenz area of the Vistula River but the congregation seems not to have organized until 1811, when David Siebrandt was elected minister. He was called to be elder in 1816, and was succeeded in 1852 by Johann Schröder. In 1874-78 the entire group emigrated to Kansas, where in the following year the congregation became the Gnadenberg Mennonite Church (q.v.). J.F.S.

Michelians (German, Michelianer), a Pietistic group within the state church in Württemberg, Germany, which derives from Johann Michael Hahn (q.v.). In contrast with Old Pietism, which accepted the creed of the church, the Michelians deviated further from church doctrine. The writings of Hahn are even more influenced by Theosophy than those of Oetinger, going back to Jakob Boehme. Ascetic traits point back to medieval Mysticism (e.g., the high regard for celibacy). Old Pietism used expressions adopted from church catechisms and hymns; Hahn has a different kind of language.

The core of the piety of the Michelians is sanctification (q.v.). This doctrine was developed by Hahn in his struggles with other streams of Pietism in Swabia. Old Pietism earnestly cultivated the feeling of human sinfulness, to such an extent that a countercurrent arose in the followers of M. Christian Gottlob Pregizer (d. 1824), which advocated joy for the forgiveness of sins by looking at Jesus and the finished sacrificial work of redemption. In opposition to these divergent ideas on justification by faith, the Michelians stressed righteous living; justification is not merely something that happened long ago outside the believer, but a process taking place within him (in contrast to the Pregizians). Whereas the Pregizians ascribe sinlessness to the Christian, the Michelians believe that it is possible for a Christian to sin. Whereas the Old Pietists continued to look at the old life, the Michelians stressed rest and joy in redemption.

The Michelians describe the second birth as an inward process that progresses by degrees, "whereby Christ, through the medium of the working of His Spirit on the mind of the believer, must accomplish and suffer within each one personally what He once historically accomplished and suffered, . . . in order to prepare him for pure sonship and blessed perfection." They stress progress in sanctification through "undismayed watchfulness of a penitent heart." This end is furthered by the brotherhood, in which the like-minded "reveal to each other the state of their spirit and impart counsel and admonition, comfort, and encouragement."

The doctrines of creation and redemption taught by Hahn, related to those of Oetinger, and Boehme, do not insist on the external forms of existing church ordinance, but stress the "free agreement of such as do not stand under the law, because Christ is in them as spirit and impulse, truth and life." The insistence upon the inner life as well as the teaching on sanctification reveal significant points of contact with Anabaptism.

The slight emphasis upon organizational matters made it possible for the Michelians to remain within the state church, follow its creed, honor its public services and sacraments, recognize the office of preaching, and thus to respect the entire institution of the state church as a legal religious educative agency. A conspicuous trait is their effort to live in peace with all other creeds.

The first spread of the Hahn brotherhoods took place in Württemberg, in the regions of Cannstatt, Böblingen, and Herrenberg, principally through the personal work of the founder. These circles treasure, besides the Scripture, the works of F. Christian Oetinger and Ph. M. Hahn, but also those of Gerhard Tersteegen, the mystic poet of the Reformed Church.

About 1870 the Michelians adopted a new constitution. It embraced at that time 26 circles with 100 localities; the southernmost was in the Baar, the northernmost the cities of Frankfurt, Mannheim, Speyer, etc. In each district two conferences are held annually. Supervision and leadership are in the hands of a committee of six older brethren. In 1939 the number of adherents was estimated at 15,000. The center is the Stuttgart circle with its seat in Stuttgart.

Michael Hahn was a prolific writer. After his death in 1819 all his works were published, comprising 15 volumes. The headship of the entire brotherhood was entrusted to Anton Egeler in Nebringen; he served in this capacity until his death in 1850. He was succeeded by the schoolmaster Kolb of Dagersheim. In addition to the conferences arrangements were made for meetings of the brethren. Kolb published Ordnung für Reisebrüder (Directive for Traveling Brethren) on their visits to the congregations. He appointed 24 unmarried brethren and 24 substitutes for the 12 districts to visit the individual brotherhoods.

Since the Gemeinschaftsbewegung (q.v.) in Württemberg has taken on a new life (e.g., Liebenzell mission), trying actively to carry out its historic mission (evangelization, etc.), the Michael Hahn brotherhood plays an important role beside Old Pietism in Swabian Pietism and beyond its borders.

In the middle of the 19th century the Michelians also found their way into the Mennonite churches of Baden. In the Mennonite congregation of Dühren - Ursenbacherhof (q.v.) the Elder Heinrich Kaufmann received a young girl of a Protestant family into the church without rebaptism as an adult, and the council of elders of the conference of Württemberg and Baden in consequence deposed him from office in 1858. His members in large part remained loyal to him and under his leadership organized a separate congregation, which was joined by the Heimbronnerhof (q.v.) congregation, and in 1900 by Bretten. The division was complete.

The two small congregations do not rebaptize persons coming into the brotherhood from the state church, but recognize infant baptism. From the beginning they conducted Sunday afternoon Bible study, in which members of the other churches participated, whereas only their own members attended the Sunday morning services.

The Michelian custom of two brethren preaching at each service, based on the sending out of Christ's disciples two by two, was also adopted by these two churches; furthermore, they remain seated while preaching. The connection with the Michelians was personal, not official. The preachers of these two Mennonite churches took part in the conferences of the Michelian group, and the latter participated in the Sunday afternoon services of the Mennonites.

Connections between the two groups were maintained alive by the later elders and preachers, especially Heinrich Musselmann of the Ursenbacherhof and Heinrich Kaufmann in Dühren (d. 1920). Later the contacts became rare. W.F.

D. Haug, Die Sekte der Michelianer nach ihrer Lehre und ihrem Verhältnis zu anderen pietistischen Partheien in Württemberg (Stuttgart, 1839); Die Hahnische Gemeinschaft, ihre Entstehung und seitherige Entwicklung (Stuttgart, 1877); C. Grüneisen, "Abriss einer Geschichte der religiösen Gemeinschaften in Württemberg," in Ztscht für die historische Theologie, 1841; ML III, 124-26.

Michelsburg (not Michelsberg, as is often found in Loserth and Wolkan), a castle in Tirol, Austria, near St. Lorenzen in the Puster Valley, about 3 miles from Bruneck, in a district of the same name, which, though small, played a significant part in the Anabaptist movement.

As early as 1527 we hear of confiscations of the property of Anabaptists who fled the country. In December 1527 the warden of Michelsburg received orders from the Brixen authorities, who held the castle in lease, to be on the lookout for Anabaptists coming from the region of Venice, since there were some among them "who preach Anabaptism in corners." A year later the judge of Michelsburg searched for Anabaptists, who apparently escaped. The Brixen authorities ordered them pursued, and on April 27, 1529, the Michelsburg warden, Balthasar Gerhard, managed to arrest five Anabaptists, including the leader in the district, Gregor Weber of Pflaurenz, preacher and trusted friend of Jakob Hutter (q.v.). Soon afterward eight additional brethren and sisters fell into his hands, whom he delivered to Brixen for trial. Thus an exchange of correspondence took place between the authorities in Innsbruck and the authorities of Brixen. Innsbruck considered it an infringement on its rights for Brixen to try these important cases, but finally granted that in case of emergency it would be permissible. Later dispute arose concerning the property confiscated from Anabaptists in Brixen territory, which Innsbruck thought should be turned over to the national coffers. Brixen usually had to yield.

The cross-examination of the Anabaptists arrested at Michelsburg revealed that there were numerous other Anabaptists there. Some of them escaped, but Kaspar Mayrpaulle, Wilhelm Sambsfeuer, Marx in der Au, a Rader woman and three other women fell into the hands of the authorities. Weber, Mayrpaulle, and the Rader woman were burned at the stake on June 17, and Sambsfeuer beheaded. A great crowd watched the execution, including two brothers of Weber; the widow of an earlier martyr took the occasion to become an Anabaptist and have herself arrested. The others were kept for months in a vile dungeon full of vermin waiting to hear from Innsbruck whether they should be taken there for trial, Innsbruck having said Brixen should pass sentence on its own Anabaptists. The prisoners were taken back to Michelsburg and released upon promise to leave the district.

In December again two men and four women of the Anabaptists were arrested. The warden Gerhard wished to deal leniently with them, but was reprimanded by Brixen, blamed for the spread of the Anabaptist movement, and ordered to spare neither money nor effort to wipe them out. Thereupon Gerhard arrested so many that the new prison in the Michelsburg overflowed, and some had to be sent to Bruneck for trial, though the sentence had to be passed in Michelsburg. After several had been executed, some declared themselves willing to return to the church; they were required to recant from the pulpit on three successive Sundays, and promise not to leave the district for three years and never to leave Tirol. Some were also apparently converted by the pastor of St. Lorenz, among them a sister of Jakob Hutter. But other Anabaptist missionaries and preachers continued to appear. To gain control of the situation Gerhard assessed each person who gave them lodging a fine of 50 florins. Innsbruck, however, objected to his taking the money for himself, and reduced the fine by half.

The struggle with the Anabaptists was taken up with new vigor when Christoph Ochs became the judge of Michelsburg in 1531. He received the highest praise from the local as well as the Innsbruck authorities, and was frequently called to give reports or advice on the situation. He made special efforts to seize backsliders, and dealt most severely with them. Two of these, Georg Schräffl of Rungen and his servant, were executed in the summer of 1531, and other "simple-minded folk" were released after they recanted. In January 1532 Gerhard was reprimanded for negligence; this led to the arrest and probable execution in February of Michel Ebner and his servant.

The records give a graphic account of the activities of Jakob Hutter, Hans Amon (q.v.), and Georg Fasser (q.v.) at this time in the region. A surprise visit by Ochs and his henchmen to Huber's home at Getzenburg on the evening of Feb. 21 found only children in the house, but food cooked for many people. Likewise a few days later, of 40 persons assembled for "the breaking of bread," only seven were seized, the rest, including Hutter, escaping. In June Innsbruck demanded more strenuous efforts, for it was learned from the confession of Friedrich Brandenburger, who had meanwhile been executed, that Hutter was staying near by with a peasant "called Pirker in the castle of Michelsburg," and had held meetings. In addition, migrations to Moravia were increasing.

Then Ochs began to use spies, one of whom succeeded in gaining the confidence of the Brethren so completely that they took him to a meeting at Getzenberg and even offered to baptize him. But before he was able to notify Ochs, most of them had fled, only five falling into his hands. One of these, Ottilie Luckner, was released on the ground of many petitions sent in for her; but she at once returned to the Brethren and was again arrested by Ochs with four others. Of these at least one, Andreas Zimmerman, was put to death, and perhaps others also. The court records again give a clear picture of the fearless work of the missionaries from Moravia. While the above were still on trial, Ochs surprised six Anabaptists in a gorge and seized three of them. It was reported that they met in droves at Getzenberg. One of their preachers, Jorg Fasser, preached to groups of as many as thirty. During October Ochs often lay in wait on the Kniepasshof next to the forest, where Hans Amon had spent a day in hiding with 20 brethren and sisters and even held a meeting. But again Ochs arrived an hour too late! Nevertheless he succeeded in seizing four brethren, one of whom, Christoph Schuhknecht, was the son of Andreas Zimmermann, who had been executed shortly before. He and two of his companions and Valentin Luckner, who had been arrested before, were beheaded after Oct. 20, 1532.

All of these measures were unavailing, though one of Och's spies was a pretended Anabaptist. In December 1533 Brixen reported to Innsbruck that the entire district was full of Anabaptists. The people, instead of obeying the edicts against sheltering them, assisted them and their missionaries. Even the warden of Neuhaus was protecting them. But when Gerhard and Ochs arrived to make arrests, the Anabaptists, who had been freely going in and out of Neuhaus, had fled. Very few were added to the four brethren in the dungeon of Michelsburg in February 1534.

Michelsburg is not again mentioned in the court records until 1536, the year of the great persecution. Ochs arrested the daughter Anna of the judge of Schöneck, who was the wife of a prominent citizen. He held her under arrest in his home because of her station, then on government orders, "that there be no murmuring among the people," put her into the castle. At her trial she was at first steadfast, but then on her father's plea recanted. She was pardoned at her own request and because of feminine "silliness."

A Moravian missionary, Kasper Huber, seized in early 1537, stated that Offerus Griesinger (q.v.) was considered the leader of the Anabaptists of Tirol and established many contacts between the Tirol and Moravia. In the same year Hans Grünfelder (q.v.) died, who had formerly gathered and cared for the Anabaptists in Michelsburg. The government notified Gerhard that there were many Anabaptists in the Puster Valley. In spite of increased watchfulness Offerus came to the Puster Valley in June 1538 to gather a group for Moravia. When Ochs discovered this, he had all the bridges and passes guarded while his men searched the countryside. Offerus escaped, but Martin of Villgraten (q.v.) and Kaspar Schuster were caught and beheaded in Michelsburg.

In 1538 Bernhard, Cardinal of Trient, ordered the pastor of St. Lorenzen to devote all his energy to the eradication of the sectarians. Just at this time an exciting incident occurred in Michelsburg. Agnes von Waldhofen, a widow belonging to an old noble family, took all her cash and jewels and her little daughter to join the Brethren in Moravia. In spite of all precaution by local and higher authorities to prevent her leaving the country she apparently made her way successfully to Moravia. But in the region of Lüsen (q.v.) Ochs arrested the wife of the Anabaptist leader Lienhard with two others. The government put an increased number of men at the disposal of Ochs to reach the most outlying parts of the district. The records of Ambras of 1540 tell of three Anabaptists of the Puster Valley who were condemned to serve on the galleys, but recanted and were pardoned.

The greater the pressure of persecution, the greater became the wish of the steadfast brethren to emigrate to Moravia. In April 1544 orders were given by Brixen to guard the roads and bridges, especially at night, in order to prevent the entry of missionaries. The orders were not too strictly obeyed, for in September a group of Michelsburg citizens was arrested in Bavaria en route to Moravia. In 1548 some left from Mühlbach, in 1553 from Bruneck. Four years later a transport from this region fell into arrest at the end of their journey on the Danube. But the movement continued in Michelsburg. In 1561 Gregor Prunner confessed that he had "gone about in the forest" and gathered his brethren.

In 1582 a mandate of Bishop Johann Thomas again complains about the increase of the Anabaptists in the Puster Valley. In August 1591 it became the scene of an execution. Georg Wenger, "one of the most active of the Anabaptists," had been seized in St. Lorenzen and tried after 30 days' imprisonment. The authorities were determined to find out who had sheltered him. But he refused to give any information, saying that he would not betray even an enemy, much less a friend. On Aug. 27, he was delivered to Michelsburg. Here he was racked so badly that the wounds were visible for 13 weeks. After two weeks he was lodged in a vermin-infested cell in Brixen. He had to keep his head covered to protect it from the scorpions. But he defied all force as well as the attempts of the clergy to convert him. He was executed at St. Lorenzen on Aug. 5, 1592.

The list of martyrs of the Hutterian chronicles records a total of 48 executions in the Puster Valley, half of them at Michelsburg.

Still the communications between Michelsburg and Moravia did not cease. In 1602, on the basis of statements made by a brother seized on his return to Moravia, a search was made in the valley for those who had lodged him, and in 1604 several persons were arrested on suspicion of being Anabaptists. P.DE.

F. A. Sinnacher, Beiträge zur Gesch. der bisch. Kirche in Säben und Brixen VII (Brixen, 1830); J. v. Kripp, Ein Beitrag zur Gesch. der Wiedertäufer in Tirol (Programm, Innsbruck, 1847); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; J. Loserth, Anabaptismus; H. Ammann, Die Wiedertäufer in Michelsburg und deren Urgichten (Programm, Brixen, 1896); Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Chronik; G. Loesche, Tirolensia, Täufertum und Protestantismus (Leipzig, 1926); ML III, 126-29.

Michelsdorf and Urszulin, two villages, a mile apart, located approximately thirty miles northeast of the Polish town of Lublin, were the center of a Swiss-Volhynian Amish Mennonite congregation ca. 1795-1837. The Mennonites who settled in Urszulin and Michelsdorf came from Montbéliard, France, leaving there in 1791 and proceeding eastward upon the invitation of the Polish Prince Adam Czartoryski. Known members of the party were Moses Gering, Johann Graber, Johann Lichti, Peter Kaufman (wife Elisabeth Graber), Anna Roth, Christ Graber (wife Marie), and Christen Stucky (wife Marie). There may have been others in the party, possibly including someone with the name of Flückinger.

Although the group may have proceeded directly to Urszulin, there is some evidence that they spent a few years in the Russian province of Podolia, possibly near Adampol. Sometime before 1800 and maybe as early as 1795, they located in Urszulin, and soon also in Michelsdorf. Joseph Mündlein, of the Galician Mennonite settlements, joined the group soon after their arrival and is known to have been its elder in 1802. The group was reinforced in 1797 by a few Swiss Amish Mennonite families who had unsuccessfully attempted to join the Hutterite colony at Vishenka on the Desna River in the northern Ukraine. Never fully satisfied with the productivity of the land, the larger part of the Urszulin-Michelsdorf settlement moved to the village of Poutschy (Eduardsdorf) in Volhynia about 1815. The remaining members left in 1837 for Horodyszcze, Volhynia.

The Urszulin-Michelsdorf congregation was Amish, and adhered to the Amish Discipline of 1779. In addition to Mündlein (d. 1810) church officials were Christian Graber, Christian Stucky, Johannes Flickinger, and Johan Graber. Names introduced into the Swiss-Volhynian churchbooks for the first time included Voran, Wolbert, Senner, Schwartz, Sutter, and Mauer. M.H.S.

Martin H. Schrag, "European History of the Swiss-Volhynian Mennonite Ancestors of Mennonites now Living in Communities in Kansas and South Dakota" (unpublished Master's dissertation, 1956).

Michiel Beernaerts, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on June 18, 1559, at Antwerp, Belgium, identical with the martyr called Jelis Bernaerts (q.v.) in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror and Gielis Bernaerts in Offer.

Michiel van Bruyssel, an Anabaptist martyr: see Michiel Willems.

Michiel Buyse (Buesse, Buerse), an Anabaptist martyr, was captured in Gent, Belgium, on Jan. 13, 1589, with Joos de Tollenaere and Josyntgen Swynts (Sijntgen Wens). "After much temptation and torment in which they constantly remained steadfast" they were condemned to die as heretics. On April 13 they were secretly hanged on a pillar in the Gravensteen castle at Gent. Then the executioner hung the corpses of the men on the gallows outside, while Sijntgen was buried beneath it. Michiel was 40 years of age, and married. By trade he was a weaver. In 1578 or 1579 he had been (re)baptized at Meenen. (Mart. Mir. D 764, E 1069; Verheyden, Gent, 68, No. 247; ML I, 313.) O.H.

Michiel de Cleercq, an Anabaptist martyr: see Michiel the Widower.

Michiel Egbertszoon, an Anabaptist, who was put to death at Amsterdam on May 14, 1535, in a cruel manner. He was one of the revolutionary Münsterites and had participated in the assault on the Amsterdam town hall on May 10-11, 1535. He was a weaver. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 63 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 143, 145, 164.) vdZ.

Michiel Geldoff, an Anabaptist, a barber-surgeon of Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg. He was (re)baptized by Jan Smeitgen (q.v.) in an attic shortly before Christmas of 1534, was arrested on Jan. 28, 1535, with a large number of members of the Maastricht congregation, and after trial, forsaking his faith, was beheaded at Maastricht on Feb. 6, 1535. His confession is very remarkable: he accused the Catholic priests of immoral conduct; the Catholic religion he considered an invention of popes and bishops; one could be a member of the church only after conversion; he held chiliastic views concerning the kingdom of God. vdZ.

W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) 120, 374.

Michiel (Gerritsz), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Breda, Dutch province of North Brabant, in August 1571 (not 1572 as is stated in Martyrs' Mirror). Michiel was an uncle of Cornelis de Gyselaer (q.v.), arrested with Michiel and executed some time before him, and was married to the widow of the martyr Valerius de Schoolmeester (q.v.). He refused to take an oath and during his trial and torture gave some information on his life. He had been baptized six years previously at Middelburg by Joachim de Suyckerbacker (Joachim Vermeeren, q.v.); he had later lived at Zierikzee and at the time of his arrest he was living at Princenhage near Breda. He possessed three books, a New Testament printed by Nicolaes Biestkens (q.v.), a copy of the Offer des Heeren, and a volume of letters by the martyr Jacob de Keersmaeckere (Jacob de Rore, q.v.). Michiel was apprehended with some others on Aug. 5, 1571, when a Mennonite meeting in Klundert (q.v.) was surprised by the officials. He remained steadfast and willingly suffered martyrdom. (Mart. Mir. D 603-5, E 929; DB 1912, 36, 42; ML III, 124.) vdZ.

Michiel van Houcke, a Mennonite martyr, burned at the stake at Gent, Belgium, on March 2, 1560, together with four others. Michiel was a native of Nevele, Flanders, and only 23 years of age. (Verheyden, Gent, 26, No. 70.) vdZ.

Michiel Jans(en) was a preacher and leader of the Flemish party in the Mennonite congregation at Harlingen, Friesland, in 1566, when the Frisian-Flemish schism arose. He attacked Ebbe Pieters (q.v.), then the leader of the Frisian party in the congregation. Being an old man, he apparently died soon after December 1566. (DB 1893, 20 f., 34, 40.) vdZ.

Michiel Jans(s)en, a writer of hymns, two of which, composed in 1531 and 1532, are found in the Geestelijck Liedt-Boecxken of David Joris (q.v.). (Wolkan, Lieder, 59; ML II, 391.) vdZ.

Michiel Jansz(oon), a native of Oosterhout in Brabant, Netherlands, who (according to the confession of Jan van Sol at Brussels in 1550) moved from the Netherlands to Danzig, West Prussia, Germany. Here he and Thonis Barbier were "buyldrager," i.e., deacons for the care of the poor of the congregation. Shortly before 1550 he died at Elbing. He is not identical with the two foregoing Michiel Jansens. (DB 1917, 137.) vdZ.

Michiel de Leertouwer, an Anabaptist martyr: see Jelis Bernaerts.

Michiel Matschilder, an Anabaptist martyr: see Matschidl, Michael.

Michiel N., an Anabaptist martyr, found in the 1578b edition of the Offer des Heeren (Offer, 15, 624 f.), who was executed at Gent, Belgium, in 1592, is identical with Michiel de Cleercq (Michiel the Widower, q.v.). vdZ.

Michiel Pietersz, of Hoorn, Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, executed by beheading at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, on Jan. 7, 1539, with 10 others. Michiel apparently was a follower of David Joris (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 749; DB 1899, 158-60; 1917, 160-67.) vdZ.

Michiel Ratgheers, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Sluis, Dutch Zeeland Flanders, on March 15, 1563. Michiel, who was born in Aardenburg near Sluis, and who was a basketmaker by trade, had stayed for some time at Brugge, Belgium, where he was arrested because of Anabaptism. He recanted and was released, but later he continued to speak slightingly of the Roman Catholic sacraments, particularly the practice of infant baptism. vdZ.

H. Q. Janssen, De Kerkhervorming te Brugge (Rotterdam, 1856) I, 11; II, 243 f., where the sentence pronounced on Michiel is found.

Michiel Seyn (Syen), an Anabaptist martyr, drowned on June 26, 1562, at the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, because he had been rebaptized (by Gillis van Aken, q.v.) and "persisted in his rebaptism." Michiel was born at Dermonde (Dendermonde?) in Flanders and was a chair-bottomer by trade. A Mennonite family with the name Seijen (q.v.) or Seyen was found in Amsterdam and other Dutch towns in the 17th and 18th centuries. (Antw. Arch.-Bl. IX, 137, 141; XIV, 32 f., No. 358.) vdZ.

Michiel Stevens of Oosterhout, a potter, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded at Vught near Hertogenbosch, Dutch province of North Brabant, on Sept. 9, 1538, with Jan Block of Gent and Adriaen of The Hague, both weavers. In the sentence Michiel is called "boersdreger," i.e., purse bearer; he was therefore probably a deacon who had charge of aid to poor members. (Mart. Mir. D 42, E 447; DB 1917, 189.) vdZ.

Michiel Verhaghe, a Mennonite preacher or elder, active in Flanders about 1566, of whom there are no further particulars. (Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen" Ms.) vdZ.

Michiel van Waelhem, an Anabaptist martyr, sentenced by the court of Holland in The Hague (?) "to die by the sword," because he was one of the Anabaptists who had sailed for Münster and were arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745.) vdZ.

Michiel the Widower (Michiel de Cleercq), an Anabaptist martyr, was seized at Gent, Flanders, Belgium, in July 1592 with Bartholomeus Panten and a sister Kalleken N. (q.v.). After a trial on the rack, in which they courageously confessed their faith, the men were hanged in the Gravensteen castle; Kalleken was released. The sparse information by van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror is considerably supplemented by the data from the official records published by Verheyden. Michiel the Widower's official name was Michiel de Cleercq. He was born about 1552 at St. Antelinks, near Aalst in Belgium. By trade he was a weaver. H. Q. Janssen (Kerkhervorming in Vlaanderen I, 377) lists him among the Calvinists. This is wrong. Initially he joined the Calvinists. He then lived at Sluis, Dutch Zeeland Flanders. He wanted to become a Reformed clergyman but was disqualified by the classis of Brugge (1579). From about 1581 Michiel lived at Gent, joining the Mennonite congregation in 1588. From now on, both in his firm conviction and his fearless activity, he was a strong pillar in the struggling congregation at the time when it was sorely tried by the loss of its leaders by persecution. Michiel de Cleercq and Bartholomeus Panten were the last Mennonite martyrs to die at Gent. The date of their execution was Sept. 15, 1592. (Mart. Mir. D 779, E 1082; Verheyden, Gent, 70 f., No. 250; ML III, 124.) NEFF, vdZ.

Michiel Willems (van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror: Michiel van Bruyssel, i.e., Brussels in Belgium), an Anabaptist martyr, a silk weaver, who was arrested at Gent, Belgium, with his wife Barberken (Barbele Pieters, q.v.) in 1576 (not 1573 as stated in the Martyrs' Mirror). They were put to death "after manifold temptations and trials of their faith, . . . not for any evil deed, but only for the obedience of the truth of Jesus Christ." Michiel was burned on July 19, 1576, at the Vrijdagsmarkt and Barberken beheaded in the Gravensteen castle. (Mart. Mir.

D 643, E 965; Verheyden, Gent, 67, No. 242; ML III, 124.) Neff, vdZ.

Michiel Zeepzieder: see Seifensieder, Michael.

Michielken (van) Huls(t), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Oct. 19, 1571. She was a native of Bocholt in the territory of Cleve, Germany, and had been (re)baptized about 1553 by Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) in a wood near Antwerp. Further information was not available. (Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 78 f., 162; XIV, 86 f., No. 974.) vdZ.

Michiel(l), a bookseller of Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, an Anabaptist martyr, (re)baptized on Nov. 25, 1534, in the home of Jacob van Wijnssen at Deventer by Hendrik Kistemaecker, was beheaded at Kempen (q.v.) in Overijssel on Feb. 15, 1535, with two brethren and a sister of his faith. He rejected the Catholic doctrines of the Mass and shared the views of Melchior Hofmann concerning the Incarnation. (DB 1875, 59, 62 f.; ML III, 129.) vdZ.

Michiels, Alfred (1813-92), a French literary historian, who achieved fame in the second half of the 19th century by his important works on the history of art in Flanders, on the relations of France with Alsace-Lorraine, on the Franco-Prussian War, etc. He was born in Paris in 1813, the son of a Flemish mother and French father, studied law in Strasbourg, made a foot tour through Germany, journeyed to England and Belgium, and finally settled as a librarian in Paris.

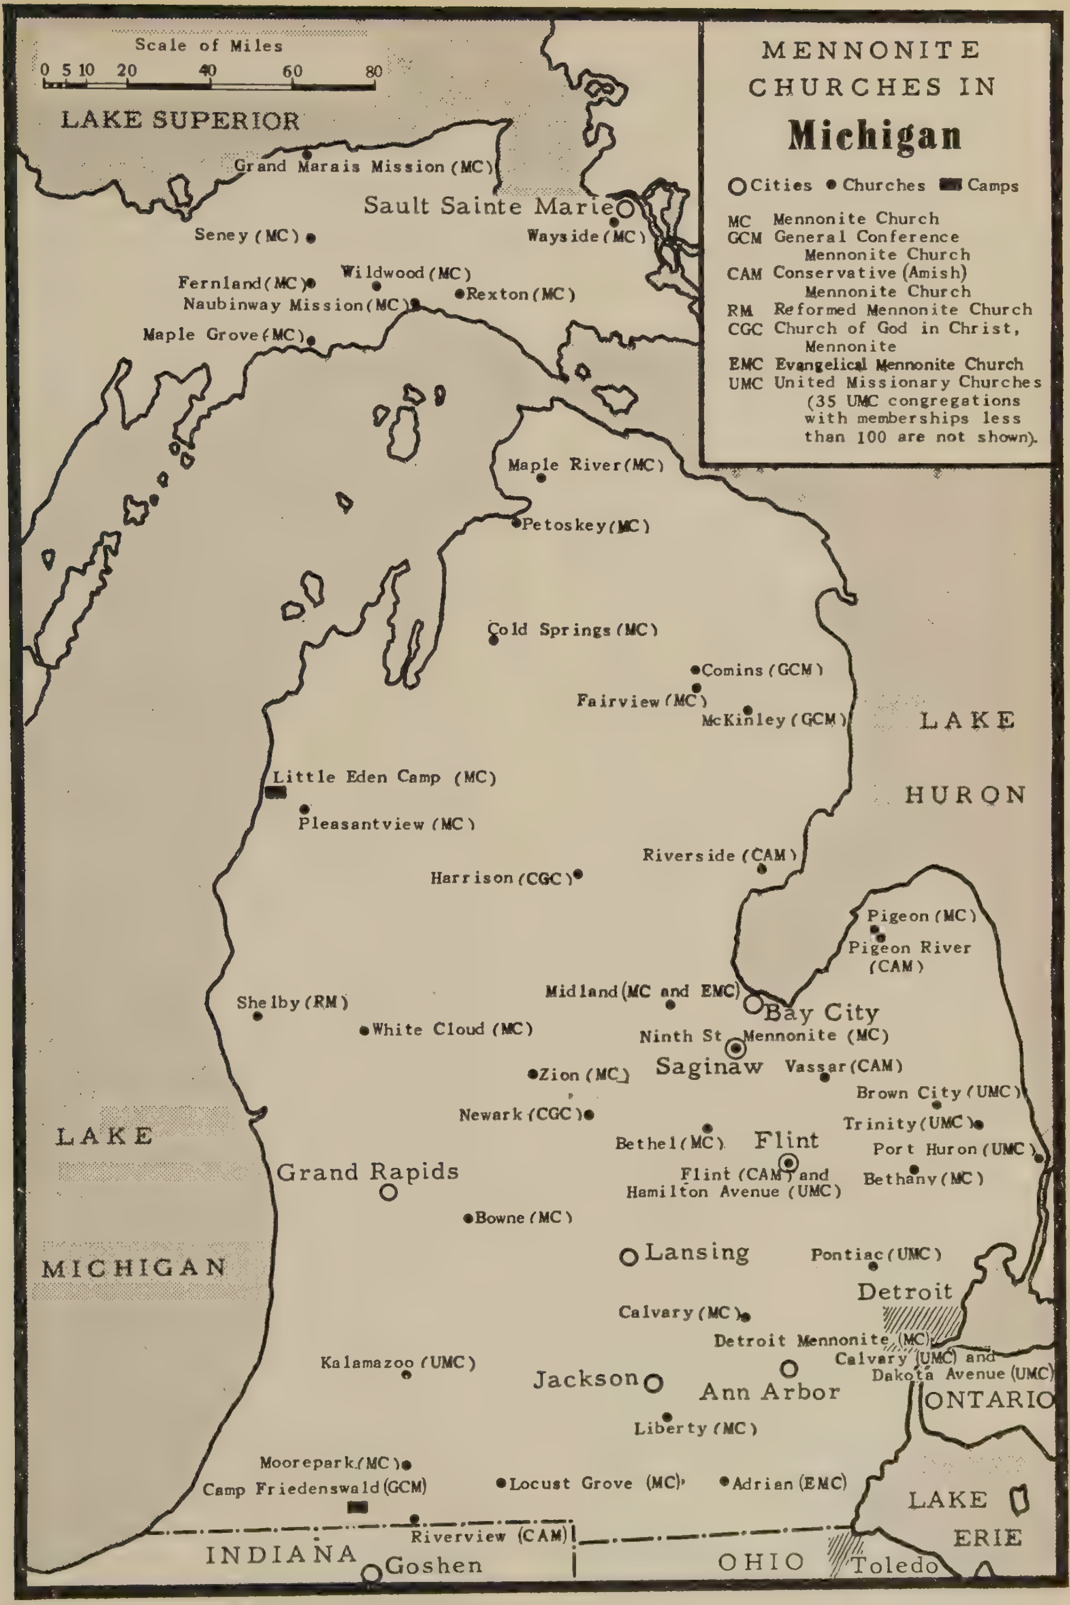
On his travels Michiels became acquainted with the Mennonites in the Vosges, and dedicated to them a book with the title, Les Anabaptistes des Vosges (Paris, 1860) which went through several editions. It is a charming account, written from the point of view of a Catholic Frenchman, of a segment of Mennonite life in the Vosges. As a metropolite Michiels feels himself transported into a legendary world, when he finds on the plateau of the Salm a group who, "hostile to luxury, exciting pleasures, vanity, and ambition, lead a peaceful, happy life." Conversation with their elders and preachers reveals that they are well informed on their history: they treasure the old Anabaptist writings; excerpts from Menno Simons, the Martyrs' Mirror, and the Dordrecht Confession are "alive in them in every respect." This loyalty to tradition goes so far that they pattern their customs entirely on Biblical examples. Not without some inward merriment Michiels tells his Parisian friends about the marriage customs of the group. When a young man wished to marry he went to the deacon, who performed the suit like Eliezer of the Old Testament and had the nickname "Steckelmann" (q.v.). He swung himself upon his horse, rode to the girl's home, and asked her for a drink of water from a well. If she granted the request the Steckelmann entered the house and asked for the hand of the daughter for the young man.

If these and similar customs seemed peculiar and incomprehensible to the author and to the modern reader, the positive aspects of Mennonite separation from the world so impressed him that he presents them as exemplary for community life: their simplicity, their wholesome, solid way of life, especially their mutual aid in cases of adversity. One who suffered misfortune through no fault of his own experienced the substantial help of the brotherhood. Only if it was apparent that he was incompetent, he and his wife had to work in subordinate positions, but their children were well provided for by the brotherhood. "Honneur donc aux Anabaptistes!" (ML III, 129.) H.Q.

Michielsz, Simon, a Dutch Mennonite elder: see Simon Michielsz.

Michigan was admitted to the Union in 1837; it has an area of 58,216 square miles and a population of over five and a quarter million. In it live approximately 5,500 Mennonites, many of them recent converts in the Mennonite Church (MC) or the United Missionary Church (UMC). By the close of the Civil War (1865) Mennonites (MC) were living in three counties of Michigan: (1) Barker Street (q.v.) had been established in St. Joseph County in 1863 and lasted a little over sixty years before it disintegrated; it never had more than 64 members. (2) Branch County was the seat of the Pleasant Hill congregation established in 1865, the home church of the well-known Bishop C. D. Beery (1815-78). Pleasant Hill was rather weak by the time of the Brenneman division of 1874, and eventually the Mennonite Brethren in Christ (now UMC) took up the work at Pleasant Hill and have built it up to a membership (1955) of 104. (3) Kent County contained two congregations, Caledonia (q.v.) established in 1864, which remained rather weak numerically until its dissolution a half century later; and Bowne (q.v.) established in 1865 and having in 1955 a membership of 104. Resident bishops of the Bowne congregation were John P. Speicher (1833-94), ordained preacher in 1867 and bishop in 1869; Bishop Jacob P. Miller (1850-1927), who moved from White Cloud to Bowne in July 1911 and lived there until March 1916; and T. E. Schrock, ordained preacher at Bowne in 1931 and bishop in 1936. Before 1879 these were the only counties in Michigan which contained established Mennonite congregations, although individual families were located in various other counties, who were often visited by traveling preachers such as John M. Brenneman of Ohio, and John F. Funk and Daniel Brenneman of Elkhart County, Ind. In 1880 a preacher Cornelius Unruh with a small flock of 25 members was living in Okemos, Ingham Co., Mich., and another small group at Hammond in Kent County was hoping to build a meetinghouse. In 1880 a settlement was begun in Antrim County at Mancelona. Some Mennonites (MC) were also living in Mecosta County at a place called Wheatland. About the same time a number of Ontario Mennonite families settled in Tuscola County, but within a few decades most of them moved away. One of the last residents was Daniel Lehman, preacher of Fairgrove, Tuscola County, who died about 1922.

Between 1879 and 1899 three permanent settlements were made in Emmet, Huron, and Newaygo



MENNONITE CHURCHES IN Michigan
○ Cities ● Churches ▬ Camps
MC Mennonite Church
GCM General Conference Mennonite Church
CAM Conservative (Amish) Mennonite Church
RM Reformed Mennonite Church
CGC Church of God in Christ, Mennonite
EMC Evangelical Mennonite Church
UMC United Missionary Churches (35 UMC congregations with memberships less than 100 are not shown).
Scale of Miles
0 5 10 20 40 60 80
LAKE SUPERIOR
Grand Marais Mission (MC)
Sault Sainte Marie
Seney (MC)
Wayside (MC)
Fernland (MC)
Wildwood (MC)
Rexton (MC)
Naubinway Mission (MC)
Maple Grove (MC)
Maple River (MC)
Petoskey (MC)
Cold Springs (MC)
Comins (GCM)
Fairview (MC)
McKinley (GCM)
LAKE HURON
Little Eden Camp (MC)
Pleasantview (MC)
Riverside (CAM)
Harrison (CGC)
Pigeon (MC)
Pigeon River (CAM)
Midland (MC and EMC)
Bay City
Shelby (RM)
White Cloud (MC)
Ninth St Mennonite (MC)
Saginaw
Vassar (CAM)
Zion (MC)
Brown City (UMC)
Newark (CGC)
Trinity (UMC)
Bethel (MC)
Flint
Port Huron (UMC)
LAKE MICHIGAN
Grand Rapids
Flint (CAM) and Hamilton Avenue (UMC)
Bethany (MC)
Bowne (MC)
Lansing
Pontiac (UMC)
Detroit
Calvary (MC)
Detroit Mennonite (MC)
Calvary (UMC) and Dakota Avenue (UMC)
Kalamazoo (UMC)
Jackson
Ann Arbor
ONTARIO
Liberty (MC)
Moorepark (MC)
Camp Friedenswald (GCM)
Locust Grove (MC)
Adrian (EMC)
LAKE ERIE
Riverview (CAM)
INDIANA
Goshen
OHIO
Toledo

counties. The Maple River congregation near Brutus in Emmet County was established in 1879 and led by Abraham W. Detweiler (1828-1912), who was originally of Ontario, but had left the Caledonia congregation to start a colony in Emmet County. Because of Detweiler's leadership the congregation itself was often called Detweiler's (q.v.). About 1886 there was a division in the congregation parallel to the Wisler schism (q.v.) in Indiana of 1871, and Detweiler went with the conservatives (Wisler's Old Order Mennonites). This Wisler congregation, although its establishment greatly weakened the other portion of the congregation, was destined to live for only half a century. In 1921 a number of these Wisler families returned to the congregation which was a part of the Indiana-Michigan Conference (MC). After the division of 1886 Bishop Henry Shaum of Indiana went to Maple River and ordained 1887 Christian Detweiler (1845-1917) to the ministry, but the congregation grew progressively weaker. In 1912 seven members communed, and in 1919 three. The District Mission Board (MC) then arranged for the ordination of Clyde X. Kauffman of Indiana, and in 1921 he located in the Brutus area and attempted to revive the congregation. In a few years he had over 50 members, but later the membership dropped back to 25. In 1952 Earl Hartman of the Olive Church in Indiana was ordained to serve at Maple River; he moved to Brutus in 1954, and in 1955 was made pastor of the congregation, which in that year numbered 64.

In 1894 the Berne (now Pigeon) congregation (MC) was organized in Huron County, Mich. Mennonite families began to move into the area about 1888, and the first services were held in a private home in 1890. The first meetinghouse was built in 1897. That same year Peter Ropp (1864-1944) was ordained preacher; he served at Pigeon until 1923 when he moved to Imlay City (where he was ordained bishop in 1926). Pigeon was in the Ontario Conference until 1916 when it became affiliated with Indiana-Michigan (MC). Later pastors were S. J. Miller and Donald E. King, who was ordained bishop in 1957. The present membership is 98.

The original settlers in Newaygo County came largely from the Shore congregation (MC) in Indiana; they located near White Cloud in 1897-99. The group started a Sunday school the first year, and in 1899 Bishop P. Y. Lehman (1836-1925) of Indiana organized the congregation. In 1900 John F. Funk (q.v.) ordained Jacob P. Miller (1850-1927) as preacher, and in 1901 P. Y. Lehman ordained Miller as bishop. (Ten years later, in July 1911, Miller moved to Bowne, Kent Co., Mich.) The long-time pastor of the White Cloud congregation (formerly called Union) was T. U. Nelson (1870-1950), who was ordained in 1909. The present pastor is Edward D. Jones, who has been a preacher since 1935, and the membership (1955) is 75. The meetinghouse was partly destroyed by fire Dec. 25, 1956.

In 1900-20 five additional Mennonite congregations (MC) were established in Michigan by colonization. Largest of all the Mennonite congregations of Michigan (MC) is Fairview (q.v.) with its 401 members in 1955. Amish Mennonite settlers from Indiana began to locate in Oscoda County in 1900. In 1903 Eli A. Bontrager (1861-1956), preacher of the West Market Street (Nappanee) congregation, moved to Fairview, and the next year Bishop D. J. Johns (q.v.) of Goshen, Ind., organized the Fairview congregation with 35 charter members. In 1906 Menno Esch was ordained as a preacher, and in 1909 as bishop. In 1952 Esch ordained Harvey Handrich as bishop. Sentiment against the nonresistance of the Fairview Mennonites during World War I led to the burning of the meetinghouse of 1904 during the night of April 4, 1918, but a new church was immediately erected in its place, and was ready for use, first in the basement only, by January 1919.

Mennonite settlers began moving into Manistee County in 1903, and the next year Bishop E. A. Mast (1856-1932) of the Howard-Miami congregation in Indiana, from which the settlers had come, organized a congregation which was named Pleasantview. The first meetings were held in a log cabin, but in 1906 the church erected a new meetinghouse. Among the pastors who served the congregation were Joseph S. Horner (1864-1945) 1903-11, and Claude C. Culp (1893-1953) 1919-53. The present (1956) pastor is Warren C. Shaum, and the membership is 29.

Mennonite settlers from the Emma congregation (MC) in Indiana began to locate in Midland County in 1910, and three years later the District Mission Board placed William Haarer there as a licensed pastor. He remained three years. In 1916-38 Eli A. Bontrager (1861-1956) was a minister at the Midland Church. In 1926 his son Floyd was ordained preacher, and in 1934 bishop. The congregation purchased an old lodge hall and moved it onto their church lot in 1917 for use as a meetinghouse. In 1928 the congregation built a new meetinghouse. The present (1955) pastor is Clarence R. Yoder, and the membership is 134.

Mennonite families began to locate at Imlay City in Lapeer County in 1917. Some came from the Pigeon congregation in Huron County, others from other places including Ontario. One of the settlers was Peter Ropp (1864-1944), a preacher formerly of the Pigeon congregation. The Imlay City congregation was organized in 1918. In 1926 Ropp was ordained bishop. Paul A. Wittrig, the present pastor, was ordained in 1938. The membership in 1955 was 35.

The last Mennonite Church (MC) to be established in Michigan by direct colonization was the Bethel congregation near Ashley in Gratiot County. The settlers came from the large Amish Mennonite churches in Illinois beginning in 1918. Sunday school was organized in 1920, and church services were inaugurated later that same year by Bishop George H. Summer (1871-1937), who had been ordained preacher by the Waldo congregation in Illinois in 1906 and bishop there two years later. Summer located at Ashley in 1920. The meetinghouse was built in 1922. Daniel S. Oyer (1882-1954) served as deacon of the congregation 1923-42, when he was ordained bishop, serving 1942-d.54. The present (1955) pastor is John M. Landis, and the membership is 134.

The remaining churches and mission stations of the Mennonites (MC) in Michigan have all been established since 1937 with the exception of Detroit (1926). In 1937-52 eleven mission stations were established in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan; these stations now have a total of 190 members (1955). Ten other stations and congregational outposts were established in Lower Michigan in 1941-55 with a membership of a little over 400 counting Detroit (which was established in 1926). The largest of these is Locust Grove in St. Joseph County with 192 members, an outpost of the Shore congregation in Lagrange County, Ind. The total membership (MC) of the ten Michigan independent congregations (not under another congregation or a mission board), those with full status in Conference, is 1,272, and the remaining 17 outposts and mission stations have 444 members, a total for the state of 1,716 Mennonite (MC) members. Only six congregations have a membership of approximately one hundred or above.

The General Conference Mennonites are represented by one congregation and one mission station in Michigan, Comins and McKinley. The congregation at Comins in Oscoda County resulted from the energy and vision of F. F. Stutesman, formerly of the Mennonite Church (MC), who started a Sunday school in Comins after a Methodist Sunday school had died. Stutesman's Sunday school was a union or nondenominational effort, but was apparently attended by a number of Mennonite families which were living in the area and which had been worshiping with the Methodists. Stutesman became sufficiently concerned to see a Mennonite church started that he came to Middlebury in 1924 to interview Emanuel Troyer, the field secretary of the Central Conference Mennonites (since 1945 merged with the General Conference Mennonites). Troyer held a series of meetings at Comins the fall of 1924, and the next summer Troyer and Allen Yoder organized the Mennonites of the area into a congregation. In the late summer of 1925 the Comins Mennonite Church was accepted as a member of the Central Conference of Mennonites. That same year the Comins congregation built its first church building. In 1927 H. E. Nunemaker accepted the pastorate. By 1927 the membership was 26. In 1955 the pulpit was supplied by Howard Johnson of Fairview, and the membership had risen to 173. The McKinley Mission (GCM), southeast of Fairview in Oscoda County, was established in 1951 and the membership in 1955 was three.

The Old Order Amish began to settle in Oscoda County, Mich., in 1900. They came from Geauga County, Ohio, and other locations. But the Amish seem not to have been permanently successful in Oscoda County. By 1955 the membership had dwindled to 20, and the remaining members no longer had any ordained men to care for them. Since 1925 the Amish have established a colony in St. Joseph County in southern Michigan, around Centerville. Here they have three districts with a total of 146 members (1955). There are also some Amish families in the Stoll District at Jerome, Hillsdale Co., Mich.

Historically the Evangelical Mennonites were not represented in Michigan but they now have two small congregations, Adrian and Midland. The First Mennonite Church (EMC) of Adrian (q.v.) in Lenawee County (north of Wauseon, Ohio) was organized in 1949; in 1954 it had a membership of 34. The Midland congregation in Midland County is even younger, having been founded in 1953. In 1955 it had a membership of 28.

The Reformed Mennonites (q.v.) are represented in Michigan by only one congregation, the Shelby Mennonite Church in Oceana County. It was established in the years immediately following the Civil War, a little before 1870. It has not prospered. The 1955 membership is approximately 50. The ministers are Omar Near and Lawrence Zimmerman. About 1900 a second Reformed Mennonite congregation was established at Rochester in Oakland County near Detroit, but it died in the 1930's.

When John Holdeman (q.v.), founder of the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, wrote his English History of the Church of God (1876), he reported that his group had spread to "Canada, Michigan, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Virginia, and Maryland, and is still increasing more and more" (p. 241). Eighty years later, however, the CGC group was represented in Michigan by only two congregations, Newark in Gratiot County, and Harrison in Clare County. Newark was established as a congregation in 1890 and has prospered; the membership stands at 285 in 1955. Meetinghouses were built in 1903 and 1920, and the latter enlarged in 1947 and again in 1953. The Harrison (q.v.) congregation in Clare County was established in 1912, and has a membership of 59.

The Old Order or Wisler Mennonites no longer have any members in Michigan. As was noted above, the Maple River or Detweiler congregation (q.v.) near Brutus in Emmet County divided about 1886. Even prior to the division at Brutus, however, Jacob Wisler had ordained Jonathan Gehman to the ministry. A later preacher was Henry Brenneman. The bishop, Daniel G. Brubaker, originally of Ontario—he settled at Brutus before his marriage and later brought a bride from Ontario—was still living in 1957, an aged man of about 90. (His home is now at Elverson, Pa.) The two groups, M.C. and O.O.M., alternated in the use of the meetinghouse. For a number of decades the Wisler congregation was the stronger of the two, the number of attendants about 1920 often being in the neighborhood of 80 or 90. But in 1921 some of the Wisler families began to unite with the M.C. congregation and others moved to various communities. About 1936, fifty years after its founding, the Wisler services ceased at Brutus. In another decade or so the last member had died.

The group with the largest number of members in Michigan is the United Missionary Church, formerly M.B.C., although as their historian J. A. Huffman writes, they have "but little Mennonite stock." The first mission stations were started in Huron and Lapeer counties in the "thumb" of Michigan in 1880. The first meetinghouses were built in 1884. In rapid succession a series of missions was founded: Grand Rapids (1897), Caro (1900), St. Clair (1903), Bad Axe (1903), Port Huron (1903), Flint (1904), Pontiac (1908), etc. Some stations have died out, but the general movement has been definitely forward. The Michigan Conference was organized in 1920 and includes twenty congregations with 1,110 members. The chain of eighteen congregations across southern Michigan belongs to the Indiana Conference (UMC) and embraces a total of 1,004 members. The following five U.M.C. congregations in Michigan have over 100 members: Brown City in Sanilac County, 132; Port Huron in St. Clair County, 165; Calvary in Detroit, 111; Dakota Avenue in Detroit, 264; and Pleasant Hill in Branch County (originally MC), 104.

The Conservative Mennonites (CAM) are represented in Michigan by three well-established congregations with a total of 602 members (1955): Pigeon River in Huron County, which began about 1902 and now has 270 members (1955); the Riverside congregation at Au Gres in Arenac County, founded about 1911 and now having 100 members; and the Riverview congregation in St. Joseph County near White Pigeon, established as an extension of the C.A.M. settlement in the vicinity of Middlebury, Ind., with a membership of 174. The mission in Flint was founded in 1929, and now has 39 members; the mission in Vassar (1938) had 15 members in 1955; and the Mount Morris mission north of Flint (Genesee County) has four members; it was established in 1951. The Fairhaven mission at Sebewaing (southwest Pigeon, Huron Co.), founded in 1938, and the National City mission, Iosco County, have as yet no resident membership. The oldest and chief congregation, Pigeon River, was host to the first session of the Conservative A.M. Conference (q.v.) in 1910. Emanuel Swartzendruber (1893-), its present bishop, ordained preacher in 1934, and bishop in 1944, has oversight of all the Conservative congregations and missions in Michigan except Riverview, where Orie Kauffman is in charge.

The Missionary Church Association was founded in 1898 as a schism from the Defenseless Mennonite Church, now Evangelical Mennonite Church (q.v.). That very year an M.C.A. congregation was founded in Elkton, Mich. In 1918-47 the following nine mission stations and/or congregations were established: Eastlawn in Detroit (1918), East Detroit (1923), Roseville, northeast of Detroit (1929), Royal Oak, north of Detroit (1937), Flint (1940), East Lansing (1940), Jackson (1945), Sturgis (1945), and Loomis (1947). By 1954 there were 14 M.C.A. congregations in Michigan including Augusta, northeast of Kalamazoo (1954), Bad Axe in Huron County, east of Pigeon (1952-53), Battle Creek in Calhoun County (1953), Clare in Clare County some fifty miles northwest of Saginaw, and Wayne, a few miles southwest of Detroit (1952-53). There are also (1954) two unorganized M.C.A. congregations or mission stations in Michigan; viz., Midland, and Mt. Clemens, northeast of Detroit. When the Missionary Church Association began to appoint district superintendents in 1909, Michigan was one of nine districts given a superintendent. The three states, Michigan, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, now constitute (1954) the Eastern District, a territory with the following organized congregations: Michigan, 14; Ohio, 11; and Pennsylvania, 3. These 28 churches, plus Michigan's two unorganized churches, have a total membership of 1,432.

One other related denomination is represented in Michigan, the Brethren in Christ (q.v.), a group founded by Jacob Engel (q.v.) about the close of the Revolutionary War. This body is represented in Michigan by seven small congregations founded since 1880, most of the meetinghouses having been built in 1915-35. The membership of these churches totaled 153 in 1954. These congregations have all been under the care of Bishop E. J. Swalm of Duntroon, Ont., since 1954 because of the advanced age of the previous leader, Henry Schneider of Merrill, Mich., who now has the status of bishop emeritus.

The successful colonies of Mennonites in Michigan have not been numerous. The state has rather proved to be the "mission field" for the various groups of Mennonites in Indiana. Four bodies, M.C. (1,716 members), U.M.C. (2,114 members), C.G.C. (344 members), and C.A.M. (602 members), constitute over 85 per cent of all the Mennonites in the state. Indeed, two of these, the M.C. and the U.M.C., together comprise about 70 per cent of the total.

J.C.W.

A. W. Climenhaga, History of the Brethren in Christ Church (Nappanee, 1942); John Holdeman, A History of the Church of God (Newton, 1876 and 1938); J. A. Huffman, History of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (New Carlisle, 1920); W. H. Lugibihl and J. F. Gerig, The Missionary Church Association (Berne, 1950); W. B. Weaver, History of the Central Conference Mennonite Church (Danvers, 1926); ML III, 129 f.

Michigan Conference of the United Missionary Church was organized in 1896 as a mission conference under the Ontario Conference, later becoming an independent conference. The earliest congregations in the district had been formed as the result of the work of a young Canadian convert, Peter Cober, and Daniel Brenneman. Other early workers were Samuel Shirk, D. U. Lambert, and J. Schlichter. The first presiding elder was E. O. Anthony. In 1954 the conference had 43 congregations and mission stations, with a total membership of 2,049, of which 16 congregations with 964 members were in the South District, 24 congregations with 1,038 members were in the North District, and 3 unorganized churches had 47 members; most of the churches are small, the following 5 having more than 100 members each: Detroit (Dakota Ave.) 243, Port Huron 177, Brown City 126, Yale Trinity 123, Pontiac 106. H.S.B.

Michigan Mennonite Mutual Auto Aid, a mutual insurance association for members of the Mennonite (MC) and Conservative Mennonite churches in Michigan, covering damage to automobiles in accidents, organized at Fairview, Mich., in 1939, with 150 members in 1953. H.S.B.

Micronius, Martinus (Marten de Cleyne) (ca. 1522-59), a Reformed theologian of the Reformation period, studied at the University of Basel under Bullinger (q.v.), who influenced him deeply. In 1550 he became pastor of the Dutch congregation in London, which was under the leadership of John á Lasco (q.v.). When it became difficult for him to stay here under Queen Mary, he and his group in 1553 sought a new home in Denmark, in Wismar, Lübeck, and Hamburg. He was rejected everywhere by the strict Lutherans. After a short stay in Emden he became pastor in Norden in 1554, and died there on Sept. 12, 1559.

In Wismar Micronius met Menno Simons. The Mennonites living here received the refugees with sympathy and willingness to help them. Soon they were engaged in religious disputations, in which Hermes Backereel wished to represent the refugees in debating with Menno Simons, who had been living here in concealment. After the first meeting Micronius was called from Emden. In the discussion of disputed points on Feb. 6, 1554, Micronius expressed his surprise that Menno's concept of the Incarnation was not among these topics. Then it was discussed for eleven hours, after which they ate a meal together. On Feb. 15 the discussion on the Incarnation was continued in the home of a Mennonite. This time the debate became so heated that Micronius and his party were finally driven out. Their relations with the refugees had an unhappy result for the Mennonites. Micronius reported that Menno was living in Wismar and that the government was tolerating Anabaptists. This ungrateful recompense for the fraternal care they had given the refugees upon their arrival worried Menno deeply. It also made it necessary for Menno to leave Wismar; he took up residence in Fresenburg in 1554.

Micronius as well as Menno published an exact report on the course of the two debates. On June 18, 1556, appeared Micronius' booklet, Een waeraechtigh verhaal der t'zammensprekinghe tusschen Menno Simons en Martinus Mikron van der Menschwerdinghe Jesu Christi, to which Menno replied with Een gants duytlick en bescheyden antwoort . . . Oct. 15, and Een seer hertgrontlijck Sentbrief aen M. Micron . . . of Sept. 16, 1556 (Menno Simons, Opera, 1681, 543-618). The discussion was closed with Micronius' Een apologie of verandtwoordinghe . . . in 1558. A first edition of each of Micronius' works is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. C.K.

J. H. Gerretsen, Micronius, zijn leven, zijn geschriften, zijn geestesrichting (Nijmegen, 1895); S. Cramer, article in Theol. Tijdschrift, 1896, 304 ff.; F. Pijper, in BRN I, 421 ff.; HRE; RGG; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914); J. Horsch, Menno Simons (Scottdale, 1916); C. Krahn, Menno Simons (Karlsruhe, 1936); ML III, 130 f.

Middelburg, capital of the Dutch province of Zeeland (pop. 21,500), has since very early times been the seat of an Anabaptist congregation with a rich history. Already in 1532 the magistrate had learned that there were Anabaptists in the city. He searched for a "Melchiorite" Jan Matthijsz Blauwaert (Jan the Goldsmith, not to be confused with Jan Matthijsz of Haarlem, of Münsterite notoriety) and four others because they were sowing the Melchiorite seed among the simple populace. Between 1535 and 1571 at least 18 Anabaptists were put to death here. Jan Everts (q.v.) was beheaded on April 19, 1535, and in the same year Marcus Cornelisz (q.v.) and Cop Heyne (q.v.); the latter had been a Münsterite, but was converted at Amsterdam. Of Münsterite ideas there is no further trace among the Anabaptists of Middelburg. Marcus Cornelisz declared that neither he nor the others had anything to do with them. The people were obviously on the side of the martyrs. Gillis Matthijsz (q.v.), a surgeon, was executed in the prison one night in 1564, for fear of the populace. Other martyrs executed at Middelburg were Maeyken Daniels, Jan Hendricksz, Andries van Laerbeke, all in 1559, Dirck Jansz in 1561, Willeboort Cornelisz in 1564, Hendrick Alewijnsz, Mattheeux Maurisz, Magdaleena Jansdochter, Hans Marijnsz, Gerrit Duynherder, Bastiaen Corsz, Maeyken Jans, Aelken Jans, all in 1569, and Anneken Jans van Woerden in 1571. Other Anabaptists who were martyred at other places are known to have been citizens of Middelburg or the vicinity. These are indications that Middelburg was an important Anabaptist-Mennonite center. The existence of a large congregation here explains why Leenaert Bouwens baptized only 13 converts here (in 1557-61). The martyr Valerius de Schoolmeester (q.v.) was active here in 1563-64 and 1566.

The bloody persecutions ceased when the city passed into the power of William of Orange in 1574. At once the Calvinist preachers, though they were in the minority, began to molest the Anabaptists. In 1576 the government gave them a hearing and made it obligatory for the Anabaptists to swear the oath. Without it they could not be citizens or carry on a trade or craft. When William visited the city in 1577 the Anabaptists presented a petition to him. In his reply of Jan. 26, 1577, William promised them release from this obligation. On this occasion the words were used which have become of great significance to the Dutch Mennonites because they marked the beginning of religious freedom for them: "His Excellency commanding and charging the magistrates of Middelborgh and all others whom this may concern, not further to oppress the petitioners contrary to their conscience, with regard to the oath and otherwise."

But the magistrate did not follow this regulation and in April 1578 again demanded the oath, closing the shops of 40 merchants (evidence of their prosperity). In addition the magistrate demanded that the Mennonites serve as armed guards. Thereupon they sent another petition to the prince. In reply he wrote to both the governor of Zeeland and the councilors of Middelburg (June 23, 1578), with emphatic instructions to give the magistrate of Middelburg express orders to leave the petitioners in peace; they were to keep their domicile beside the other citizens, carry on their business as well as they could, and were not to be in any way molested or disturbed. But the magistrate paid no attention; another letter from William was needed (July 26, 1578): "And therefore we order and demand expressly of you to cease to molest the aforesaid persons, who are Mennonites, or to prevent them from carrying on trade and crafts."

New disturbances soon followed. An attempt was made to disturb and prevent their services (June 1580) and to compel them to take their armed guard duty. The Mennonites were willing to pay taxes, serve as guards to prevent and aid in case of accident or fire, and even dig trenches, but refused to bear arms. At first William of Orange, to whom the Mennonites had addressed a letter (signed by Arendt Pietersz, Jan van Son, Matthys Hermansz, and Aert Conincx, apparently preachers or deacons of the congregation), was unable to do anything for the oppressed Mennonites, but in 1582 he again intervened on their behalf. After another letter had been sent by the Mennonites he decided on Jan. 29, 1582, that all Mennonite men should pay a special tax. Since this was very high, a new ruling was passed in 1588, whereby the brotherhood paid the fee of 1,200 florins annually. This amount was reduced to 800 in 1626, 600 in 1659, 420 in 1681, 350 in 1708, and was dropped in 1795. After the death of William of Orange (1584) the magistrate of Middelburg apparently continued to thwart the Mennonites, for on March 4, 1593, William's son and successor, Stadholder Maurice of Orange, in reply to a letter written by Maillaerd de Poorter and Joost Leonisse in the name of the Middelburg Mennonite congregation, admonished the magistrate of Middelburg not to interfere with the privileges granted the Mennonites by his father. It was always the Reformed Church which set the magistrates against the Mennonites. In 1578 Hans de Ries (q.v.), visiting Middelburg, was imprisoned here for about a month and banished from the territory.

After 1550 the membership increased rapidly, especially after the arrival of the foreigners, mostly Mennonite merchants from Belgium. In 1580 some Anabaptists arrived from England. In 1574 the male membership was about 90, in 1581 about 130. In the 17th century it continued to grow. Many immigrants from Flanders joined the Mennonites in Middelburg. Elder Bastiaen Willems baptized 42 persons here in 1632-33. Numerous complaints were made by the pastor of the Reformed Church concerning these transfers, which were not limited to foreigners. In 1656 these complaints were still heard. Hermann Faukelius (q.v.), the zealous pastor of Middelburg, appeared several times in the Mennonite church services in 1620 and in July 1621, read a paper to the congregation, which was published under the title, Babel, dat is de Verwerringhe der Wederdoperen. In 1660 the synod called the attention of the government to the "great and dangerous errors" which tended to creep in especially among the Mennonites; this is a reference to Socinianism. The 12 articles ("Geuze vragen," q.v.) set up for this purpose were presented to the Mennonite preachers for signature. Joost Isenbaert complied; Adriaen van Eeghem (q.v.) and his cousin Thomas refused to do so and were forbidden for some time to preach.

The Middelburg congregation, which belonged to the Flemish wing, at first was rather conservative. In 1632 their representatives, Elder Bastiaen Willemsen and Preacher Jan Winckelmans, signed the Dordrecht confession. But through the influence of its excellent elder Adriaan van Eeghem it grew more progressive; in the schism between Galenus Abrahamsz and Samuel Apostool, called the "Lammerenkrijgh" (q.v.), it took a moderate position, as did most of the Zeeland congregations. When Samuel Apostool (q.v.), the leader of the conservative wing, visited Middelburg in 1665 to persuade the congregation to join the stricter Zonist group and to co-operate in the Verbond van Eenigheydt (q.v.), although Joost Isenbaert signed, the congregation led by Adriaan van Eeghem would not involve itself in the quarrel.

Besides the Flemish congregation there was also in Middelburg a congregation of the (Groningen) Old Flemish or Ukowallists (q.v.). This group apparently is identical with a congregation mentioned in 1576-78, called "Voetwasschers" (Footwashers). Of this group Gerrit Gerrits was a preacher in 1663, while in 1681 Claes Pieters and Winink Alberts attended a conference of the Groningen Old Flemish. In 1663 the elders of this wing, Derk Sierts (Huizinga) and Luirt Luirts (Huizinga), visited Middelburg on their great preaching journey. This Old Flemish congregation had died out or merged with the main Middelburg congregation before 1710.

After the restless history of the 16th and 17th centuries the life of the congregation developed more quietly. The calm was broken in December 1732 when 12 Mennonite families from Dannenberg in Prussia settled on the island of Walcheren in the vicinity of Middelburg. In the following years several of their brethren, who had found a temporary home near Wageningen (q.v.), also moved to Walcheren. The Committee for Foreign Needs assisted in buying farms for these people. But the new settlers did not feel at home here, and one after the other they returned to Prussia. Since the sale of these homes did not bring enough to cover the original cost, to say nothing of additional expenses incurred in making the settlement, Middelburg suffered a considerable financial loss through this episode.

Old Mennonite families formerly of Middelburg are de Clerq, van Da(e)le, Dobbelaer(e), Dyserinck, van Eeghen (Eeghem), Fa(c)k, Goudeseboys, d'Hoye, van Houcke (Hoecke), van de Steenkiste, Strubbe, Ta(c)k, de Wind, Winckelmans (Winkelman); most of these families have died out, a few in the course of time joined the Reformed Church, and many others left Middelburg during the 17th and 18th centuries, moving elsewhere, particularly to Haarlem and Amsterdam.

The congregation of Middelburg, whose baptized membership was about 270 in 1600, decreased rapidly in the 18th century. Figures about the 18th century were not available, but in 1847 the baptized membership had decreased to 92. After that there was some increase: 102 in 1861, 187 in 1900, 209 in 1911, but 132 in 1939, and 107 in 1957. The congregation formerly was rather well-to-do. The small congregation contributed liberally to the needs of the Mennonites in Poland and Prussia: in 1727, 255 florins; in 1733, 727 florins; in 1736, 530 florins. Among the ministers who have served here there are a number of outstanding men. Bastiaen Willemsen, named above, died in 1636 or 1637. Adriaan van Eeghem served here in 1655-1709. In 1705-52 Gerardus de Wind, a physician, was its preacher. Johannes Nettis, also a physician, 1729-73, Gerrit Boothamer 1751-90, Abraham Wynands 1773-78, Sjoerd Ysbrandi 1778-83. Eke Menalda served 1784-1831, Sicco Rekker 1790-1832, Alle M. Cramer 1832-71, K. R. Pekelharing 1849-84, Tj. Kielstra 1885-1901, P. Sybolts 1901-6, P. H. Veen 1907-19, Jacob Koekebakker 1919-40, Miss A. H. A. Bakker since 1940. In 1808 an agreement was reached with the neighboring Vlissingen (q.v.) congregation to have the Middelburg preachers serve both congregations. This union lasted until 1898. In 1920 a similar agreement was made with Goes (q.v.); this union (1955) still exists.

Originally the congregation may have met for its services in the homes of its members; in 1629 Pieter van de Vegte bought a building in the Hoogstraat, which was adapted as a meetinghouse. It was used until June 18, 1889; a new church in the Lange Noordstraat was dedicated on July 7, 1889. The old church is now used by the Salvation Army. The congregation of Middelburg always took good care of its poor members. They not only supplied them with money, food, clothing, and fuel (usually peat), but in the economically difficult period of the French occupation in August 1807, moved a number of poor Mennonite children to the province of Drenthe to work in textile mills. In 1838 Pastor A. M. Cramer (q.v.) initiated a project to create work for the unemployed (not only Mennonites) during the winter months. Until the 19th century the congregation possessed a "Fund for the prevention of poverty," directed by four "comissaries" and the pastor of the congregation. There is a ladies' circle and a West Hill Sunday school for children. vdZ.

The Middelburg Archives contain a manuscript by G. Boothamer, "Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinde Gemeente te Middelburg uit de boeken en geschriften ter kerkekamer berustende tot den tegenwoordigen jare 1773"; this ms. contains very valuable information; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 424-34, 439, 441 f., 452, 580, 887, 1072, 1168, 1195-2085; II, Nos. 1645-67, 2094-2108; II 2, Nos. 273-95, 503, 518, 571, 608; DJ 1837, 24; 1850, 42; 1930, 115-41; DB 1863, 113 f.; 1875, 36 f., 99; 1877, 5; 1879, 7, 93 f.; 1883, 88, 114, 106; 1890, 142; 1900, 228; 1905, 118, 157 ff.; 1906, 111 ff.; 120, 122-24; 1908, 1-64; 1912, 113 note 2; K. R. Pekelharing, "Geschiedenis der Hervorming in Zeeland," in Archief Zeeuwsch Genootschap VI (1866); Blaupot t. C., Holland I and II, passim; C. P. van Eeghen, Adriaan van Eeghem (Amsterdam, 1896); Kühler, Geschiedenis I and II, passim; Mellink, Wederdopers, 317-19; Catalogus Amst., 150 f., 294; Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad XI, No. 47 (Feb. 23, 1957); ML III, 131 f.

Middelharnis, a village on Overflakkee, an island in the Dutch province of South Holland, was once the seat of a Flemish Mennonite church, which dated back to the early days. Elias Jansz van Wijlvliet, Coenraet Jansz van Wijlvliet, and Coenraet Philipsz Block of Middelharnis were present at the Flemish meeting in June 1660 at Leiden. Later on the congregation belonged to the Zonsche (q.v.) Sociëteit. The congregation was always small in membership. It had declined to 12 male members by 1747. The congregation was always very poor and for nearly a century Rotterdam contributed to the minister's salary. Also the congregations of Amsterdam and Haarlem supported it, particularly when the church needed repairs in 1779. In 1805 the church was sold (it still exists as a warehouse), and the congregation ceased to exist. Its last preachers were Pieter Beets until 1753, Jacob van Loon 1755-57, Jan Nieuwenhuyzen 1758-63, T. G. van Grouw 1764-70, Abr. Tersier 1771-1805. In the 18th century it was united with Sommelsdijk (q.v.), where there was also a church. On Dec. 7, 1540, Paulus Harrouts (q.v.) of Middelharnis was burned at the stake at Zierikzee. In 1617 the Mennonite elder François de Knuyt (q.v.) of Zierikzee held a public dispute at Middelharnis with the Reformed pastor Abr. Stamperius on infant baptism.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1164, 1180; II, Nos. 2109-41; DB 1864, 121; 1880, 50; 1908, 106-14; ML III, 132.

Middelhoven, a Dutch Mennonite family at Zaandam, province of North Holland. Most of them belonged to the Waterlander congregation of Zaandam, and after the merging of Waterlander and Flemish congregations (1687) to this united church. But in the Frisian congregation there were also members of the Middelhoven family. From the 18th century they were mostly lumber dealers. Jacob Dirks Middelhoven was a preacher of the Waterlander congregation ca. 1680-91. In this year he asked to be discharged from his preaching office, because his trade—he was a confectioner or pastry cook—demanded all his time. He was somewhat liberal in his views, and (from 1697) ardently participated in the Collegiant (q.v.) meetings at Rijnsburg. He published a funeral sermon on Pieter Pietersz of Koog aan de Zaan (Lyckrede ofte Aenmercking des Doods . . . , Amsterdam, 1680). This Jacob Middelhoven seems to have moved to near-by Krommenie (q.v.) shortly after 1691; his son Jacob was a deacon there in 1729. Many members of the Middelhoven family until recent times served as deacons of the West-Zaandam congregation, one of whom was Willem Jacobsz Middelhoven, who died in 1888, having served for nearly 55 years. vdZ.

S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 31, 44, 70, 76, 114 f., 169; Catalogus Amst., 250; DJ 1926, 139-41.

Middelie, a village in the Dutch province of North Holland, south of Hoorn, the center of Anabaptist activity from the earliest times (Walraven Herberts of Middelie was executed at Utrecht in 1535) and soon the seat of a Mennonite congregation, of which, however, little is known. Leenaert Bouwens baptized 25 persons here in 1563-65. Soon afterward the congregation joined the Frisian branch, and in the 17th century the Frisian conference of North Holland. At an early time the congregation of neighboring Axwijk (q.v.) had united with Middelie. The congregation contributed in 1733 and 1736 to the needs of the Prussian Mennonites. It seems to have had a hymnal of its own (see Middelier Lied-Boeck), replaced in 1854 by the Groote Bundel (q.v.), which was in turn replaced in 1946 by the Doopsgezinde Bundel. Until 1892 it was served by untrained preachers, among whom in the 18th century were some members of the Hartog (q.v.) family. The last untrained preachers were Hendrik Bakker, serving 1809-38, and H. W. van der Ploeg, serving 1839-92, who was examined and appointed preacher candidate by the Conference of Friesland (Friesche Doopsgezinde Sociëteit). He was followed by A. van der Goot, serving 1892-1930. After the departure of van der Goot the pulpit became vacant, but in 1936 an agreement was made with the congregation of Den Ilp (q.v.) to have its pastor also serve at Middelie. This lasted until 1953, when the Middelie-Axwijk congregation united with Edam-Monnikendam. The old meetinghouse was remodeled in 1860 and 1907; it acquired an organ in 1865.

The baptized membership, numbering 140 in 1726, 119 in 1788, and again 140 in 1847, was 187 in 1901, 184 in 1939, and 109 in 1957. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 102, 412, 1131, 1179; II, 2, No. 140; Blaupot t. C., Holland I and II, passim; DJ 1850, 21; DB 1887, 130 f.; 1900, 116; De Zondagsbode XXIV (1910-11) No. 47; ML III, 132.

Middelier Lied-Boeck, a Dutch Mennonite hymnal, printed at Haarlem 1651. It was used by the congregation of Middelie (q.v.) until 1854. This hymnal contains 131 hymns without notes, all composed by J. H. Pos. vdZ.

Middelstum, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen. Close to Middelstum was the castle of the Ewsum family, to which half of the land of Groningen belonged, and which was favorable to the Anabaptists. Christoffer van Ewsum (q.v.) was undoubtedly one of them. The Middelstum congregation belonged to the Groningen Old Flemish branch; in 1710 it numbered about 50 members, in 1767, 20. In 1783 a merger was effected of the Middelstum, Westeremden, and Huizinge congregations. A new church was built in Huizinge (q.v.) in 1815. The membership was 36 at the time. In 1863 the church in Huizinge was sold and a new church with a parsonage was built in Middelstum, where the congregation has had an almshouse from early times (sold in 1890). Until 1865 the congregation was usually called Huizinge and Westeremden, now always Middelstum. The baptized membership was 68 in 1861, 74 in 1900, 37 in 1957. Since the church and parsonage have been established at Middelstum it has been served by J. Hoekstra 1856-74, J. F. Bakker 1875-77, C. Leendertz 1878-1908. In 1911-26 the congregation was served by Karel Vos (q.v.), the noted historian, who wrote numerous articles for the Mennonitisches Lexikon. Since his death the pastorate has been vacant. Services were conducted by J. M. Vis of Noordbroek 1928-45; in 1946 an agreement was reached with Leermens-Loppersum to have its pastor also serve at Middelstum.

Old Mennonite families found in and around Middelstum are van der Molen, Gaaikema, Doornbosch, Wiersema, Noordhoff, and particularly Huizinga (q.v.). Many members of the Huizinga family have served the Middelstum congregation as lay preachers.

Middelstum is important in Mennonite history because of a meeting held here on Sept. 18-22, 1628, to consider the offer of reconciliation made by the Frisians to the Flemish. The irreconcilable attitude of the Flemish Elder Jan Luies (q.v.) prevented the adoption of the agreement, and caused the rise of the Groningen Old Flemish branch. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 558 V; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I and II, passim; DJ 1840, 43, 52; DB 1864, 169; 1879, 5, 86; N.N.B.Wb. III, 797 f.; K. Vos, "Doopsgezinde familien onder Middelstum," in Groningsche Volksalmanak 1921, 95-115; ML III, 133.

Middle District Conference of the General Conference Mennonite Church comprises 20 churches with a membership of 5,237, located in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri. This district conference had its beginning in 1868, when four churches of Lee Co., Iowa, and the church at Summerfield, Ill., organized to carry on home missionary work. Other Mennonite churches were invited to this first meeting, but only the above five churches responded. A conference was organized and the name "Western District Conference" was adopted. Its purpose was to promote home mission work and a spiritual ministry among scattered Mennonite families in the "north and west." Christian Krehbiel, a minister in the church at Summerfield, Ill., was the leader in this movement. By 1888, 30 churches, including a number of churches in Kansas, had affiliated with this district. The churches in Kansas, because of the close proximity to each other, had organized a local conference. When the Western District Conference met in 1888 in its twenty-first session, it was decided to divide the area into two districts. The western churches, which then were chiefly the churches of Kansas, organized and adopted the name "Western District Conference." The churches of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa then reorganized and chose as their name "Middle District Conference." In 1888 the Middle District was composed of six congregations: Berne, Ind.; Dalton, Ohio; Summerfield, Ill.; Donnelson, Iowa; West Point, Iowa; and Franklin, Iowa. In the course of the years other Mennonite churches within the area came into the district conference.

The Middle District Conference, in its constitution, states that it seeks to unite the Mennonite churches within its area in fellowship and in evangelization and service. The major home mission project of the district is the Lima (Ohio) Mission Church (now First Mennonite Church of Lima). There is also active interest in the home mission efforts carried on in Chicago, Ill. The standing committees of the district are the Home Mission Committee, Education Committee, Young People's Committee, Women's Work Committee, and Peace Committee. The district actively supports Bluffton College and elects members to its board of trustees. The district shares in sponsoring the program of summer camps at Camp Friedenswald. Mennonite Biblical Seminary in Chicago receives the support of the churches of the district. The four churches near Bluffton took the initiative in promoting plans for a home for elderly people and were joined by other churches. The home was dedicated and opened in 1955.

The first session of General Conference was held in 1860 in a church (Lee Co., Iowa) of this district. In fact much of the interest which led to the organization of the General Conference had its origin in the Middle District. Daniel Krehbiel and Christian Showalter, both from the churches of Lee County, urged and supported the union movement which led to the organization of the General Conference. Then, too, it was within the Middle District that the first Mennonite school in America for training ministers and Christian workers was established. This school was opened in 1868 at Wadsworth, Ohio, and served as the forerunner of Witmarsum Theological Seminary located at Bluffton.

In view of the fact that the churches of the Middle District and the churches formerly of the Central Conference of Mennonites (but now G.C.M.) are located in the same general area it was proposed by the Middle District that the two districts merge and be known as the Central District. This proposal was favorably received by both district conferences. The merger was completed at the joint session of the two conferences held at Normal, Ill., April 25-27, 1957. The newly organized conference is known as the Central District of the General Conference Mennonite Church. A.E.K.

H. P. Krehbiel, History of the Mennonite General Conference I (n.p., 1898).

Middle East Relief and Refugee Administration (MERRA) was organized to deal with the various problems created by the large-scale evacuation of refugees from Poland, Greece, and Dodecanese to the south early in 1941. These refugees were placed in camps in countries to the east of the Mediterranean and Egypt. MERRA was a fusion of the Repatriation Office with the Relief Section of the Minister of State Office, both British. The impact of the refugee movement by the British Military necessitated a single organization to move refugees and administer the camps where these people were temporarily housed. The exact date of MERRA's organization is not known because fire destroyed the records. One document has given July 1, 1942, as the official date of organization.

MERRA was active in administering refugee camps for a period of three years. During this brief period the Mennonite Central Committee, Inc., Akron, Pa., assigned a total of 15 of its foreign relief workers to refugee camps at El Shat and Tolumbat, both in Egypt. In May 1944 MERRA was absorbed by UNRRA (United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration), a United Nations civilian organization of world-wide scope. At this time MERRA became the Balkan Mission, an administrative section of UNRRA. MCC was not a part of MERRA. J.N.B.

Middlebury, Ind., a town (1950 pop. 839) in Middlebury Twp., Elkhart Co., Ind. For many years there have been many Amish and Mennonites in the vicinity of this village. As early as 1868 the Brenneman brothers, Daniel of Indiana and Henry of Ohio, preached to a "large, attentive, and very orderly audience." But no effort was made to locate a Mennonite church in the town before 1902, when a Sunday school was conducted in private homes. In 1904 the Middlebury Mennonite Church (MC) was organized with 32 charter members as a sort of outpost of the Forks congregation. In 1911 the first meetinghouse was built, a brick structure. In 1923 the congregation, along with a number of others in Indiana, suffered a schism on questions of discipline and conference authority. At this time about 100 members withdrew and became an independent congregation called Warren Street Mennonite Church, which later joined the Central Conference. In 1956 the two congregations had a total of 462 members of whom 62 were in the Warren Street congregation. A large number of Old Order Amish and Conservative Mennonites live in the territory surrounding Middlebury, which is their shopping center. J.C.W.

Middlebury (Ind.) Mennonite Church (MC). As early as 1868 the Brenneman brothers, Daniel of Indiana and Henry of Ohio, preached to a "large, attentive, and very orderly audience" in Middlebury. But no effort was made to locate a Mennonite meetinghouse in the village before 1902. In that year the Mennonites conducted a Sunday school in private homes. On May 10, 1903, the Sunday school was more formally organized and preaching services were begun in Prescott Hall, with D. D. Miller of the Forks Amish Mennonite Church preaching the first sermon. In 1904 the Middlebury congregation was organized with 32 charter members as a sort of outpost of the Forks congregation. A. J. Hostetler, who had been ordained deacon at Forks in 1896 and preacher in 1898, became the first pastor of the congregation, and D. J. Johns served as bishop. Simon S. Yoder, who had been ordained deacon in the Forks congregation in 1903, joined Middlebury a few years later, and in 1907 was ordained preacher. In 1911 the first meetinghouse was built, a brick structure, on Lawrence Street, enlarged in 1950-51. In 1923 the congregation, along with several others in Indiana, divided over the issue of how strict the discipline of the church ought to be, and how much direction conference ought to give its constituent congregations. In this division Hostetler remained with the Indiana-Michigan Conference (MC), together with 110 members, while Yoder and about 100 members withdrew and soon joined the Central Conference as the Warren Street congregation. Hostetler's group continued to grow, and by 1956 had a membership of 400. Wilbur Yoder has been pastor since 1936. In 1941 Simon S. Yoder was received back into the fellowship of the Indiana-Michigan Conference (MC) following his return to the Middlebury (Lawrence Street) congregation. Paul M. Miller was chosen bishop by the congregation in 1956. J.C.W.

Middlesex Reformed Mennonite Church, located near Carlisle, Cumberland Co., Pa., had 17 members in 1948. The meetinghouse was built in 1870. J.L.K.

Middleton, Humphrey, an English Anabaptist martyr, was executed during the reign of Mary, the Catholic queen of England, in London in July 1555. (ME II, 217.)

Midland, Mich., Old Order Amish community, now about extinct, was established 14 miles north of Midland in 1909 by settlers from Elkhart and Lagrange counties in Indiana. It never prospered, the only resident bishop having been Peter Yoder, who served in this office 1925-28. The last family moved away in 1930. D.J.T.

Midland (Mich.) Mennonite Church (MC) was organized in June 1913, the first families having arrived from Emma, Ind., in 1910 (Jacob Emmert) and 1912 (A. D. Miller). The first meetinghouse was a remodeled log dwelling in 1916, located five miles north of Midland. The second, a former Grange hall 3½ miles southwest of the city, was used in 1917-28; then a new meetinghouse of cinder block was built on the same site. The first resident minister was E. A. Bontrager 1916-39 (following Will Haarer, who served as unordained leader 1913-16). F. F. Bontrager (ordained 1926) has served as bishop-pastor since 1934, but Clarence Yoder (ordained 1936) is now (1956) serving as pastor, assisted by Erie Kindy, since Bontrager has charge of the mission outpost at Clare, 30 miles northwest of Midland. In 1956 the membership was 134. H.S.B.

Midland Mutual Fire Insurance: see Mennonite Mutual Fire Insurance Association.

Midsland, on the Dutch island of Terschelling (q.v.), was in the 16th century the seat of a Mennonite congregation, whose meetinghouse was renovated in 1690, but which soon after, at any rate before 1731, died out or joined the main congregation of West-Terschelling. (DB 1861, 87, 92.) vdZ.

Midway Mennonite Church (MC), located near Columbiana, Mahoning Co., Ohio, is a member of the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference. The first meetinghouse was built about 1825 on land deeded to the church by Jacob Oberholtzer, who was the first Mennonite minister in Ohio, having arrived here in 1806. A new brick church was constructed in 1869 to replace the older building. An addition was constructed in 1899. The building has been remodeled twice since that time. For many years the members and the ministers were a part of the circuit of the three churches—Midway, North Lima, and Leetonia, rather than assigned to a specific church. The bishops who served since about 1866 were Joseph Bixler, John Burkholder, and Albert J. Steiner. In 1956 Paul Yoder was bishop-pastor, and Ernest Martin minister, with a membership of 164. It was called Oberholtzer's until 1898. P.R.Y.

Midwolda, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen. The Mennonite congregation here was in existence by the 17th century, but was then usually called Woldampt. Concerning its history there is little information; in 1637 it was mentioned as the Midwolda congregation. In the 17th century it belonged to the Old Flemish branch. Amme Hikke(n)s (q.v.) was its elder at this time. During the 18th century the name Widwolda is not found in the Naamlijst, since the Mennonites of Midwolda were united with the Beerta (q.v.) and Meeden (q.v.) congregations; but from 1793 the congregation is listed as Midwolda-Beerta-Meeden, and in 1794 a parsonage was built at Midwolda. Until 1793 the preachers had always been chosen from the members of the congregation; in that year Huizinga was called in from the outside; the first preacher who received training at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary was Taco Kuiper, serving here in 1804-7. He was followed by S. E. Wieling 1808-22, J. F. Boersema 1827-66, J. Oosterbaan 1866-72, J. F. Bakker 1873-75, A. H. ten Cate 1877-83; after a vacancy of ten years a call was accepted by Joh. A. Wartena, who however did not live at Midwolda, but at Winschoten (q.v.). Concerning the membership there are no figures for the 17th and 18th centuries; in 1834 the baptized membership of the Midwolda-Beerta-Meeden congregation numbered 65, 100 in 1861, 119 in 1897.

About the middle of the 19th century the congregation became liberal in its theology. In May 1869 the question was discussed whether persons should be admitted to the church without baptism, i.e., only on confession of faith; and in 1871 it was decided that baptism was not obligatory for membership. In 1893 the church in Midwolda was sold, and the pastor moved to Winschoten (q.v.), which now became the center of the united congregation; services were to be held alternately in Beerta, Midwolda, de Meeden, and Winschoten. In Midwolda a hall has been rented for the purpose, but Beerta and de Meeden had churches. In Winschoten the preaching service was at first held in the Lutheran church. On Oct. 11, 1931, a new Mennonite church was dedicated there. Since about 1920 no services have been held at Midwolda; only seven members were living there then. The congregation now carries the name Winschoten. For ministers and membership, see Winschoten. vdZ.

DB 1879, 5; 1870, 178; 1872, 192; 1887, 148; 1894, 168; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 93, 214, 238; ML III, 133.

Mierdemann (Mierdman), Steven, a book printer, who had a publishing business at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1543-45, and in England in 1551-53. In 1554 he fled to Emden, East Friesland, Germany. Here he published in 1556 "the first genuinely Lutheran Bible in the Low German tongue," called Den Bibel in Duyts. The text for this Dutch Bible had been prepared by Jan Gheylliaert, also an emigrant from Flanders. The historical books of the Old Testament followed the text of the Dutch Bible printed at Antwerp by Jacob van Liesveldt (q.v.). For the other books of the Old Testament and of the New Testament they took the German Zürich Froschauer (q.v.) Bible (first ed. 1548, repr. 1549, 1556). The Mierdemann-Gheylliaert Bibles were also in use among the Mennonites in the Netherlands and northern Germany; Menno Simons may also have used this edition. After 1560, when a new Bible in the Dutch language was published at Emden by the Mennonite printer Nicolaes Biestkens (q.v.) van Diest, the Mierdemann Bible probably soon was discarded. Among the Dutch Reformed the Mierdemann Bible was replaced by the Calvinist Dutch edition edited by Jan N. Utenhove and Godfried van Winghen and published by Gillis van der Erven at Emden. The assertion of Samuel Muller (DJ 1837, 56) that there was a Mierdemann edition of 1528 at Emden, is a mistake. vdZ.

DB 1890, 62-64; K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914) 259 f.; I. le Long, Boekzaal der Nederduytsche Bybels (Amsterdam, 1732); Nederlandse Bijbels en hun uitgevers 1477-1952 (Amsterdam, n.d., 1952).

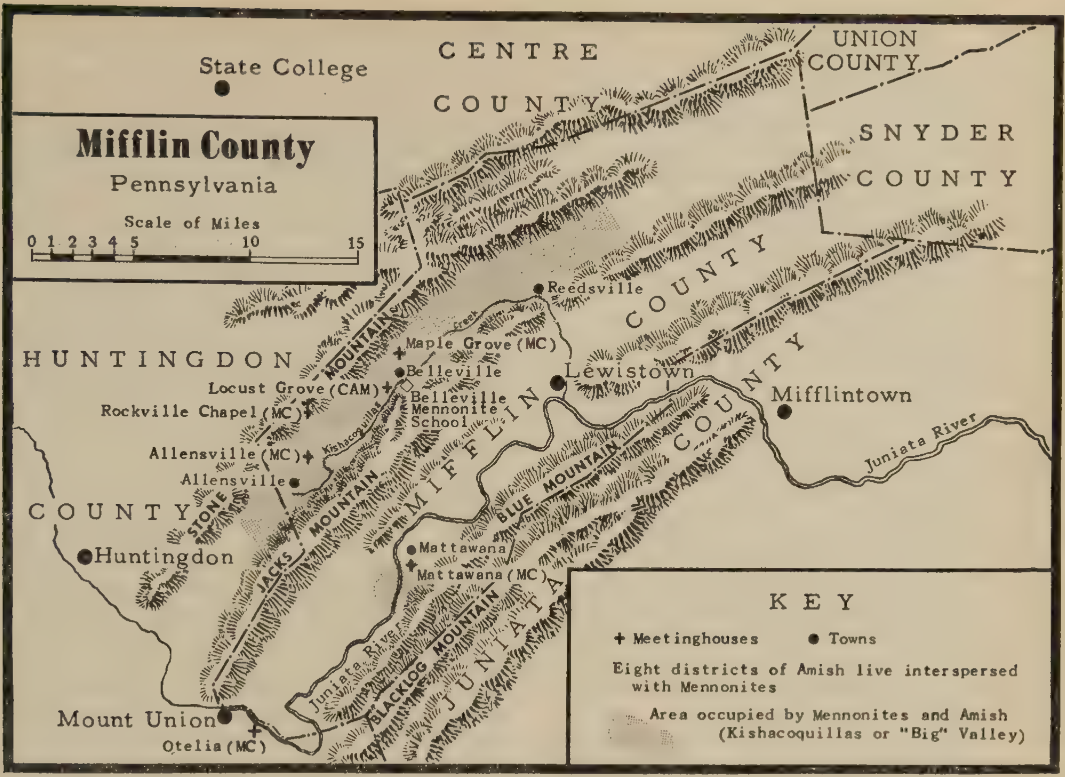
Mierevelt (Miereveldt), Michiel Janszn van (1567-1641), a noted Dutch portraitist, lived all his life in Delft (q.v.) and painted many pictures of the princes and princesses of the house of Orange-Nassau, also of Elector Frederick (q.v.) V of the Palatinate, the dethroned king of Bohemia. Many of the pictures painted by his pupils in his studio were signed by him; this practice had a depreciating effect on his reputation as well as on the value of his paintings. The portrait of Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.), a Mennonite preacher, which is in the national museum at Amsterdam, is the product of a pupil (Cat. 1907, No.



Mifflin County
Pennsylvania
Scale of Miles
0 1 2 3 4 5 10 15
State College CENTRE COUNTY
UNION COUNTY
SNYDER COUNTY
HUNTINGDON COUNTY
Reedsville
Maple Grove (MC)
Belleville
Locust Grove (CAM)
Belleville Mennonite School
Rockville Chapel (MC)
Allensville (MC)
Allensville
Lewistown
Mifflintown
JUNIATA COUNTY
MIFFLIN COUNTY
Juniata River
Kishacoquillas
STONE MOUNTAIN
JACKS MOUNTAIN
BLUE MOUNTAIN
BLACKLOG MOUNTAIN
Juniata River
Mattawana
Mattawana (MC)
Huntingdon
Mount Union
Otelia (MC)
KEY
+ Meetinghouses
● Towns
Eight districts of Amish live interspersed with Mennonites
Area occupied by Mennonites and Amish (Kishacoquillas or "Big" Valley)

1606). But the best made by him in person are of great artistic value. After unremitting work he left a fortune at his death and a respected school of portraitists, of whom Paulus Moreelse and Jan van Ravesteyn were the most outstanding. His son-in-law, the excellent copper etcher Willem Jacobszn Delff, made some excellent reproductions of van Mierevelt's works.

In foreign countries Mierevelt also enjoyed great fame. The court of England invited him to come to London; he was, however, unable to go because of the epidemic of the plague prevalent in the city. Duke Albertus of Austria, Stadholder of the southern Netherlands where the Anabaptists had been so terribly persecuted, called him to Brussels, and he was granted the very unusual privilege of practicing his "Mennonite religion" undisturbed, as the historian Joachim van Sandrart reports. The poet Joachim Oudaen (q.v.), who was closely associated with Mennonites and Collegians, composed his epitaph. Of his contacts with the Mennonites nothing is known but the fact that he was a member of the Mennonite Church. About 1600 there was at Delft a Flemish, a Frisian, and possibly a Waterlander Mennonite congregation. His father, Jan Michielsen Mierevelt (1528-92), a silver smith and copperplate engraver at Delft, is also said to have been a Mennonite. H.F.W.J., vdZ.

J. van Sandrart, Academie der Bau-, Bild- und Malerey-Künste 1675-83 (Academia nobilissimae artis pictoriae), later edition of three folio volumes under the title Teutsche Academie (ed. J. J. Volkmann, 1768-75); A. Houbraken, Groote Schouburgh der Nederlandsche Konstschilders (3 vv., 1718-19); Van der Aa, Biogr. Wb. VIII (Haarlem, 1869); ML III, 133.

Miertgen (Maritgen, Mynken Sduucs), an Anabaptist martyr, born at Komen (Commines) in Flanders, the wife of Hans de Vette. In July 1559 a number of members of the Mennonite congregation of Gent, Belgium, were arrested. Most of them were put to death on July 5 and Aug. 7, 1559, among them Hans de Vette on July 5. Two women, Tanneken Gressy (Tanneken Godtbetert) and Miertgen, who were pregnant when they were arrested, had their execution postponed until they had given birth to their children; and then the execution for some reason or other was again postponed until June 27, 1560, when they were secretly beheaded in the Gent Gravensteen castle and immediately buried. Miertgen, who with the other martyrs of this group is commemorated in the hymn "Ick moet een liet beginnen" (I must begin a song), No. 14 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, faithfully suffered imprisonment and martyrdom. She is said to have spoken from the window of her prison to the passers-by and to have thrown letters into the street. Van Braght (Martyrs' Mirror), who calls this martyr Maritgen van Waestene (Warneton in Flanders), where Hans and Miertgen probably had lived before they moved to Gent, gives 1559 as the year of execution. (Offer, 348, 559; Mart. Mir. D 246, 249; E 620; Verheyden, Gent, 26, No. 74.) vdZ.

Mifflin County in central Pennsylvania, organized in 1789, contains large settlements of Amish and Mennonites. The beautiful Kishacoquillas Valley, enclosed by Stone and Jacks Mountains, and extending about 30 miles across the central part of the county, is host to the Mennonite and Amish inhabitants of the county. There are five Mennonite meetinghouses in the county. The first settlers known were Michael Yotter (Yoder), whose name occurred on the assessment roll of Union Township in 1791, and Christian Zook, who warranted land in 1792. That Amish Mennonites were in the county as early as 1760 (S. W. Peachey) cannot be substantiated. Family names of early Amish settlers who came to Mifflin County from Lancaster, Berks, Chester, and Union counties were Yoder, Zook, Byler, Hooley, Hartzler, Peachey (Bitsche), Renno, and Kauffman. The first Amish minister was probably "Long" Christian Zook, the first bishop Hans Beiler (q.v.). In 1850 there were three Amish church districts with a membership of 290. In 1900 the total membership in Mifflin County was 863: Belleville 155 and Allensville 110 in the Eastern A.M. Conference; Peachey (3 districts) 250, Old School (2 districts) 159, Locust Grove 110, and Mattawana 79 across the mountain and in the Eastern A.M. Conference.

The present Mennonites in Mifflin County all stem from the early Amish settlers. The settlement has gradually gained in membership in its 160 years of history, even though at various times some of its families have moved westward to Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, and North Dakota. Since 1849 there have been various schisms in the Amish group so that there are now eight differing Amish and Mennonite branches or conferences in the county, totaling 1,796 members. Farming is the chief occupation, with special emphasis on dairying. The three villages in the heart of the settlement in Kishacoquillas Valley are Allensville, Belleville, and Reedsville.

Shem Zook (q.v.), Samuel Yoder, and J. K. Hartzler were outstanding Amish Mennonite leaders of the county. The four Mennonite churches belong to the M.C. branch. Of these, only Maple Grove (Belleville) is a member of the Allegheny Conference; the others belong to the Ohio and Eastern Conference. Locust Grove (CM) members conduct mission points at Woodland and Crenshaw. Following is a summary of Amish and Mennonite membership in the county in 1956:

Name of Church	Origin	Building Erected	Founder or Organizer	Membership
Mennonite (814)
Mattawana	1793	1871	Sol Yoder	125
Maple Grove (Belleville)	1863	1868	Solomon Byler	281
Allensville	1863	1869	Solomon Byler	361
Rockville	1934	1941	Eli K. Zook	56
Conservative (402))
Locust Grove	1898	1899	Abraham D. Zook	402
Old Order Amish (580)
Old School Byler	1792		Hans Byler	40
Renno (3 dist.)	1863		Abraham Peachey	205
Nebraska (Yoder)	1880		Yost H. Yoder	70
Speicher (Beachy)	1911		John B. Zook	205
Nebraska (Zook)	1945		Christ. Y. Zook	60

J.A.H.

S. W. Peachey, Amish of Kishacoquillas Valley, Mifflin Co., Pa. (Scottdale, 1930); J. W. Yoder, Rosanna of the Amish (Huntingdon, 1940); idem, Rosanna's Boys (Huntingdon, 1948); the Yoder books portray Amish life and customs of the Mifflin County area; J. K. Hartzler, "Fifty Years with the Amish Mennonite Churches of Pennsylvania," Herald of Truth (June 1, 1902); J. A. Hostetler, "Life and Times of Samuel Yoder," MQR XXII (October 1948); idem, "The Amish Family" (MA thesis, Penn State, 1951).

Migrant Work. In the United States thousands of families annually follow the harvest season work from Texas to Michigan, Florida to New York, and up the coast in California. Since 1940 Protestant groups have generally co-ordinated their religious, educational, and health concerns for migrants through the Home Missions Council of North America (later the Division of Home Missions of the National Council of Churches of America).

Full-time Mennonite migrant workers were sponsored by California General Conference Mennonites at Shafter as early as 1941. That same year a Mennonite Women's United Service Committee of the Defenseless, General, and Central conferences was organized with migrant work as a major service objective.

The Mennonite Central Committee in co-operation with the Home Missions Council pioneered in placing a team of six to ten voluntary service workers to do a more thorough job in a given area. The first such summer unit was in operation in Utica, N.Y., in 1949, and shortly thereafter a year-round unit at Coalinga, Cal. A children's nursery, evenings of recreation, visual education, a traveling library service, visiting nurse, vacation Bible school, Sunday schools, and a wide range of counseling and visitation constitute such a total unit approach. It is an effort to provide the help and influence of a Christian church community to an unstable, migrating community of Christians and non-Christians. Though not aimed specifically toward becoming a continuing mission church, its fruition has been just that. By 1956 the Brethren in Christ had taken over the Coalinga work as a mission project.

Of the individual Mennonite groups the Lancaster Conference (MC) has developed one of the most extensive ongoing ministries to the migrants. Their year-round migrant service, much like the MCC's, began in 1951 with a unit of five workers at Redland, Fla. A year later a similar group was located in the Everglades of Florida at Immokalee. In both camps the Mennonites have regular chapel services in buildings provided by the government-built camp or the local migrant committtee of the near-by city. In 1951 a Gospel Quartet spent several months with Negro migrants in Potter County, Pa. This has developed into a continuing program with child care as the core of the work. Spanish migrant work in their own neighborhood was begun in Lancaster County in 1950. Of particular significance is an annual fellowship meal and meeting sponsored by local Mennonite churches which reaches 1,000 Puerto Rican migrants at one time.

Other similar missions to migrants include that of the Mennonite Church (MC) with the Indians in New Mexico, in Maryland, and other states. The G.C. Mennonites have developed a mission church at Eloy, Ariz., for poor whites and Spanish and Negro migrants. E.Ed.

Migrations of Mennonites. Mennonites and their history are characterized by severe persecution and subsequent migrations. The Mennonites of Swiss background migrated primarily to South Germany, France, and Pennsylvania; most of the Mennonites east of the Mississippi River are of this background. Smaller groups of Swiss Mennonites also went to Holland, Polish Russia, and Prussia.

During the 16th century the Mennonites of the Low Countries went primarily eastward to Danzig and Polish Russia, and only during the second half of the past century did their descendants begin to come to America, with the exception of the first Dutch-German Mennonite families who settled in Germantown, Pa. Those coming during the last century settled mostly in the prairie states and provinces, and are thus located west of the Mississippi River. All Mennonites that have migrated to South America are of this background.

Dutch-North German Mennonite Migrations. When Anabaptism established itself in the Low Countries under most adverse conditions, migration to other countries was often the only chance for survival. The Anabaptists from Flanders went to the northern provinces of the Low Countries. On the other hand, German East Friesland became the haven of religious refugees from the Low Countries as a whole. Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, Leenaert Bouwens, David Joris, and many other early leaders and their followers found shelter there. Another German province which soon became a haven of Anabaptist refugees was Schleswig-Holstein. Wüstenfelde near Oldesloe became a Mennonite settlement with Menno Simons as leader. Soon Altona and Friedrichstadt attracted refugees.

As early as 1530 Anabaptists found their way to the Vistula Delta and the migration to this area continued for a long time. Menno Simons and Dirk Philips were instrumental in establishing congregations here. From here the Mennonites moved along the Vistula River even into Poland after the triangle between Danzig, Elbing, and Marienburg had been occupied. Until the middle of the 18th century the surplus population was absorbed in new settlements along the Vistula. Thus far all migration had been on a scale involving small groups. From now on organized large-scale migration of Mennonites of Dutch background became common.

When Catherine the Great issued her Manifesto in 1763 inviting farmers from Western countries to settle in the Ukraine, the Mennonites of Prussia and Danzig were soon attracted, because they were continually encountering restrictions in their economic and religious life. Later the matter of exemption from military service became important. The approximate number that emigrated to Russia in 1787-1870 was 1,907 families, with a total of some 8,000 persons. This constituted a true mass migration of Mennonites in comparison with previous movements. Of this number about 400 families settled at Chortitza (q.v.), some 1,049 at Molotschna (q.v.), some 438 at Samara (q.v.), and 20 families were reported to have gone to Vilna (q.v.).

While the migration eastward was still in progress the Mennonites of Russia and Prussia were again studying the map to find a place where they would find complete exemption from military service, which they were in danger of losing in Prussia and Russia. In 1873-84 some 18,000 Mennonites left Russia to settle in the United States and Canada. Although the Chortitza settlement (Old Colony) was much smaller than the Molotschna settlement, it furnished almost half of the emigrants. Only a small number of the Samara Mennonites, the newest settlement, left. The chief reasons for this mass migration were unwillingness to accept a compulsory alternative service program and the objection to a Russianization program inaugurated by the Russian government. Only a small number of Prussian Mennonites joined this movement, whereas all of the Swiss Volhynian Mennonites of Polish Russia joined, half of the Swiss Galician Mennonites came to America, and many of the Low German Mennonites of Poland came to the United States as congregations (Karolswalde, Michalin, etc.).

An even larger migration of Mennonites from Russia occurred after World War I, when in 1922-30 some 25,000 Mennonites went to Canada (21,000), Mexico, Brazil, and Paraguay. The reasons for this mass migration were the threat of a complete disintegration of the religious, cultural, and economic way of life of the Mennonites. A much larger number would have escaped if the "Red gate" had not rather suddenly closed. During the German occupation of the Ukraine in 1941-43 some 35,000 were evacuated by the German army to be settled in the Vistula area where they had come from some 150 years ago. Because of the outcome of the war nearly two thirds of them were forcibly repatriated by the Russian army in 1945-46, while some 12,000 found their way to Canada and South America.

In Russia itself great migrations have taken place. Between 1850 and 1914 many new settlements originated in the Ukraine, Crimea, north of the Caucasian Mountains, along the Volga River, Siberia, Central Asia, etc. After the Revolution mass exiles and concentrations in slave labor camps contributed to the dispersion of Mennonites. Large numbers were sent to northern European Russia and to Asiatic Russia. Again during the invasion of the Ukraine by the Germans in 1941 many Mennonite settlements were dissolved, the total population having been sent to Asiatic Russia by the Soviet government. This happened to the settlements east of the Dnieper River with the exception of those which the invading German army was not expected to reach. The exact location of the majority of the Mennonite population and its centers since this mass migration has not yet been fully determined. Kazakhstan, east of the Ural Mountains, is known as a new center of the Mennonite population.

All the Mennonites of Prussia and Poland fled in 1945 when the Russian army approached. Some were interned for some time in Denmark, while the others escaped to West Germany, where many of them have established new homes. A large number of the Danzig and Prussian and some of the Galician Mennonites migrated to Uruguay and Canada in 1948-52.

Migrations have also taken place among the Mennonites of America. After World War I many Old Colony Mennonites moved from Manitoba and Saskatchewan to Mexico and some Sommerfelder Mennonites moved to the Chaco of Paraguay. In general, the Mennonite population trend in Canada and the United States has been from the east to the west and from the country to the city. A considerable number of Russian Mennonites from Paraguay have come to Canada. There have also been some migrations within the boundaries of Brazil. Witmarsum was dissolved and New Witmarsum and Bage were established. C.K.

C. Henry Smith, The Story of the Mennonites (Newton, 1950); idem, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (Berne, 1927); Mennonite Life Maps and Charts (North Newton, 1953); Horst Quiring, "Die Auswanderung der Mennoniten aus Preussen 1788-1870," Menn. Life VI (April 1951); S. C. Yoder, For Conscience Sake (Goshen, 1940); Ernst Müller, Berner Täufer; B. H. Unruh, Die niederländisch-niederdeutschen Hintergründe der mennonitischen Ostwanderungen im 16., 18. und 19. Jahrhundert (Karlsruhe, 1955).

Swiss-South German Migrations. The first migrations from Switzerland or South Germany were of Anabaptists fleeing persecution to a haven of refuge with Hutterites in Moravia, throughout the 16th century. This was not on a mass scale but included a considerable number of families, sometimes blocks or a whole congregation. Hutterite missioners invited the harried brethren to come, promising toleration and the security of a large group fellowship. The numbers leaving sometimes were so large, or other resources taken along so great, that the civil authorities took steps to stop the movement, both by counter-persuasion and by penalties, including confiscation of property and imprisonment, both of those departing and the missioners. To go to Moravia meant of course for the Swiss Brethren not only a migration but a conversion to Hutterianism.

The next migration, also caused by persecution, which became very severe in Switzerland in the 17th century, was from the cantons of Bern and Zürich down the Rhine to Alsace and the Palatinate on both sides of the Rhine, as well as certain adjoining territories such as Durlach or Zweibrücken. Since the earlier Anabaptists in these territories were almost completely wiped out by 1600-30, all the later Mennonite settlements in these areas were made by emigrants from Switzerland. The heaviest movement was in 1650-90. Some Bernese Anabaptists migrated to the Jura region of the Bishopric of Basel early in the 18th century, and about 1711 some emigrated to Holland. In 1714 the Anabaptists were ordered expelled from Alsace, and many left to found the community in Montbéliard, at that time ruled by Württemberg. From 1700 on there was an almost constant internal migration of families from Alsace westward into interior France, northward down the Rhine into Hesse, into Wittgenstein, and finally into Waldeck, where it reached its limit. Mennonite farmers were seeking land to rent and tolerable living conditions and freedom of worship. Mennonites from the Palatinate moved eastward in South Germany into Württemberg, Franconia, and Bavaria from about 1800 on. Others went from Alsace and the Palatinate to Galicia about 1784-85, and some of them later to Volhynia. Shortage of land forced some migration of Swiss Mennonites into Alsace in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

But the greatest migration of the Swiss-South German Mennonites, both from Switzerland direct and from France, Germany, and Galicia-Volhynia, was to North America. This migration was of the greatest significance for the future of the Mennonite movement. Beginning in 1683, one hundred years before the emigration from West Prussia to Russia begun in 1788, it lasted much longer (200 years) and ultimately moved more people. It was, of course, a part of the great Atlantic migration from western Europe to America, in which the Mennonites played a small role, although they have the honor of founding the first permanent German settlement in America at Germantown. This total migration falls into six successive waves: (1) Lower Rhine to Germantown, 1683-1705, 100 persons; (2) Palatinate and Switzerland to Eastern Pennsylvania (Franconia and Lancaster districts), 1707-56, 3,000-5,000 persons, mostly Mennonite, possibly 300 Amish; (3) Alsatian, Bavarian, and Hessian Amish to Ohio, Ontario, Indiana, Illinois, 1815-80, possibly 3,000 persons; (4) Swiss Mennonites to Ohio and Indiana, 1830-60, possibly 500 persons; (5) Palatine Mennonites to Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, possibly 300 persons; stragglers of the last three groups continued to come after the Civil War (1861-65) until toward the end of the 19th century; (6) Galician and Volhynian Mennonites to Kansas and South Dakota, 1875-80, about 400 persons. A total of possibly 8,000 persons crossed the Atlantic in the two centuries. Almost all of the first three waves found fellowship together in what is known as the Mennonite Church (MC). Including some Amish who never joined (remaining Old Order) and the schismatic groups, Oberholtzer (GCM), Holdeman (CGC, a minority part only), Reformed Mennonites, Evangelical (Defenseless) Mennonites, and Central Conference (GCM), the total Mennonite membership in the United States and Canada in 1956 of the descendants of these 8,000 immigrants of 1683 to 1883 number approximately 120,000 or three fifths of the total Mennonite membership. Since only 10,000 of this number are in Canada, the 110,000 in the United States (not counting the United Missionary Church) is over two thirds or about 70 per cent of the total number of Mennonites in the United States. A small Dutch group from Balk came to New Paris, Ind., in 1853.

This group of immigrants has been widely distributed by internal migration. A considerable movement to Southern Ontario from Eastern Pennsylvania took place in 1785-1840, accompanied by a southward movement to Maryland and Virginia. A movement westward (also from Virginia) across the Alleghenies into Western Pennsylvania and Ohio and finally from Ohio and Ontario to Indiana and Northern Illinois took place in 1800-60. All this was Mennonite. An Amish movement westward from Eastern (and Western) Pennsylvania into Ohio, Indiana, and Iowa (some to central Illinois) took place in 1800-60. Some Amish from Illinois and Ontario reached Iowa and Nebraska in 1845-80. Mennonites from Pennsylvania and Virginia reached Missouri and Kansas in 1865-90, and some went into North Dakota, Oregon, and Alberta in 1890-1920. Some Amish reached Oregon from Ohio and Missouri, also Iowa and Nebraska in 1880-1910. A small movement of Mennonites from Ontario reached Saskatchewan and Alberta in 1907-20. All these westward movements were part and parcel of the general internal westward migration in both the United States and Canada. Whereas the migrations across the Atlantic had as a major motive the search for religious toleration and freedom from military service, with economic betterment, the internal migrations were solely motivated by the search for cheaper land and economic betterment.

The Dutch Mennonites rendered significant financial aid to the harried Swiss and Palatine Mennonites in their migration to Pennsylvania in the first half of the 18th century. It is doubtful if many could have succeeded in the move without this help, since most of the Swiss were penniless exiles, and the Palatines had suffered heavily from the French invasions and the heavy exactions and economic restrictions of the successive Palatine rulers. H.S.B.

The internal German migrations are well surveyed in the article "Germany" by Ernst Crous (ME II, 491-93), those of the Bernese in Europe and in the 19th century to Ohio and Indiana by Delbert Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists and Their American Descendants (Goshen, 1953) 57-78 and 128-40. C. Henry Smith's The Mennonite Immigration to Pennsylvania in the 18th Century (Norristown, 1929) covers the early story thoroughly. His Story of the Mennonites (Berne, 1941) is almost the only source for the 19th century.

Mijleman, Franciscus (1610-67), a Jesuit who was active in the Dutch province of Groningen in 1639-67, and who gave some information about Anabaptism in this area in his booklet Ommelands Eere. In his book Vast ende klaer bewijs hoe dat Christus Jesus . . . in sijn H. Mensch-wordinge heeft uyt sijns H. Moeders, en Maegts Maria suyver Lichaem aengenomen onse Nature (Antwerp, 1661), he also attacked the doctrine of the Incarnation (q.v.) as taught by Menno Simons. (DB 1906, 41-43; N.N.B.Wb. III, 900.) vdZ.

Mildam, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Friesland, near Heerenveen, the seat of a Mennonite congregation belonging to the Groningen Old Flemish branch (the Naamlijst of 1731 erroneously calls it Frisian). In 1648 it had a small meetinghouse. The preachers listed are Jacob Poppes (1648), Frank Wybes (1681), Jan Rykels (1683), Jan Jans Heide (1696-1764), serving 1725-64, Klaas Eites, *ca.*1722-46, Dirk Gerrits 1747-d.70. The membership numbered about 50 in 1710, 62 in 1733, 39 in 1754. About 1765 the congregation of Mildam merged with that of neighboring Knijpe (q.v.), hence it is then called Mildam and Knijpe or Knijpe and Mildam. It died out about 1800. (Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 128; DJ 1840, 43; DB 1879, 3, 90; 1890, 94.) vdZ.

Milder, Johannes (*ca.*1628-88), a Hutterite leader, born in the brotherhood in Hungary, a tailor by vocation, was chosen preacher on March 4, 1660, in Sobotiste (q.v.) and ordained on March 13, 1661. He experienced all the vicissitudes of the Thirty Years' War as they affected this settlement of the Hutterian Brethren with their many tribulations, quartering of troops, and oppression. Sobotiste was the Bruderhof from which a delegation was sent to Holland in 1665 to ask aid, which they received.

Milder, in co-operation with the leader Johannes Rieger and his colleague Benjamin Poley, was outstanding in his fearless opposition to the efforts of Georg Szelepesenyi, the archbishop of Gran, royal chancellor and regent of Hungary, to catholicize the Brethren. On March 11, 1574, the three were summoned to Pressburg where about three hundred Lutheran and Calvinist preachers and teachers were assembled, who were subsequently expelled, imprisoned, and some of them sentenced to serve as galley slaves. The three Brethren were ordered by the agents of the Counter Reformation either to become Catholic or to leave the country. For days they were urged with promises and threats, at least to permit their children to be baptized. They replied that this was impossible, and said that they wished nothing but to serve and to make their living without harming anyone. The noblemen present gave them the best testimonial, finding only the one fault that they were not Catholics.

When Milder, Rieger, and Poley were about to go home, the archbishop had three halberdiers take them by force to the cathedral on Palm Sunday, when he held the High Mass. But the splendor of the cult did not make the desired impression on the three Brethren standing amid the worshipers; hence the archbishop had them brought to his castle in the train following his carriage and then dismissed them with orders to make their final decision within two weeks.

Upon their return to Sobotiste the three Brethren reported their experience to the brotherhood and received their approbation. In April they reported to the archbishop's committee that they intended to remain steadfast. But the expected expulsion did not follow; it is said that the bishop of Wiener Neustadt intervened. While Sobotiste was left in peace, there was no cessation of attempts to convert the Brethren in Trentschin. On March 3, 1676, the three Brethren were again summoned to Pressburg and confronted with the same promises and threats as in the previous year and then dismissed. Some of the landlords also took advantage of the situation and oppressed them. Then followed the quartering of troops in the period of the Turkish war, especially 1686-87, as well as internal difficulties, such as the abandonment of communal living in Velke Levary (q.v.).

In the summer of 1687 the leader Johannes Rieger died. The preachers of the Bruderhofs in Sobotiste, Levary, Trentschin, Dechtitz, Schatmannsdorf, and St. Johannes on Aug. 20 unanimously chose Milder as leader of the brotherhood. After less than 33 weeks in this office he died on March 28, 1688, at the age of sixty. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 133 f.) P.De.

Milford, Neb., is a town (pop. 900) in the southeastern end of Seward County, which is in the southeastern part of the state. The three Mennonite (MC) churches in the community, Milford, East Fairview, West Fairview, have a total of 796 members. Approximately 650 Mennonites live within shopping distance of the town. The main settlement is west of town, but there are Mennonites living all around it. Approximately 18 per cent (75 families) of the Mennonites live in town; about one third of the businesses are owned and operated by Mennonites.

Mennonites have been living in this area since 1873. Near the town is the Rest Home for the Aged, privately operated by a Mennonite family. (ML III, 134.) L.O.S.

Milford Defenseless Mennonite Church, now extinct, located in Seward Co., Neb., had its beginning in the late 1890's, when settlers came from Groveland and Flanagan, Ill. In 1891 they built a church. C. R. Egle from the Flanagan area was chosen the first minister. After a number of years Joseph Rediger from Groveland succeeded him, serving as pastor for a number of years. Silas Miller also served the church. For a time Rediger apparently preached in German and Miller in English. At the beginning there were about 40 members and at the most 100. Some of the members came from the Amish church near by.

In 1915 a revival took place in which many were converted. Shortly thereafter there was some difference of opinion as to doctrine and the church was dismissed from the conference. The building was then sold to the group, who later sold it for salvage. About four or five, however, remained with the Defenseless Mennonite Conference. Others became affiliated with the Mennonite Brethren in Christ. E.E.Z.

Milford Mennonite Church (MC), located in Milford, Seward Co., Neb., a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Mennonite District Conference, was organized on Nov. 19, 1925, with 81 charter members, under the leadership of L. O. Schlegel, bishop, and William Schlegel, minister, as a schism from the East Fairview Mennonite Church (q.v.). After a period of attempted affiliation with the General Conference Mennonite Church the congregation returned and was received as a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference (MC) on Aug. 8, 1938. The first meetinghouse, a frame structure, was erected in 1926, modernized and enlarged to a seating capacity of 400 in 1953. The 1956 membership was 205 with L. O. Schlegel as bishop and W. A. Eicher and Milton Troyer as ministers. On June 3, 1956, Milton Troyer was ordained bishop and L. O. Schlegel resigned from active service. L.O.S.

Milford (Buck Ranch) Hutterite Bruderhof, founded in 1918 near Raymond, Alberta, by the members of the Bruderhof in Milford, S.D., and their preachers Johann Kleinsasser and Jerg Waldner; they sold the holdings in South Dakota and bought the Big Ben site. In 1947 the Milford Bruderhof numbered 125 souls, with 60 baptized members. D.D.

Milford Square, Bucks Co., Pa., was the location of the press of John H. Oberholtzer, founder in 1847 of what is known as the Eastern District Conference (GCM) in southeastern Pennsylvania. On June 9, 1852, he issued here the first number of a new church periodical entitled Religiöser Botschafter (q.v.). To bear the burden of publication there was organized in 1856 the Mennonite Printing Union (in German, Mennonitischer Druck-Verein, q.v.) to take over the Oberholtzer printery, which was later sold to J. G. Stauffer. In 1856 the name of the paper was changed to Das Christliche Volksblatt, and in 1867 to Mennonitischer Friedensbote. From Milford Square were also issued a number of books, booklets, catechisms, constitutions, conference reports, periodicals, etc., beginning in 1855 with Gottfried Arnold's Geistliche Erfahrungslehre. When the 1860 sessions of the General Conference Mennonite Church were held it was proposed to create a mission board, with one treasury to be maintained at Franklin Center, Lee Co., Iowa, the other at Milford Square, Bucks Co., Pa., but the plan seems not to have been adopted. The Mennonite (GCM) publisher J. G. Stauffer (q.v.) also issued periodicals such as the Himmelsmanna (1876-), Reformer & Agriculturist (1876-) for a number of years at Milford Square before removing to Quakertown, Pa., in 1880. Stauffer published also B. C. Roosen's Menno Symons den Mennoniten Gemeinden geschildert at Milford Square in 1874. And Peter High Stauffer issued an eight-page periodical from Milford Square entitled Our Home Friend. For years the name Milford Square stood for the publication interests of the General Conference Mennonite Church, especially in the East. (ML III, 134 f.) J.C.W.

Military Service in Europe. The ancient Mennonite principle of nonresistance has often led to conflicts with the state, until in the course of the 19th century, partly under compulsion and partly from conviction, the principle was abandoned almost completely in Europe. This change was at the same time the result of the change in the form of warfare. Formerly war was the business of mercenary troops; now it is the affair of the entire nation. Hence the Mennonites of Europe in their adjustment to the society surrounding them reached the point where they sacrificed their nonresistance.

The Swiss Mennonites with some difficulty preserved their full nonresistance for a long time. The regulation of Sept. 3, 1815, granted them the privilege of hiring substitutes for their service in the army. When their nonresistance was denied them in 1874, they secured the privilege of noncombatant service in the army, which they have used in most cases.

In the Netherlands the "fine Mennonites" (Fijne Mennisten) strictly maintained the principle of nonresistance, while the "coarse Mennonites" (Grove Mennisten) in the late 17th and 18th centuries considered a war of self-defense justified, but nevertheless forbade their members to become soldiers. By considerable (more or less) voluntary gifts of money they induced the government to continue to grant them freedom from military service (union of Utrecht, 1579). During the wars with England in 1606 and 1672 they paid about 500,000 florins. During the siege of Kampen, Groningen, Deventer, etc., they fulfilled their civic duty by fighting fires under a constant rain of bullets. But in the arming of the civilians in North Holland and Friesland in 1785 some Mennonites hastened voluntarily to bear arms, and even though this step was frowned upon by the brotherhood, and some Mennonites were actually expelled from membership for serving on a warship in 1793, and others were not admitted to baptism, nevertheless nonresistance was no longer a required article of faith. In 1796 a law was passed which abrogated the old privilege given to the Mennonites by Prince William I of Orange, but which still made it possible to avoid military service by sending a substitute. In 1810 Napoleon invaded the "Batavian Republic" and compelled the Mennonites to bear arms. But it was not until the war with Belgium (1830) that the practice of nonresistance was generally abandoned, though not by all. At the end of the 19th century the tenet of nonresistance was abandoned and in its stead the obligation to "Christian meekness" was adopted. The system of employing substitutes was abolished by a law of 1898; from that time on, military service was compulsory for all, including the Mennonites, who accepted it without much objection. After World War I the principle of nonresistance was revived in certain small circles and the "Arbeidsgroep (q.v.) tegen de Krijgsdienst" was organized, followed by the "Vredesgroep" (q.v.) after World War II. (See Conscientious Objectors.)

The Mennonites of France were permitted by a decision passed in the French Revolution to perform their military service in building fortifications and roads or in transportation or to purchase their release. Thus until the reign of Napoleon III they were free of the obligation to render full military service.

The Mennonites of Galicia were given a promise of freedom from military service in 1789, which was rescinded by Austria at the close of the 19th century.

Most consistent in their refusal of military service were the Hutterian Brethren (q.v.). They even refused to perform services indirectly supporting war. In Russia the substitution of forestry for military service did not satisfy them, and they (with many Mennonites) emigrated to America.

In South and West Germany the Mennonites enjoyed the privilege of voluntary freedom from military service until 1806. As late as 1803 the Ibersheim conference passed the resolution that "bearing arms is contrary to the teaching of Christ and of our faith." But Napoleon paid no attention to creeds when he conscripted all the young men of the age of 21 in the territory of the federation of the Rhine. To hire a substitute for 2,000 florins was possible only for the wealthy. Thus the law of Jan. 7, 1805, in Bavaria, Dec. 17, 1820, in Hesse, and Aug. 22, 1818, in Baden, meant the end of nonresistance in those countries, although the provision was made for the hiring of a substitute.

The Mennonites of East Friesland lost their freedom from military service under the reign of the Hannoverian kings. On the basis of the more liberal position of the Rhenish Mennonites, Hermann von Beckerath, a member of the Crefeld congregation and minister of state in 1848, declared in the Parliament of Frankfurt that the Mennonites were willing to perform armed service. Immediately a protest was made by the Mennonites of West Prussia (Heubuden, Sept. 14, 1848), stating that for most of their members it was still a matter of deepest conviction not to bear arms. (The document is printed in complete form in Mannhardt, 192.)

The Mennonites of West Prussia fought longest to preserve nonresistance. Under the Polish government they could employ a substitute; only the Danzig Mennonites had to serve in guard and fire-fighting duty in 1733-34, and were then released upon payment of 5,000 florins, later reduced to 2,000. Serious difficulties arose when West Prussia was incorporated into militarized Prussia. In 1723 the recruiting agents of Frederick William forced some young Mennonites living in Lithuania to enter the army for a short time. Under the tolerant reign of Frederick the Great, however, they were granted freedom from military service "forever." In return for the privilege they had to pay 5,000 Thalers annually to the cadet school in Culm after 1773. In the Wars of Liberation they collected voluntary sums of 10,000 and 30,000 Thalers; nevertheless they had to suffer much annoyance, especially on the part of minor officials. A graphic picture of these struggles is given by Elder Heinrich Donner (q.v.) (Gem.-Kal. 1932). They maintained the principle of nonresistance and expelled several young Mennonites from membership for performing military service.

When universal military conscription was introduced in Prussia, an order of cabinet of March 3, 1868, gave them the privilege of serving in the noncombatant functions of the armed forces. This provision became valid for the entire German army in 1871. Only in Bavaria and Württemberg was military service forced upon the Mennonites. But in the Franco-Prussian War some of the Mennonites voluntarily took up arms, and in World War I only a few Mennonites took advantage of the order of the cabinet. One report states that about one third of the West Prussian Mennonites took noncombatant service in World War I. In World War II the German Mennonites as such no longer asked for noncombatant service.

Since 1918 (until 1945) there was among the German Mennonites no thought of refusing military service. All the Mennonites without exception accepted the call to military training in 1933. For later developments see below.

The Mennonites of Russia were released from military service in 1800 "for all time." In gratitude many young Mennonites served in the hospital units during the Crimean War; several lost their lives. When military service became compulsory in 1874, lengthy negotiations with General Todtleben led to the enactment of a law permitting the Mennonites to perform their service to the state in forestry service. In World War I many voluntarily accepted service in the medical corps, which was at that time still under the Red Cross and not a part of the army.

Under the treaty of Brest-Litovsk of 1917, the Germans occupied the Ukraine for a time. When they were preparing their withdrawal self-defense military units (Selbstschutz) were organized in the German settlements, particularly in the Mennonite settlements of Chortitza and Molotschna. After the withdrawal the Mennonite Selbstschutz (q.v.) did a small amount of fighting with the Machno guerrillas but were speedily overcome. After the re-establishment of the Russian army under the Soviet government the Mennonites were granted the privilege of noncombatant service until about 1933-35. (See Nonresistance for North America.) H.S.B.

A. Brons, Ursprung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (Emden, 1912); W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Danzig, 1863); N. van der Zijpp, De vroegere Doopsgezinden en de Krijgsdienst (Wolvega, 1930); E. Händiges, Die Lehre der Mennoniten (Kaiserslautern, 1921); Chr. Neff, "Die Wehrlosigkeit der Mennoniten und der Weltkrieg," in Die Eiche, April 1924; John Horsch, Die biblische Lehre von der Wehrlosigkeit (Scottdale, 1920); J. S. Hartzler, Mennonites in the World War (Scottdale, 1921); Friesen, Brüderschaft; ML III, 135 f.

Mill Creek Union Church is located in the village of Hamburg two miles west of Luray, Page Co., Va. This old weatherboarded log church, still standing, was built around 1800. The land was given by Joseph Mauck, a Mennonite, and the church built on it was to be open to all orthodox denominations. Mennonite preachers in Rockingham County held infrequent services here for a rapidly declining membership in Page County during the 19th century. For a number of years Mennonites and other interested parties have held an annual Harmonia Sacra Singing in this ancient church. H.A.B.

Mill Run Mennonite (MC) Mission, located in a suburb of Altoona, Pa., with a population of a few hundred, is an outgrowth of the Altoona mission work and is located about three miles north of the Home Mission at 2504 Fourth Avenue. The Southwestern Pennsylvania (now Allegheny) Mission Board authorized the opening of the work in November 1927; a plot of ground was purchased for a building site, and a chapel was built, dedicated in 1928. A mission home was erected in 1933, and in 1937 a school adjacent to the chapel was purchased to provide more space. The former chapel was converted into a residence. At first the work was carried on under the supervision of the Altoona Mission, but it now has its own workers and organization under the direction of the Allegheny Mennonite Mission Board. In 1956 the membership was 30, with Sidney Martin as pastor. J.L.H.

Joseph Nissley, in Mennonite Yearbook and Directory, 1929; John L. Horst and Ammon Kaufman, Seventy-fifth Anniversary Observance of Southwestern Pennsylvania Conference (1951).

Mill Stream, The, is a 32-page periodical issued 10 times a year by Lancaster Mennonite School, Lancaster, Pa., since 1942, edited by a student staff. It carries school news, articles by students and teachers of the school, poems and essays from English classes, and solicited contributions by persons not in school. N.G.

Millbach: see Royer Mennonite Church.

Millbach (Pa.) Mennonite Mission (MC) was operated by the Ephrata, Pa., Mennonite Church in 1945-47 in a former Baptist church located about one mile north of Kleinfeltersville in Lebanon Co., Pa., primarily for Lancaster County Mennonite families moving northward for cheaper land. In 1947 the Millbach work was moved to the Tulpehocken Brethren church building between Myerstown and Richland. I.D.L.

Millen, a village now in the Dutch province of Limburg, in the 16th century belonging to the duchy of Jülich, Germany. In the 1530's it was a center of Anabaptist activity. Later there were also Mennonites here. Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.) baptized in Millen about 1550. About 1550 one group of seven Anabaptists and then one of eleven were beheaded in the territories of Millen and neighboring Born (q.v.). In 1591 the Concept (q.v.) of Cologne was signed by Diderich Verwer for the Millen congregations ("vanwegen aller Gemeynten in 't Lant van Millen"). vdZ.

Rembert, Wiedertäufer, see Index; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik I (The Hague, 1937) passim; II (The Hague, 1941) 365; Mart. Mir. D 98, E 496.

Millennialism: see Chiliasm.

Miller, an American family name of Swiss origin. (For the European history of the family, see Müller.) It is the most common family name in the Mennonite Church (MC) and in the Old Order Amish and Conservative and related Amish groups, but it is completely missing from the lists of ordained men in all other Mennonite groups in North America, except three in the General Conference Mennonite Church; it is not found in any group in Canada. In 1956, of the O.O.A. ordained men, 131 bore the name Miller, 63 in Ohio and 37 in Indiana. In the other Amish groups 28 more ordained men were Millers. In the Mennonite Church (MC) there were 93 ordained men bearing this name, six of these in Indiana and eleven in Pennsylvania. Miller is distinctly a midwestern Amish name; very few families of Millers descend from the early Mennonites in colonial Pennsylvania, although Jacob Miller was one of the first (1710) Mennonite settlers to arrive in Lancaster County from Switzerland. Among the church leaders of the past with this name should be mentioned the Mennonite bishops Moses B. Miller (1819-1902), bishop in the Johnstown (Pa.) district from 1848; Noah E. Miller (1880-1930), bishop at Springs, Pa., from 1921; D. D. Miller (1864-1955), bishop near Middlebury, Ind., from 1906. Jonas B. Miller (1870-1952) was an influential Conservative minister at Grantsville, Md., from 1897. Moses J. Miller (1811-97) was an influential Old Order Amish bishop in Holmes County, Ohio, from 1847. Among the currently active workers in the Mennonite Church are O. O. Miller of Akron, Pa., long executive secretary of the MCC, and Ernest E. Miller of Goshen, Ind., missionary to India and president of Goshen College 1940-54, both sons of the above D. D. Miller, Paul M. Miller, bishop and professor in the Goshen College Biblical Seminary, D. D. Miller, bishop at Berlin, Ohio, Ira E. Miller, minister and dean of Eastern Mennonite College at Harrisonburg, Va., Paul R. Miller, bishop at Walnut Creek, Ohio, Ivan J. Miller, Conservative bishop at Grantsville, Md. (Eight Miller genealogies, mostly of Amish families, are listed in the article Genealogies, ME II, 461.) H.S.B.

Miller, D. D. (1864-1955), a Mennonite (MC) bishop and leader, was born in Lagrange County, Ind., on Dec. 10, 1864, a son of Daniel P. and Anna (Hershberger) Miller. He prepared himself for teaching school, and followed the profession for twenty years. On May 26, 1889, he married Nettie Hostetler. They had thirteen children, of whom eleven grew to maturity: Orie O., Ernest E., Truman T., Ida, Clara, Wilbur W., Kathryn, Bertha, Alice, Samuel S., and Mabel. All became schoolteachers for longer or shorter periods. Orie O. Miller (b. 1892) became executive secretary of the Mennonite Central Committee, Ernest E. Miller (b. 1893) president of Goshen College, and Samuel S. Miller (b. 1908) a bishop in the Indiana-Michigan Confernce (MC). As a young man D. D. Miller went west to Cass County, Mo.; while there he united with the Amish Mennonite Church. After some time he returned to Indiana and became a member of the Forks A.M. Church in his home community. There in 1890 he was chosen as deacon, one year later as preacher, and in 1906 as bishop, D. J. Johns performing all three ordinations. About a year after his ordination he voluntarily adopted the "plain coat" so that his ministry would be more effective among the Mennonites (MC), although his Amish Mennonite church did not require it. He traveled far and wide in the Amish Mennonite and Mennonite brotherhoods, served as an evangelist and a Bible Conference instructor times without number, and exerted a strong influence everywhere he went. His sermons were well prepared, his voice was strong and clear, his thought processes clear and direct. As a disciplinarian he was somewhat strict, yet not a legalist. He wrote considerably for the Gospel Herald, the organ of the Mennonite Church (MC), and contributed several sections to the large Bible Doctrine book of 1914. He was active in his local conference, first the Indiana-Michigan Amish Mennonite Conference, and then in the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference (MC) after the merger of 1916. He was the first moderator of the united conference, and frequently thereafter. He was active in the Mennonite General Conference (MC), on the Mennonite Board of Education (MC), and especially on the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC), of which he served as president 1920-35, and as treasurer 1939-40. He continued to serve a large bishop district in the churches of Indiana until his health collapsed in his eightieth year, early in 1944. Burial was in the Forest Grove Cemetery, southeast of Middlebury. J.C.W.

Miller, Jonas B. (1870-1952), Amish Mennonite minister and leader, was born at Grantsville, Md., on Dec. 10, 1870, the oldest of the three sons and three daughters of Bishop Joel J. and Savilla (Beachy) Miller. He was the sixth generation of the Miller family, Amish pioneers, who settled in the Casselman River region in 1793. He was married to Barbara Swartzentruber on Oct. 5, 1893. They raised a family of four sons and seven daughters on their small farm near Grantsville, among them Bishop Ivan J.

Miller was an avid reader and lover of books, and an able student, public speaker, and writer. He was a member of the Amish Mennonite Church and ordained to the ministry by his father on May 30, 1897, serving over 52 years. He was one of the original members of the Conservative Amish Mennonite Conference and one of its early influential leaders. He served as English editor of Herold der Wahrheit 1917-49, when he was succeeded by his son Evan. In his preaching and writing he was a staunch advocate of conservatism in faith and practice. He died Sept. 20, 1952, at Grantsville and is buried in the Maple Glen cemetery. I.J.M.

Miller, Moses J. (1811-97), an Amish bishop and leader, was the second Amish child and the third white child born in Holmes Co., Ohio. His parents, with three other families, all young people, moved from Somerset Co., Pa., to the western wilderness in Walnut Township, arriving on May 6, 1810. Indian raids drove them back to Somerset County during the War of 1812, but in 1815 they returned to Holmes County. In 1834 Moses married Katherine Dunn, an Irish girl. They became the parents of ten children, of whom only three outlived their father. He was ordained minister in the Amish Church in 1835 and bishop in 1847. He was one of 14 bishops and ministers in the Holmes-Tuscarawas congregations to attend the first Amish ministers' meeting held in Wayne Co., Ohio, in June 1862. Three Moses Millers were present at that conference: Moses J. (Gross or Big Mose) Miller of Walnut Creek; Moses H. Miller of Winesburg; and Moses Miller of Shanesville. One of the latter was known as "Klein (Small) Mose" and was so designated in the conference report. There was also another Moses B. Miller from Johnstown, Pa. The subject of this sketch, "Big Mose," took an active part in the conference discussions and took a broad-minded, conciliatory attitude in current issues. He strongly advocated leniency in enforcing the ban between man and wife, favored allowing nonmembers in the counsel meeting when Christian duties were under consideration, and urged tolerance on the mode of baptism, "in the house" or "in a running stream." Moses J. Miller did not attend the general Amish ministers' meeting again until it met in Wayne County in 1865. Nineteen Holmes-Tuscarawas bishops, ministers, and deacons attended. Since the report does not include the statements of individual ministers his reactions cannot be stated with certainty. Tradition records that he cast his lot with the old order during the period when meetinghouses were built and other "new things" introduced. He attended no more of the Amish conferences, not even the one held in the vicinity of Walnut Creek, Holmes Co., Ohio, in 1869. By this time Abraham Mast and a few other Holmes County ministers had become regular attendants and led one of the five Amish congregations into the progressive Amish Mennonite group. Tradition records that Moses J. Miller was a wise counselor and able leader, keeping his people in the old paths. J.S.U.

Miller, Noah E. (1880-1930), a Mennonite (MC) pastor, evangelist, and Bible teacher, was born Jan. 13, 1880, the son of Elias M. and Catherine J. Miller. He was an active member of the Southwestern Pennsylvania (now Allegheny) Mennonite (MC) Conference and lived his entire life in the vicinity of Springs, Somerset Co., Pa. He was married to Hannah, daughter of Bishop J. N. Durr, Martinsburg, Pa., June 6, 1907, to which union were born three sons and three daughters. He was ordained to the ministry in the Springs congregation (MC) May 11, 1912, and as bishop Oct. 5, 1912. He was known and widely used throughout the church. At different times he served as secretary and moderator of Southwestern Pennsylvania Conference and president of the Southwestern Pennsylvania Mission Board. He was an instructor for the winter Bible school at Eastern Mennonite School for about ten years and was serving in this capacity at the time of his death. At various times he served on the Young People's Bible Meeting Committee and the Young People's Problems Committee of Mennonite General Conference. He was secretary of the Mennonite General Conference at the time of his death, March 18, 1930. J.L.H.

Miller, Peter, prior of the monastery of the followers of John Beissel in Ephrata (q.v.), Lancaster Co., Pa., stemmed from Alsenborn near Kaiserslautern, Germany, studied theology at the University of Heidelberg, and in the first half of the 18th century emigrated to the United States, settling in Ephrata. Here he translated van Braght's great martyrbook, the Martyrs' Mirror (q.v.), from Dutch into German, thereby fulfilling a wish of the Mennonites of America, who had in October 1745 asked their brethren in Amsterdam to find a reliable translator to print a German edition for them. Over two years later, on Feb. 10, 1748, the Amsterdam Mennonites replied that it was impossible to comply with the American request on account of the difficulty of finding a translator and the high costs of such a project (Brons, 219).

Meanwhile the Mennonites of Pennsylvania had approached the brothers in the monastery on the subject of publishing a German edition of the Martyrs' Mirror in Ephrata, since they had a printing shop with two hand presses—the second-oldest German printery in America. One of these presses has been preserved in the Franklin Institute in Pennsylvania. From this shop other books had appeared for the Mennonites (Bender, p. 2): Güldene Aepffel in Silbern Schalen (q.v., see also Beissel) and Die ernsthafte Christenpflicht (q.v.). They are among the oldest German books printed in America. Since there was no further demand for printing the press was not used for some years.

An entry in the diary of a Moravian Brethren missionary dated March 20, 1748, states that while he was in Ephrata visiting the monastery the Mennonites were just concluding a contract for the translation and printing of the Martyrs' Mirror (Frankfurter Bücherfreund V, Nos. 3 and 4; Menn. Bl., 1908, 20). Now this important work of the Dutch Mennonites was to be made accessible to German readers. The printing was begun in 1748; it continued through three years, frequently delayed by a paper shortage, which the brothers manufactured themselves. For this printery with its primitive equipment this great work was a very meritorious achievement.

With his translation Peter Miller rendered the Mennonites of Germany and America a most important service. The Martyrs' Mirror is also of importance in the history of American literature, since it was the largest book printed in America before its independence. It is a folio volume of 1,512 pages. The translation was checked, as the conclusion of the book states, by Henry Funck (q.v.) and Dielmann Kolb (q.v.), the ministers of the Mennonite congregations of Franconia (q.v.) and Salford (q.v.). Five editions of the German Martyrs' Mirror have followed, all of them reprints of the original German translation by Peter Miller.

The printing of the German Martyrs' Mirror is also significant to the economic history of America. It was the occasion for the casting of type in America. Previously all type used in Ephrata had been obtained from Christopher Sauer in Germantown, the first printer of German books in the American colonies, who had it sent from Frankfurt, Germany. The brothers of the monastery made contact with Benjamin Franklin, who also owned a print shop, who furnished them matrices from which they made their own fonts, as stated in the conclusion of a religious book printed in the monastery (Gustav Mauri). HEGE.

Bender, Two Centuries; A. Brons, Ursprung, Entwickelung, und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (Emden, 1912); G. Mauri, "Der Buchdrucker Christoph Sauer in Germantown," in Gutenberg-Jahrbuch 1934, 229; J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937); ML III, 136 f.

Miller Amish Mennonite Church at West Liberty, Ohio, now extinct, existed from 1883 to about 1902. It was made up of progressive members of the Warye-Plank faction of the Oak Grove (q.v.) and Walnut Grove (q.v.) congregations. The introduction of English and four-part singing, the change of Sunday school to the forenoon (leaving the afternoon open for visiting), and English sermons by visiting ministers from Indiana, who organized the congregation under the Indiana Amish Mennonite Conference, attracted many young people to their services. Locally the group was known as the "Miller people" because Bishop Eli Miller of the Clinton Frame Mennonite Church in Elkhart Co., Ind., organized the congregation and ordained Samuel Detweiler as their minister. Weak ministerial leadership and a Church of God camp meeting caused a decline in the membership. Most of the small remaining membership united with the Bethel Mennonite Church (q.v.) in West Liberty. A few families returned to the Oak Grove and Walnut Grove congregations during the late 1890's. J.S.U.

Miller Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located in the western outskirts of Clarence, N.Y., was built by the Strickler family on Ulrich Strickler's farm. Ulrich's brother-in-law, a Miller, was to preach there. John Strickler, a son of pioneer Ulrich Strickler, was also a preacher here. This point likely represents the independent action of some Mennonites of Erie Co., N.Y., after the middle of the 19th century, when disturbances were affecting several congregations of the Mennonite Conference (MC) of Ontario, of which these east of the Niagara River were to be a part. About 1825 the Miller church, already in disuse, was converted into a residence. Its structure of stone is still substantial a century later (see Strickler's Mennonite Church). J.C.F.

L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites in Ontario (Toronto, 1935) 55.

Miller Mennonite Church (MC), located near Leitersburg, Md., was established before 1800. After services had been held in private homes for many years, a stone meetinghouse was built by Martin Bachtel (their minister) upon his farm near Fiddlersburg, which served until 1835, when a stone church was built on the present site, donated by Jacob Miller, which was surrounded by many families of the Miller name. The present brick church was built in 1926. The bishop in 1835 was Peter Eshleman, ordained in 1828. Ministers who have served the congregation were Christian Strite, ordained 1850; Jacob Oberholtzer, 1863; Adam Baer, 1876; his son Henry H. Baer, 1883; J. C. Miller, 1893; D. M. Strite, 1901; John D. Risser, 1920. M. K. Horst was serving as bishop in 1954. Sunday school has been conducted there since 1893. The 1956 membership was 183, with Daniel M. Strite and Samuel L. Martin as ministers. J.D.R.

Miller Mennonite Church (MC), located in Miller, Hand Co., S.D., a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference, was organized in 1928 with 17 charter members under the leadership of Bishop Lee O. Schlegel. The first pastor was Wm. Schlegel, who served until 1932. Paul J. Glanzer, the present (1956) minister, began to serve in 1950. Services were held in a schoolhouse until 1947, and in a Seventh-Day Adventist church until 1954, when a new frame church was built. The membership in 1956 was 23. P.J.G.

Miller Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, was located on the North Fork in Union Magisterial District, Pendleton Co., W. Va., two miles below (north) the mouth of the Seneca. Samuel and Sara Miller gave the land here for a church which was to be used by "all orthodox denominations." This was the first church built in West Virginia under the auspices of the Mennonites of the Middle District of the Virginia Conference. The Brethren Church became active in the area and the Mennonites lost out. There was more promising work elsewhere in the West Virginia field for the Mennonites. The church was moved to Roaring Creek in 1913. H.A.B.

Millerovo, a town in the Don area of Russia, where in the beginning of the 20th century some Mennonite industrialists, businessmen, and farmers settled. A few large mills and factories employed several hundred workers. In 1926 there were 231 Mennonites living in Millerovo and vicinity. Since the early days Millerovo had a Mennonite Brethren church. Wilhelm Dyck (q.v.) was chosen leader of the group in 1910. In the yearbook of 1913 J. J. Nickel was listed as deacon. In 1927 J. Pätkau, the minister of the church, reported on a harvest festival which was conducted in the M.B. church in Millerovo at which a collection was raised for home missions. There was also a small group at Millerovo belonging to the Mennonite Church. A.J.K., C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 464; Unser Blatt III (1927) 75; Der praktische Landwirt, 1925, No. 5, p. 2; ML III, 137 f.

Millerovo Mennonite Brethren Church, located in the town of Millerovo, in the Don region of Russia, was rather isolated from other Mennonite settlements, being at least about 400 miles from the closest Mennonite community. The first settlers, David J. Klassen, Wilhelm J. Friesen, who was a teacher, Johann Nickel, and J. Siemens, three of whom were business partners, and Wilhelm Isaac Dyck, a businessman and minister, came to Millerovo in the spring of 1903, seeking better business opportunities for a flour mill. This group immediately selected a place for a church, built a frame structure with a seating capacity of 40-50, and then organized an independent M.B. Church under the leadership of Wilhelm I. Dyck. The membership did not exceed 140, and consisted mainly of business people and laborers. They conducted all of their services in the High German language. W. I. Dyck was assisted in the work of the church by the ministry of David Johann Klassen, Johann Penner, and Abram Rempel. Rempel also succeeded W. I. Dyck as the leader of the church 1919-23. By 1924 most of the members, on account of hardship because of the Revolution, emigrated to Canada, and the church ceased to exist. J.J.T.

Miller's (John Miller's) Mennonite (MC) meetinghouse, the former name of the present River Corner (q.v.) meetinghouse in Conestoga Twp., Lancaster, Co., Pa. I.D.L.

Millersville, a town (pop. 2,551) in Lancaster Co., Pa., located two miles southwest of Lancaster, was started in 1764 by lottery by John Miller, a Lancaster blacksmith, who purchased of Michael Mayer on May 8, 1749 (surveyed to his father in 1737), 217 acres and more land until he had 460 acres. It was called Millersburg until about 1800, then Millerstown until 1855, when it assumed its present name. Michael Cryder and Peter Kegy were among the first residents. Abraham Herr, George, John, and Bernard Mann, John Correl, John and Michael Shank, Jacob Frantz, Christian Musselman, Andrew Kauffman, Martin Funk, and Peter Eshleman were some of the early Mennonite settlers in that vicinity. In 1854 the normal school, which today is the Millersville State Teachers College, had its beginning in the town. The Millersville Mennonite Church (MC), with a meetinghouse in town, has 375 members, and the entire surrounding area has many Mennonite families. The Mennonite Children's Home has been located here since 1911. (ML III, 138.) I.D.L.

Millersville Mennonite (MC) Church in the town of Millersville, two miles southwest of Lancaster, Pa., dates back to 1757, when a log meetinghouse was built to serve the Abraham Herr, John Correl, Michael Shenk, Peter Eshleman, Jacob Frantz, and Andrew Kauffman families. Benjamin Hershey, living one mile west of Lancaster, was the first bishop. Among the leading ministers who have served here were Andrew Kauffman, John Shenk, Benjamin Hertzler, Christian S. Herr, and more recently Daniel Lehman and Daniel Gish. Among the sons of the congregation serving elsewhere have been John D. Charles, Chester and Daniel Lehman, and Clyde Shenk. The old church was replaced in 1851 by a new brick building, which in turn was replaced in 1897 by the present church, with renovations in 1927. Jacob G. Hess, Landis Shertzer, and J. Herbert Fisher were the ministers in 1955 with a membership of 375. The Millersville Mennonite Children's Home (q.v.) is near by. The ministers share a circuit with the ministers of the Rohrerstown congregation. I.D.L.

Milltown, or Cedar Spring Mills, in Lower Allen Twp., Cumberland Co., Pa., a few minutes' walk from the Susquehanna River, was a Mennonite (MC) preaching point (Lancaster Conference) as late as 1884. Little is known about this place. Caspar and Adam Weber built a mill at this place in the late 1780's hence the name "Milltown." I.D.L.

Milltown Hutterite Bruderhof, founded in 1918, one fourth of a mile south of Bernard Siding, Man., was the first Hutterite settlement in Manitoba, the members coming from South Dakota, where they had experienced persecution during World War I. Joseph Kleinsasser, who was born in Russia Nov. 10, 1869, and came to South Dakota with his parents in 1874, was chosen minister on March 12, 1901, and confirmed Dec. 2, 1902, by the Milltown (S.D.) Bruderhof. On Feb. 11, 1934, he was chosen elder for the entire Schmied (q.v.) group in Canada and South Dakota, and served in this office 13 years; he died April 16, 1947, having been a preacher 46 years. Michael D. Waldner was chosen to the ministry on Jan. 31, 1943. In 1947 the population of the Bruderhof was 95, of whom 28 were baptized members. D.D.

Millwood Mennonite Church (MC), located two miles northeast of Gap, Lancaster Co., Pa., since 1945 a member of the Lancaster Conference, was formed in 1877 with 22 families consisting of 124 members from the Old Order Amish community in this district, under the leadership of Gideon Stoltzfus, who had been ordained a minister in 1868 by the Old Order Amish, and was ordained bishop in 1888, serving in this office until his death in 1913.

The congregation met in members' homes every two weeks until 1882, when the first meetinghouse was built (frame 36 x 50 ft.), which served the congregation until 1937, when the present brick structure was erected. John A. Kennel, ordained bishop in 1926, assisted by LeRoy S. Stoltzfus, ordained bishop in 1949, were serving as bishops in 1955. Ministers and deacons that have formerly served were Samuel Lantz, John M. Stoltzfus, Daniel Stoltzfus, Amos B. Stoltzfus, M. S. Stoltzfus, Frank Stoltzfus, George B. Stoltzfus, John P. Kennel, Aaron Mast, and Isaac G. Kennel. Since 1929 the congregation has established the following mission outposts which together with the home congregation constituted the Millwood district membership of 431 in 1954: Coatesville (1929), Parkesburg (1938), Homeville (1945), Newlinville (1949), and Kennett Square (1951). In 1954 the Millwood congregation proper had 222 members, with Reuben G. Stoltzfus as preacher in addition to the two bishops.

In 1909 the Millwood congregation built a second meetinghouse, known as Maple Grove, but continued to function as one congregation. In 1945 a division occurred, the more conservative one-third minority withdrawing under Bishop John Kennet's leadership to join the Lancaster Conference (the only congregation of Amish background in the conference) and taking the Millwood meetinghouse. The more progressive two-thirds majority (1954 membership 458) continued the congregation's membership in the Ohio and Eastern A.M. Conference, taking Maple Grove (q.v.) meetinghouse. (ML III, 138.) L.S.S.

Miloradovka Mennonite Brethren Church was located 65 miles west of the city of Dnepropetrovsk, earlier known as Ekaterinoslav, in South Russia, in the midst of rolling prairies and fertile valleys. Gerhard Pries, Bernhard Rempel, Daniel Löwen, Gerhard Dyck, Jakob Unger, Johann Funk, Peter Driediger, and Johann Penner were among the first settlers who arrived in 1889, a group of young farmers who were unable to acquire farms in the older settlements because of the scarcity of land. The church was organized in 1895, and built its first meetinghouse of brick with a seating capacity of 250 about 1908. Most of its members were farmers and used the Plattdeutsch in their homes and the High German in their worship services. The membership reached a peak of 110, with the following ministers serving this congregation: Abraham Wall (leader), Johann Funk, Gerhard Dyck, Johann Funk, Jr., Isaac Funk, David Dück, and Jakob Bergen. Peter Rempel was one of their outstanding choir directors.

This congregation experienced two great revivals, one in 1911 and another in 1921, through Baptist influences. A mass funeral became necessary in 1918 when a minister of the church and six young men of the village were murdered by bandits. In 1929 severe persecution began. The last known membership is given as 25, but the church disintegrated completely in the fall of 1933, when the last leaders left and the believers were subjected to severe persecution. David Dyck, a former minister of this congregation, is living in Grassy Lake, Alberta. J.J.T.

Milotitz, a region in southeastern Moravia, which included the villages of Svatoboric and Wäzenobitz (Slavic, Vacenovice), containing Hutterite Bruderhofs. During the Hungarian Wars and in the period of rebellion at the beginning of the Thirty Years' War they were severely damaged. The Bruderhof Wäzenobitz was burned down in June 1665 by attacking Hungarians; four brethren met a violent death. A band of Turk and Tatar marauders seized the Milotitz castle in July, and inflicted much loss on the Hutterites living near by.

In 1615 the treatment which the Wäzenobitz Bruderhof received from Albrecht Wenzel Eusebius von Waldstein, lord of Milotitz, was especially rough. He imposed such heavy labor upon them that both they and their horses were seriously injured, and refused to pay them for the goods they made for him. When he finally began to repay them in produce, he required the Brethren to pay several hundred florins for it, thus doubly injuring them. When they complained and declared their inability to pay he had their housekeeper arrested in his castle until some neighboring noblemen interceded for them. Unable to endure the treatment any longer, the preachers withdrew to Schädowitz and the entire colony prepared to vacate. Then Waldstein finally yielded and promised to pay his debts and take a more friendly attitude; so the Brethren promised in return to stay. The case of Waldstein shows that besides the numerous Moravian nobles who appreciated the Hutterian Brethren and were kindly disposed to them, there were occasionally some who wished to enrich themselves forcibly at their expense. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 138.

Mils, a village near Hall (q.v.), one of the earliest centers of Anabaptism in Tirol, Austria. In August 1529 in a forest near Mils 20 persons were seized in a worship service and taken to Hall on the Inn. On Sept. 14 they were put into solitary confinement to prevent their encouraging each other. They received instruction in Catholic doctrine from Christoph Landtsperger, and most of them recanted. Two women, Anna Malerin (q.v.) and Ursula Ochsentreiberin (q.v.), remaining constant to their faith, suffered a martyr's death. (ML III, 138.) Hege.

Miners Village Mennonite (MC) Mission was opened in 1931 in the woods on the edge of the ore-mining village with this name in Lebanon Co., Pa. The present mission building is leased from the Bethlehem Steel Co. The membership in 1956 was 40, with Noah S. Boll as pastor. Two women workers at the mission live in the building. I.D.L.

Mininger, Hiram J. (1870-1953), a Church of God in Christ Mennonite preacher, the son of John and Susanna (Johnson) Mininger, was born on Jan. 8, 1870, in Hatfield, Montgomery Co., Pa. He grew up on the farm and attended the district school until the sixth grade and one summer of German Sunday school conducted by the Franconia Mennonite Church. He married Katie Bechtel, whose parents were also Mennonites, in September 1889. Nine sons and seven daughters were born to this union. He wrote: "At the time when we were married very few of the Mennonite youth joined the church before marrying. Soon after marriage we informed the local pastor, Bishop Josiah Clemmer, that we wished to change our way of living and would like to join the church, upon which it was openly announced and a class of 12 couples received instructions every other Sunday for several months on changing our lives and how to live when affiliated with the church, and were baptized." Mininger was a truth-seeker and gave much time to reading the Bible and to prayer. He became deeply interested in church history. He soon felt a need for a new birth, which he obtained when he earnestly sought the Lord and His ways through much prayer and fasting. When the door to a fuller fellowship in the Mennonite church seemed to close, he, his wife, and a few others joined the Church of God in Christ Mennonites, when John Holdeman and Tobias Unruh held meetings in Pennsylvania in March 1898. A few years later they moved to Ithaca, Mich., where Mininger was ordained to the ministry in March 1904. After serving the Newark congregation at Ithaca as associate minister for many years, he took charge of the congregation at Wauseon, Ohio. He preached with great fervor and emphasis the whole truth as he believed it. He was a pioneer in the evangelistic field, devoting much time and effort to conducting revival meetings. P.G.H.

Mininger, Jacob D. (1879-1941), a Mennonite (MC) leader, mission worker, and evangelist, was born near Sellersville, Bucks Co., Pa., on June 9, 1879, the third son of Joseph M. and Eliza Detweiler Mininger. As a youth he united with the Mennonite Church and early had convictions for mission work.

On July 27, 1904, he was married to Hettie B. Kulp of Danboro, Pa. One daughter and two sons were born to them: Ruth (Mrs. M. T. Brackbill), a teacher at Eastern Mennonite College, Harrisonburg, Va.; Paul E., a bishop, and president of Goshen College, Goshen, Ind.; and Edward P., a physician at Elkhart, Ind.

J. D. Mininger spent four and a half years (1904-9) as superintendent of the Mennonite Old People's Home, Marshallville, Ohio, and three years in Holbrook, Col., where he was ordained to the ministry in late 1911 or early 1912. In April 1912 he was appointed superintendent of the Mennonite Gospel Mission, Kansas City, Kan., where he served until his death, almost 29 years later. The outreach of the mission was greatly extended during those years, as he discovered varied ways of ministering to the spiritually needy.

Mininger was used church-wide as an evangelist and conference speaker, a frequent theme of his messages being the victorious Christian life. He wrote and edited many tracts, which he called Victory Leaflets. Exalting Christ in the City is a mission study text which he wrote as a veteran missionary. He rendered unusual service as counselor and pastor to the conscientious objectors imprisoned in the U.S. Military Disciplinary Barracks at Ft. Leavenworth in World War I and after. Through the years he was a member of various committees and boards of the church. At the time of his death he was a member-at-large of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities and a member of the executive committee of the Mennonite Board of Education. He died Jan. 4, 1941, and was buried at Maple Hill Cemetery, Kansas City, Kan. R.M.B.

Minister of Music is an office which has only recently entered the Mennonite churches of America, and is still unknown in Europe and elsewhere, although in some of the larger Protestant denominations it has been the practice for some time to make a professionally trained person responsible for the music program of a congregation. With the traditional Mennonite interest in music and with the growing multiple responsibilities of the pastor of a congregation, whose first responsibility it is to preach the Gospel, and to counsel and visit the members of the church, it has become desirable to make one person responsible for the musical work of the congregation. At times this office also includes the leadership of the young people's activities. As a rule such an individual has had some theological as well as musical training. Congregations (only GCM) which at present (1957) employ full- or part-time ministers of music are Bethel Mennonite Church, Mountain Lake, Minn.; Bethel College Mennonite Church, North Newton, Kan.; Bethesda Mennonite Church, Henderson, Neb.; First Mennonite Church, Berne, Ind.; First Mennonite Church, Newton, Kan.; First Mennonite Church, Reedley, Cal. In some churches which have had such an office it is at the moment vacant; others are planning to create it. C.K.

Ministerial Retirement Benefit Plan of the United Missionary Church, a recent development, begun in 1940. In the earlier history of the church ministers were only partially supported and were expected to provide a portion of their own living. The Retirement Plan came as a consequence of a supported ministry, giving full time to ministerial work. It was inaugurated as a result of an agreement that pastors would pay a small percentage of their salaries into the fund, and that the church which they serve would also pay into the fund a certain amount annually. Each congregation is expected to pay into the Retirement Fund 50¢ per member annually, and the pastor is expected to pay one per cent of his salary up to $1200 per annum, and 2 per cent of the portion over that amount. The maximum benefit paid to any retired minister is $35 per month and to widows of deceased ministers a maximum of $100 per year. In 1948 a Death Benefit Insurance was incorporated into the Retirement Fund, with a maximum death benefit of $1000. J.A.Hu.

Ministers' Bible Week, an annual institution, usually held on a college campus for the ministers and interested laymen and students of the community, for which occasion special speakers or Bible expositors are invited. The first Bible Week in connection with Bethel College (q.v.) took place in 1915 after the initiative had been taken at the Western District Conference session in October 1914. This Bible Week was originally held in connection with a course for ministers and Sunday-school workers. In 1952-53 J. E. Hartzler endowed a lectureship in connection with the Bible Week, which is known as the Hartzler Bible Lectureship. A similar Bible Week is being held at Tabor, Freeman, and Bluffton colleges. The Canadian Mennonite Bible College and the Mennonite Brethren Bible College of Winnipeg as well as the Gretna Collegiate Institute and Rosthern Junior College and the many other academies and Bible schools have been conducting a Bible Week for their students and constituency. Spiritual and intellectual guidance and stimulation have been given. (See also Ministers' Week.) C.K.

Ministers' Manuals, handbooks or service manuals for ministers, usually containing forms and instructions for administration of the ordinances of baptism, communion, and footwashing, and for ordination, reception, discipline, and dismissal or transfer of members, order of service in worship, and other items of service to ministers in the performance of the duties of their office. Sometimes prayers for various occasions are included. Among German-speaking European and American Mennonites such manuals have been given various names: Formularbuch (Palatinate), Leitfaden (Baden), Handbuch für Prediger (Russia and North America).

The history of ministers' manuals among Anabaptist-Mennonites begins with Balthasar Hubmaier's two pamphlets of 1527, Eine Form zu taufen and Eine Form des Nachtmahls Christi. The Hutterian Brethren also had manuscripts prescribing the ritual for the ordinances; Peter Riedemann's Rechenschaft of 1545 contains a "Taufordnung." Beck's Geschichts-Bücher (pp. 648-50) reprints from the original codices several forms: "Des Tauffens weis, oder wie man tauffen soll" (1561); "Vom Abentmal Christi" (1529-56); "Form des Nachtmals Christi" (1561); "Vom Bann oder Ausschluss und Wiederaufnehmen" (1529-65).

The oldest known printed manual is probably the one found as an appendix to the second edition of a book by Jan Gerritsz van Emden (Amsterdam, 1650), Drie Evangelische Predicatien, . . . daar in zeer leerelyk aangeweezen, en verklaard word hunne maniere van Doop, en Avondmal, de Reden, en Woorden, die zy gebruiken in deeze Heilige Handelinge, en Godsdienst. . . . Hier achter volgen Eenige stichtelyke Gebeden, en Meditatien, dewlke mede ter Zee gebruikt kunnen worden. Schijn-Maatschoen (Geschiedenis III, 58-75) reprints most of the manual material. This manual was translated into German by Elder Jakob Siebert of the Thiensdorf congregation in West Prussia and printed there in 1800 under the title Drei geistreiche Predigten . . . . It was used by the Rudnerweide and Kronsweide congregations in Russia (reported by Friesen, Brüderschaft, 82). It contained a manual or order of worship consisting of three sermons, articles of faith, information regarding baptism, the Lord's Supper, Christian doctrines, the election and installation of deacons, ministers, and elders, the marriage ceremony, excommunication, reception of repentant members, footwashing, etc. Elder Franz Goerz (q.v.) of the Rudnerweide Mennonite Church in Russia still used this manual.

It is likely that this manual was in use in many congregations in handwritten form. The Bethel College Historical Library has an old copy of this "Formularbuch" formerly in use by the Michalin Mennonite Church (q.v.), Poland, which has a preface by Johann Siebert (q.v.) in which he states that this book was translated from the Dutch by his father, Jakob Siebert, and that the sermons dated back to the days of Menno Simons. Gerardus Maatschoen (Geschiedenis III, 58-75) assumes that Hans de Ries (q.v.), the noted Waterlander preacher, was the author of these sermons. The Michalin copy consists of a sermon preceding the articles of faith, the articles of faith; a sermon preceding the baptismal sermon, the baptismal sermon; the sermon preceding the Lord's Supper, the sermon at the Lord's Supper; about the election of ministers, deacons, and elders; about excommunication, the acceptance of excommunicated members, and a marriage ceremony.

J. C. Jehring, in his Gründliche Historie (Jena, 1720, pp. 264-74), published a Formular so bei Einsetzung und Ordination der Lehrer und Aeltesten unter den Mennoniten gebräuchlich ist. Aufgesetzet von Abraham Dircks, gewesenem Lehrer und Aeltesten der Taufgesinneten Gemeine zu Amsterdam, which he took from Part III of a Dutch hymnal of the Flemish at Altona (De CL. Psalmen, Hamburg, 1685; first ed., Amsterdam, 1652), titled Het deerde Deel, vervattende de Belydenisse des Gheloofs met de voornaemste zeden, wetten, kerkelycke Ordre en discipline in de Christelycke Gemeynte. Dircks, he says, lived ca. 1626.

An interesting report on the forms for baptism and communion used in the Old Flemish (Jan-Jacobsgezinden, q.v.) Church on the island of Ameland, Holland, written by the Old Flemish preacher C. P. Sorgdrager apparently in the late 18th century, is described in Mennonitische Blätter for 1913 (p. 75), in the article "Kirchliche Gebräuche bei den alten Flamingern auf der holländischen Insel Ameland um 1800." This manuscript was, however, not printed as a ministers' manual. Sorgdrager did publish Vragen aan de Dopelingen met derselver antwoorden.

The only regular ministers' manual published in modern times for the Dutch Mennonites is Kanselboek: ten dienste van de Doopsgezinde Gemeenter in hederland (62 pp.) published in 1948.

The first manual printed in Switzerland or Germany was Valentin Dahlem's Allgemeines und vollständiges Formularbuch für die Gottesdienstliche Handlungen in denen Taufgesinnten, Evangelisch Mennoniten-Gemeinden (Neuwied, 1807). It was printed for the congregations of the Palatinate at the request of the Ibersheim conference of 1803. The first 145 pages contain the manual of forms, the second section (146-293) a collection of prayers for the minister's use, the third section (299-336) the ministers' manual of the congregations in Baden and Württemberg in the Neckar regions, prepared by the ministers of this group east of the Rhine and printed at their request in the Dahlem book.

In 1852 the Palatine churches replaced the 1807 manual with one prepared by Johannes Molenaar, Allgemeines Formularbuch (Monsheim, 1852) of 279 pages, but without the "Neckar" appendix. The "Neckar" congregations published their own manual in 1876 under the title Leitfaden zum Gebrauch bei gottesdienstlichen Handlungen zunächst für die Aeltesten und Prediger der gesammt-Mennoniten Gemeine in Baden, prepared by Ulrich Hege and printed at Sinsheim in 1921 (154 pp.). The Handbuch zum Gebrauch bei gottesdienstlichen Handlungen zunächst für die Aeltesten und Prediger der Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Nordamerika (Berne, Ind., 1893, pp. 124), published by the General Conference Mennonite Church, and often reprinted, was based on manuals of the Palatinate and Baden.

For whom the Mennonite Publishing Company at Elkhart, Ind., printed the following small 47-page booklet about 1875 is not known: Ein Verlobungs-, Copulirungs- und Strafannehmungsbuch. Nebst schönen, geistreichen Sprüchen. Von dem ehrsamen Lehrer Oheim Heinrich Schmidt, wohnhaft und Mitnachbar in Antonowka, bei der Kreisstadt Kanjew, Volhynisches Gouvernement im Kaiserthum Russland. It is not strictly a service manual but contains sermons to be used at the occasions of betrothal, marriage, and restoration of disciplined persons. Schmidt is identified as having been ordained on April 7, 1861, at Antonowka by Elder Tobias Unruh. The first and apparently only manual published for the Mennonite Brethren Church was Heinrich A. Neufeld's Handbüchlein für Prediger und Gemeindeglieder (Winnipeg, n.d.-1927, 24 pp.).

The Mennonite Church (MC) since 1890 has used the Confession of Faith and Ministers Manual, edited by John S. Coffman and John F. Funk and published at Elkhart. Besides the manual proper it contains the Dordrecht Confession, Shorter Catechism, and forms for use at funeral services. The eighth edition appeared at Scottdale in 1925. In 1944 this was combined with other materials under the title Mennonite Church Polity and published by authorization of the Mennonite General Conference.

The Old Order Amish ministers' manuals have been handed down largely in manuscript form. The oldest known manual is that prepared by Bishop Johannes Naffziger of Essingen, Palatinate, Germany, at the request of the Amish congregations in Holland and sent to them in a letter dated March 16, 1781. (Several manuscript copies of this manual are in the GCL.) It was printed at Elkhart in 1916 as a 31-page pamphlet under the title, Ein Alter Brief, and reprinted at Kutztown, Pa., in 1926. Another independently composed manual was written by Joseph Unzicker, apparently in Europe in the early 19th century. (Several manuscript copies of this manual also are in GCL.) John Umble has edited the Unzicker manual in the article, "An Amish Minister's Manual," MQR XV (1941) 95-117, and described all the manuscript manuals in GCL in "Manuscript Amish Ministers' Manuals in the Goshen College Library," MQR XV (1941) 243-53. L. A. Miller assembled material from several manuscript manuals and added his own revision and comments to produce the first printed Old Order Amish ministers' manual. Its title is: Handbuch für Prediger. Zum Gebrauch für gottesdienstliche Handlungen so wie den Diakonen, Diener zum Buch und Bischöfen ihr Beruf anbefohlen wird und wie verschiedene Lehren oder Predigten ordentlich und ehrerbietig ausgeführt werden die Zuhörer zu Jesu leiten wiedergeboren und selig werden (Arthur, Ill., n.d.-1950).

Goshen College Library also has a manuscript Mennonite (not Amish) manual used in Virginia, entitled Ordnung und Gemeinde Regel, von Daniel Good, Aelt. der Gemeinde in Rockingham County, Virginia. Bishop A. G. Clemmer (d. 1939) is reported to have used a manuscript ministers' manual of his own. H.S.B.

Ministers' Meetings or Conferences.

A. Mennonite Church (MC). Ministers' meetings as distinct from the official annual or semiannual conferences are widely held in the Mennonite Church, usually semiannually. In their earliest occurrence, as for instance in Ontario, they were meetings of all the ordained men in a local area or even one bishop district. In each of the three districts in Ontario, Waterloo, York, and "Twenty" (Vineland), semiannual ministerial meetings (called Kleine Zusammenkunft) were held from the beginning, at least as early as 1830 and probably earlier, and have continued to the present. They may even have preceded the annual conference (called Grosse Zusammenkunft). Earlier they preceded the traditional spring baptismal and communion services, and no doubt gave attention to matters relating to these services, including discipline. More recently the ministerial meetings have been largely inspirational and educational meetings for the consideration of matters relating to the improvement of ministerial service, including however also expository studies and theological and practical topics.

In the Franconia Conference it has been a long-standing tradition that the bishop calls a meeting of the ministers and deacons of his bishop district to fix communion and baptismal dates and to consider matters of discipline or "housekeeping" which may need attention. This meeting was called the Kleiner Rath in contrast to the annual conference, which was called Grosser Rath. These meetings were essentially different from the later ministers' meetings for inspiration and instruction.

In the Indiana-Michigan Conference four ministerial meetings are held in addition to the annual conference, two in northern Indiana meeting semi-annually (one east of Goshen, and one west), and two annual meetings, one for Michigan, and one for the entire ministerial body, usually meeting in December. The last meeting is of recent origin, starting in 1945. The northern Indiana meetings are much older, dating from about 1890, but the one for Michigan began only in 1919.

All of these meetings are similar in character, being on an inspirational and practical nature to help the ministers in their work, but not transacting any business.

In Ohio the ministerial meetings are of more recent origin. The northeastern Ohio meetings date to about 1913, the Wayne County meetings to about 1945; the western Ohio meetings began in 1955. In other states and conference districts ministers' meetings are of more recent origin. Sometimes they are called Ministers Fellowship (Illinois) or Ministers Retreat (Allegheny). The date of origin of the ministers' meetings in other conference districts is as follows: Virginia 1912, Lancaster 1933, Missouri-Kansas 1936, Pacific Coast 1936, Franconia 1938, Allegheny 1938, Illinois 1943, Alberta-Saskatchewan 1945 (combining with Christian Workers' Meeting), North Central 1946, Allegheny Retreat 1954.
H.S.B.

B. General Conference Mennonite Church. The practice of holding a ministers' conference as distinct from the annual official general or district conference in the General Conference Mennonite Church goes back to 1886, when the Eastern District conference sessions authorized the holding of such a gathering "to discuss subjects and topics relative to the labor and success of the ministers of our church." Such a ministers' conference was announced in the Mennonite to be held on June 14, 1886, at the West Swamp Church in Pennsylvania. Bad weather on this date made a postponement to Aug. 2 necessary. However, the six ministers who appeared on June 14 devoted some attention, under the chairmanship of A. M. Fretz, to "The Duty of the Pastor at the Sick Bed." At the Aug. 2 session the ministers discussed the choice of sermon texts, the preparation of sermons, avoiding duplication in funeral sermons, and the minister's duty to youth. N. B. Grubb presided at this session.

From the Eastern District the idea of ministers' meetings apparently spread rapidly to other sections, for by the fall of 1891 the Christlicher Bundesbote carried announcements and reports of such conferences held in the Middle District and also the Western District conferences. The idea was also promoted in the organizational session of the Northern District Conference at Mountain Lake, Minn., in that same year. In the ministers' conference held at Newton, Kan., on Sept. 21, 1891, chaired by Christian Krehbiel, some of the topics discussed were the Mennnonite attitude toward life and health insurance, the dismissal of ministers, the slandering of ministers, and the question of admitting to church membership such who do not agree with the church on the practice of footwashing, abstinence from tobacco, and prohibition of alcoholic drinks.

The practice of holding ministers' conferences has spread to and continues in all districts of the General Conference but the frequency of meeting and the program patterns vary from district to district. In the Eastern District Conference the ministers' conference has become the "Quarterly Conference" which includes also congregational officers and other church leaders. (See also Ministers' Retreats.) E.W.

Ministers, Hutterite, Special Honors Accorded to. One of the features that have impressed visitors to Hutterite Bruderhofs ever since the very beginning and which occasionally also caused internal problems is the treatment allotted to their ministers (Diener des Wortes, q.v., i.e., elders or bishops). While in general a puritanical way of life and a democratic sharing of all goods prevailed, ministers as a rule were given somewhat better quarters and better food wherever possible. This was naturally resented by some strict members of the group and it likewise aroused surprise, perhaps even criticism, by foreign observers.

The Chronicle of the Hutterites is quite frank in this regard, reporting as early as 1540 an internal conflict on this count. A certain Herman Schmid (of the more radical wing of the brotherhood) openly censured the practice "that the brotherhood treats their ministers with special food and drink" (Zieglschmid, 211). An ensuing meeting (without the ministers) readily reaffirmed that it is according to divine Scripture that those who serve the group spiritually as shepherds should receive "double honors" in things temporal. Schmid, however, was disavowed and excommunicated. He went to Hesse, where Peter Riedemann (q.v.) at that time was imprisoned, and asked Riedemann for his intercession.

Riedemann now (1540) wrote a lengthy epistle to the brotherhood in Moravia, "Concerning the Office of the Ministers and What is Due Them" (Der Diener Amt und Gebühren halben), now in the Chronicle (Zieglschmid, 212-23), in which he discussed the issue in general along the lines approved by the brotherhood. He wrote it "impartially," inasmuch as he could not know whether or not he might ever profit from such an "opinion." This great letter then became a real cornerstone of Hutterite practice for all the future and thus created a tradition within the brotherhood, which is still alive today. The gist of this rather elaborate document is the reference to I Tim. 5:17, "Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine." As it is the Word of God, the brotherhood should by all means conform to it.

This principle was repeated in 1556, when Hänsel Schmidt or Raiffer explained the practice of the brotherhood to Swiss Brethren around Kreuznach in a seven-point statement. Point 4 deals again with what should be allotted to ministers in all things temporal (Zieglschmid, 363). The "double honor" principle is expressly mentioned. Again in 1652 this seven-point statement is reproduced by Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.) in his great Sendbrief, one of the few Hutterite documents ever printed. The brotherhood has accepted this practice as a matter of course ever since 1540.

Visitors and guests, however, did not approve this policy. We hear, for example, of Polish Brethren (Anti-Trinitarians: see Polish Church) who lived on a Bruderhof for a whole year (1569/70) to learn how to run a community farm, and who now strongly criticized this usage; in fact, they called the Brethren for this reason outright "hypocrites." Likewise later visitors had a similar impression, and of course all the local antagonists, e.g., Catholic clergymen such as Erhard and Christof A. Fischer (q.v.). Indeed this practice has to the present day aroused surprise, amazement, and sometimes resentment. It seems incongruous in the face of the uttermost strictness and Puritanism among the Brethren in general, that the food and living conditions of ministers and elders are distinctly better and more ample. Today, as an expression of honor, the ministers do not eat with the other brethren and sisters in the common dining hall but separately in their own rooms.

With the Society of Brothers a similar practice was the rule, but it has been abandoned in recent years, although certain privileges are still granted the ministers. (Zieglschmid, Chronik; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch.) R.F.

Ministers' Retreats (GCM). The idea of a retreat for ministers and other Christian workers was first given official approval at the General Conference sessions held at North Newton. Kan., in 1945. The first retreat of this kind was held at Spirit Lake, Iowa, in the summer of 1946. Designed to promote spiritual fellowship and understanding, to serve as a workshop to discuss pertinent problems, and to provide opportunity for relaxation and recreation, the policy has been to hold such retreats annually except when some other conflicting gathering make this inadvisable. While the responsibility for planning the retreat was at first in the hands of the Board of Education, since the constitutional reorganization in 1950 this responsibility rests with the Committee on the Ministry functioning under the Board of Missions. E.W.

Ministers' Week, the name in the Mennonite Church (MC) for a special series of addresses and discussions provided for ministers in service by the colleges and Bible schools of the church, originally offered for a school week, but later often reduced to three to five days, although still called a "week," and usually scheduled at the end of the six weeks' Winter Bible School. Topics of practical value to the working minister are offered, including Bible exposition, homiletics and pastoral work, doctrine, church program and problems, and Christian education. The first known Ministers' Week was offered by Hesston College in 1925. Johnstown (Pa.) Bible School followed in 1926, Goshen College in 1927, Ontario Bible School and Eastern Mennonite College in 1928, Canton (Ohio) Bible School and others later. Hesston and Johnstown were later transferred to conference sponsorship. Attendance has usually included most of the active ordained men of the region served. In recent years attendance has declined, and in a few cases the ministers' week has been discontinued, or replaced as at Goshen by the School for Ministers lasting three weeks. For shorter meetings of one or two days see Ministers' Meeting.

Similar programs for ministers have been provided at the colleges of other Mennonite groups such as Bethel, Bluffton, Canadian Mennonite Bible College for the General Conference Mennonite Church, M.B. Bible College for the Mennonite Brethren in Canada. (See Ministers' Bible Week.) H.S.B.

Ministry (Netherlands). In the early period of Anabaptism in the Netherlands there are found a number of names and functions of ministers: bishop, elder (oudste), baptizer (doper), preacher, deacon, purse bearer (buydeldrager; in charge of financial matters), servant (dienaer), and servant of the poor (armendienaer). In those times of persecution and insecurity, when the congregations had not yet been fully organized, there was no sharp distinction between the various offices. Not yet strictly observed was the difference between elders, whose task it was to baptize, to administer the communion, to perform marriages, to ordain elders, preachers, and deacons, and to ban, and on the other hand preachers, who were only to preach or to read the Scriptures in the meetings, and there are a number of instances where a deacon preached and even performed baptism. Though we are informed only about a few cases, we may assume that as a rule elders, preachers and deacons were ordained by laying on of hands. This did not imply a doctrine of apostolic succession (q.v.). The word "Bishop" is rarely found; it was apparently too suggestive of Catholicism. About 1545 the differences between the offices became clearer, and elders, preachers, and deacons were usually well distinguished. Preachers then used to be chosen from the deacons, while the elders were chosen from the preachers. In the times of Menno Simons there were only a few elders, traveling about, who formed a kind of council of elders, meeting from time to time (Goch 1547, Lübeck 1552, Wismar 1554) to discuss and to decide upon the matters of the church, also to discuss and resolve the question whether new elders should be ordained. But by the close of the 16th century most local congregations had obtained their own elder. He was chosen by the preachers and deacons (dienaerschap) of the local congregation and ordained by an elder from abroad. Thus it is found in the confessions. In the Concept of Cologne (q.v.) 1591 the "bishop or leeraer" is to be chosen by the congregation and after being examined is to be ordained by elders with the laying on of hands. Ordination of deacons is not mentioned here. In the Flemish Olyftack (q.v.) confession of 1626, preachers, elders, and deacons are named, together being the shepherds of the church, who after fasting and prayer are to be examined concerning their faith and their moral conduct and thereupon to be ordained by laying on of hands. The Jan Cents confession of 1630 (High German-Frisian), Article X, mentions the following officers in the church: prophets, shepherds, preachers (this means elders; the word "Oudste" is not found in this confession), "hulpers" (i.e., assistants, who were the preachers), and governors. They are to be appointed by the congregation after fasting and prayer. Laying on of hands is not mentioned, but obviously assumed. The Dordrecht confession (q.v.) of 1632 (Flemish), Article IX, deals with the ministry only in general terms. The distinction between bishops, or elders, and preachers (leeraers) is not quite clear. Laying on of hands is emphatically demanded. Both the "Diaken-Dienaren," who were to care for the poor, and the deaconesses, who were to look after the poor, the sick, and the afflicted, are mentioned among the ministry. It is expressly stated that the congregation which appoints the minister shall choose as deacons men who, if necessary, can also preach. The practice, no doubt, generally agreed with these resolutions. Laying on of hands for ordaining deacons in all these groups had disappeared by 1650, in some branches even long before.

After the Dutch Mennonites had been divided into numerous branches by their deplorable schisms, practices in the various groups differed.

Waterlander (q.v.) practices are revealed by the resolutions of the Emden meeting in 1568 and the Amsterdam meeting of 1581. In the Emden resolutions a difference is made between a "leeraer" (i.e., elder) and a "vermaner" (admonisher), who was chosen to "the service of admonishing," i.e., preaching. The deacons, if they were able to do so, were also authorized to preach. In the resolution of Amsterdam in 1581 the "leeraer in den vollen dienst" (minister in full service) is spoken of and during this meeting Jacob Jansz (Schedemaker, q.v.), who until then had been a "vermaner" (preacher), was "asked, admonished, and ordered" to accept the full office of the eldership (leerampt). Upon his assent he was ordained with the laying on of hands. The expression "leeraer in den vollen dienst" was the common title of the elder among the Waterlanders; the word "Oudste," though it is found in Articles XXVI and XXVII of the Waterlander confession by Hans de Ries and Lubbert Gerritsz (1610), was unusual among the Waterlanders. About 1610 the distinction between the offices of elder and preacher was no longer strictly observed in this group, and soon after the preachers usually also performed baptism and administered communion, which in other Mennonite branches was reserved to elders as their special assignment and prerogative. As a typical remnant of the old difference between the functions of elder and preacher we note the retention of the phrase "asked, admonished, and ordered" to accept "the full service of the leerampt," but practically the difference between "leeraer in den vollen dienst" (elder) and "leeraer" soon disappeared. Another remnant of the old distinction is seen in the practice, commonly found among the Waterlanders until the 18th century, of inviting a minister from another congregation for the purpose of performing baptism and administering the communion, though the "leeraer" of the congregation was fully qualified to do this himself.

The extreme conservative groups in the Netherlands, e.g., the Janjacobs-gezinden (q.v.), Groningen and Danzig Old Flemish, and Old Frisians, until the end of the 18th century maintained the distinction in function and responsibility between elders and preachers. These groups maintained the traditions from the times of Menno Simons, e.g., that of traveling elders. Among the Old Frisians of North Holland these men were called "landsdienaren." The Groningen Old Flemish called them "oudsten," or "opzieners," but in the last decades of the 18th century even the name "commissaris" is found. There is much information on the manner of choosing elders in this group: when they wanted to appoint an elder, a number of preachers who were candidates for the eldership visited all the congregations; the one who gathered most votes was then chosen. This system lasted until the end of the 18th century. From about 1750 among this group only the elders, not the preachers, were ordained by laying on of hands.

Among the Flemish and the Frisians, and after 1665 among the Lamists and Zonists, the distinctions between elder and preacher also gradually fell into discard (Galenus Abrahamsz was never ordained as elder), though there are during the 18th century many examples of appointing and ordaining preachers to special eldership, both among the Lamists and Zonists. During the 18th century in a few congregations (Leiden, Rotterdam, Amsterdam bij 't Lam, Bovenknijpe) there were "ouderlingen." They were chosen from the deacons and had to supervise the finances of the congregation.

Deacons were chosen from the male membership. Until about 1685 deacons were usually chosen by the meeting of the brethren (Broedervertoeving), but from this time on in a number of congregations, especially those of larger cities like Amsterdam, Haarlem, Leiden, Rotterdam, gradually the practice was introduced of having the church board (preachers and deacons) appoint the new members of the board, who in the 18th century were often chosen for life. The rural churches rarely accepted this practice of co-optation, which lasted in Rotterdam, for example, until 1924.

As long as the congregation had lay preachers (leekepreekers) who did not receive a salary, or at most a small remuneration for the loss of their earnings from private business (liefdeprediekers), each congregation had two or more, up to as many as seven preachers. When a preacher had been chosen he was subjected to a thorough examination. In the stricter groups like the Old Flemish this was an examination on the confession. He then became a minister on probation (proefdienaar). This they formerly called "in de proeve staan." The preachers from about 1550 until about 1700 like the deacons were usually chosen out of the congregation by the male members of the congregation, but from the 18th century on in a number of congregations preachers were appointed by the church boards. About 1700 and occasionally even some three decades before, as the desire and ability of the local candidates diminished, and the congregations, particularly those of the larger cities, grew more and more demanding, preachers were often called in from abroad, who were then given a salary. At the same time, in 1680, Galenus Abrahamsz at Amsterdam started to train young men for the ministry, which training was continued in 1735 by the Amsterdam (Lamist) Theological Seminary, founded in this year, whereas the Amsterdam Zonist congregation began a ministers' training course some years later. Besides this, a number of ministers, like Pieter van Dokkumburg (q.v.) at Koog aan de Zaan and Pieter Beets (q.v.) at Zaandam, took up the training of ministers, who after their training were examined by a church board or by the trustees of the Conference in Friesland (Friesche Doopsgezinde Sociëteit) and appointed ministerial candidate (proponent). During the entire 17th century and even before, the congregations liked to have a physician as their preacher, the university training giving some warranty for scholarly education (see Medicine among the Mennonites). Thus a number of congregations in the 18th century obtained well-trained ministers; but in the country churches the untrained and unsalaried ministers far outnumbered the others until about 1825.

From the 19th century on, the Dutch Mennonite congregations have been governed by a church board (Kerkeraad, Kerkbestuur), consisting of a number of male members (since 1900 also in many congregations female members), which with a few exceptions are now chosen by all the members of the congregation. The pastor usually is a member of the church board, often its secretary. In most congregations the trustees are called deacons. In some congregations there are still special deacons (deaconesses) for the care of the poor. The members of the church board (deacons) have no particular spiritual office, since preaching, baptizing, performing marriages, giving catechetical instruction, etc., is left to the pastor(s). Occasionally a deacon preaches. The congregations are wholly autonomous, both material and spiritual matters being discussed and resolved by the local church board. Most congregations now have only one pastor; a number of small congregations have united to be served by the same pastor. Only a few large congregations are served by two or more (two each in Leeuwarden, Groningen, Utrecht, Texel, Zaandam, Rotterdam; The Hague three, Haarlem four, Amsterdam six). The pastor is usually called "dominee"; the old "leeraar" has gradually become rare. Since 1911 there have also been women in the ministry (in 1957, 25 out of a total of 109 pastors). The great majority of pastors now have been trained at a university and the Amsterdam Seminary, but in 1957 there are still ten pastors who have had no university or seminary training.

Since the distinction between elders and preachers is now unknown in the Netherlands, the pastor is both elder and preacher. Pastors mostly take up their office simply by being introduced by an older pastor (usually a relative or a friend) and by delivering an installation sermon. Laying on of hands, which had been rarely practiced for more than a century and a half, now sometimes takes place. Pastorship is generally a full-time job; only a few pastors have some side employment. This makes high demands upon the Dutch brotherhood. Most salaries are provided by the local congregations; but many congregations which are unable to pay an adequate salary receive a subsidy from the A.D.S. (in 1956 some 75,000 guilders paid to 64 congregations). For the insurance of the pastors in cases of illness or old age there are a number of pension funds.

Nearly all the pastors have joined the A.N.D.P.V. (q.v.) (General Dutch Mennonite Pastors' Association), founded in 1927; a number of them are members of the (interconfessional) union of Dutch pastors, an association for the material interests of ministers. vdZ.

Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 292, 300 f., 369, 400, 434; idem, III, 2-4, 7-21; S. F. Rues Tegenwoordige Staet der Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1745) 40, 54 f., 67, 99 f., 110-16, 121, 148-50; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 283, 668, 676, 686; DJ 1840, 33-52; N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 55 f., 126-29, 182-84, 222; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 32, 131 f.; DJ 1837, 86-125, 1840, 33-52; BRN VII, 528 f.; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 130-39; DB 1877, 67-72, 76, 80-82, 84; 1878, 30 f.; 1879, 9; 1889, 28-30; 1906, 149-51; 1910, 191; J. Willemsz, Grondigh Ondersoeck oft Klaer Betoogh (De Rijp, 1652); Oud Gebruyck van de Vryheit van Spreecken in de Gemeente der Doopsgesinden (1665); W. K. Loopes, Ontlediging der Christel. Kercken-Order ende des zelfs Ampten (Amsterdam, 1684, repr. 1699) 14 and passim.

Ministry (German, Diener am Wort, Lehrer, Dutch, dienaar, leraar) of Mennonites of Prusso-Russian Background. Among the Mennonites of Danzig, Prussia, Poland, and Russia Dutch traditions pertaining to the ministry were retained over many generations and even transplanted to the prairie states and provinces of North America and South America in a somewhat modified form. The Danzig church record, beginning with the activities of Peter Classen in 1667, gives a list of ministers from the days of Dirk Philips to the 19th century, and a list of the elders (oudsten) and preachers (dienaar int' woort) from 1598 to 1805, together with interesting information on the election of elders, ministers, and deacons. The congregation always had one elder and from two to five ministers and a number of deacons. At times the elder had a coelder. A number of candidates were nominated at a congregational meeting, and the one receiving the largest number of votes was considered elected. On Aug. 17, 1800, the election procedure differed considerably from the previous method, in that the church council nominated candidates, from whom the congregation elected the one they wished to have serve as minister. The candidate with the highest number of votes had 41, the next had 30, and the third had 20. The one with 41 votes was considered elected.

In later days it frequently occurred that candidates elected were not willing to accept the responsibilities of the ministry. On the other hand, the candidate who was elected was on "probation" for some time before he was ordained. There was always a possibility that he would remain a candidate and never be ordained. The following entry in the Danzig church record on Feb. 1, 1801, is characteristic: "In the country church where Jacob Bartsch resigned from his ministerial duties and Gerhard Fast was deprived of his ministerial duties, there was an election of a deacon and minister. First two deacons were chosen. Gerhard Dyk with 25 votes, Klaas Reimer with 24 votes. Of these two deacons one was elected minister. Klaas Reimer was elected with 21 votes. Both men accepted the office. May the Lord strengthen them." (Klaas Reimer founded the Kleine Gemeinde in Russia.) On Feb. 10, 1805, the congregation elected two ministers, both of whom refused to accept the call. In the early 19th century it became extremely difficult to find members of the congregation willing to serve as lay ministers (Mannhardt). This led to the calling of theologically trained salaried ministers. Jacob van der Smissen, the first such minister, began serving the Danzig Mennonite Church on July 9, 1826. Elbing followed this practice. This changed the traditional Mennonite pattern of a multiple lay ministry. The theologically trained and salaried minister served as elder and pastor of the congregation, assisted by the deacons. The lay ministers were "retired" and died out. In the rural Prussian and Polish churches, with the exception of Lemberg, Galicia, the old system prevailed until World War II, at which time the Mennonites of this territory were dispersed.

With the change in the function of the minister came also changes in preaching. Originally the minister delivered the sermon seated on a somewhat elevated chair without a pulpit (Mannhardt, 106). On both sides of the preacher sat the co-ministers. The sermon was delivered without notes in the Dutch language. During the second half of the 18th century the Dutch was changed to German. The first German sermon in the Flemish Mennonite Church of Danzig was preached by Gerhard Wiebe of Elbing on Sept. 19, 1762. "Since the congregation was not used to this he did not find general approval." With this gradual shift from Dutch to German it became common for a minister to stand while preaching and to follow an outline. This necessitated the introduction of a pulpit. Hans von Steen complained that "the beautiful simplicity is disappearing more and more from Menno's church." The change was probably brought about by developments in the Mennonite churches of the Netherlands, where the practice of writing out sermons and delivering them verbatim no doubt originated. Numerous sermons from the beginning and middle of the 18th century have been preserved in the Bethel College Historical Library coming from Prussian, Old Colony, and Kleine Gemeinde ministers. Some were written by the Dutch minister Pieter Pietersz, and (according to entries on the cover) were delivered in various congregations and at times also repeated in the same congregation. This practice prevailed in Russia until men like Bernhard Harder (q.v.) began to preach without notes. Among the conservative groups, such as the Old Colony Mennonites, the old practice has been retained to this day.

The Mennonites of Russia retained the multiple unsalaried lay ministry until the end of the 19th century. With the improvement of educational facilities and the raising of the educational standard within the congregation it became necessary to deviate from this old practice, just as had been the case in Danzig and in Holland. In Holland in the early days the congregation frequently elected the ministers from the ranks of practicing physicians. In Russia the teaching profession was considered most suitable for the ministry. Before World War I the Mennonites of Russia had some 32 elders in the Mennonite Church and 15 in the Mennonite Brethren Church, with a total of 500 ministers. Of this total about one third were or had been teachers with a secondary school training. Two thirds had only an elementary education. Twenty-five of these ministers had received theological training in some place following the pattern of the urban Mennonite churches of Germany and the Netherlands. They encountered difficulties with the government in establishing a seminary. The outbreak of World War I and the consequent Revolution prevented the Mennonites of Russia from building their own theological seminary.

On April 8, 1910, the Halbstadt Church meeting regarding the establishment of a church fund for the theological training of ministers stated that it would be impossible in the future to follow the old practice pertaining to the ministry, and that without intending to break with the practice of electing and maintaining a lay ministry, the time had come when the minister deserved remuneration. The ministerial candidate should also have an opportunity to obtain theological training in short-range Bible courses as well as in theological seminaries; for this purpose a budget of 2,060 rubles was to be created, and the money raised by a special method (Friesen, 760). Numerous attempts were made to create a theological seminary in connection with the secondary Mennonite schools in Russia or by establishing Bible schools (q.v.). Not all of the plans could be realized. However, the Bible courses offered for ministers in larger congregations were of great significance.

Some of the older congregations with cultural centers and secondary schools had quite a high ratio of ministers with a secondary and theological education. Statistics of the Chortitza Mennonite Church of 1928 reveal that of the total of 18 ministers and 10 deacons of the church and its subsidiaries, 10 had a secondary education including religious training and one had theological training. A similar situation was recorded regarding the Nikolaipol Mennonite Church and the Kronsweide Mennonite Church (Unser Blatt III, April 1928, p. 176; May 1928, p. 193).

In the prairie states and provinces of North America the Mennonites of Prussian, Polish, and Russian background continued the practices to which they had been accustomed in the old country. Gradually an adjustment to the environment and to new needs took place. This change was first effected in the United States. One of the reasons which speeded up the shift from the unsalaried multiple lay ministry to a single theologically trained and paid minister was the change from the German to the English language in worship services. As in Russia, Prussia, and Holland the rise of the educational level of the laity also caused the downfall of the old system here. In the United States in the congregations of the General Conference Mennonite Church, the Mennonite Brethren Church, and the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church the change is nearly complete. A minister is hardly ever elected from the members of the congregation to serve for a lifetime without special preparation and remuneration. As a rule he continues his training beyond college at a seminary or Bible school. After he has received a call from the congregation he enters into a contract with the congregation for one or a number of years. The old division of duties whereby the minister preaches only and the elder (q.v.) is responsible for administering baptism and the Lord's Supper has been discontinued. The present pastor takes care of all ministerial and elder duties, although much of the work of administration may be done by the church council of the congregation or the board of deacons.

The former Prusso-Russian pattern has been retained most fully among the Mennonites in Canada, Mexico, Brazil, Uruguay, and Paraguay, with Canada showing greater changes than the other countries. With the rapid changes from German to English it will most probably follow the usual pattern of the United States. Most of the Canadian congregations in the G.C.M., M.B., and other groups still have one elder or leader and a number of ministers, up to five or even ten. However, there is a tendency toward a salaried one-minister system. The Russo-Canadian Mennonites have thus far drawn heavily upon the teachers from Russia. They are now producing their own ministers. Young men are being prepared in the two Canadian Mennonite Bible colleges of Winnipeg; many of them go on to other Mennonite colleges and seminaries.

A recent study reveals that in the United States there is a constant turnover in the ministry. The practice of electing a lifetime minister from the membership of the congregation is past. Most of the G.C.M. congregations have had from two to five ministers within the last 25 years, indicating that the tenure is from five to twelve years. It is likely that the situation is similar among the M.B., E.M.B., and K.M.B. groups. The larger congregations apparently have a slightly higher rate of change in the ministry than the smaller congregations.

All ministers of the General Conference Mennonite congregations of the United States are partially or fully supported, whereas in Canada 50 per cent are self-supporting. In the United States 69 per cent are fully supported, and 28 per cent partially supported. Almost all G.C.M. ministers in the United States serving congregations of more than 150 are fully supported. In most of the larger congregations the salary of a minister is equal to that of a faculty member in a Mennonite college. In some of the large congregations an assistant minister or a minister of music is employed. The Mennonite Brethren situation is very similar to that of the G.C.M., except in Canada, where there are as yet few fully trained and salaried ministers. The old ministerial pattern is best preserved in C.G.C. congregations, which are mostly of Polish background.

A unique incident is related by H. B. Schmidt, which may have represented a general practice among the Mennonites of Prussia and Poland. When the brethren of the Friedenstal Church (Tampa, Kan.) visited him to ask him to become their minister they gave him a farewell kiss (which had originally been a general practice but was then restricted to this occasion).

The trend toward a supported ministry began in the Eastern District Conference before World War I and spread westward to the Western District Conference, and is now nearly completed. The process was a little slower in the Northern District.

Fifty per cent of the Canadian General Conference churches have from two to four ministers, the other 50 per cent having only one. Most of the elders serve more than one congregation. About half of the congregations have called their ministers from within the congregation in the last ten years.

In some of the congregations it is a practice to license a ministerial candidate to preach before he is ordained. This is in keeping with the old tradition in the Danzig Mennonite Church. It is also in keeping with the Anabaptist emphasis that the minister and his family are expected to be the best representatives of a consecrated disciplined congregation. A high ethical standard is still emphasized more than eloquence and education. C.K.

Harold W. Buller, "The Problem of Pastoral Responsibility in the General Conference Mennonite Church in Its American Environment" (dissertation, Princeton, 1952); P. M. Friesen, "Der geistliche Charakter der Gemeinde und der Predigerschaft," Brüderschaft, 730-66; M. Shelly, "Practices and Trends in Mennonite Congregations," Proceedings of the Study Conference on the Believers' Church (Newton, 1955) 27 ff.; P. K. Regier and I. I. Friesen, "Values and Problems of the Lay and the Supported Ministry," ibid., 197 ff.; H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919); Cornelius Krahn, "The Office of an Elder in Anabaptist Mennonite History," MQR XXX (April 1956) 120 ff.; "Danzig Mennonite Church Record" (BeCL); K. Friedrichsen, "Die Allgemeine Mennonitische Bibelschule," Unser Blatt I, 280; II, 101.

Ministry in Switzerland, South Germany, France, and North American Groups of This General Background. Very early in Swiss-South German Anabaptist history the congregations adopted a form of leadership which gave considerable responsibility to the bishop-elder in each congregation. The Schleitheim Confession of February 1527 calls this office the "Hirtenamt" or pastoral office. How early the threefold ministry of bishop-elder, preacher, and deacon developed is not clear, but by the time of the Strasbourg Discipline of 1565 it was well established. It has been maintained to modern times in all the Swiss, French, and South German congregations, as well as North American, except in the Palatinate, where the single pastor system with trained and salaried pastors was introduced soon after the beginning of the 19th century (first case, Ibersheim in 1813). The plural ministry has been maintained in all those congregations in Europe which did not adopt the system of the trained single pastor. Here usually there is also a plural eldership, the larger congregations having as many as four or five elders; in Alsace the practice has commonly been to have only one elder, with several preachers. In the Badisch-Württembergisch-Bayrischer Gemeindeverband, all the ordained men of all the congregations of the conference constitute a conjoint ministry, the elders being actually ordained for the entire conference, though with local congregational connections. In the Palatinate the office of deacon has virtually disappeared.

In North America the early Pennsylvania settlements of Swiss and Palatine immigrants continued the ministerial pattern of their homelands as did the Alsatian Amish immigrants of the 19th century settling farther west. One notable change took place in the Mennonite congregations, however, namely, the development of a district or diocesan bishop with charge over a number of congregations. This pattern probably was a result of the establishment of daughter congregations from an original base congregation whose bishop retained pastoral charge at all the meeting places of the total congregation. The ministers also in such cases served in rotation in a circuit. Amish congregations retained more rigidly the pattern of one bishop for each congregation. Among the Old Order Amish to this day a congregation is not considered fully organized until it has its own bishop, who is usually chosen very promptly after the formation of a new "district." In all North American groups with a plural ministry, ministers are chosen exclusively out of the congregation and serve for life unless "silenced" for heresy or misconduct. The lot (q.v.) has been commonly used in the choice of candidates for ordination, and is still widely used.

The practice of a single pastor ministry, with training and full or part salary, has been slow in coming in the Mennonite Church (MC), but since World War II has been rapidly increasing except in the four eastern conferences—Franconia, Lancaster, Franklin-Washington, and Virginia—and in the western conferences of Iowa-Nebraska, North Central, and Pacific Coast. A recent study shows that now about 40 per cent of M.C. ministers are ordained without the lot. Some 60 congregations, mostly in the Middle West, now have single pastors with salary. This is almost wholly the case in Illinois and Ontario, and largely so in Ohio and Indiana. The office of deacon usually retreats in significance or is dropped in these cases. Ministers are still chosen or called by the congregations for life or an indefinite term, although in a few cases recently a three- or five-year term has been specified. The practice of licensing ministers for a probationary period a year at a time has been coming in rapidly in the past ten years.

A significant trend of the past ten years has been the reconsideration of the office of bishop. The bishop district system having been largely broken down west of the Allegheny Mountains because of the growing adoption of the practice of having a bishop in each congregation, the office of bishop has lost much of its former prestige. Two conferences (the South Central and the Ohio and Eastern) have suspended the ordination of bishops and are experimenting with a system of district superintendents. The Ohio and Eastern Conference has adopted the practice of only one ordination, with assignments to various types of ministerial duty—deacon, pastor, and supervising bishop. Thus the ministerial system has come into flux, with the outcome not yet clear. The district superintendent plan is in effect the reintroduction of the district or diocesan bishop concept with limited tenure and supervisory functions rather than pastoral.

The Hutterian Brethren developed a ministerial system in which each local Bruderhof (congregation) had at least one preacher (Diener der Worts) and one deacon (Diener der Notdurft), while the whole brotherhood had one bishop-superintendent (Vorsteher). (See also Bishop, Elder, Deacon.)

H.S.B.

Mennonite Church Polity. A Statement of Practices in Church Government (Scottdale, 1944); Paul Peachey, "Anabaptism and Church Organization," MQR XXX (1956) 213-28; Report of the Study Conference on Church Organization and Administration (Scottdale, 1955); H. S. Bender, "The Historical Background of Our Present Ministerial Offices," Gospel Herald XLII (Oct. 25, 1949) 1051 and 1061.

Ministry, Call to the. A distinction is properly made between two aspects of the call to the ministry: a direct and inner call (vocatio immediata or interna), which comes from God, and an indirect or outward call (vocatio mediata or externa), given through a human agency, the church. The two must work together. This is the prerequisite for a blessed, fruitful discharge of the duties of the minister's office, and the preliminary requirement for a healthy church life. The one-sided emphasis of the former as a rule leads to disorderly, undisciplined conditions, and the exclusion of all participation by the church is often a principal cause of disintegration of church life.

It is the teaching of the Bible and apostolic practice that the call proceeds from God and takes place through the church. The church chooses those called by God and ordains them to service. Acts 1:21-26 says, "Wherefore of these men which have companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, unto that same day that he was taken up from us, must one be ordained to be a witness with us of his resurrection. And they appointed two, Joseph called Barsabas, who was surnamed Justus, and Matthias. And they prayed, and said, Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men, shew whether of these two thou hast chosen, that he may take part of this ministry and apostleship, from which Judas by transgression fell, that he might go to his own place. And they gave forth their lots; and the lot fell upon Matthias; and he was numbered with the eleven apostles."

When it became necessary to fill the office of deacon, with which also the proclamation of the Word was connected, the Twelve did not simply impose a man selected by their power upon the church, but they called the church together (Acts 6:2-6) and said, ". . . Brethren, look ye out among you seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business. . . . And they chose Stephen . . . whom they set before the apostles: and when they had prayed, they laid their hands on them."

Other passages of Scripture agree with these. The elders at Ephesus are reminded by Paul of their divine calling and admonished (Acts 20:28), "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood." In Eph. 4:11 the apostle writes, "And he [Christ] gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers." Compare this with I

Cor. 12:28: "And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers . . . ." We hear thus that Christ gives, God determines ("hath set") and calls individuals as bearers of spiritual office, and the church takes them, so to say, from the hand of God and of Christ and ordains them to service.

The outward call to the office, if it is to have meaning in the kingdom of God, must be based on the inner call. In II Cor. 3:5 and 6 Paul writes, "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God; who also hath made us able ministers of the new testament; not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life." And in I Cor. 2:12 and 13 he especially emphasizes, "Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God. Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual." Only he who is in possession of the Holy Ghost is called by God to any spiritual office in the Christian church. He has personal life-connection with Christ, from which strength flows to him to plant the seeds which grow into eternal life.

The teaching and practice of the apostolic church is based on the idea of the priesthood of all believers (q.v.). In the post-apostolic period this fundamental Christian principle was adhered to. Justin and Irenaeus testify with joy that the church of Christ is the priestly race of promise, and Tertullian asserts that because all Christians are priests, they also have the right to administer the ordinances. Also Origen and Augustine emphasize the priesthood of all believers. And yet this principle had long since been abandoned in practice. The example of Old Testament priesthood was more and more imitated in the Christian (Catholic) church. The calling of church officials became solely the affair of the church authorities, which set up exact directions for it. In these specifications there are echoes of the idea of the priesthood of believers. Thus the demand is repeatedly made that appointments to church offices should not be made without consulting the congregation. But it was never done. At the Roman Catholic Council of Trent in 1545-63 (Sessio XXII c. 4) all participation by the laity in the calling and appointment to spiritual office was eliminated.

The Reformation restored validity to the concept of the priesthood of all believers. Now the question of the call to the ministry in the Christian church became current again. How beautifully Luther expresses it in his booklet, An den christlichen Adel deutscher Nation: "For all Christians are truly of the 'spiritual estate,' and there is among them no difference at all but that of office. . . . If a little group of pious Christian laymen were taken captive and set down in a wilderness, and had among them no priest consecrated by a bishop, and if there in the wilderness they were to agree in choosing one of themselves, married or unmarried, and were to charge him with the office of baptizing, saying mass, absolving and preaching, such a man would be as truly a priest as though all bishops and popes had consecrated him" (Works of Martin Luther, II, Philadelphia, 1915, 67). And in a Kirchenpostille Luther preaches: "Hence every Christian has the power which the pope, bishops, priests and monks have in this case to retain or to remit sins. . . . All of us indeed have this power; but let no one presume to exercise it openly, unless he is chosen by the church to do so."

Here Luther represents the absolutely correct Protestant conviction that all worthy and responsible members have the right to exercise the functions of spiritual office, but that for the sake of order only the person to whom the office has been entrusted by the church may do so. Luther afterwards modified his conception of the priesthood of believers because of the attitude of the Zwickau prophets and Thomas Müntzer. He placed increasing emphasis on the preaching office and put the greatest stress on the orderly call to the office, limiting the participation of the congregation and giving the state increasing rights and duties.

In the third chapter of his exposition of several chapters of Exodus (1524-26) Luther distinguishes two types of call: The first comes only from God, without the use of an intermediate means; but this call must have outward signs and evidence. The other call, which comes through men, needs no sign. Those who say, "We are called of God," must prove that God and men have called them. In his exposition of Psalm 82 he argues as follows: "It does them [the Anabaptists] no good to assert that all Christians are priests. It is true that all Christians are priests, but not all are pastors; for over and above being a Christian and a priest, he must also have an office and an assigned parish." Hence, "unless they [the "corner preachers"] furnish good evidence and proof of their calling and commission from God to this work in a definite parish, they should not be recognized or listened to, even if they were like angels or Gabriel himself. For God wants nothing done by one's own choice or worship, but all on command and call, especially the office of preaching, as Peter says in II Pet. 1," etc. Therefore "Let everyone consider: If he wants to preach or teach, let him prove the call and command that drives and compels him or be still. If he refuses, then let the government commend such fellows to the proper master, whose name is Master Hans" (i.e., the hangman).

Luther goes still further in his booklet Von den Schleichern und Winkelpredigern (1532). He actually warns against the restoration of apostolic custom: "People are too wild and forward." Just as it is not permitted to push oneself uncalled into the (civil) council, much less should it be allowed that "in a spiritual council, that is, the office of preacher, a foreign intruder should push his way in or a layman should venture to preach uncalled in his church. It shall be and remain the charge of the prophets (the pastors)." To them and not to the members he grants the right of protest against an erring preacher and thus no doubt also the right of calling the preacher.

In the Lutheran Church the conception of a twofold call, immediate and indirect, was retained. But the former is not understood as the call that comes through the Holy Spirit as the prophets and apostles experienced it, but merely as the inner conviction of the capability of performing the functions of the office of preacher, knowing that one has the required gifts and the knowledge, especially the gift of teaching ability and eloquence, and that one agrees with the faith of the church and has the urge and the joy to serve according to the intentions of the church. The latter or indirect and outward call consists either in the congregational choice or in the church governing body's selection of a candidate for the administration of any spiritual office. Fundamentally the participation of the church is required. The sentence, "The call is the concern of the entire congregation," occurs again and again in the rules and doctrines of the church; therefore the members must in some way be heard. But actually their participation is extremely slight. The call remains solely the concern and the task of the church authorities with the co-operation of the state. The conditions of the call are as follows: (1) an unspotted reputation; (2) the proper age; (3) adequate health and absence of disturbing bodily defects; (4) adequate education, required since 1552. As a rule, two examinations are required; one (pro licentia concionandi) to acquire the permission to preach and to be a candidate for the ministry, the other (pro ministerio) for admission to a spiritual office; three examinations are given in Old Prussia, Saxony, and several Thuringian states; (5) since 1533 a statement has been required of the candidate, confessing as his own the faith that he is to proclaim; (6) the gratuitousness of the giving of the office, so that all simony is excluded.

The same practice is, on the whole, found in the Reformed Church. According to Calvin's Institutes (IV, c III, 17) the call must be made with the consent and approval of the congregation; other pastors must have charge of the election. Accordingly, in accord with the Geneva Rules, the pastors elect, and the laymen declare their assent. The Helvetian Confession of 1556 (Confessio Helvetica Posterior) makes the following assertion regarding the call: God gives the church preachers, who are to be regarded as the successors of the apostles, even of the prophets, by equipping believing men with the gifts necessary to leadership in the church; but only those are to be considered servants of the church, who have been chosen and regularly ordained by the church. "The call and the choice are made by the church or by those whom the church has appointed for the purpose." In the Reformed Church, too, as a rule the call to the office is issued by the church authorities; the individual congregation has only the right of suggestion or of limited choice.

More faithfully than these Anabaptism has preserved the principle of the congregational call to the ministry and has given the priesthood of believers its full place. The call is the business of the individual congregation and is given to a mature member of the congregation by a vote of the congregation. The oldest confession (q.v.) of the Anabaptists states it thus (Mart. Mir. D (I), 433 f., E 395; translated from the German Pirmasens edition of 1780): "Therefore shall the believers who lack preachers, after they have sought the face of God in ardent prayers (Acts 6:6), turn their eyes to a God-fearing (Acts 16:2; I Tim. 3:7) brother who keeps his body in subjection (I Cor. 9:27), and in whom the fruit of the Holy Spirit (Gal. 5:22) is evident. He, when he has been chosen through the votes of the members (II Cor. 8:19), shall be examined by the elder and overseer of the congregation (I Tim. 3:10), whether he agrees with the congregation in all matters, according to the rule of God's Word, so that he may be capable of instructing others in the way of truth which he himself understands and knows (Matt. 15:14; Isa. 9:15). And he, if he is found capable (Tit. 1:8), shall arise in the name of the Lord to proclaim the will of God to the people. If it is evident that God has entrusted him with the preaching of the Gospel (Gal. 2:7), namely, that he rightly divides the Word (II Tim. 2:16) and with it brings forth fruit (Isa. 55:11; Col. 1:6), then the church, if it is in need of it, and if after the examination he is found to be of one mind with the congregation, can elect him by a regular vote (II Cor. 8:19) as elder and preacher in full office; the elders (I Tim. 1:14; II Tim. 1:16; Acts 13:3) confirm it by the laying on of hands and permit him to work and labor in the Lord's vineyard (I Cor. 3:9), and also administer Christian baptism and the Lord's Supper with all that pertains to it."

The regulations in other Mennonite confessions, though shorter, have the same provisions. This is still the doctrine and practice of the Mennonite churches everywhere; i.e., that the call of the ministry is the exclusive right of the individual congregation. It is carried out by means of the vote, to which all mature members, in most churches including women, are eligible. A prerequisite of the congregational call is the divine call, which consists, not in receiving special revelations, but in the inner urge to preach given by God and in the possession of the necessary qualifications. Formal training, which at times and in many places was rejected as unscriptural, is coming more and more to be viewed as essential. In Holland, in the city churches of Germany, and in the country churches of the Palatinate it has become a requirement. The country churches of West Prussia, the Verband (q.v.), as well as the churches of Russia and America still reject this as an absolute requirement.

Before 1795 some of the Mennonite congregations in the Netherlands were required to ask the consent of government in order to call a minister, or the called ministers were obliged to get approval in order to be allowed to accept the invitation. Usually the congregation did not comply with this law and called ministers without notifying the government. In 1745 at Almelo (q.v.) and in 1765 at Enkhuizen (q.v.) difficulties arose because the church board neglected to ask for the required approval. In both cases the government conceded.

In former times Mennonite congregations frequently asked the Lamist congregation at Amsterdam for consent to call ministers. Among others, this happened in the case of Den Burg in 1713 and 1714, Cadzand in 1758, Grouw in 1799 (when notified that the minister they intended to call did not belong to the Lamist Sociëteit), and Ameland in 1807. Consent was asked because Amsterdam gave subsidies to these congregations. After the A.D.S. (Dutch General Conference) was established in 1811, the congregations which received subsidies from the A.D.S. were required to have the approval of this organization for the calling of the ministers they chose.

The opponents of 16th-century Anabaptism made vigorous attacks on the right of the Anabaptist preacher to preach; i.e., they challenged his call. This topic was one of the church questions discussed in practically all the disputations held by state church authorities with the Anabaptists. The great Bern debate (Berner Gespräch) of 1538 is a striking example of this. The whole concept of corner preacher (Winkelprediger) as applied to the Anabaptists also expresses this. The Anabaptist answer was usually simply, "God has called us." But they did also commonly recognize the call by the congregation as soon as an ordered congregational life was set up. (See the Schleitheim Confession, 1527, article V.) (ML I, 198-200.)

The call to the ministry in the Mennonite churches of Europe (with the exception of the Netherlands) and of America has commonly been of two types: (1) by direct vote of the members of the congregation, or (2) by a nominating vote of members of the congregation followed by the casting of the lot (q.v.) if more than one candidate receives votes. Most of the groups in Europe and America use only a vote without the lot, and have done so throughout most of their history. In earlier times the minister, who was a lay-minister without special training or salary, was always chosen from the midst of the congregation. The employment of trained and salaried ministers usually means a call to someone from outside the congregation. In South Germany, France, and Switzerland the lot was used at certain times and places, and the 18th and 19th century immigrants from these areas to America brought the lot with them. It was consequently used regularly until recently in the Mennonite Church (MC), and all branches of the Amish. The Old Order Amish still use this method exclusively, but in the Mennonite Church it is being rapidly replaced by a direct vote or call from the outside. The lot ceased to be used in Europe by the end of the 19th century, with certain small exceptions. In the Palatinate the calling of trained ministers from the outside began in the first quarter of the 19th century.

A theological examination of candidates for ordination by the executive committee of a conference or by a special committee designated for this purpose, with or without a written questionnaire, has been introduced into about half of the conferences of the Mennonite Church (MC).

The early practice in the Mennonite (MC) and Amish churches in America was to expect every male member to be available for a call to the ministry, and refusal of a call was considered a very serious matter and at times subject to discipline. Some baptismal vows included a commitment to accept a call to the ministry if one should be received. Occasionally inability or unwillingness to preach after ordination resulted in a complete nonfunctioning in the ministerial office. This was tolerated more readily than was refusal to accept ordination. The call to the ministerial office as expressed through the vote of the congregation and the lot was considered a divine call which could not be refused, whether one had an inner call or not. In more recent times it has been common to ask the candidate voted for whether he has an inner call from God. One who professes no such call is commonly excused from the lot. However, by many the vote and the lot are still considered sufficient evidence of a divine call.

The call to the ministry for service in special appointments under mission boards in foreign or home fields of service, or in institutions, does not usually require action by the congregation from which the candidate comes.

In the M.B.C.-U.M. Church a candidate for the ministry may offer himself for service but must receive an endorsement by vote of his home congregation before he can be used in an appointment to the pastoral ministry elsewhere. A period of probation, usually three years under licensure, must precede full ordination.

The practice of licensing, whereby a candidate for ministerial service may be authorized to serve in a preaching or pastoral appointment, either in full charge or as an assistant to an ordained minister, is coming into many district conferences of the Mennonite Church (MC). In this case the call is extended by the bishop in charge, often without any vote by the congregation from which the candidate comes, but frequently with a vote by the congregation where he is to serve. In the case of a mission station, no vote is taken. Licensure is usually for a year at a time only. (See Berufung, ML I, 198-200.)

Neff, H.S.B., vdZ.

Minnesota, one of the United States of America, is bounded on the north by Canada, east by Lake Superior and Wisconsin, south by Iowa, and west by the Dakotas. Its area is 84,068 square miles. The chief towns are Minneapolis and the adjoining capital St. Paul. The state is known as the land of 10,000 lakes and attracts many vacationists. Its climate is healthful. The winters are cold but invigorating. Mining and lumbering are among its industries, but the state is noted largely for its prosperous agriculture.

The first Mennonite settlers in Minnesota came in 1873 from the Crimea, Russia, into the village of Mountain Lake, in the southern part of the state, which was hardly more than a railway station then. Other groups, all of Dutch-Prussian-Russian background, came in succeeding years; by 1880 some 350 families had come to this Cottonwood County village, which became the center of a large Mennonite community. Some of these families made their homes in the village and set up places of business, but most took up neighboring farm lands. A few families chose more outlying districts but later came back. Leaders in the early years were the four pioneer elders, Aaron Wall, Heinrich Voth, Gerhard Neufeld, and Heinrich Regier. Other personalities of note were Jacob Balzer, I. I. Bargen, and John Rempel, who were instrumental in organizing school and church life.

A smaller contingent of Mennonites came to Butterfield, in Watonwan County, the county east of Cottonwood, in 1880-83. This group, of Galician (Swiss) origin, came from the Lemberg (q.v.) area in Austria. A few families of this group located in outlying districts, but only temporarily. Most of these people live in or near Butterfield. The Butterfield and Mountain Lake area is really one community. Through the years a number of families have drifted away to western states, and some to the cities, but many have come back. The majority of the Mennonites in this locality are prosperous farmers, but a goodly number have set up flourishing business establishments. Some have gone into professions, such as medicine, nursing, teaching, and the ministry.

A small group of Mennonites has been living at Warroad, a town of about 1,500, in Roseau County in northwestern Minnesota, since 1934. Most of this group came originally from the Mountain Lake and Butterfield area. They had left Minnesota in 1916 and settled near Lostwood, in northwestern North Dakota, but because of continued crop failures moved to Warroad. Their number was increased by some families from Alsen and Munich, N.D., and others coming direct from the Mountain Lake and Butterfield community. They are all of Dutch-Prussian-Russian background. A congregation (GCM) was organized in 1939 and a country church was built. Its membership (1954) is 86.

The first Mennonite church in the Mountain Lake community, now called Gospel Mennonite Church, was organized in 1876, and was open to all who wished to affiliate with it. In 1888 a split occurred, due to the introduction of Sunday school. A small group in the congregation led by Aaron Wall (q.v.) severed its connection and reorganized as a separate congregation, which later was instrumental in forming the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Conference (q.v.). The original church became a member of the General Conference and the Northern District Conference. A third branch of Mennonites represented in the community are the Mennonite Brethren. The first M.B. church was organized in 1877. The following data indicate the constituency of these conferences in Minnesota in 1954; G.C.M. with a membership of 1,822 in 7 churches, including the church at Warroad; M.B. with 452 members in 2 churches; and the E.M.B. with 255 members in one congregation.

The last migration of Mennonites into Minnesota was that of the Mennonite (MC) Church. One group came from Cullom, Ill., to settle in 1894-97 at Alpha, in Jackson County, on the Iowa border some 20 miles straight south of Mountain Lake. This congregation had 77 members in 1954. The next congregation of this branch was Lake Region at Detroit Lakes, 180 miles northwest of Minneapolis, founded in 1926, most of the members coming from Nebraska. In 1954 it had 87 members. A series of seven mission churches have been established by this branch in the past ten years in northern Minnesota (Cass Lake 26 members, Ogema 51, Queeton 15, Leader 26, Loman 20, Menahga 26, International Falls 50). The total membership in these missions was 214. Thus the total membership of the Mennonite Church (MC) in Minnesota in 1954 was 378.

The total membership of all branches of Mennonites in Minnesota in 1954 was 2,907. J.J.F.

Jubiläumsfeier zum Andenken an das 50-jährige Bestehen der Mennonitenansiedlung von Mountain Lake, Minnesota 1875-1925 (n.p., n.d.); F. S. Schultz, A History of the Settlement of German Mennonites from Russia at Mountain Lake, Minnesota (Minneapolis, 1938); G. S. Rempel, A Historical Sketch of the Churches of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren (Rosthern, 1939); ML III, 139.

Miropol: see Friedensfeld and Novo-Kovno.

Mishawaka (Ind.) United Missionary Church (MBC), founded in 1903, had a membership of 52 in 1953, with Lloyd Murphy as pastor. J.H.H.

Missel, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, still a young man, was betrayed and arrested at Langenschemmern in the Biberach district of Württemberg, Germany, and was taken to Warthausen and beheaded on Dec. 13, 1571. He went to his death with joy. The executioner testified of him, "This man is better than all of us together." His suffering is described in the song, "Merkt auf, ihr gelibten Brüder mein," found in Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder and in Liliencron's anthology. NEFF.

Mart. Mir. D 561, E 893 f.; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 359-61; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 466 ff.; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 693-97; R. Liliencron, Zur Liederdichtung der Wiedertäufer (Munich, 1875) 49-51; ML III, 140.

Mission Advocates, the first missionary organization in the Lancaster Mennonite (MC) Conference, originated at a meeting in the home of John H. Mellinger, Harristown, Pa., on Sept. 15, 1894. It was a layman's movement with C. M. Brackbill, John H. Mellinger, Abram Metzler, Jr., J. A. Ressler, and others as a nucleus, an outgrowth of Bible Studies through the district. At the second meeting they contributed $7.75 to encourage the new Chicago Mission. After 16 months, to comply with Bishop Board wishes they organized the Mennonite Sunday School Mission, and missions began to appear. Here was the seedbed for the Eastern Board of Missions and Charities, which is now touching four continents. I.D.L.

Mission Association, Dutch Mennonite: Doopsgezinde Zendings Vereeniging: see Dutch Mennonite Missions Association.

Mission Board of the E.M.B. Church, known as the Commission on Missions of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, was organized in 1889, originally consisting of only three members. At the present time, according to the recently revised constitution, nine members serve on this board. Three members are elected each year and the term of office is three years.

The Commission functions as a co-operating Board, processing and recommending a missionary candidate to the societies with which the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren is affiliated: Congo Inland Mission, Far Eastern Gospel Crusade, and Gospel Missionary Union. It also recognizes and keeps in touch with all E.M.B. missionaries going out under any nonaffiliated mission societies. The annual budget is nearly $100,000. The number of missionaries served by the Commission is 70, located in Japan, India, Africa, and South America.

The officers at present are O. H. Wiebe, chairman; H. H. Dick, Executive Secretary; H. P. Nickel; B. B. Janz; Arthur Fast; Reuben Warkentin; Max Eisenbraun; A. P. Toews; and H. P. Wiens. O.H.W.

Mission Home for the Aged, located in Hillsboro, Kan., one block north of the Salem Hospital and Salem Home for the Aged, is operated by the same board as the Salem Home. It was opened in 1920 as the Bethesda Sanitarium under the direction of Dr. and Mrs. J. V. Wiebe. After Dr. Wiebe's death it continued as the Mission Home for the Aged under the supervision of Miss Marie Schmidt and others until taken over by the Salem Home for the Aged Board, which is made up of representatives of the several Mennonite churches in Hillsboro and community. Each Home has its own matron and nurses. In 1957 the occupants of the Mission Home were transferred to the remodeled former Salem Hospital and Home and the activities of the Mission Home as a separate institution terminated. The enlarged institution now operates under the name Home for the Aged, Inc. D.V.W.

Mission Mennonite Belge (MMB) was set up in 1955 as the legal holding corporation for the mission work of the Mennonite (MC) Board of Missions and Charities in Belgium. It is a subsidiary to the European Mission Council described in the article Mission Mennonite Française. H.S.B.

Mission Mennonite Church (GCM), a rural congregation near Mission City, B.C., organized in 1940 by settlers from the Canadian prairies, now called United Mennonite Church. The first settlers were Johann Dueck, Peter Enns, David Lietz, and Peter Penner, who came in 1934-37. In 1940 a meetinghouse seating 180 was built. The members are largely engaged in dairying, poultry raising, and berry culture. In 1954 the membership was 116, with Peter J. Froese as pastor. C.G.T.

Mission Mennonite Française (MMF), legal holding corporation in France for the mission work of the Mennonite (MC) Board of Missions and Charities, organized Sept. 19, 1954, in co-operation with the French Mennonites. The original officers were Pierre Widmer chairman, René Kennel secretary, Max Schowalter treasurer. MMF is a subsidiary to the European Mission Council of the MBMC, which was created by the MBMC Sept. 1, 1953, to plan and make recommendations for its mission work among the French-speaking peoples of Europe, particularly France and Belgium. In 1956 the members of EMC were David Shank chairman, Pierre Widmer executive secretary, Orley Swartzentruber, Jules Lambotte, René Kennel, Max Schowalter, Robert Witmer, and John H. Yoder. The MMF fields of service in 1957 were the work carried on by the Orley Swartzentrubers in Paris, and the PAX unit at Orleansville, Algiers. H.S.B.

Mission News is a bimonthly paper published by the Franconia Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC). It was first published in March 1937 as a four-page paper. Later it developed into an eight-page paper. At present (1955) it is a 16-page paper, approximately 8 x 10 in. in size. It is printed at the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottdale, Pa., with an edition of 2,100. The purpose of this paper was given by President Isaiah G. Ruth in the first issue as follows: "The object of the undertaking is to inform our people as to the work which is carried on by the Board and the mission stations under its supervision." The editors were 1937-39 Claude Shisler and Jacob M. Moyer; 1940-55 J. Silas Graybill and Elmer B. Kolb. J.S.G.

Mission News Bulletin, published biweekly by the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, Elkhart, Ind., was first issued on Jan. 21, 1925, and continued through Dec. 22, 1947. Since that time the mission and financial information contained in the News Bulletin has appeared in the Gospel Herald under "Mission News" and "Your Treasurer Reports." The News Bulletin began as a one-page 8½ x 11 inch release and continued as such until June 6, 1928, Vol. 4, No. 11, when the format was changed to a one-page 8½ x 14 inch mimeographed sheet and continued in that form until discontinuance. It was distributed free to a selected list of ministerial and lay leaders in the Mennonite Church (MC). Since April 1953 the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities has published a multigraphed monthly Mission-Service Newsletter which supplements material appearing in the Gospel Herald. L.C.H.

Mission Quarterly; German edition, Missions Quartalblatt, was a 16-page, 6 x 9 in., quarterly published by the Home and Foreign Mission boards of the General Conference Mennonite Church from September 1924 to February 1931. The German issues were published in March, June, September, and December, while the English edition was published in February, May, August, and November. Most of the content was duplicated in the two languages. Since the purpose of the periodical was to acquaint church members with mission fields and missionaries and to promote the missions cause, its contents consisted mainly of reports and letters from missionaries, information from the mission boards, and editorials emphasizing missions. The home missions editor was A. S. Shelly of Germantown, Pa., until February 1928, when J. M. Regier of Pandora, Ohio, succeeded him. P. H. Richert of Goessel, Kan., edited the foreign missions section. It was sent free of charge to all families in General Conference churches. J.F.S.

Mission Worker, The, "A monthly periodical published in the interest of mission work by the Mennonite (MC) Home Mission" in Chicago, A. H. Leaman editor, was published from December 1906 to November 1908 as an 8-page (from January 1908 16-page) 6½ x 9½ in. monthly. Beginning with May 1908 it was published by the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottdale, Pa., and from June 1908 John Thut was editor. It was discontinued with the establishment of the Christian Monitor in January 1909. H.S.B.

Missionary Banner, an illustrated 16-page monthly, published first in 1938 at New Carlisle, Ohio, then at Winona Lake, Ind., and Pandora and Springfield, Ohio, and now at Elkhart, Ind., by the United Missionary Society, the missionary organization of the United Missionary Church. R. P. Ditmer served as editor of the first 14 volumes, 1938-52; Roy P. Adams, 1952-53, and Richard S. Reilly, 1954- . N.P.S.

Missionary Church Association, founded on Aug. 29, 1898, at Berne, Ind., has been deeply influenced by Mennonite character and tradition, since a number of the founders came out of the Defenseless Mennonite Church (now the Evangelical Mennonite Church). Several of the early leaders in the Missionary Church Association, including J. E. Ramseyer, William Egle, Joseph Egly, David Roth, and Henry Roth, were ministers in the Defenseless Mennonite Church originally. A. E. Funk of Eastern Pennsylvania, a minister in the General Conference Mennonite Church and a close associate of A. B. Simpson in the Christian and Missionary Alliance, was elected the first president of the M.C.A. in 1898. B. P. Lugibihl of the C. and M.A., and D. Y. Schultz were also strongly influential leaders in the beginning of the M.C.A. J. A. Sprunger, a General Conference Mennonite minister, also wielded an influence, but did not associate with the M.C.A. at its founding. A number of people followed the early Mennonite leaders in establishing the first Missionary churches in Berne and Grabill, Ind., Archbold, Ohio, Groveland, Ill., and Elkton, Mich. In addition to the Mennonite sources, the C. and M.A., through its early German Branch and the influences of its strong missionary and Bible conferences, played a major role in the formation of the new church.

Bethany Home and Bible Institute (the antecedent of the Fort Wayne Bible College) was established by the B. P. Lugibihls in 1895 in Bluffton, Ohio. J. E. Ramseyer, D. Y. Schultz, J. A. Sprunger, and others were engaged to assist in the Bible Institute at Bluffton. J. E. Ramseyer was principal for the first two years (1895-97), followed by D. Y. Schultz (1897-1900). The Bible Institute was closed in 1901 after six years of ministry. In 1904, after wide investigation for a new and more advantageous site, the school was reopened as the Fort Wayne Bible Training School in Fort Wayne, Ind. The school is now known as the Fort Wayne Bible College with a strong and varied program of training. It is owned and controlled by the Missionary Church Association although operated under a broad interdenominational policy. S. A. Witmer has been president for twelve years beginning in 1945.

J. E. Ramseyer was the president of the M.C.A. for 44 years (1900-44), and during that long period was its great and highly respected leader. He was also the president of the Fort Wayne Bible College 1912-d.44. Other founders of Fort Wayne Bible College were D. Y. Schultz, B. P. Lugibihl, William Egle, David Roth, and Henry Roth.

From 1900 to 1907 most of the churches founded had some Mennonite background. These included Pandora, Ohio, in 1900; Elbing, Kan., in 1902; Swanton, Ohio, in 1904; Archbold, Ohio, Pettisville, Ohio, and the First Church, Fort Wayne, Ind., in 1905; and Woodburn, Ind., in 1907. After 1908 the church grew largely through other influences and sources which have weakened the Mennonite character of the church.

The particular issues which led to the expulsion of the early leaders from the Defenseless Mennonite Church were the baptism with the Holy Spirit as a crisis experience following regeneration, certain truths related to eschatology, immersion as the only mode of baptism, and divine healing. J. E. Ramseyer brought the conflict in the church to a crisis by being rebaptized by immersion in August 1896. Others followed his example in baptism, and these with others became the nucleus of the new church.

In 1904 the official organ of the M.C.A., The Missionary Worker, was established with D. Y. Schultz as its first editor 1904-11. It has continued as a bimonthly denominational periodical. The German organ, Botschafter des Heils in Christo, was founded earlier but was approved by the General Conference of the M.C.A. in 1903 as an official organ of the church. William Egle served as its editor until 1927 with the exception of 1919-22, when H. C. Thiessen was the editor. The paper was discontinued in 1927.

The strong distinctives of the M.C.A. have been its emphasis upon the deeper life and upon foreign missions. Separation from the world, nonresistance with some modification, and the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper are taught and practiced. Footwashing, once quite widely practiced, has practically died out.

The M.C.A. in 1957 had 113 local churches with approximately 7,000 members. There are 95 ordained pastors and 25 licensed ministers serving in churches. The churches are distributed as follows: Indiana 16, Ohio 24, Michigan 17, Illinois 9, Pennsylvania 3, Maryland 1, Tennessee 3, Arkansas 2, Missouri 1, Kansas 6, Nebraska 2, Colorado 1, Oregon 2, California 18, Arizona 3, Hawaii 4.

Foreign missionary work is carried on in sixteen countries around the world with a staff of 100 missionaries including 10 in the Hawaiian Islands. The M.C.A. operates its own fields in Sierra Leone, Africa; Ecuador, S.A.; Jamaica, Dominican Republic; Haiti, and the Hawaiian Islands. It has cooperated closely with other boards, particularly the Christian and Missionary Alliance, in sending and supporting missionaries in other countries.

The M.C.A. has had close relations for many years with the Evangelical Mennonites, the United Missionary Church, and the Christian and Missionary Alliance. Off and on there have been special efforts at merger between the M.C.A. and the first two. Negotiations are in progress at the present time with the U.M.C. The M.C.A. has been a member of the National Association of Evangelicals and its foreign department of the Evangelical Foreign Missions Association since their inception.

The M.C.A. headquarters is located at 3901 South Wayne Avenue, Fort Wayne, Ind., in a memorial building to J. E. Ramseyer, dedicated in 1950. J. A. Ringenberg succeeded J. E. Ramseyer as president in 1944, and Jared F. Gerig was elected to that office in 1952. J.F.GE.

Walter H. Lugibihl and Jared F. Gerig, The Missionary Church Association, Historical Account of Its Origin and Development (Berne, 1950); Mrs. J. E. Ramseyer, J. E. Ramseyer, Yet Speaking (Berne).

Missionary Guide, an illustrated 16-page (sometimes 12, sometimes 18) bimonthly, published by the Illinois Mennonite Mission Board, "for the promotion of the interests of the Illinois Mennonite Conference and her subsidiaries." The editors have been J. N. Kaufman and C. Warren Long, 1944; Raymond M. Yoder, 1945-48; and Harold Zehr, 1948 to the present. N.P.S.

Missionary Meetings, which serve the purpose of awakening and reviving a missionary spirit, are held regularly in the Mennonite churches in America, South Germany, West Prussia, and Switzerland. In 1830 a meeting of this kind was held in Heubuden (Danzig). Since 1817 the West Prussian Mennonites had been supporting Protestant missionaries with regular contributions and private gifts (Menn. Bl., 1856, 55). When the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association (q.v.) was organized in 1847, the interest of German Mennonite friends of missions was soon turned to it. In the annual missionary meetings of the West Prussian churches this fact found lively expression in sermons and addresses. These meetings were well attended (Menn. Bl., 1877, 66) and continued down into recent times.

The Mennonites of Russia also gathered for missionary meetings from an early period. On Oct. 4, 1857, "our this year's missionary meeting was held at Berdyansk" (Menn. Bl., 1858, 18). Thus they became important in the life of the church.

Somewhat later missionary meetings were organized in South Germany. The initial impulse came from America. At the meeting of the General Conference Mennonite Church at Wadsworth in December 1876, it was proposed that annual missionary conferences be held to support the newly established foreign mission. The plan was carried out. Today such meetings are very frequent in the Mennonite churches of America. Some are quarterly (e.g., West Liberty, Ohio, M.C.), some semiannual, some annual. Some have been carried on for several decades.

In Switzerland the first known missionary meeting was held in the Emmental on March 9, 1890. Two years later the congregation of Giebelstadt-Würzburg followed its example and held such a meeting annually on a Catholic holiday. The farewell service for the outgoing missionaries, P. Löwen and his wife, and Peter Nachtigall with his wife, in 1911 in Würzburg became an inspirational celebration. Thereupon it was decided at the following meeting of the preachers of the conference of Baden and Hesse to hold a mission meeting annually. The first took place in Monsheim on May 1, 1913. Since then it has been held alternately in Monsheim and Kaiserslautern. The Gemeindeverband of Baden, Bavaria, and Württemberg has been conducting such meetings in Heilbronn since 1915. A similar meeting was held annually on the Deutschhof near Bergzabern until World War II.

Great blessing results from these meetings; they not only benefit foreign missions, but also serve to strengthen and revive the home churches. (See also Angas, William Henry; ML III, 142.) NEFF.

Missionary Messenger, The, the official organ of the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference (MC), began as a 4-page quarterly in April 1924, became a 12-page 7¾ x 10¾ in. monthly in May 1925, a 16-page since December 1930 with an occasional 16-page supplement in recent years. Orie O. Miller was the first editor; his successors with time of beginning have been: J. P. Sauder, March 1932; Menno E. Miller, May 1935; Howard Charles, May 1941; Mahlon Hess, October 1941; Irvin B. Horst, July 1946; J. Lester Brubaker, February 1947; Paul N. Kraybill, May 1951. It touches all phases of missions, relief, and service, and some general church life. The subscription list of 4,900 reaches the entire conference, serving especially well by "keeping all the issues before all of our people all the time." I.D.L.

Missionary News and Notes, the organ of the Women's Missionary Association of the General Conference Mennonite Church, 722 Main St., Newton, Kan. Its primary purpose is to propagate missionary interest among women of the Conference constituency and solicit their participation in the support of all Conference missionary endeavors. It was first published in 1926 as a monthly (except July and August) four-page leaflet with variable format. It is now (1957) published as a 16-page monthly, size 7 x 10 in., printed by the Herald Book and Printing Company of Newton. Its highest circulation, 6,650, was reached in 1947; the current circulation is 6,274. The editors have been Mrs. P. R. Schroeder 1926-29; Mrs. R. A. Goerz 1929-45; Mrs. H. J. Andres 1945-48; Mrs. A. D. Klassen 1949-56 (partial); and Mrs. Ira Sprunger 1956- . A German edition appeared in 1929-45. The German editors were Mrs. F. H. Klassen 1937-39 and Mrs. Gerhard Friesen 1939-45. At first the German edition was mimeographed and published separately but in April 1936 the separate issues were combined in one publication. Missionary News and Notes is now published entirely in English. J.S.A.

Missionary Sewing Circle Letter, the monthly organ of the women's missionary and sewing circle work of the Mennonite Church (MC), at first 4 pages, 5 x 7 in., later usually 8 pages, called M.S.C. Monthly beginning in August 1944. It was published by the General Sewing Circle Committee of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, a committee appointed by the Board, until March 1948, when a new name was given to the committee, Women's Missionary Sewing Circle Organization of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. In January 1952 the format was enlarged to 6 x 9 in., still 8 pages, and has remained so to date. In October 1954 the title was changed to Women's Missionary and Service Monthly to correspond to the change of the organizational name to Women's Missionary and Service Auxiliary of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. H.S.B.

Missions, Board of: see Board of Missions (GCM).

Missions, Board of Foreign, of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America: see Board of Foreign Missions.

Mission-Service Newsletter, a 6-page, 8½ x 11 in., monthly multilithed publicity release, published by the Mennonite (MC) Board of Missions and Charities, first number April 1953, mailed free to all ordained men and church workers of the Mennonite Church (MC). The editor from the beginning has been Levi C. Hartzler. It is the successor to the Mission News Bulletin (q.v.), published 1925-47. H.S.B.

Missions, Foreign Mennonite. Modern Protestant mission work finds its stimulus and origin in the 18th-century Pietist movement and the evangelical awakening which followed it. Certain special characteristics mark this flowering of the missionary movement in the "Great Century," such as the multitude of zealous missionaries, the stress upon individual conversion, the dependence for financial support upon a voluntary supporting society, and the development of an understanding on the mission field that the new movement had the status of a minority in an antagonistic world. In the main these characteristics represent a new emphasis and new direction in mission purpose and method and could come into being only in the wake of a broad spiritual awakening. The lack of a deep spiritual revival as an immediate aspect of the Reformation is one of the main factors in explaining the lag of Protestant interest in the cause of missions. In other words, when the medieval idea of the state church with state support and state control and enforced membership was taken over by the classical reformers and introduced into the new Protestant movement and with Protestant princes uninterested, unwilling, or unable, the cause of Protestant missions could only wait for a new stimulus to individual responsibility and voluntary participation. The territorial church concept of the Reformers inhibited outreach beyond the national borders.

Early Anabaptist Missions (1525-1600), though conducted against the opposition of both Protestant and Catholic authorities and eventually suppressed, represent an attempt to introduce an apostolic sense of mission 200 years before the Protestant church as a whole was ready. A strong evangelical strain ran in the early Reformation leaders and was picked up by the Swiss Brethren and the Dutch Mennonites, both of whom represented the moderate, spiritual phase of the "Left Wing Reformation." In them was developed to a higher degree the logical Reformation emphasis on individual conversion, apostolic call to witness, and voluntary church fellowship. Early Anabaptist missions, thus, were a precursor to the modern missionary movement. They grew out of a deep sense of responsibility for evangelism and the spontaneous testimony of warm hearts to a faith that could only be transmitted by voluntary witness and appropriation. This spontaneous expansion through evangelism (q.v.) is evident from the earliest Anabaptist congregation at Zollikon in 1525 (Blanke, Brüder in Christo) to the last roving missionaries of the Moravian Hutterites about 1650. It accounts for the rapid expansion in Switzerland, where 38 congregations are reported organized in the canton of Zürich alone in the two years 1525-27 and a similar number in the canton of Bern. It appears in the Martyrs' Synod (q.v.) held in Augsburg in 1527, where in addition to ironing out doctrinal misunderstandings missionaries were assigned to the various fields of labor in central Europe. It appears again in the North in the rapid expansion of Anabaptism in the Low Countries, though here one must distinguish between the politico-eschatological Münsterites and the deeply religious Dutch Mennonites. It is seen pre-eminently in the Hutterites, whose missioners (q.v.) were part of an organized program to preach the Gospel and gather the Lord's people to the Moravian colonies which, in the later 16th century, were prospering. The evangelists were driven by zeal or persecution into ever widening circles where the indistinct national boundaries of the day made little difference. In this process, although they sailed no boundless seas to "Greenland's icy mountains" or "India's coral strand," they encountered the problems of modern missions and displayed the qualities of character and the methods of that movement.

F. H. Littell ("Anabaptist Theology of Missions") points out specific ways in which the early Anabaptist missions foreshadowed the modern movement: (1) they rejected the parish pattern and coercion for Pauline methods of persuasion and faith in which the proper order was first, preach, secondly, believe, and lastly, baptize; (2) they interpreted the Great Commission's "Go ye therefore" as applying to all believers at all times; (3) the lay believer became the carrying power of the movement; and (4) they had a supreme confidence in the power of God so that the suffering of the martyr church was its authentication and believed that in this very process "the Master was gathering His people from the far corners of the earth and that in His own good time God would give them the kingdom" (Stauffer, "Anabaptist Theology of Martyrdom").

Loss and Recovery of Evangelistic-Missionary Zeal. The very success of the evangelical Anabaptist movement stimulated opposition to it in a day when torture and death were accepted means of suppression. Persecution in various ways and to varying degrees became current wherever the Anabaptists went. The earlier effect was to spread the movement and to increase the challenge to faithfulness; the Hutterite Chronicle, the early South German and Swiss Ausbund, and the Dutch Het Offer des Heeren and Martyrs' Mirror glory in accounts of faithfulness unto death and in conversions by such vivid testimony. The later effects were not so favorable; trained leaders were lost and replaced by equally devoted but perhaps less qualified men; eventually missionary zeal was lost and replaced by an inner aspiration for piety and faithfulness to a more traditional type of religious life. The period of Mennonite exclusiveness had arrived. Although severe persecution ceased, irritating discriminations by the authorities continued, and the typical Mennonite became the "Quiet in the Land," emphasizing the virtues of simplicity, honesty, and adherence to the faith of the fathers, but without imagination or judgment as to opportunities or responsibilities of the higher faith in Christ. The 16th-century Anabaptists had been "in the world but not of the world"; the 18th-century Mennonite was neither "in the world" nor "of the world." This explains the continuing lack of evangelistic zeal for a long period after persecution and discrimination had passed.

The recovery of evangelistic-missionary zeal was a complicated process in which not only the challenge of a new viewpoint toward religious opportunities was necessary but also a reinterpretation of secular social responsibilities. It was the complication of balancing one of these against another that made Mennonite adjustments to the new movements of the 19th century so difficult. By approximately the early 19th century the Dutch and North German Mennonites were giving up much of the traditional Mennonite way of life. Nonresistance and nonconformity gradually vanished here and elsewhere. Liberal theology also made its inroads in Holland and North Germany. But Pietism also exerted its influence in Holland, Hamburg, West Prussia, South Germany, and Switzerland. In Russia and America conservative-traditional Mennonitism was maintained, but warmer pietistic and evangelical currents of influence opened the door to missions by the end of the 19th century. It was in the nexus of this social and religious adjustment that evangelism and missions returned to the Mennonites, receiving at first only a hesitant welcome. The process occupied the greater part of the 19th century and in Europe involved stimulating contacts with Baptists and Lutheran Pietists. In America it came largely through the German Evangelical arm of the Methodist awakening, or through the Moody type of revivalistic evangelism. The contacts were many and complex and it was not simply outside pressure that won Mennonites to renewed evangelistic and missionary zeal, but also the dawning consciousness that this was an essential aspect of Anabaptist-Mennonite faith.

Missionary Interest among European Mennonites was first aroused through efforts of the English Baptists to secure support for their Serampore (India) work. William Henry Angas (q.v.), an English Baptist preacher, was instrumental in organizing, in 1821, in Holland the Aid Society to support this work, which was predominantly Mennonite in membership. In 1824 Angas toured the Continent, paying attention to Mennonite congregations in Prussia, Poland, Bavaria, Switzerland, and France, and making a deep impression on them. As a result of his visit in the Palatinate a special conference in 1824 authorized a missionary box in every church and a mission offering once a month for support of the Baptist work. Shortly afterward, in 1830, there was held the first mission festival in West Prussia in the Heubuden church. Contributions raised were sent to the Berlin Mission. The growing sentiment for missions brought about in 1847 the reorganization of the Dutch Aid Society for the support of Baptist Missions into a Dutch Mennonite Missionary Association (q.v.). Prominent in this reorganization was Samuel Muller (q.v.), who had been president of the previous organization and carried over in the same capacity in the new society. Muller, deeply spiritual, formerly minister of the Amsterdam congregation and professor in the Seminary, was one of the most influential Mennonite leaders of the period. As were most early missionary societies, this was a private organization seeking voluntary support from all who were interested; though there was some Mennonite opposition as an innovation, it came to draw popular support, though it never won the entire brotherhood. The Palatinate and Prussian congregations now directed their contributions to the new Mennonite society, as did those of North Germany, Bavaria, and Russia, as well as a few congregations in America.

The first volunteer for foreign service was Pieter Jansz (q.v.), a teacher from Delft, Holland, who was sent out in 1851 to the Netherlands overseas possessions in Java (q.v.), locating at Japara. He was followed by H. C. Klinkert (q.v.) in 1856, Thomas Doyer (q.v.) in 1857, and R. D. Schuurman (q.v.) in 1863. Another mission field was opened in Sumatra in 1871 but staffed by the Russian Mennonites, Heinrich Dirks (q.v.) being the first missionary.

The rise of missionary interest among the Mennonites in Russia presents a vivid case of the influence of Pietist and Awakening forces on staid Mennonites. The Mennonite colonies in Russia were laid down roughly in three strata. The first colonists (1788-98), forming the Chortitza settlement, came originally from the financially poorer class of West Prussian Mennonites, consequently with less training and breadth of vision. The settlement was marked by early quarrels and slow progress and at the middle of the 19th century was still closed to innovations. The second group (1803-8), forming the Molotschna settlement, were from a more well-to-do background, with broader training and more initiative. They progressed more rapidly and took the lead in educational and religious moves. The third was a group of later arrivals (1819-40) from scattered settlements up the Vistula River, where they had had more prolonged contacts with other Protestants and particularly intimate relations with the Herrnhuters (q.v.). They formed the congregations of Rudnerweide, Alexanderwohl, Gnadenfeld (q.v.), and Waldheim (q.v.) and were scattered within the Molotschna settlement where they became focal points of new ideas. Rudnerweide, a Frisian congregation, immediately showed progressive tendencies by associating and uniting with a Flemish congregation. Then, with Alexanderwohl and Ohrloff, another progressive congregation, it joined in organizing a Molotschna branch of the Bible Society in St. Petersburg, and in supporting the Moravian missionary work as early as 1827. Under the first elder, Franz Görz, there were found at Rudnerweide mission study hours and a warm, evangelical type of sermon not common elsewhere.

Gnadenfeld, whose pastor Wilhelm Lange (q.v.) had formerly been Lutheran, had intimate Moravian contacts in Prussia at Brenkenhoffswalde (q.v.), where the congregation is said to have received many blessings, such as "a clear knowledge of the Scriptures, living Christianity, and understanding and love for missions and schools." This background made Gnadenfeld open to the ministrations of the near-by Lutheran Pietist minister Eduard

Wüst (q.v.), who further cultivated the pietistic-evangelistic emphasis. Here in 1860 was one of the main centers of the Mennonite Brethren as they emerged with their revival activities. In spite of some controversy Gnadenfeld presented a relatively undisturbed picture of developing spiritual life with stimulating effect on other congregations through evangelical, educational, and missionary activities. It was from this same Gnadenfeld that the first Russian Mennonite missionary volunteer came. Heinrich Dirks offered himself to the Dutch society and in 1867 was sent out to Sumatra. His service on the field and later service at home promoted the cause of missions among the Mennonites of Russia and Europe.

The Russian Mennonites organized no mission society of their own, but additional missionaries were like Dirks sent out under the Dutch society, and in fact the main support of the society came from Russia. The Mennonite Brethren made Baptist connections and sent a student to the German Baptist Seminary at Hamburg. When their first missionary, Abraham Friesen, was ready in 1889, he was sent out under the American Baptist Mission Union to South India, where he started a work for the Mennonite Brethren at Nalgonda, Hyderabad. Following him were A. J. Hiebert in 1898 and Heinrich Unruh in 1899. This was carried on at first in co-operation with the Baptists but later absorbed by the American Mennonite Brethren mission established in this area in 1900.

North American Mission Interest. As among European Mennonites, the mission interest of the Mennonites in North America arose contemporaneously with and in relation to the Evangelical awakening but was hindered by the social environment where secular innovations were pressed along with new forms of religious work. Thus opposition to political enticements, secular schools, and city occupations developed a reaction which tended to oppose all innovations including Sunday schools, midweek prayer meetings, evangelism and missions. Mennonites responded with varying degrees of opposition or approval to the new methods and activities, in accord with their background, contacts, and development. All of the Mennonite immigrants to America settled in what were at first closed communities with linguistic and religious distinctions which discouraged outside influences.

1. General Conference Mennonite Church. The first serious struggle over new methods of work came in connection with the John H. Oberholtzer (q.v.) schism of 1847 in the Franconia Conference (MC) in which 16 congregations, in whole or in part, comprising about one fourth of the members of the Franconia Conference, separated from the main body and organized the East Pennsylvania Conference of the Mennonite Church, later to be the G.C.M. Eastern District Conference (q.v.). Among the innovations soon introduced under Oberholtzer and the new conference were Sunday-school work, publication of literature, and ministerial training. Missions also were envisaged, for in a letter to European Mennonites in 1858 Oberholtzer inquired about how the Dutch Mission Society operated (Menn. Bl., December 1858, 63). Contacts were soon made with the South German Mennonite immigrants who had recently settled in Iowa and were already sending back contributions to the Dutch work (Menn. Bl., September 1857, 50). Certain Canadian churches associated with Daniel Hoch (q.v.) joined with Ohio churches in a conference in May 1855, and recognized "the high duty to support missions for heathen" (Rel. Botschafter, June 25, 1855, 125). This surge of missionary interest in many quarters was part of the growing sentiment which brought about the organization in 1860 of the General Conference of the Mennonite Church of North America (now General Conference Mennonite Church, q.v.). In the union conference both home and foreign missions were commended to the churches and three treasuries were set up for the receipt of funds. Plans were made also for continuing and enlarging Oberholtzer's publications and for setting up an educational institution to train ministers and missionaries. To further these ends Daniel Hege (q.v.) was set aside as an itinerant minister to visit all Mennonite congregations explaining the new move and the opportunities for new work, and to solicit funds for the proposed institution. The building for the new school, located at Wadsworth, Ohio, was completed and dedicated in 1866 and Carl Justus van der Smissen (q.v.), pastor of the Friedrichstadt Church in Schleswig-Holstein, was secured as principal. The influence of the Wadsworth institute, though it lasted but ten years, and the influence of the van der Smissen family in the cause of missions cannot be overestimated. Deeply spiritual, in contact with the Dutch movement and the Java mission, van der Smissen impressed students and through them congregations. Perhaps most important is that from the first graduating class in 1871 came the one, Samuel S. Haury (q.v.), who was to become the first missionary sent out by the General Conference. As a missionary candidate, he made it necessary for the General Conference to organize a board which became in time the Foreign Mission Board (q.v.) of the General Conference. Various possible fields were investigated, Java under the Dutch society and Alaska; but finally in 1880 Haury was located among the American Indians in Oklahoma. This was the beginning of General Conference work among the American Indians which came to include the Arapahoe, Hopi, and Cheyenne in Oklahoma, Arizona, and Montana. The Hopi work was started by H. R. Voth (q.v.), who in addition to evangelistic work made notable contributions to Hopi anthropology by collections of Hopi artifacts now in the Chicago Museum of Natural History. The outstanding name in the Cheyenne mission was that of Rodolphe Petter (q.v.), who came from Switzerland in 1890 to join the Indian mission and become the foremost linguist in the Cheyenne language. His dictionary, grammar, Bible translations, and other publications are monumental works. The first mission field on foreign soil to be opened by the General Conference was that in India, started in 1900, in response to famine needs; the second was that in China begun as an independent venture in 1909 by H. J. Brown but taken over by the General Conference in 1914; more recently work was begun in Colombia (1945), in Japan (1950), and in Taiwan

(Formosa) (1954). In addition to the several factors mentioned above which contributed to the development of missionary interest among the General Conference Mennonites must be mentioned the coming of the Russian Mennonite immigration toward the end of the 19th century. Ten thousand settled in the prairie states and another eight thousand in Manitoba. Their conscious Mennonite heritage, their emerging interest in missions, their experience in education and co-operative enterprises, and their resources in personnel and finances stimulated all church activities but none more than missions.

Mennonite Brethren in Christ. The Evangelical movement under Jacob Albright in the early 19th century among the Germans in Pennsylvania came close home to the Mennonite congregations there, and among the thousands who thronged this movement were many Mennonites. Some joined the Evangelical church; some attempted to remain in their own church. William Gehman (q.v.), a minister in the Upper Milford congregation associated with Oberholtzer's group, under Evangelical influence started holding prayer meetings. Criticism developed against this new spiritual exercise and the emotional religion with which it was associated. As a result, in 1858 Gehman and others were stricken from the list of ministers. With like-minded members they then organized the Evangelical Mennonites, who in turn made contact with groups in Indiana, Ontario, and Ohio of similar experience and by a series of unions formed in 1883 the Mennonite Brethren in Christ (q.v.). Because of their background in the revival movement they immediately adopted its type of program and entered aggressive work. Home missions and particularly city missions were prosecuted with zeal, and an increasing proportion of their membership came from people of non-Mennonite origin. It was from this group that the first American Mennonite missionary to a foreign land appeared. Eusebius Hershey (q.v.), for forty years an inveterate traveling home missionary, announced in 1883 that the church would have a foreign missionary before long. In 1890 he left his family at home and without board appointment or assurance of support sailed for Africa. Aged 67 and not physically strong, he succumbed to the African climate after six months of work through an interpreter. His greatest contribution was the legacy of inspiration of a completely devoted life. Two others from this group left in the 90's for foreign service—William Shantz (1895) and C. F. Snyder (1897), both to China where they worked under the Christian and Missionary Alliance. The first work directly sponsored by the M.B.C. church was opened in Nigeria, Africa, by A. W. Banfield in 1901 and taken over by the church in 1905. This was well supplied with workers and has been a successful effort. Other fields in which this Mennonite branch has labored are Armenia (1898-1920), India (1928), and Colombia (1942), with also many individual workers supported by the church but working under other boards.

3. Mennonite Church (MC). Among the mass of remaining Mennonites, often referred to as the "Old" Mennonites, who were located largely east of the Mississippi River and in Ontario, evangelism and missions were slower in entering. John C. Wenger has characterized the group in recent times as (1) conservative in faith, (2) strict in discipline, and (3) active in missions, publication, education, and mutual aid. The activity came in part from the stimulus of prolonged contacts with outside influences such as Sunday schools and evangelism. The influences were mediated by men like John F. Funk (q.v.) and J. S. Coffman (q.v.). The former, a Pennsylvania teacher and later businessman in Chicago where he had contacts with Moody, relocated his printing business in Elkhart in 1867 and became the center of a movement for publication, education, and missions. The latter, a Virginia minister, became the pioneer evangelist and almost singlehandedly introduced "protracted" meetings in the church during the 1880's. Both worked together for promoting education for service in the Elkhart Institute (1894), which later became Goshen College (1903), as well as stimulating the organizing of the Mennonite General Conference in the late 90's. They had an uncommon ability to retain the confidence of conservatives while introducing progressive ideas. Mission interest, both home and foreign, entered and became fruitful in the closing years of the century through organization of the Mennonite Evangelizing Committee (1882) and the Mennonite Benevolent and Evangelizing Board (1892), which in 1905 became the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. The first city mission was opened in Chicago in 1893 and the first foreign work in India in 1899. The India work was a response to famine conditions which were vividly reported by George Lambert (q.v.), who had just returned from a world tour appalled by the suffering. He was sent out to accompany a shipload of food, and the first missionaries, J. A. Ressler and Dr. and Mrs. W. B. Page, followed shortly. Beginning with orphanage, education, and evangelistic work, the India work has developed into a strong indigenous church work. Other fields entered have been Argentina 1917, Tanganyika in East Africa 1934, Bihar in India 1940, Chaco in Argentina 1943, Puerto Rico 1945, Ethiopia 1948, Japan 1949, Sicily 1949, Belgium 1950, Honduras 1950, Luxembourg 1951, Alaska 1952, England 1952, Israel 1953, France 1953, Somalia 1953, Cuba 1954, Brazil 1954, Uruguay 1954, Jamaica 1955, Viet-Nam 1957, Ghana 1957. In this group several district conferences have entered into foreign and home mission work in addition to the main older board, these being Lancaster (Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities in 1917), Virginia (1949), Conservative (1951), and Franconia (1954). An independent mission was begun in the Amazon region of Brazil in 1955.

4. Mennonite Brethren Church. The Mennonite Brethren with their Russian origin and evangelical beginnings were better prepared for aggressive work when they came to America in 1874. From Russia Abraham Friesen (MB) went to India under the American Baptist Mission Union in 1889 and thus a pattern of Baptist co-operation had been set up. The mission emphasis is indicated by the incorporation of the Mennonite Brethren in 1900 under the name "American Brethren Mission Union," later revised to "Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America." The first American missionaries to join the Mennonite Brethren work in India were Mr. and Mrs. N. N. Hiebert and Elizabeth Neufeld, who arrived in the Telugu (Hyderabad) field in 1899. Additional missionaries were sent out and a strong evangelistic program carried on which spread to several major stations in the Hyderabad area. The next field entered by the Mennonite Brethren was China where individual missionaries joined the work of the China Mennonite Mission Society (q.v.) in Shantung, and where in 1911 F. J. Wiens opened the work in Fukien among the Hakkas. M.B. work began in the Belgian Congo on a private basis in 1912, coming under the official board in 1923. The mission in Paraguay to the Indians called "Light to the Indians," begun by the colonists in 1932, was turned over to the M.B. mission board in 1946. Additional M.B. foreign mission fields are Curitiba in Brazil (1946), Colombia (1945), and Japan (1950). They also have a work among the American Indians.

5. Other American Mennonite Groups. By 1900 most Mennonites were convinced of the validity of mission work and it was only a matter of time and opportunity before the remaining groups began to express interest. The Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, who merged with the Mennonite Brethren in 1957, have had a remarkably high missionary interest, although as a very small group they never had a mission board of their own. Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Barthel, K.M.B. members, started a mission in the Shantung province of China in 1901, which led to the formation of an inter-Mennonite China Mennonite Mission Society in 1912 to operate this work. The Evangelical Mennonite Brethren became one of the chief supporters of this mission. In 1921 two K.M.B. missionaries started a work in Inner Mongolia. Individual workers are supported in other fields by the K.M.B. Conference. The K.M.B. conference mission work is carried forward by three committees, the Foreign Missions Committee, the Home Missions Committee, and the City Missions Committee. The E.M.B. conference operates its mission program through the Commission on Missions, and through the Congo Inland Mission Board, on which it has three members. It operates no direct foreign work of its own but supports conference-recognized workers in several fields under other denominational boards. The Church of God in Christ Mennonites have recently begun mission work in Mexico, and among the Navaho Indians and the Mexicans in the Southwest of the United States, under their General Mission Board.

The Central Conference of Mennonites (q.v.) and the Evangelical Mennonite Church (q.v.) (then Defenseless Mennonites) joined in opening work in Africa which developed into the Congo Inland Mission (q.v.) organized in 1911, which is now a large co-operative work in which the G.C.M. church is also associated. A few of the smaller groups, such as Evangelical Mennonites (Kleine Gemeinde), Church of God in Christ Mennonites, and Conservative Mennonites, have only recently been drawn into mission work, while the most conservative groups still hold aloof, such as Reformed Mennonites, Old Colony, Hutterites, and Old Order Amish. In 1956 an Old Order Amish mission committee started work among the Indians in far Northwest Ontario.

The total foreign missionaries in service under the major American Mennonite mission boards in all fields as of July 1, 1957 (including those on furlough and under appointment, but not short-term service workers), with the total membership by groups, was as follows: General Conference Mennonite Church: missionaries 127, members 25,295; Mennonite Church (MC): missionaries 266, members 4,103; Mennonite Brethren Church: missionaries 196, members 30,904; Congo Inland Mission: missionaries 93, of which 44 are duplicates of the GCM figure, members 16,000 (all in GCM figures); missionaries 638, members 50,302. The total annual contributions of the American Mennonites to foreign missions now runs over $1,000,000. The following table lists the numbers of foreign missionaries by boards and countries, not including short-term service workers (I-W, etc.).

Country	M.C.	M.B.	G.C.M.	Total
Alaska	5			5
Algeria	2			2
Argentina	22			22
Austria		5		5
Belgium		23	9	32
Brazil	8	5		13
Colombia	2			2
Congo, Africa		68	44	*161
Cuba	6			6
Ecuador		5		5
England	6			6
Ethiopia	33			33
France	4			4
Germany		5		5
Ghana	4			4
Honduras	13			13
India	32	42	45	119
Israel	4			4
Jamaica	4			4
Japan	18	12	18	48
Luxembourg	12			12
Mexico		11		11
Paraguay		20		20
Puerto Rico	28			28
Somalia, Africa	8			8
Taiwan (Formosa)			11	11
Tanganyika, Africa	41			41
Uruguay	10			10
Viet-Nam	4			4
Total	266	196	127	638
American Indians		9	27	36

* The total figure includes other Mennonite bodies.

In 1940 the Dutch Mennonite mission field in Java was turned over to the Malay Mennonite Church, which had become independent in that year. The Dutch board then in 1950 took over from the Dutch Reformed Church a mission field in the territory of northwest New Guinea, which has about 60 congregations and mission stations. The Russian Mennonites had developed a mission among the semi-primitive people (Ostyaks) of north-central Siberia after World War I about 300 miles north of Tomsk (see Ob Mission). It was in operation as late as 1928.

The development of the missionary enterprise among the Mennonites of North America since 1900 has been noteworthy in size and significant in influence upon the brotherhood as a whole. It has meant a great enlargement of vision, a stimulus to outreach in various other areas of work, an intensification of spiritual commitment, a growth in stewardship, and emphasis upon the majors in the Christian faith and life.

For additional treatments on aspects of missions and evangelism among Mennonites, see the following articles: Evangelism, City Missions, Missionary Meetings, Negro Missions, Rural Missions, the various conference mission boards, the various foreign fields, such as China, India, Japan, etc., the various major stations in the mission fields, biographies of outstanding missionary leaders, etc., also in the supplement in Vol. IV the articles Home Missions and Jewish Missions. The Dutch Mennonite Mission Association has published annual reports since 1848, and the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities since 1915. S.F.P.

Ed. G. Kaufman, The Development of the Missionary and Philanthropic Interest Among the Mennonites of North America (Berne, 1951); Ira D. Landis, The Missionary Movement Among Lancaster Conference Mennonites (Scottdale, 1938); E. R. Storms, What God Hath Wrought (a history of M.B.C.-U.M.C. missions) (Springfield, 1948); G. W. Peters, The Growth of Foreign Missions in the Mennonite Brethren Church (Hillsboro, 1952); Mrs. H. T. Esau, The First Sixty Years of Mennonite Brethren Missions (Hillsboro, 1954); F. H. Littell, "The Anabaptist Theology of Missions," MQR XXI (1947) 5-17; Ethelbert Stauffer, "The Anabaptist Theology of Martyrdom," MQR XIX (1945) 179-214; ML I, 54 f.; II, 274 f.; III, 141 f.

Missions Quartalblatt: see Mission Quarterly.

Mississippi, population 2,170,194, the twentieth state admitted to the Union (1817), has one Mennonite (MC) congregation, Gulfhaven, located about five miles north of Gulfport in the far south of the state, founded in 1922, with 62 members in 1956, and a mission (MC) in Gulfport founded in 1947, with 22 members in 1956. Both belong to the South Central Conference. A CPS project under the MCC, Camp Landon, near Gulfport, has since 1945 been serving the Negro community. In January 1957 it was taken over by the General Conference Mennonite Church. H.S.B.

Mississippi was considered by the Old Colony Mennonites (q.v.) for settlement in 1920 when they had difficulties in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. After the delegation had returned from South America in 1919, another delegation was sent to Alabama and Mississippi. After a visit by a land agent named Peters from Mississippi a delegation from Canada investigated the land and conditions offered in Mississippi in 1920. Although there was some question as to whether the "freedoms" promised by Peters would actually be granted, it was decided on June 1, 1920, that a delegation make a down payment of $250,000 on the land; at the border, however, the delegation with the money was stopped and sent back by the United States officials. Evidently patriotic organizations like the American Legion prevented the immigration of nonresistant Mennonites into Mississippi. The chronicler David Harder wrote, "Since we could not find out why the border was closed to us, we are compelled to accept it as a guidance of God, who wanted to spare us unforeseen hardships. Very likely the offer of freedom was the hoax of a land speculator." Thus the Old Colony Mennonites chose Mexico instead of Mississippi. C.K.

Missive, van de Sociëteit der Doopsgezinde gemeenten in Vriesland en Groningen, geschreeven aan de Doopsgezinde Christenen, welke zich uit Dantzig in Pruissen hebben nedergezet in de Staaten van Haare Majesteit Catharina de Groote, Keizerin aller Russen (Leeuwarden, n.d.-1788) (Missive of the Conference of Mennonite Congregations in Friesland and Groningen, Written to the Mennonite Christians from Danzig, Prussia, Who Have Settled in the States of Her Majesty Catherine the Great, empress of all Russians) is an official letter, signed by the trustees of the Mennonite Conference of Friesland (FDS), Netherlands, drawn up at the special request of Jakob (von) Trapp(e) (q.v.), the Russian director of settlements, at this time visiting the Netherlands and contacting the Dutch Mennonites. Alarmed by the information given by Trappe that the new settlers in Russia were torn by doctrinal differences, the Mennonite Conference of Friesland, which held a special meeting to discuss the question, resolved to send a letter to the settlers. This letter, drawn up by pastor Heere Oosterbaan (q.v.), and dated July 31, 1788, is a warm plea for moderation. It urged the Mennonites in Russia to avoid banning members who as Flemish married members of the Frisian branch and to live in peace and harmony. The letter, written in German, was printed in Dutch; it was reprinted in full by Blaupot ten Cate in Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1837) 354-63. vdZ.

Missoula (Mont.) CPS Camp No. 103 was a Forest Service camp under the administration of the MCC but with the men chosen from other agencies in addition to those from the MCC. The men were trained as "smoke jumpers," learning how to parachute to the sites of forest fires. Over 200 men were members of the camp between its opening and closing dates May 1943—January 1946. A 48-page book entitled Smoke Jumpers, produced by the men of the camp, gives pictures of the unit's work as well as a description of its activities. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 139-47.

Missouri, pop. 3,945,653, admitted to the Union in 1821 as the 24th state, has had Mennonites within its borders since 1860, when the first ones (Amish Mennonites) located on the western border of the state, below Kansas City in Cass County (near Garden City). In 1868 they organized the Sycamore Grove (MC) congregation, which in 1956 had 224 members. The next settlement was made in 1866-68 in the Morgan County-Moniteau County area near Versailles and Fortuna. First to come were Swiss Mennonites from Berne, Ind., and Polk County, Iowa, followed by others from Rockingham County, Va. In 1871 the settlement peaceably divided into two congregations, Mount Zion (MC) and Bethel (GCM), with 54 and 131 members respectively in 1956.

The third location to be settled was in northeastern Missouri, northwest of Hannibal in Shelby Coun-

Mennonite Churches in Missouri

	Mennonite Church (MC) Name of Church	Address
1.	Mt. Pisgah	Cherry Box
2.	Pea Ridge	Palmyra
3.	Palmyra (extinct)	Palmyra
4.	Mennonite Mission Church	Hannibal
5.	Mennonite Gospel Center	Kansas City
6.	Sycamore Grove	Garden City
7.	Mt. Zion	Versailles
8.	Providence	Versailles
9.	Lick Creek	Edwards
10.	Berea	Birch Tree
10a.	Walker	Walker
	General Conference Mennonite
11.	Bethel	Fortuna
	Old Order Amish Mennonite
12.	Bowling Green, North	Curryville
13.	Bowling Green, South	Curryville
14.	Green Ridge	Green Ridge
15.	Jamesport	Jamesport
	Church of God in Christ Mennonite
16.	Emmanuel (Bethany)	Rich Hill

MISSOURI
KANSAS
ILLINOIS
Mississippi
Mississippi
Missouri River
Missouri River
Osage River
Lake of the Ozarks
Kansas City
Kansas City
Mennonite Children's Home (MC)
Columbia
St. Louis
Marion County
Cass County
Morgan County
1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
10a
11
12
13
14
15
16
0 10 20 30 40 50
Scale of Miles

ty and later in Marion County. The Mount Pisgah (MC) congregation, formerly called Cherry Box, was founded in 1868 by settlers chiefly from Sterling, Ill.; in 1956 it had 48 members. A daughter congregation, Berea (MC), was settled in 1895-99 in the far south in Shannon County. In 1956 it had 25 members. A third small congregation in the Marion County area, Palmyra, founded by settlers from Lancaster County, Pa., in 1884, was dissolved in 1955, part joining the Pea Ridge congregation, which had been started about 1909 as a mission from Palmyra and in 1956 had 28 members.

In addition to the original settlements missions have been established at various places by the Mennonite Church (MC). The first was in Kansas City (Mennonite Gospel Center), dating from 1947, with 29 members. The larger Argentine church (MC) with 109 members, is on the Kansas side of the city. At Hannibal the Mission Church, now with 76 members, was started in 1934. The three additional missions in central Missouri still in existence (at Edwards, Warsaw, and Walker, started in 1939, 1949, and 1954) have a total of only about 30 members. The total membership of the Mennonite Church (MC) in Missouri in 1956 was 514.

The remaining Mennonites in Missouri consist of four Old Order Amish districts, with a total of 131 members, located in three widely scattered areas of the state (see map) and are of more recent origin. The Emmanuel Church of God in Christ congregation at Rich Hill along the Osage River, near the western border of the state, was organized in 1923; it had 93 members in 1956. The total Mennonite and Amish membership in the state in 1956 was 869. There are no Mennonite institutions in the state. H.S.B.

Missouri-Iowa Mennonite Conference (MC) was organized in 1873 (first meeting at the Bethel Church, Moniteau County, Mo., on Oct. 24, 1873) as the Mennonite Conference of Missouri, Iowa, and eastern Kansas, later extended to include the few Mennonite (MC) congregations west of Illinois in Louisiana, Texas, Minnesota, and North Dakota. When the merger and reorganization of the Mennonite and Amish Mennonite conferences west of Indiana took place in 1920-21, this conference was dissolved, and its congregations redistributed among the Missouri-Kansas (later South Central, q.v.), Iowa-Nebraska (q.v.), and Dakota-Montana (later North Central, q.v.) conferences. In 1920 the Missouri-Iowa Conference included the following 17 congregations, with a membership of 723: Missouri 434—Mount Zion at Versailles 89, Bethel at Garden City 110, Proctor 14, Palmyra 24, Pea Ridge 40, Mount Pisgah at Cherry Box 42, White Hall at Oronogo 65, Jasper 16, Oakland 17, Berea at Birch Tree 49, and five missions: Iowa 57—Liberty at South English 50, Coal Creek at What Cheer 7; Minnesota—Alpha 42; North Dakota 89—Fairview at Surrey 43, Spring Valley at Baden 46; Montana 24—Bloomfield 20, Coalridge 4; Texas—Tuleta 49; Louisiana—Lake Charles 15, Allemands 13. Among the outstanding leaders of the conference were D. D. Kauffman (d. 1896) of Versailles, J. M. Kreider (d. 1946) of Palmyra, J. R. Shank of Carver, J. D. Mininger (d. 1941) of Kansas City, and Andrew Shenk (d. 1937) of Oronogo, Mo.

The conference had a district mission board for home mission work, organized in 1898, and a Sunday school conference, organized before 1905. H.S.B.

Missouri-Kansas Mennonite (MC) Conference, formed in 1921, changed its name in 1946 to South Central Mennonite Conference (q.v.).

Mitarbeiter, Der, a monthly German periodical founded in 1906 in the interests of the Canadian Mennonite Conference and Gretna Collegiate Institute, where it was edited and published. H. H. Ewert served as editor throughout its publication. David Toews and N. W. Bahnmann served temporarily as assistant editors. In 1913 the paper had 500 readers, 230 in Manitoba and 225 in Saskatchewan. Special collections were raised to subsidize the paper.

During World War I the publication of the paper was suspended for about two years. In 1925 at the Canadian Mennonite Conference it was decided to discontinue the publication of the paper. However, H. H. Ewert continued it privately by founding a publishing company and raising the funds necessary to subsidize it. In December 1934, just before his death, the paper was discontinued. The paper had a definite influence among the Mennonites of Canada in promoting and maintaining high religious and educational standards. Major credit goes to H. H. Ewert (q.v.). C.K.

Paul J. Schaefer, Heinrich H. Ewert (Gretna, 1945) 108; "Zum Abschied," Der Mitarbeiter, December 1934; ML III, 143.

Mithelfer, a short-lived, monthly religious magazine of 32 pages, size 6 x 9 in., published from March 1926 to April 1927 with Abram Kroeker and N. N. Hiebert of Mountain Lake, Minn., as editors and owners. It was printed and mailed by the M.B. Publishing House, Hillsboro, Kan. The content of the magazine included sermon outlines, doctrinal articles, Sunday-school material, Christian dialogues, poems, editorials, and information on the current religious outlook. The first issue of some eleven hundred copies was mailed as a sample to Mennonite leaders and laymen. The actual subscription list varied between 400 and 500, and therefore the magazine proved financially impossible. A.E.J.

Mittermaier, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Ingolstadt, Bavaria, Germany, therefore called Hans (Hänslein) of Ingolstadt. He was baptized by Hans Hut (q.v.) about 1527. It is possible that he became a leader soon after his joining the brotherhood, for he was one of the participants in the Martyrs' Synod (q.v.) at Augsburg at the end of August 1527. He was sent with Leonhard Dorfbrunner (q.v.) as a missionary to Upper Austria. Dorfbrunner did not reach the field assigned him, for he was captured in Passau and died there at the stake in January 1528. Mittermaier went on to Linz (q.v.), and there served the "brotherhood in the land of the Ems" with Wolfgang Brandhuber (q.v.) after the complete destruction of the Anabaptist congregation in the town of Steyr. But his work was of short duration. In 1529 the two men with 75 members were seized in Linz, and put to death together, some by beheading and the others by burning.

In the accounts given by the Hutterite chronicle and the Martyrs' Mirror (D 24, E 433) Hans Ni(e)dermai(e)r is named as the preacher of the group, but according to the court records of Linz which were sent to the council of Augsburg, he is probably identical with Mittermaier. HEGE.

Fr. Roth, Augsburgs Reformations-Geschichte (Munich, 1901) 232, 262; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 47; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 65; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 88; ML III, 143.

Mittersill, a castle in the Austrian province of Salzburg. This medieval castle has a twofold significance in Anabaptist history. (1) It was here that the Hutterite brother Veith Grünberger (q.v.) was imprisoned while on a mission trip in 1569. The Chronicle says that he was brought to the "Schloss gen Mitterschl (Nidersol)," where he lay for five weeks before being moved to Salzburg (where he lay seven years before regaining his freedom). The dungeon where he was kept still exists; it is a foul, dark place far down without light or any provision whatsoever for human existence. A tiny opening near the ceiling served as the only connection with the outside world. (2) About 1900, Mittersill castle was modernized by a nobleman who happened to be also an outstanding book connoisseur. This nobleman (Baron Grundherr) in 1919 bought the entire collection of Hutterite codices of the library of the cathedral chapter of Bratislava (q.v.) in Slovakia, a total of 25 unique and invaluable handwritten books in excellent condition. The canons of Bratislava needed money and the Baron wanted to adorn his castle. Around 1928 the place changed hands, and the depression in the early 1930's forced the sale of the entire castle. The manuscript collection was bought by a secondhand book dealer in 1936, and was later sold by him to the City Archives and Library of Bratislava. At present (1956) this library owns a total of 29 such codices, four of them of different derivation. A description of the Mittersill collection may be found in the printed Catalog of the Cathedral Library of Bratislava by N. Knauz, made in 1870. R.F.

R. Friedmann, "Of Hutterite Books," Menn. Life VII (April 1952) 81 f. (illustrated); H. S. Bender, "Rediscovery of the Schloss Mittersill Hutterite Codices," MQR XXX (January 1956) 77; N. Knauz, A Poszonyi Kaptalannak Keziratai (Esztergom, 1870) 324 pp.; Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 483 f.

Mixed Marriage. Marriage of Mennonites with non-Mennonites was formerly more or less strictly forbidden. In the early period of Anabaptist history there was no thought of such marriage. That was the time of gathering the brotherhood and fortifying it against the pressure and persecution from the outside. The sacredness of marriage was a religious and moral obligation that was taken for granted. With righteous indignation they repudiated the charge of community of wives, which was raised again and again. Their high moral sense in the matter of marriage is obvious in the confessions of the early martyrs.

Not until the brotherhood was well established was there any proscription of mixed marriage. In Menno Simons there is no mention of it. But Dirk Philips (q.v.) speaks of it. Before him Adam Pastor (q.v.) had already concluded from the words of I Cor. 7:39, "only in the Lord," that matrimony should be concluded only with members of the brotherhood. The Brüderliche Vereinigung of Schleitheim states that one should take in marriage only a member of the "believing people."

Dirk Philips goes still further. In his booklet Concerning the Marriage of Christians (Van die Echt der Christenen) he says, "This we indeed confess, that marriage consists first of all in this, that the hearts of both persons are thus inclined, but that they do not marry unless it is pleasing to the Lord and to the brotherhood." By this measure an attempt was made to keep the church pure. By exercising an influence on the choice of a marriage partner the brotherhood could prevent the marriage of a brother or sister with someone in another branch. Not only was marriage with a member of another creed forbidden, but marriage with a member of another Mennonite wing as well.

Dirk Philips was the exponent of the strictest party. "Deut. 7:3 clearly shows how great a sin and danger to souls there is in a union between a believer and a heathen or unbeliever; for here through Moses God Himself says quite expressly that the unbelievers, the heathen daughters, will mislead the believers who have once known and accepted the truth and are inscribed in the number of the saints, so that they will be turned away from the living God to idols. A believer dare not accept any marriage other than the first one, which God instituted in Eden and was later renewed and confirmed, that is, with one man and one woman, two believers, whom God Himself joins. This is a true marriage, and from this each one who fears God can understand how unreasonable, how wrong, yea, how utterly ungodly it is to dare to act contrary to the pure, good, and holy command of the Lord. . . ." This strict concept of marriage was shared by the Mennonites in South Germany and especially of Alsace-Lorraine. The Abred (Agreement) of Strasbourg of 1568 says expressly that those who believe in the Lord shall not marry an unbeliever (Müller, 51; Gem.-Kal. 1906, 136). The Ordnungsbrief (conference decisions) for the Alsatian congregations, agreed upon at Steinselz on April 28, 1752, says in point two, "When a brother or a sister unites himself with or marries a worldly person, but with sorrow and penitence desires to be received, the request shall not be denied, but with the stipulation and on the condition that he bring with him his wife whom he has married contrary to God and His Word; if this could not happen, he must leave her, but provide for her physical needs and separate himself for the sake of the kingdom of heaven and earnestly beseech God that she may be converted and recognize the truth."

Article 8 of the Essingen Ordnungsbrief, of Nov. 22, 1779, says that "marriage shall take place with the foreknowledge and consent of the preachers and elders and when feasible of the parents, in the Lord and not with the world" (Gesch.-Bl., 1938, 53).

In all the Mennonite confessions of faith the religious and moral significance of marriage is stressed beside its divine origin, together with the requirement of agreement of faith. The Olyftacxken of 1627 says that a brother or sister may marry if he will, but only in the Lord. But God has never ordained that a believer should unite with an unbeliever, but that the Lord is angry with such and has declared that they are flesh, who refuse to let His Spirit govern their lives; therefore we discipline all who follow their carnal desire herein like other carnal sinners. The Concept of Cologne of 1591 strictly forbids mixed marriage, saying that the Scripture leaves no liberty to marry anyone except one who has become a member of the body of Christ through faith. No brotherly communion should be held with those who transgress, unless one feels their genuine penitence; they should then be admonished to keep the marriage vow faithfully, and neither to leave the mate nor to incur another marriage (Hege, 151). Also the confession of 1630 (Jan Cents) agrees that "only in the Lord" means that a believer does not have the liberty to unite himself in marriage with an unbeliever. The Dordrecht Confession of 1632, article 12, deals with marriage; "in the Lord" means that marriage may be entered into only with one in the spiritual family of God, who are united first with the church as one heart and one soul, have received one baptism and stand in one faith, doctrine, and life.

This position is still held by the Amish branch of the Mennonite brotherhood in America, as formerly in Switzerland and France. The Mennonite Church (MC) and related groups maintained this rule until into the 20th century.

A more liberal position was taken by Cornelis Ris in his confession of 1766: In order to be happy in marriage we consider it necessary wherever possible to stay within the brotherhood, in order to prevent impurity and many unpleasant consequences which often arise between persons with a different upbringing and manner of life in the training of the children and in other matters. It is therefore not only proper but also beneficial to take the advice of parents and relatives. But only in the fear of the Lord.

This is the standpoint of the Dutch and North German congregations, as well as of the Mennonites of Baden and Hesse. The prohibition of mixed marriage does not exist there. One who marries outside the brotherhood remains a member as before and loses none of the rights of membership.

In the West Prussian country congregations marriage outside the church automatically excluded one from the church. Article IX of Glaubensbekenntnis der Mennoniten in Preussen of 1895, "On Christian Marriage," says, "When a member marries outside the brotherhood, the act is regarded as a voluntary parting from the brotherhood."

The Russian Mennonites of all branches and their descendants in North America maintained the prohibition of mixed marriages. The most conservative Russian Mennonite groups in Canada, such as the Old Colony group (but also the Bergthaler), still maintain this rule and apply it to intermarriage with other Mennonite groups. (See also Marriage and Divorce.) NEFF.

A. Hunzinger, Das Religions-, Kirchen- und Schulwesen der Mennoniten oder Taufgesinnten (Speyer, 1830); Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Karlsruhe, 1908); ML III, 139 f.

Mizpah United Missionary Church, located 5½ miles southeast of Cass City, Sanilac Co., Mich., was organized Nov. 15, 1895, with a membership of nine. In 1957 L. W. Sherrard was serving as pastor, with a membership of 47. J.KI.

Möckmühl, a town (pop. 2,000) in Württemberg, Germany, at the confluence of the Seckach River with the Jagst. Since 1914 there has been a Mennonite congregation here, which had its seat formerly in Rossach (q.v.) near Schöntal (Württemberg); it was joined by members of the Lobenbach congregation when this congregation merged with the one in Heilbronn (q.v.). The Möckmühl congregation meets every two weeks in a rented hall and in 1955 had 23 members with 2 children living in six villages. It is a member of the Verband (q.v.), the conference of Baden, Württemberg, and Bavaria. (ML III, 143.) HEGE.

Moded, Herman (also called Herman Strijcker) (1530-1603), a Dutch Reformed divine. His career was very changeful. He became Reformed about 1558 and was made court chaplain and professor at the University of Copenhagen, Denmark; later he preached in Flanders; after 1567 he was preacher of the Dutch refugee church at Norwich, England. In 1572 he organized the Reformed congregation in Zierikzee, Dutch province of Zeeland. From 1580-88 he was the preacher of the Reformed congregation in Utrecht. After 1595 he lived in Middelburg (Zeeland). One of the books he published dealt with the Mennonites; it was originally written by Pieter Pauwels in Norwich; Moded corrected and enlarged it and published it with the title Grondich bericht, Van de eerste beghinselen der Wederdoopsche Seckten ende wat veelderley verscheyden tacken, een yder met zyn aert ende dryven, daer wt gesproten zyn (Middelburg, 1603). Robbert Robbertsz (q.v.) replied to it with Een cleyn briefken, tegen Harmen Modeth, Predicant (Middelburg, 1603). (N.N.B.Wb. III, 862 ff.; ML III, 143.) vdZ.

Modern Devotion (Latin, Devotio Moderna; Dutch, Moderne Devotie), a medieval revival in the Netherlands in the Roman Catholic Church of which Geert (de) Groote (Deventer, 1340-84) was the soul and animator. The movement resulted in the organization of the Brethren (q.v.) of the Common Life (Broeders des gemeenen levens) and finally also in the Windesheim monastic order, to which a number of monasteries and nunneries both in the Netherlands and Germany belonged. Though the Modern Devotion remained thoroughly Catholic—there are no traces either of deviation from Catholic doctrines or of fundamental criticism of the Catholic hierarchical system—yet this movement criticizing the immoral conduct of the clergy, particularly by the stress it laid upon Biblical piety—in pre-Reformation times the Bible was a nearly unknown book even among the clergy—created a type of new devoutness, devotia moderna, which proved to be very wholesome and of great blessing, preparing the soil for the Biblicism of Sacramentalism and Anabaptism. There are, however, no direct connections between the Modern Devotion of the 14th century and the Sacramentist-Anabaptist movement in the early 16th century. W. J. Kühler overaccentuates the influence of the Modern Devotion on Anabaptism; N. van der Zijpp holds the opinion that it had no direct influence on the rise of Anabaptism in the Netherlands. vdZ.

W. Moll, Kerkgeschiedenis van Nederland voor de Hervorming II, 2 (Arnhem, 1867) 164-78; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 24-32; L. Knappert, Het Ontstaan en de Vestiging van het Protestantisme in de Nederlanden (Utrecht, 1924) 33-52; R. R. Post, De Moderne Devotie (Amsterdam, 1940); A. Hyma, The Brethren of the Common Life (New York, 1951); N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 28.

Mödling, a town (pop. 48,000) in Lower Austria, situated at the edge of the Vienna Woods. In 1536 the Hutterian Brethren sent Georg Fasser (q.v.) and Leonhard Lanzenstiel (q.v.) as missionaries to Tirol. On April 25 they started out, but were seized two days later at Neudorf in Lower Austria "a half mile of field road" from Mödling and placed in stocks. On the next day the Mödling judge transferred them to the local prison and asked why they had been arrested. They replied, "For the sake of the divine truth and righteousness." On the way to Mödling and in the prison, which they shared with criminals, they zealously confessed their faith and defied all attempts to convert them; nor did they change their view after nearly a year of imprisonment. In prison Lanzenstiel and Fasser wrote six letters to the brotherhood in Moravia (found in a codex, division 5 of the University Library of Budapest), to which Hans Amon replied with four (found at the same place). In order to conceal the place of origin they were given peculiar place headings: "From the village where Oswald keeps house and Martl cooks," i.e., Tischlawitz; or "From the town where the kitchen is in the cellar and Walser keeps house," i.e., Gostal (Kostel). Released "by a special miracle," Fasser and Lanzenstiel hastened to Moravia, where they were received by the Brethren in the border village of Drasenhofen. Fasser died the death of a martyr in Pögstall, having been sent out again in 1537. The martyr list names four executions in Mödling, concerning which no details are known. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 143 f.

Moencopi Mennonite Mission (GCM) is located about two and one-half miles east of Tuba City, Ariz., which is a government post for the Western District of the Navaho Reservation, approximately 75 miles north of Flagstaff. Mission work was begun at Moencopi in about 1905. Among the missionaries then on the field were J. R. Duerksen, J. B. Fry, and Mary Schirmer. J. B. Fry was given charge of Moencopi mission work. The work is being carried on under the direction of the Home Missions section of the Board of Missions.

The present workers (1956) are Mr. and Mrs. Henry A. Kliewer, members of the Immanuel Mennonite Church of Downey. A church council consisting of all adult members was organized Oct. 18, 1955. It is hoped that soon a more complete organization will be formed. The work carried on at present consists of regular Sunday school and morning worship services, Sunday evening services, midweek children's classes, and adult Bible class. During the winter months special sewing classes are held for the women. Plans are being worked out for men and older boys. Visitation is a very important phase of the work. The present (1956) membership includes three Hopis, two Navahos, one Acoma, one Eskimo, and one Cherokee. H.A.K.

Moerbeek, van, a former Dutch Mennonite family found at Dordrecht, Haarlem, and Amsterdam. Adam Abrahamsz van Moerbeek (b. about 1720 at Cleve, Germany) served a few years as preacher of the Hoorn congregation on the island of Texel and 1749-d.93 at Dordrecht; he was also a noted philologist. His son Jacobus van Moerbeek studied at the Amsterdam Seminary 1778-86 and served the congregations of Wieringen 1787-92 and Huizen 1792-c. 1825. Abraham van Moerbeek, of Haarlem, studied at the Theological Seminary at Amsterdam and became a ministerial candidate in 1777. Thereupon he studied medicine at the Leiden University, obtaining his M.D. degree in 1782. Returning to Amsterdam, he served for about one year as an assistant preacher, then he resigned, devoting himself to his medical practice, but continued his service to the church by his appointment by the board as doctor of the poor. vdZ.

Naamlijst; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1701-7, 1712; N.N.B.Wb. IX, 687; DJ 1850, 85, note 1; DB 1868, 97.

Moeriaan, a former Dutch Mennonite family, found in Alkmaar and particularly in the Zaan district of the province of North Holland. Simon Poulusz Moeriaan (d. 1757), an oil miller, was a deacon of the Frisian congregation at Wormerveer. The best-known member of this family was Dirk Symonsz Moeriaan (1654-April 20, 1728) of Zaandijk. He was a merchant, owner of an oil mill, shipowner, also owner of whaling vessels, and apparently a wealthy man. Besides all these businesses he still found time to devote to the Mennonite church. In 1679 he became a preacher, and later an elder of the Waterlander congregation of Koog aan de Zaan, serving for nearly 49 years until death, at first in the Waterlander, and after its merging (1690) with the Flemish in the united congregation of Koog-Zaandijk. Dirk Symonsz' influence extended beyond his home congregation into the Waterlander Conference. Being rather conservative, it was due to his influence that his congregation and also a number of other Waterlander churches in North Holland joined the Zonist (q.v.) conference. In 1722 he and Maarten Mol (q.v.) tried to bring about a complete union between the Zonists and the Lamists, but failed to achieve it. Dirk Symonsz was often invited to preach and baptize in other congregations. In 1699 he ordained Jan de Lanoy as an elder of the congregation at Hamburg. He had been trained for the ministry by E. A. van Dooregeest (q.v.). His colleague Abr. Verduin commemorated his death in a funeral sermon, Heil in de Dood (published at Haarlem, n.d.). vdZ.

Kühler, Geschiedenis III, 8; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 909, 918, 925; II, Nos. 1429 f.; DB 1898, 88 f.; B. C. Roosen, Geschichte der Menn.-Gemeinde Hamburg I (Hamburg, 1886) 49, 61; II (1887) 10; S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 64; (J. de Lange CJzn) Beknopte Gesch. der Doopsgez. gemeente te Alkmaar (n.p., n.d.-1927) 30, 91, 97, 162.

Mohadi, M.P., India, is a village 28 miles (or 40 miles by motorable road) east-northeast of Dhamtari, a station of the American Mennonite (MC) Mission. Four acres of land for mission premises were purchased by the Mission in 1920. The mission bungalow and Christian workers' and servants' quarters were finished by 1922. R. R. Smucker and family became resident at Mohadi in 1923, and with Indian Christian workers carried on evangelistic work among the villages of the district. A small medical dispensary also was opened by the missionaries.

Mohadi was regarded as purely an evangelistic station with the missionaries free for village and home visitation work and touring. The district is large, including Bindra-Nawagarh Zamindari (a small Indian state) and a large area of villages extending west to the Dhamtari-Mohadi border and east for many miles to the border of the American Evangelical Mission territory. A church was organized with a membership of about 50 and an Indian deacon. The pastoral work was performed by the missionaries whether resident or nonresident. In 1954 the membership was 33. (ML III, 144.) G.J.L.

Moibanus, Ambrosius (1494-1554), a Lutheran divine, who is considered as the coreformer of Silesia, Germany, with Johann Hess. In his efforts to promote Luther's teachings on every hand, the Anabaptists, who had been there since 1526, and the Schwenckfelders were in his way. Both had many adherents among the nobility and in the country. Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) even dedicated his book (1527) Das ander Biechlein von der Freywilligkeit des Menschens to Frederick II, Duke of Liegnitz.

Ten years later Moibanus wrote a book which he also dedicated to the duke and which attacked the Anabaptists and the Schwenckfelders. It appeared in 1537 with the title Das herrliche Mandat Jesu Christi vnseres Herrn vnd Heilandes. Gehet hin jnn die gantze welt vnd prediget das Evangelium . . . Marci XVI. Denen zu einem vnterricht, so das Predigampt vnd die Sakrament Christi für vnnötig zur Seelen heil achten wollen, gehandelt (copy in Wolfenbüttel). The book reproaches the ruler for tolerating the two brotherhoods. The consequence of the book was a heightened persecution of the Anabaptists in Liegnitz, Brieg, and Wohlau, and their emigration to the gravure of Glatz. Now Moibanus set about to persuade Baron Johannes von Bernstein in Helfenstein not to tolerate the two groups. In this attempt he was supported by Melanchthon, who in 1541 dedicated to the baron a booklet printed in Breslau on the duty of princes. HEGE.

D. Erdmann, Luther und seine Beziehungen zu Schlesien, insbesondere zu Breslau (Schriften des Vereins für Ref.-Gesch.) 1887; P. Konrad, Dr. Ambrosius Moibanus (Schriften des Vereins für Ref.-Gesch.) 1891; ML III, 144.

Mol, a former Dutch Mennonite family, many of whose members served the church as deacons and preachers. An important branch of this family lived at Jisp (q.v.), province of North Holland. In the Waterlander congregation of Jisp (or Wormer-Jisp) Maarten Jansz Mol and Jacob Jansz Mol were preachers about 1675. Jan Maartensz Mol of Jisp, who died before 1697, apparently a son of Maarten Jansz Mol and preacher of the same congregation, was the author of a much-used catechetical booklet, Kort Onderwys des Christelyken Geloofs (Amsterdam, 1697, repr. 1698, 1710, 1723, 1740). His son Maarten Jansz Mol, of Jisp, was an elder of the Wormer-Jisp congregation, serving from about 1700 until at least 1731. He must have been a wealthy man, as most members of this Jisp branch were. He was the owner of an oil mill, at the same time participating in whaling; in 1701-31 he sent 41 whaling boats to Greenland and 1732-33 two vessels to Davis Street. Pieter Pietersz Mol, living about the same time at Jisp, and likely related to the former, became a deacon of the church in 1695 and was probably the author of Nutte Zamenspraak tusschen een Geestelyke en een Wereldling (Amsterdam, 1741). This Pieter Mol was also an important owner of whaling boats. In 1700-8 he sent 34 vessels to the whaling grounds near Greenland, and in 1709-19 together with his son Jan Mol 47. The members of this Jisp Mol family were rather conservative in their religious opinions, and though they were members of the Waterlander congregation they were much in sympathy with the Zonist (q.v.) principles.

There are, besides the Jisp branch of this Mol family, a number of Mennonite preachers bearing the same family name, of whom it could not be decided, whether and in what way they were related with the Jisp family.

Jan Pietersz Mol served at Alkmaar about 1720; Jan Pietersz Mol (the same person?) was preacher of the congregation of Almelo 1731-41. In 1740 he was invited to Danzig, West Prussia, to reconcile the quarreling parties in the Danzig Flemish congregation and to restore peace. Mol, however, did not go (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2656). Other preachers of this name were Willem Mol, serving at Winterswijk 1739-45 and Zuid-Zijpe 1745-48 (?), whose father Nicolaas Mol also seems to have been a Mennonite preacher or elder. Cornelis (Jacobsz) Mol, a native of Wormer, was in 1743 an assistant preacher at Krommenie; Pieter Mol served the congregation of Enkhuizen 1787-89 and Hoorn 1789-d.1804. Hendrik Jansz Mol, from about 1735 until about 1762 a preacher of the Old Flemish congregation at Blokzijl, was not related to the former.

These preachers were all lay preachers, not having received a special training for the ministry. vdZ.

Naamlijst, passim; Kühler, Geschiedenis III, 8; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 918, 925; II, No. 1429; DB 1898, 88; Marten Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745) 68, 69; information from J. Aten at Wormerveer (descendant of Maarten Jansz Mol.)

Mol, de, Mennonites from Antwerp, Belgium, later found in Hamburg, Germany. Pieter de Mol fled from Antwerp with his sister Pereira de Mol and her husband François Noë before 1600. In 1621 a Jan de Mol was chosen as a deacon of the Old Flemish congregation on Achterburgwal at Amsterdam. vdZ.

B. C. Roosen, Geschichte der Menn.-Gemeinde Hamburg, (Hamburg, 1886) 10 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 5.

Molalla Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located at Molalla, Ore., a member of the Pacific Coast Conference, was organized with 40 members in 1935, when Joe Yoder was ordained as minister for the congregation, largely out of a number of Swedish converts who had been members of the Hopewell Mennonite Church. At first a hall at an unsatisfactory location near the rodeo stadium was used, but in 1937 a meetinghouse was built on Third Street. When the Sweet Home congregation was organized in 1939 about half of the Molalla membership united with this group. From that time on the membership declined seriously. When Yoder left for Arizona in 1945 J. S. Roth was made minister in charge. In 1951 the work was closed. (ML III, 144.) H.S.B.

Molanus, Jacobus Gualterus (Jacob Wouter Molenaar), and four other Reformed ministers on the Dutch island of Texel in 1649 had Claas Arentsz, the Mennonite elder of Nieuwe-Zijpe, arrested, because during a baptismal service on Texel he had spoken disparagingly of infant baptism. Arentsz had to dispute with Molanus and his colleagues. The dispute was broken off, but after a few weeks continued. Then Arentsz was assisted by three Mennonite preachers of Amsterdam, one of whom was Galenus Abrahamsz. After these disputations Molanus published Christen-Kinder-doops-Waerheijdt, voorafgegaan door een: Corte sommarische ende oprecht verhaal van de handelinghe ende 't samensprekinghe der Gereformeerden Praedicanten in't eylandt Texel met Claas Arentz, Menniste Bisschop uit de Nieuwe Zijp met meer andere Bisschoppen ende vermaanders . . . (1650). An unknown author calling himself J.G.L.V.C.W.M.D. (apparently the initials of a motto) answered with Christelycke Antwoort op het Boeck J. Molani, ghenaamt Christen-Kinder-doops-Waerheydt (Amsterdam, 1650). Neither the book by Molanus nor the reply is at present extant. vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 195-97; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 39 f., 200, note 27.

Molenaar family. Hessel Ockes (d. 1720), a Mennonite at Workum, Dutch province of Friesland, had a son Hylke Hessels (1703-75), married to Anke Wopkes Knoop of Bolsward. Hylke inherited a "molen" (sawmill) from his father; hence his family name became Molenaar. His son Claes Hylkes Molenaar inherited the mill in 1774. Another son was Wopko (Wopke) Hylkes Molenaar (q.v.), minister at Crefeld and ancestor of the Crefeld branch of the family. A son of his was Isaak Molenaar I (q.v.), also minister at Crefeld, and a grandson Johannes Molenaar (q.v.), minister at Monsheim. Isaak Molenaar I had a son Isaak (II), and Isaak (II) had a son Isaak (III). They were all Mennonite preachers. A grandson of Johannes was Heinrich Molenaar (q.v.). Two brothers of Isaak Molenaar I, Nicolaus (1778-1840) and Jacob (1788-1816), in 1812 founded the oldest bank at Crefeld. The only son of Nicolaus, Gustav Wilhelm (1811-64), followed his father in the bank. Most prominent of his 13 children were Alfred (1841-1922), Emil (1851-1929), and Willy (q.v., 1852-1921), the latter being the founder of the Berlin Mennonite Church. Alfred was also a banker and held honorary positions in the civil administration of Crefeld. W.Ri., vdZ.

Die "Heimat" (Crefeld) IV (1925) 189-96; Rheinisch-Westfälische Bank in Krefeld, früher Deutsche Bank 1901-1951; DB 1903, 110.

Molenaar, Heinrich (1870-), a grandson of Johannes Molenaar (q.v.), was born at Zweibrücken, Germany, June 16, 1870, planned to follow in the footsteps of his Mennonite ancestors, but finally decided to study modern languages in preparation for teaching. His first and—as he was fond of saying—favorite position was at the Weierhof (q.v.) school under Ernst Göbel, whom he regarded with respect. He also taught at schools in Kaiserslautern, Weissenburg in Baden, Nürnberg, Bayreuth, Darmstadt, Neustadt a.d.Weinstrasse, and Munich. Besides his duties as a teacher he was actively and sacrificially engaged in the solution of social and philosophical problems. To develop life physically as well as spiritually and mentally in accord with the laws of God was a special interest of the teacher Molenaar.

He was therefore widely known as an opponent of vaccination and the use of tobacco. He gave many public addresses, wrote articles for periodical literature and pamphlets to promote his views. Some of these were his lectures on Comte's Positivism: Die Religion der Menschheit, and Positive Weltanschauung. He created a universal language, and founded the Franco-German league in which he worked long before World War I to improve understanding between the two countries. In the fields of music and poetry Molenaar's warmth found varied expression and form. The sonnet was the form he used most successfully. Two volumes of verse were Kriegsgedichte (Bayreuth, 1914), and Geharnischte und friedliche Sonette (Frankfurt, 1931).

Heinrich Molenaar was by nature a fighter. Even where one can not agree with him his friends recognize that in his blood lay something of the inheritance from the old Anabaptist forebears, which was devoted to building up society in a narrower or wider circle. (ML III, 144.) G.Go.

Molenaar, Isaak, I (1776-1834), a Mennonite minister, was born on Sept. 3, 1776, at Crefeld, Germany, the son of Wopko Molenaar (q.v.), studied at the Mennonite Seminary in Amsterdam (1794-99) and at the University of Jena, where he met Schiller in the home of Johann Jakob Griesbach, a professor of theology. Schiller mentions him with honor in his letters to Wilhelm von Humboldt, suggesting Molenaar for the position of tutor to the Humboldt sons.

Molenaar completed his studies at Amsterdam. In 1804 he was called as preacher to Zutphen, in 1806 to Groningen, in 1808 to Zaandam-West, in 1814 to Leiden, where he was on friendly terms with his old friend of student days, now Professor Siegenbeek (q.v.), and the professors van Voorst, van der Palm, Kemper, Borger, and Willem Bilderdijk, a conservative who lectured in history and who mentioned Molenaar's intellect and scholarship with praise. The sermon he preached at Leiden on Oct. 3, 1814, to commemorate the relief of Leiden was published: Kerkelijke Aanspraak ter viering van Leiden's ontzet (n.p., n.d.).

In 1818 Molenaar was called to Crefeld. He preached his first sermon there on Oct. 18 and continued his fruitful work for 16 years, until his death on April 19, 1834. A volume of his sermons was published in 1836 with a biographical foreword by Professor Sack of the University of Bonn (see Crefeld). A collection of his sermons, entitled Leerredenen (Amsterdam, 1836), was published in the Dutch language by van der Palm, Siegenbeek, and Muller.

An interesting estimate of Molenaar's character is given by Princess Wilhelmine of Prussia: "In Cleve I had the pleasure of meeting the Mennonite preacher Molenaar, whom I had learned to love long ago through a splendid sermon which dear old Pastor Reuss gave me on the words 'Maria-Rabbuni.' Unfortunately he is very sickly, but all love, gentleness, and humility—and so simple!" Of interest is also his correspondence with Willem de Clerq (q.v.), published in the Mennonitische Blätter (1916, 74, and 1918, 4 and 12).

In an article, "Izaäk Molenaar aan Willem de Clercq" (DB 1911, 63-92), C. B. Hylkema calls him one of the forerunners and fathers of the Dutch Réveil (1830-50). As a Pietist he occupied a very unusual position among the Dutch Mennonites, shared by few—Willem Messchert (q.v.) of Rotterdam, Jan ter Borg (q.v.) of Amsterdam, and Doyer of Texel—where the Mennonite preachers in general had adopted a rationalistic Christianity. In this respect certainly he was a unique personality for his time. NEFF.

W. Bauer, "Prinzess Wilhelmine von Preussen," 246, taken from Menn. Bl. 1911, 37; N.N.B.Wb. IV, 998; DJ 1837, 36; DB 1901, 4; 1911, 62 ff.; S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 161, 164-66; ML III, 145 f.

Molenaar, Isaak, II (1813-91), a Dutch Mennonite minister, son of Isaak Molenaar I, was born at Crefeld, Germany, in 1813, died at Zwolle, Jan. 12, 1891. After studying at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, he served the congregation of Irnsum, Dutch province of Friesland, 1837-78. His advice to divide the united congregation of Irnsum-Poppingewier into two separate congregations was published at Irnsum in 1870 (Aan de leden der Doopsgezinde Gemeente). (ML III, 146.) vdZ.

Molenaar, Isaak, III (1848-1935), a Dutch Mennonite minister, a son of Isaak Molenaar II, was born at Irnsum, Dutch province of Friesland, on Dec. 7, 1848, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary 1868-73; served as preacher in Berlikum 1872-75; in Almelo 1875-77; in West Zaandam 1877-1914; retired on June 21, 1914, and died on Oct. 12, 1935. After his resignation a collection of his sermons, entitled Preeken (Amsterdam, 1915), was published by the church board of Zaandam. In 1897 he published a study on S. Hoekstra Bzn, entitled Professor Hoekstra (Haarlem, 1897); he also wrote the articles "Hoekstra" and "Opzoomer" in the Realenzyklopaedie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, third edition. D. Attema wrote a sketch of his life and work in the Zondagsbode, Oct. 20, 1935. (ML III, 146.) NEFF.

Molenaar, Johannes (1810-68), a German Mennonite minister, was born at Zaandam in Holland, Oct. 27, 1810, spent his youth in Crefeld, Germany, where his father Isaak Molenaar I (q.v.) served the Mennonite congregation as pastor, attended the Gymnasium in Kreuznach, studied theology at the University of Bonn, married Alwine Beindorff, a highly educated woman, poet and composer, in 1836 became preacher of the Mennonite congregation at Monsheim (q.v.) and made his influence felt far beyond the confines of his parish.

With his fellow ministers Jakob Ellenberger (q.v.) of Friedelsheim and Johann Risser (q.v.) of Sembach he was in close fraternal sympathy. Together they compiled a ministers' manual (q.v.) in 1852 and a hymnal (q.v.) in 1854, which latter was principally his work. He drew Albert Knapp (q.v.) of Stuttgart into collaboration. He also worked out a catechism (q.v.) in 1841, which he published in a new edition in 1854 and which in shortened form is still in use in the congregations of the Palatinate and Hesse.

In addition Johannes Molenaar published a collection of sermons, for every Sunday and church holiday, with the title Evangelische Stimmen (1884), and also Andenken an die beiden heiligen Tage der Taufe und der ersten Abendmahlsfeier. He also translated some of the popular writings of his brother-in-law J. de Liefde (q.v.) from the Dutch: Des Christen Einnahme und Ausgabe, for the benefit of the rescue home at Hassloch in the Palatinate, Der Sträfling, and other stories.

Molenaar was active in the founding of the rescue home at Rockenhausen in the Palatinate. He was well acquainted with a number of Protestant ministers, as Ohly, Helferich, and Mallet. W. H. Riehl (q.v.), author and professor of cultural history, was a frequent guest in his home, and gave him this tribute: "Among the educated preachers of the Mennonites there are, by the way, men before whose scholarship and education the light of many a Catholic and Protestant divine may be as dim as a street light in Westrich." He was also a personal friend of Hermann von Beckerath (q.v.) and Heinrich von Gagern, minister of state.

Johannes Molenaar was an enthusiastic sponsor of the Evangelical Alliance (q.v.), and took part in their meetings in Berlin (1857) and Geneva (1861). He was also a loyal co-worker on the Mennonitische Blätter (q.v.). His description of a trip in Switzerland is particularly interesting (Menn. Bl., 1861 and 1862).

Molenaar's work at Monsheim was not without its difficulties. In 1838 a part of the congregation, dissatisfied with his preaching, left Monsheim and joined the Ibersheim congregation. In his family life he endured great sorrow. His wife was afflicted with a long nervous illness until her death in 1865. His strength was broken. He had to have an assistant. Three years later, on Oct. 19, 1868, he died. Upon his death Christian Böhmer, a Protestant minister, wrote a warm poem, and a member of his congregation also wrote a poem, Denkmal der Liebe (Monument of Love). (Menn. Bl., 1870, 14.)

NEFF.

J. Ellenberger, Bilder aus dem Pilgerleben II (n.p., 1783); DB 1868, 1-5; W. H. Riehl, Die Pfälzer, Ein rheinisches Volksbild (Stuttgart, 1858) 375; Allgemeine lutherische Kirchenzeitung, No. 166, Oct. 30, 1839; ML III, 145; DB 1868, 1, 3 f., 5; 1886, 16.

Molenaar, Willy (1852-1921), a lay leader of the Berlin Mennonite Church, was born on Nov. 18, 1852. He was a descendant of the Crefeld branch of the family; his father was a grandson of Wopko Molenaar (q.v.), a nephew of Isaak Molenaar (q.v.) of Crefeld, and a cousin of Johannes Molenaar (q.v.). Like his grandfather Nikolaus and his father Gustav, Wilhelm was a banker, in partnership with his brother Rudolf, in the Molenaar banking firm. In 1900 he was made director of the Augusta Insurance Company, but had to retire after a few years because of a hearing difficulty. In 1883 he married Maria von Beckerath, a Mennonite of Crefeld. In his parental home he had learned to love music and the arts; he was a collector of paintings (sale on Nov. 13, 1906) and helped to found the German Art Association in Berlin. He took an active part in the political, economic, and artistic life of his time. But he was also devotedly interested in the Mennonite brotherhood, sparing no pains or money to promote it. He was a member of the first curatorium of the Vereinigung (q.v.), which he had helped to organize. Until 1907, when he was forced to withdraw on account of eye trouble, he was chairman of the Berlin congregation, and remained an honorary chairman until his death, on Dec. 29, 1921. Many an article (Menn. Bl., 1911-16) shows his interest in following Bernhard Brons as a link between the intellectual life of the time and his brotherhood. The medal struck for the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Berlin congregation upon his suggestion bore the inscription, "Gott die Ehre, frei die Lehre." E.C.

E. Harder, Festschrift zur Feier des 25-jährigen Bestehens der Berliner Mennonitengemeinde (Berlin, 1912); Menn. Bl., passim; ML, III, 146.

Molenaar, Wopke (Wopco, Wopko) (1739-94), a German Mennonite preacher, was born Sept. 30, 1739, at Workum, Dutch province of Friesland, the son of Hylke Hessels, owner of a large sawmill. He studied at the Lamist (q.v.) seminary in Amsterdam, served at Franeker 1767-70, and in 1770 became the first theologically educated preacher of the Mennonite congregation in Crefeld. An endowment from the von der Leyen family (1766) enabled the Crefeld congregation to request the seminary to send a trained preacher. Molenaar and Sino van Abbema came. Van Abbema served in Crefeld 1771-88. The funeral address given by Molenaar at the burial of the last lay preacher, Wynand Peter Wynandsz (1777), indicates that the transition from the lay to a salaried ministry was not easy for either the congregation or the minister. Especially the spiritualistic circles appear to have remained aloof, probably in view of the "enlightened" position of the new preachers. That Molenaar was rationalistic is proved by his membership in the "enlightened" circle of Engelbert von Bruck. Wopke Molenaar was married to Hester Tirion, of Crefeld. He was the progenitor of the Molenaar family in Crefeld. He died on April 27, 1794. D.C.

K. Rembert, "Zur Geschichte der Crefelder Familie Molenaar," Heimat IV, 189 ff.; Beiträge zur Geschichte rheinischer Mennoniten (Schriftenreihe des Mennonitischen Geschichtsvereins, No. 2, 1939); Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2350; ML III, 146 f.

Molkwerum, a small village of scarcely 200 inhabitants in the southwest corner of the Dutch province of Friesland, was once the seat of a very large Mennonite congregation, of whose history not much is known. The congregation dates from the middle of the 16th century or even before. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 39 persons here in 1551-54, 19 or 21 in 1557-61, and 36 in 1563-65, a total of 94 or 96 within 14 years. Soon the congregation must have increased greatly. One can hardly imagine that in this picturesque little hamlet at the beginning of the 17th century there were more than 1,000 Mennonites in three or four congregations, the largest of them being Waterlander (formerly Young Frisian) with 407 baptized members about 1600. In 1650, when the membership comprised 174 men and 233 women, it was decided to build a new church, commonly called the Groote Vermaning. This was a period of prosperity derived from shipping (it must have been in this period when 70 Molkwerum ships lay at the dock in Riga on the Baltic at one time). The Mennonites at this time made large contributions to Mennonites in other countries. In 1672, though trade was weakened by war, an offering of 259 guilders was raised for Swiss Mennonites. The war with England during this period seriously hampered the Mennonite shipping industry. Their preachers had to keep reminding the members that the weapons of their warfare were not carnal but spiritual; one shipper who had armed his boat was expelled from membership. The Waterlander congregation was served by lay preachers until 1808; among them was Harmen Reynskes (q.v.), serving here 1690-94, later preacher of the Amsterdam Zonist congregation, whose progressive ideas, considered Socinian (q.v.) by the conservative members, nearly caused a schism in the Molkwerum congregation.

At the beginning of the 18th century Molkwerum suffered the decline in trade affecting all the shipping towns on the Zuiderzee. The Mennonite congregations of Molkwerum also decreased rapidly. In 1695, when both the Groote Vermaning and the Kleine Vermaning joined the F.D.S. (Conference of Friesland), their membership numbered 167 and 97 baptized members. The union of the large group (Waterlander) with the smaller one (Flemish, commonly called Kleine Vermaning) in 1732 did little good; the combined congregation then numbered scarcely 200 members. All sorts of other factors contributed to the decline; a division in 1755-67, and in the 18th century a conflict between a more liberal preacher and a conservative one, difficulty with the Reformed clergy, and finally trouble with the authorities (in 1705 the congregation had to surrender to the Reformed congregation a considerable legacy, which had been left to the Mennonites). In 1838 there were only 20 members left.

Until 1797 the congregation was served by lay preachers chosen from the members. The last of these preachers was Nanne Jans, who served 1755-d.97. After Cornelis Gerbens van Grouw, a lay preacher called in from outside the congregation who served here 1796-1806, the Molkwerum congregation in 1808 joined the neighboring one of Hindeloopen (q.v.) in supporting a (trained) pastor; in 1873 Molkwerum joined the congregation of Stavoren (q.v.) for the same purpose. The membership, which had risen to 55 in 1910, in 1939 was 29. Wijtse S. van der Zijpp was treasurer 1867-1909. In 1921 a new church was built. On May 16, 1948, when there were only 12 members left, they decided to merge with the congregation of Warns (q.v.), only two miles from Molkwerum. Thereupon the small meetinghouse was sold. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 295; Blaupot t. C., Friesland, passim; Naamlijst 1808, 77; DB 1874, 86 f., 142; 1895, 105-16; 1900, 228; 1903, 81, 91; De Zondagsbode XXIV (1910-11) No. 3; ML III, 147.

Mollem (Mullem), van, a former Dutch Mennonite family, of Flemish origin, stemming from Mollem near Gent, Belgium, or Molhem near Brussels, during 17th-18th centuries members of the Flemish congregation at Amsterdam, where some of them were deacons. As early as 1573 a Dierck Mullem (or van Mollem) is found at Rotterdam, where he was a book printer (Rotterdamsch Jaarboekje, 1931). In 1582 he published the hymnal by Hans de Ries. He was probably an emigrant from Flanders and a Mennonite. Mathijs van Mollem (d. Oct. 24, 1689) was a preacher of the Flemish congregation at Rotterdam ca. 1655-86. To this family also belonged Jacob van Mollem (b. 1623), a merchant of Amsterdam, who in 1681 founded a silk factory at Utrecht, which was managed by him and later his son David van Mollem (1670-1746). Their luxurious country seat "Zijdebalen" near Utrecht, built in 1693 and in 1719 enlarged with splendid parks adorned with a large number of beautiful statues, had a wide reputation (see N.N.B.Wb. III, 876, and S. Müller Fzn, "Zijdebalen" in Bouwkunst 1912, repr.). Both Jacob van Mollem, married to Maria Sijdervelt, and David, married to Jacoba van Oosterwijck, were faithful Mennonites.

It could not be ascertained whether Corijn (Krijn) van Mollem (who is confused with Krijn or Quirin Vermeulen in ML III, 119), a Mennonite of Flemish descent living in Danzig, West Prussia, who in August 1612 perished during his attempt to make gold (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2925, 2927, 2935) was related to the above van Mollems. vdZ.

Möller, A. von (Angelica von Lagerström) (d. 1879), author of popular and juvenile German literature 1846-61, taught foreign languages in Danzig, 1850-52 in Königsberg, then having been expelled from the city as a member of a free church was housekeeper in the home of Gottfried Kinkel in London, returned to Königsberg in 1864, where she died on Nov. 20, 1879. In 1851 she published a popular book titled Die Mennoniten. The story is centered around Danzig during and after the siege of 1813 and has as its theme the young man concerning whom Bishop Eylert (q.v.) wrote, and who was the hero of Wildenbruch's Menonit. On the whole the treatment differs from Wildenbruch's and the attitude toward the Mennonites is much friendlier. E.C.

S. Pataky, Lexikon deutscher Frauen der Feder (Berlin, 1898, under both names); J. N. Weisfert, Biographisch-litterarisches Lexikon für . . . Königsberg und Ostpreussen (Königsberg, 1898); ML III, 147.

Möller (Müller), Georg, an Anabaptist martyr from Schönau near Zwickau, Germany, joined the Anabaptists after hearing sermons by Georg Köhler (q.v.) in Riestedt near Sangerhausen and by Heinz Kraut (q.v.) in March 1535. He was baptized by Heinz Kraut on July 10 with his brother Jobst Möller (q.v.) in the home of Georg Knoblauch behind the cathedral in Halberstadt (q.v.). He began at once to preach repentance (Jacobs, 469) in the vicinity of Riestedt. He was seized with Georg Köhler on the morning of Sept. 2, 1535, and taken to the prison in Sangerhausen, where an Anabaptist woman, Petronella, was detained. Two days later Köhler and Möller were subjected singly to a lengthy cross-examination by the Catholic authorities. The bailiff Philipp Reibitzsch reported at once to George, Duke of Saxony (q.v.), with the comment that he was greatly surprised by their free confession of their faith and the frank answers to the questions asked them; the presence of the executioner had not intimidated them (Thüringen, 130 and 392).

The answers, published by Eduard Jacobs from the court records (pp. 496-508), give important information on the history of the Anabaptist movement in Central Germany. Georg Köhler, in answer to the question how he had come to join the Anabaptists, said that he had first been admonished by Georg Knoblauch—whose wife Greta Knoblauch (q.v.) had been executed in April 1534 at Sangerhausen, and with whom he had been baptized six months later by Heinz Kraut—to turn to God, be obedient to Him, repent, and deny the world, pride, and drunkenness. Georg Möller had also been deeply influenced by Knoblauch, whose house in Halberstadt was long an Anabaptist center.

As in other countries, the Anabaptists in Saxony were suspected of seditious intentions. Köhler declared that they had made no conspiracy against the government, that God had ordained government, and killing was forbidden in the Ten Commandments (Jacobs, 504). And Möller said in reply to the question as to the whereabouts of his brethren that God's followers were all beloved of Him and were ready to endure all persecution for God's sake (Jacobs, 472).

The Anabaptists put great stress on clean moral living, as is shown by their statements on marriage. Among them marriage was not begun with excessive eating, drinking, and pride, as is the usage in the world. "By their simple and moral conduct," writes Jacobs, "they stand high above the unrefined generation of their day, in many cases sunken in gluttony and drunkenness. . . . It is indeed no trifling matter that our friends of God could say that they tolerated no adulterer, gambler, or glutton, nor any with an undisciplined or evil life and conduct in their brotherhood; they were not permitted to speak ill or laugh in derision at anyone" (Jacobs, 485 and 529).

The questioning on doctrinal points covered infant baptism, original sin, confession of faith, communion, confessional, and forgiveness of sin. Baptism they regarded as the covenant of a good conscience with God, which an infant cannot enter into. Infants are not tainted by original sin or any other kind of sin. God has instilled a clean spirit into them. It is therefore not possible that they could be in the power of the devil whom the parson must drive out. God has not granted the devil so much power over a child that has done no wrong. Concerning communion both repeated what they had been taught by Heinz Kraut, who later became a martyr in Jena, "that God is a living God and a spirit, over whom no man has any power." Therefore, declared Köhler, he did not believe that in the form of the bread the body of God was concealed or was pure flesh and blood. Möller answered that he did not believe that God would permit Himself to be transformed into bread by a priest or a sinful man. In reply to the question of what benefit communion was to them Möller replied that it was of no special benefit; he thought that as the grain of wheat must suffer much before it becomes bread, so also a disciple of Jesus must suffer much before he becomes a real Christian (Jacobs, 508). Communion they regarded as a meal of the covenant which obligated them to faithful discipleship. That included being willing to give up home, property, wife, and child, indeed even life (Jacobs, 475, 500, 503, and 507). Asked about the confessional and absolution Köhler said that he placed no value on the forgiveness of sin as the church taught it. Nobody was able to forgive sin except those sins which his neighbor had committed against him. The forgiving of sins pertained to God alone. To that end He did not need a man, but required a penitent heart.

The records state that Köhler had answered freely without the use of the rack and had in conclusion declared that he would adhere to his opinion, come what might. Likewise Möller said he would adhere to his confession of faith, hoping that God would strengthen and illumine him in doing so. Albrecht, Cardinal of Mainz, on Sept. 24, 1535, advised Duke George to have them beheaded and also to put Petronella to death unless she recanted, as soon as the consent of the council of Quedlinburg and the official of Sachsenberg arrived, since Petronella had been baptized in his district by schoolmaster Alexander, who had already been martyred, "that such an unchristian undertaking be seriously punished and eradicated" (Thüringen, 130).

The arrest of these two men led to further executions, also under Lutheran authority, since they named their brethren when asked to do so. John, the young Duke of Saxony, had in the absence of his father sent the records of the trials to Cardinal Albrecht, administrator of Halberstadt, with the request to seize the Anabaptists named by the prisoners and try them, "that we may see behind their intrigues" (Jacobs, 519). The Anabaptists who remained steadfast were drowned by order of the cardinal at Gröningen near Halberstadt (Jacobs, 536). HEGE.

Eduard Jacobs, "Die Wiedertäufer am Harz," in Ztscht des Harz-Vereins für Gesch. und Altertumskunde XXXII (1899) 422-536; P. Wappler, Inquisition und Ketzerprozesse in Zwickau zur Ref.-Zeit (Leipzig, 1908); idem, Thüringen; ML III, 147 f.

Möller (Müller), Heinrich, an Anabaptist martyr from Schönau near Zwickau, Germany. With his brothers Georg (q.v.) and Jobst (q.v.) he joined the brotherhood in the spring of 1535. He was married to Anna Wedekind, the daughter of the martyr Greta Knoblauch (q.v.) from her first marriage; Anna had been baptized by Heinz Kraut (q.v.) in November 1534 in her stepfather's home with her sister Ursula and her brother Hans (Jacobs, 440) seven months after her mother's execution. After his marriage Heinrich Möller moved to Eisleben.

On Nov. 20, 1535, an Anabaptist meeting at Hans Peissker's (q.v.) mill at Kleineutersdorf in Saxon territory was surprised and 16, including Heinrich and Anna, were taken and cross-examined. The report to the ducal council at Weimar said that Heinrich Möller placed no value on "our sacrament" (Thüringen, 398). With his father-in-law Heinrich was then taken to Neustadt on the Orla, where Lutheran clergymen endeavored to convert them (Thüringen, 140 and 151), as was reported to John Frederick, Elector of Saxony (q.v.), "to move them to desist from their seditious and unchristian articles and conduct" (Thüringen, 414). Since the content of the articles of examination was not sent to the elector, he sent the minister of Neustadt and other scholars to re-examine the prisoners and to write up the statements and confessions of each separately and present them to him (Thüringen, 415).

The prisoners were then subjected to further questioning concerning their faith by scholars in the presence of the council of Neustadt and the bailiff of Arnshaugk. Their statements were sent to the professors of the University of Wittenberg (who had gone to Jena to escape the plague) who were to send their opinion with the records to the elector (Thüringen, 422). There are no records of Heinrich's statements. Since he was not amenable to the teaching of the divines he was beheaded at Neustadt (Wappler, Inquisition, 112). His father-in-law and his wife recanted and were released with the penalty of church penance (Thüringen, 422). HEGE.

Eduard Jacobs, "Die Wiedertäufer am Harz," in Ztscht des Harz-Vereins für Gesch. und Altertumskunde XXXII (1899); P. Wappler, Inquisition und Ketzerprozesse in Zwickau zur Reformationszeit, 1908; idem, Thüringen; ML III, 148 f.

Möller (Müller), Jobst, an Anabaptist martyr from Schönau near Zwickau, Germany, was baptized with his brother Georg Möller (q.v.) in the home of Georg Knobloch (q.v., also Knoblauch) at Halberstadt on July 10, 1535, by Heinz Kraut (q.v.). Three weeks later Möller married Ursula Wedekind, a daughter of the martyr Greta Knobloch (q.v.) from her first marriage. Ursula's first husband had been executed in 1534 in Frankenhausen. (Thüringen, 127.) The marriage was of short duration. On Nov. 20, 1535, Jobst and Ursula were taking part in a meeting of Anabaptists in the home of the miller Hans Peissker (q.v.) at Kleineutersdorf near Orlamünde in Saxony (q.v.), which was disbanded by Peter Wolfram, bailiff of the Leuchtenburg. As the catchpolls closed in on them the little group began to sing the Luther hymn, "Nun bitten wir den Heiligen Geist," and cried to God to help them to be firm. Sixteen persons were taken to the Leuchtenburg, including Jobst Möller and his wife, Hans Peissker, Heinz Kraut, Heinrich Möller (q.v.) and his wife, and Georg Knobloch. On the way to prison they sang religious songs and called to the curious onlookers in the villages they passed through to repent. In the Leuchtenburg they were at once cross-examined. When asked what they thought of the sacrament (communion) all the prisoners said they did not agree with the Lutheran doctrine.

Since the prison was not large enough for 16, and a guard of 12 men would have been required, the men were divided between Jena, Kahla, Neustadt on the Orla, and the Arnshaugk castle, while the women remained at the Leuchtenburg. Jobst Möller, Heinz Kraut, and Lorenz (Hilarius) Petsch were taken to Jena (q.v.). Here they were questioned on Dec. 1 and 6 in the presence of the mayor and several members of the city council by Philip Melanchthon (q.v.), Kaspar Cruciger (q.v.), and the city pastor Anton Musa (q.v.) concerning their doctrinal position, including the Trinity, communion, forgiveness of sin, and baptism, as well as on civil matters such as community of goods, government, oath, and marriage. They said they had had no connections with the Münsterites, and could therefore say anything, either good or bad, about them.

Lorenz Petsch, who stemmed from Emseloh near Sangerhausen, and, as Melanchthon reported, had lived in villages where the Gospel was not preached and had consequently received no instruction, was separated from the rest. He had not yet been baptized and was from the beginning of the examination inclined to recant; he escaped from prison the day before the others were put to death.

The statements made by Jobst Möller, Heinz Kraut, and Hans Peissker have been published from the court records in Corpus Reformatorum II. Though the brief summary does not always correctly interpret the meaning, it nevertheless affords an insight into the principal doctrines of the Anabaptists in Saxony.

Concerning the doctrine of the Trinity they said, according to the text of the court record: "God the Father must be seen in omnipotence, the Son in righteousness, and the Spirit in kindness. Likewise they confess the eternal Deity of Christ together with the humanity He assumed, in which He suffered; they say nothing wrong about the two natures in Christ; but they say they are not educated and cannot talk much on these high articles." On the question as to how they had received pardon for their sin, the record gives their reply, "They must sincerely ask for forgiveness and must thereafter walk in righteousness, believe and trust God's Word, do the will of the Father, and the sins would be forgiven. In short, one must practice truth and righteousness." "Concerning the sacrament of baptism they say, infant baptism is not commanded, and all children are saved, whether of Christians, heathen, or Turks. God is not such a God that He would damn an infant on account of a little water; for all His creatures are good. And they deny original sin in children, for they have not willed to sin, but only when man is grown and sins voluntarily does original sin become valid. . . . The children are of the kingdom of heaven . . . and even if they sin it does not harm them, for they do not yet know what is good or what is bad" (Corp. Ref. II, 995, 999, and 1000).

Melanchthon at once reported to John, Elector of Saxony (q.v.), the results of the examination, but does not quite do justice to their statements on civil matters. The brief summary of these statements gives the impression that Heinz Kraut and his companions rejected all government and taught that "Christians should have no government at all except the preachers" (Corp. Ref., 1004), and "a Christian can not be a ruler, who punishes with the sword," while according to the court record Heinz Kraut declared that "if the government deprived him of his faith he must not obey it. For he had only one Lord, God alone. He left his former government because it had interfered with his conscience. But he recognized government that rewards the good and punishes the wicked, and gives it whatever it requires. But neither he nor his brethren could assume the responsibility of government. To preach the Gospel no government permission is needed, but only the consent of his brethren and those who accept the Word" (Corp. Ref. II, 1000 f.). The statements of the prisoners on property rights are quoted in Melanchthon's report as a rejection of all personal possession and the requirement of complete community of goods (op. cit., 1004), whereas the court records show that they had no common possessions. "But a Christian must part from his possessions and his lands which he does not need for himself and his family" (op. cit., 998). On marriage it was their belief that no marriage could exist if the partners were not of the same faith, but the dissolution of the marriage should be postponed for a time until the erring partner has had an opportunity to place himself under God's Word, which should be a matter of prayer to God (op. cit., 1001).

Since the prisoners showed no inclination to give up their faith, the elector on Jan. 9, 1536, ordered that the records be presented to the doctors of law then in the city of Jena for their official opinion on the method of punishment, "in order that this seductive sect be eradicated" (Thüringen, 404).

The cross-examination of the prisoners at Kahla and Leuchtenburg was reported to John of Saxony by Melanchthon on Jan. 19, 1536, together with suggestions on punishment. Concerning the wavering father of a family he wrote, "With this one I beg you not to hasten punishment. For I hope that when his master Heinz Kraut, who lies in Jena, and a few other stubborn ones are executed, he will let himself be instructed. On the obstinate ones it is necessary to inflict serious punishment. And even though some may not be otherwise untractable, nevertheless this harmful sect must be resisted, in which there are so many terrible, dangerous errors. But with the poor obstinate women I think it is not necessary to hurry, but first deal earnestly with their husbands." John wrote a letter on Jan. 23 concurring with Melanchthon's opinion (Corp. Ref. III, 16 f.).

The jurists of Jena wished to have the prisoners questioned further on a few points before giving their opinion, first in kindness, and then if they made no statements, on the rack. This was done on Jan. 26, 1536. The instruments of torture produced no statements beyond what they had already said. On the next day they were condemned to death and beheaded.

The death sentence gives as the reasons for inflicting this penalty that the prisoners had allowed themselves to be baptized a second time, contributed to the spread of their ungodly, seditious doctrine, and held meetings at Kleineutersdorf. They had also, in spite of the application of much zeal and Christian teaching, not yielded their erroneous faith, but always said they would persist in it. Of Heinz Kraut it was said that he had participated in the revolt of Frankenhausen (Thüringen, 409-14).

The women held in the Leuchtenburg, the wives of Jobst and Heinrich Möller, were naturally crushed by the news of the execution, as Melanchthon hoped. On Jan. 13 they had still resisted his attempts to convert them, and were described by Melanchthon as stubborn (Corp. Ref. III, 21). But now the widows were incapable of further resistance and yielded to pressure. They were joined by Ursula Meurer, a girl of 16 years. On March 3, 1536, the elector ordered that the women should make a public recantation in the church at Kahla (Thüringen, 423).

The execution of the three Möller brothers illustrates how the families of religious minorities in both Catholic and Protestant countries were torn apart, merely because they refused to join the state church. It is also evidence of the impression made on pious natures by steadfastness and suffering of believing Christians. The courage of Greta Knobloch, the mother-in-law of Jobst and Heinrich Möller, "was most highly praised by the populace, so that much annoyance to the preachers resulted from it and they were compelled to preach against it openly from the pulpits several times" (Thüringen, 109).

The martyrdom of the Möller brothers and their companions brought new converts to the Anabaptist movement. Hans Hamster, a young man of 33 and a brother-in-law of the Möller brothers, who had not yet been baptized, was now heart and soul in the cause (Inquisition, 100). He gave up his previous position because the lord of the place would not tolerate Anabaptists and moved away, but was seized in August 1538 on Saxon territory and was put through four cross-examinations. Each time he refused to make the required recantation, and finally said that he would willingly suffer and die for his faith. John sent his confession to the court in Wittenberg on Sept. 25. The court apparently hesitated to pronounce a verdict, for John sent a reproof on Oct. 14. It is not definitely known that Hamster shared the fate of his brothers-in-law, for the pertinent Zwickau records have disappeared (Inquisition, 114-17).

While these trials were in progress in Jena, Melanchthon planned to have a public warning against the Anabaptists issued. On Jan. 19, 1536, he wrote John in connection with his report on the answers of the prisoners, "Perhaps it would be advisable for your Excellency to have a public writing issued, which would show what coarse, seditious, and dangerous articles the Anabaptists have, wherefore such earnest measures must be taken against them" (Corp. Ref. III, 17). The elector agreed with the proposal and assigned the composition to Melanchthon, asking him to send it to him and his brother for approval (Thüringen, 407). Then in February Melanchthon drew up a guide for pastors, with the title, Des Herrn Philipp Melanchthons Widerlegung auf etliche aufruhrische Artikel so die Wiederteufer treiben und verteidigen, which presents the teachings of the Anabaptists, in somewhat distorted form, and refutes them. At the end he says, "We also command that in all places the pastors and preachers shall give the people a thorough and clear report of these and other erroneous articles" (Corp. Ref. III, 28-34).

Since the execution of these persons who had been seized at an evening service of worship at Kleineutersdorf within the homeland of the Reformation caused great excitement, Melanchthon felt it necessary to defend the severe sentence pronounced against them in another booklet. It was published in Wittenberg in 1536 (without date) and had the title, Verlegung etlicher vnchristlicher Artikel; welche die Widerteuffer furgeben (38 pp.). In the preface Melanchthon says that on account of these articles, which all Anabaptists hold in common, several had recently been punished in these lands. With the exception of infant baptism the pamphlet deals not so much with questions of dogma as with questions of civil right, as the Anabaptist position on government, property, and divorce, imputing motives to them that are in many instances incompatible with the earnest character of the Anabaptists of Saxony. At the close he writes, "The Anabaptists have in addition more errors on both sacraments and their practice, and on other articles, of which others have already written before, and which cannot all be discussed here for lack of time." A second edition of this pamphlet appeared in Zwickau in 1536 without naming Melanchthon as the author.

Melanchthon's report to John on the statements of the martyrs executed in Jena found an echo in the mandate of April 10, 1536, in a warning reference to the executions, "that everyone may know how to guard himself against such blasphemous and seditious sects and that kind of seditious punishment."

In view of the fact that princes, theologians, and jurists were occupied for months with the religious confessions made by the condemned prisoners, it is appropriate to inquire what Anabaptist wing the Saxon group adhered to. Melanchthon noted in his pamphlets that "the Anabaptists are not alike." The jurists of Jena wanted to know definitely whether sedition could be charged against Jobst Möller, Heinz Kraut, and Hans Peissker, before giving their official opinion. The question was therefore to be asked the prisoners, whether they had any connections with the Münsterites; the answer was negative in both examinations, even with the application of torture. Melanchthon was also well aware that this was not the case; for he added to his account the statement that among the Münsterites more and worse errors were found.

That these Anabaptists had not the remotest idea of revolt is clear from their statement that only such persons were admitted to membership as would pledge themselves to commit no civil crime, but would obey God's command. Heinz Kraut demanded sincere penitence and devotion to God before he baptized anyone. Georg Köhler said on Sept. 4, 1535, as recorded in the official report of the trial at Sangerhausen, "When one wishes to be baptized he comes to the baptizer and says kneeling: Dear Brother, I desire the bond of a good conscience with God and request baptism. The baptizer then says, And do you believe that Christ is the only begotten Son of God and is eternal, will you submit yourself entirely to Him alone, be obedient to Him as to a God and Lord, and if necessary die for His sake? If the answer is yes, the brother appointed to the task performs the sacred act, repeating first the baptism of John word for word. Then he wets his finger three times in the water, draws three crosses on the head and brow of the candidate, and says, I baptize you in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. He then earnestly admonishes the brother to follow the covenant, be obedient to God, avoid sin, and yet always consider himself a sinner in the sight of God" (Jacobs, 470).

This serious conception of discipleship coincides with the doctrine and thought of the High German Anabaptists, whose representatives met on Aug. 20, 1527, in the Martyrs' Synod at Augsburg. That there were contacts between the Saxon and Upper German Anabaptists is known, for the Synod sent Hans Mittermaier, of Ingolstadt, as a missionary to Saxony in 1527. HEGE.

Corpus Reformatorum II and III; E. Jacobs, "Die Wiedertäufer am Harz," in Ztscht des Harzvereins für Geschichte und Altertumskunde XXXII (1899); Chr. Thomas, Philipp Melanchthon, Verzeichnis von den Wiedertäuffern, so in Jena gefangen gesessen und Anno 1536 enthauptet worden. Melanchthonis Articul wieder die Wiedertäuffer, die damals zu Weimar, Leuchtenburg und Jena gefangen gesessen, auch damit die meisten zu rechte gebracht 1536 (Halle, 1693); P. Wappler, Inquisition und Ketzerprozesse in Zwickau zur Ref.-Zeit (Leipzig, 1908); idem, Thüringen; ML III, 149-52.

Möllinger, a well-known name among the Mennonites of the Palatinate, Germany, whose progenitor, Ulrich Möllinger, immigrated from the canton of Bern, Switzerland, in the middle of the 17th century, and settled on the "Mainzer Hofgut" in Guntersblum near Oppenheim, and then on the Kirschgartshäuserhof near Mannheim. The dates of his birth and death are not known.

His son Jakob Möllinger (b. about 1660) was hereditary lessee of one fourth of the Hemshof. Johannes Möllinger, a grandson of Jakob, was ordained preacher and elder of the Friesenheim congregation (see Namenlistbüchlein 1805, 43).

Better known than Jakob and his descendants was his younger brother Vincenz and his family. Vincenz Möllinger (b. Nov. 22, 1668, d. Dec. 1748) settled in Dühren near Sinsheim a. Elsenz, where he married Veronica Magelin (1664-1753). In 1710 he settled with his family on the Nonnenhof near Bobenheim, in 1714 in Eppstein near Frankenthal, and in 1718 in Mutterstadt. When he died at the age of 80 he left his widow, four married sons, and three married daughters, whom the parents had reared "with great love and care." Some of the four sons became famed beyond the Mennonite circles.

Mellingers are found in America in Lancaster County, Pa., in Columbiana and Mahoning counties, Ohio, and at Sterling, Ill. (ML III, 152.) G.H.

Möllinger, David (1709-86), an outstanding German Mennonite farmer, "the father of agriculture in the Palatinate," was born Jan. 24, 1709, at Dühren near Sinsheim, Baden. He married Maria Kindig of the Immelhäuserhof (q.v.) on Feb. 8, 1732. In farming he was a pioneer. At first he lived in Mutterstadt in the Palatinate, where his father Vincenz was farming, and in 1732 moved to near-by Cronau, where he increased his small patrimony (500 florins) "through trade and crafts." In 1744 he bought land near Monsheim.

Möllinger's success at extensive farming was widely acclaimed. He distilled liquor, brewed beer, made vinegar, fattened cattle, and cultivated the land. He was the first to manufacture liquor from potatoes. A by-product of his distillery was some valuable cattle feed. To feed his cattle he also raised certain kinds of clover. In 1769 he lost much of his hay through a flood of the Rhine. Then he transferred his meadows to the higher lands and planted grain on the lower. He purchased part of a neighboring wooded hill, planted the bare top of the hill in clover and scattered limestone over it, which he ground in a mill driven by horsepower, and raised an amazingly good crop. A complete revolution in the system of crop rotation followed. Instead of letting every field lie fallow each alternate year, the soil was improved by the use of clover, his stand of cattle was trebled, the fertility of the soil increased, and the prosperity of the farmer improved. "All of this the Palatinate owes a single man, a Mennonite" (Schwerz). He died at Monsheim (q.v.) on May 3, 1786.

The monthly periodical of the historical society of Frankenthal (Frankenthaler Altertumsverein) of June 1904 published a guest book of his family containing more than 350 entries, some of them very important persons, a glowing tribute of the high esteem he enjoyed. NEFF.

Ernst Correll, Das Schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925) 122-26 contains an excellent description of Möllinger's "model farming"; J. N. Schwerz, Der Ackerbau der Pfälzer (Berlin, 1816); Ernst Crous, "The Mennonites in Germany Since the Thirty Years' War," MQR XXV (October 1951) 235-62; "Aus dem Stammbuch der Familie Möllinger." Gem.-Kal., 1933, 116-25; ML III, 152 f.

Möllinger, Jakob (1695-1763), a famous Mennonite clockmaker, was born Dec. 4, 1695, at Dühren, Germany, oldest son of Vincenz Möllinger, d. Jan. 17, 1763, at Neustadt on the Haardt, Palatinate, Germany. His shop is said to have been one of the most important in all Germany. It produced the "Altpörtl-Uhr" in Speyer and the handsome clock in the Dreifaltigkeitskirche in Worms (the latter is now in a museum at Worms; see Wormser Zeitung, No. 552). A census list of Mennonites of 1743 indicated that he had six sons, one of whom was court clockmaker to the Count of Wartenberg.

Ernst Crous, "The Mennonites of Germany Since the Thirty Years' War," MQR XXV (October 1951) 235-62; "Graf und Uhrmacher," Gem.-Kal., 1932, 125 ff. (taken from Pfälzische Geschichts-Blätter, 1905); ML III, 153.

Möllinger, Johann Albert, a German Mennonite farmer, b. Sept. 16, 1823, at Pfeddersheim, Hesse, d. April 30, 1906, was a member of the Nationalverein, an association which as early as the 1860's promoted the unification of Germany under Prussia, from 1862 to 1906 a member of the Second Chamber of the Hessian parliament, and for 18 years president of the Department of Agriculture of Hesse (Menn. Bl., 1906, 53). His wife Angelica died Nov. 4, 1939, at the age of one hundred years. (ML III, 153.)

NEFF.

Möllinger, Joseph, b. Nov. 7, 1715, at Eppstein, Palatinate, Germany, d. April 27, 1772, at Frankenthal, was like his brother Jakob (q.v.) a clockmaker at Neustadt on the Haardt. He was called to Zweibrücken as clockmaker and minter of money to the Duke. Besides his professional skill he was known for his benevolence. (ML III, 153).

Möllinger, Martin (1698-1774), a German Mennonite elder, was born at Dühren, Baden, Germany, on Nov. 12, 1698. For 20 years (1753-73) he served as preacher and elder of the Mennonite congregation at Mannheim (q.v.), after he had farmed for three years at Mutterstadt and 25 years at Monsheim. He died at Mannheim, Jan. 17, 1774.

Through Martin Möllinger, at the instigation of the Danzig Elder Hans van Steen (q.v.), the correspondence between the West Prussian and South German Mennonites was begun (Gem.-Kal., 1935, 112 ff.). The letters and poems of David Möllinger were read with pleasure by the West Prussian Mennonites. A song of 40 stanzas and the letters were copied by Hans van Steen and placed in the archives of the Danzig Church. The Familiennachrichten des Martin Möllinger zu Mannheim vom 1. Februar 1766 (published in Gem.-Kal., 1940) contains a brief biography in addition to data on his ancestors and brothers and sisters. (ML III, 153). G.H.

Mölln: see Refugee Camps.

Molotschna Mennonite Settlement, located in the province of Taurida, Russia, on the Molochnaya River, was the second and largest Mennonite settlement of Russia (q.v.). Chortitza (q.v.), founded in 1789, was the oldest and next in size. Chortitza was established by Mennonites of Danzig and Prussia who had followed the invitation of Catherine the Great issued through her representative George von Trappe. The basis for this invitation was the fact that the Russian government needed good farmers in the Ukraine on land just acquired through a war with Turkey. Land along the Vistula River in Prussia had become scarce and the Mennonite families were large; hence the Mennonites, who were by tradition farmers, were forced to seek other occupations, not all of which were open to Mennonites. Among the first settlers establishing the Chortitza settlement were many artisans and laborers who longed to have their own farms. In 1787 Frederick William II of Prussia issued an order of cabinet which forbade the Mennonites to enlarge their landholdings. The "Mennonite Edict" followed in 1789 with further restrictions. Frederick William III further increased restrictions when he issued a declaration supplementary to the Mennonite Edict in 1801. All Mennonite efforts to have the edict changed were in vain. It became apparent that these restrictions were aimed to undermine the Mennonite principle of nonresistance. Mennonites who gave it up could purchase all the land they wanted.

Beginning. In spite of the reports of hardships experienced by the Chortitza settlers a new movement to the steppes of the Ukraine began in 1803. Elder Cornelius Warkentin of Rosenort, who had been in Russia in 1798, was in correspondence with Kontenius (q.v.) and found out that there was land available for several thousand families on the Molochnaya east of the Dnepr. This was the major topic of discussion at the West Prussian Mennonite ministers' conference on Aug. 10, 1803. Of particular significance was the special Privilegium which Czar Paul I had given the Mennonites in 1800. The first Molotschna group arrived at Chortitza in the fall of 1803 and continued its trip in the spring. Other groups followed, making a total of 365 families during 1803-6. The immigrants were on the average much more prosperous than those who had gone to Chortitza.

Various things hindered the emigration movement. The German authorities kept 10 per cent of the property of those leaving the country. For a while passports were refused. Also the Napoleonic wars stopped the emigration for a time. In 1819-20 again 254 families went to the Molotschna. More groups followed. In 1835 the migration to the Molotschna came to a close, with a total of 1,200 families (Unruh, 231) and an estimated population of 6,000. The land complex of the settlement consisted of 120,000 dessiatines (324,000 acres) located east of the Molochnaya River along its tributaries the Tokmak, Begemthsokrak, Kurushan, and Yushanlee, about 100 miles southeast of the Chortitza settlement. To the west resided non-Mennonite German settlers, to the north and east Ukrainians, and to the south nomadic tribes. Around 1870 the Molotschna settlement consisted of the following villages, besides many large estates located within the boundary of the settlement.

The Villages of the Molotschna Settlement in 1860
(Based on Isaac, Molotschnaer Mennoniten, 72-73)

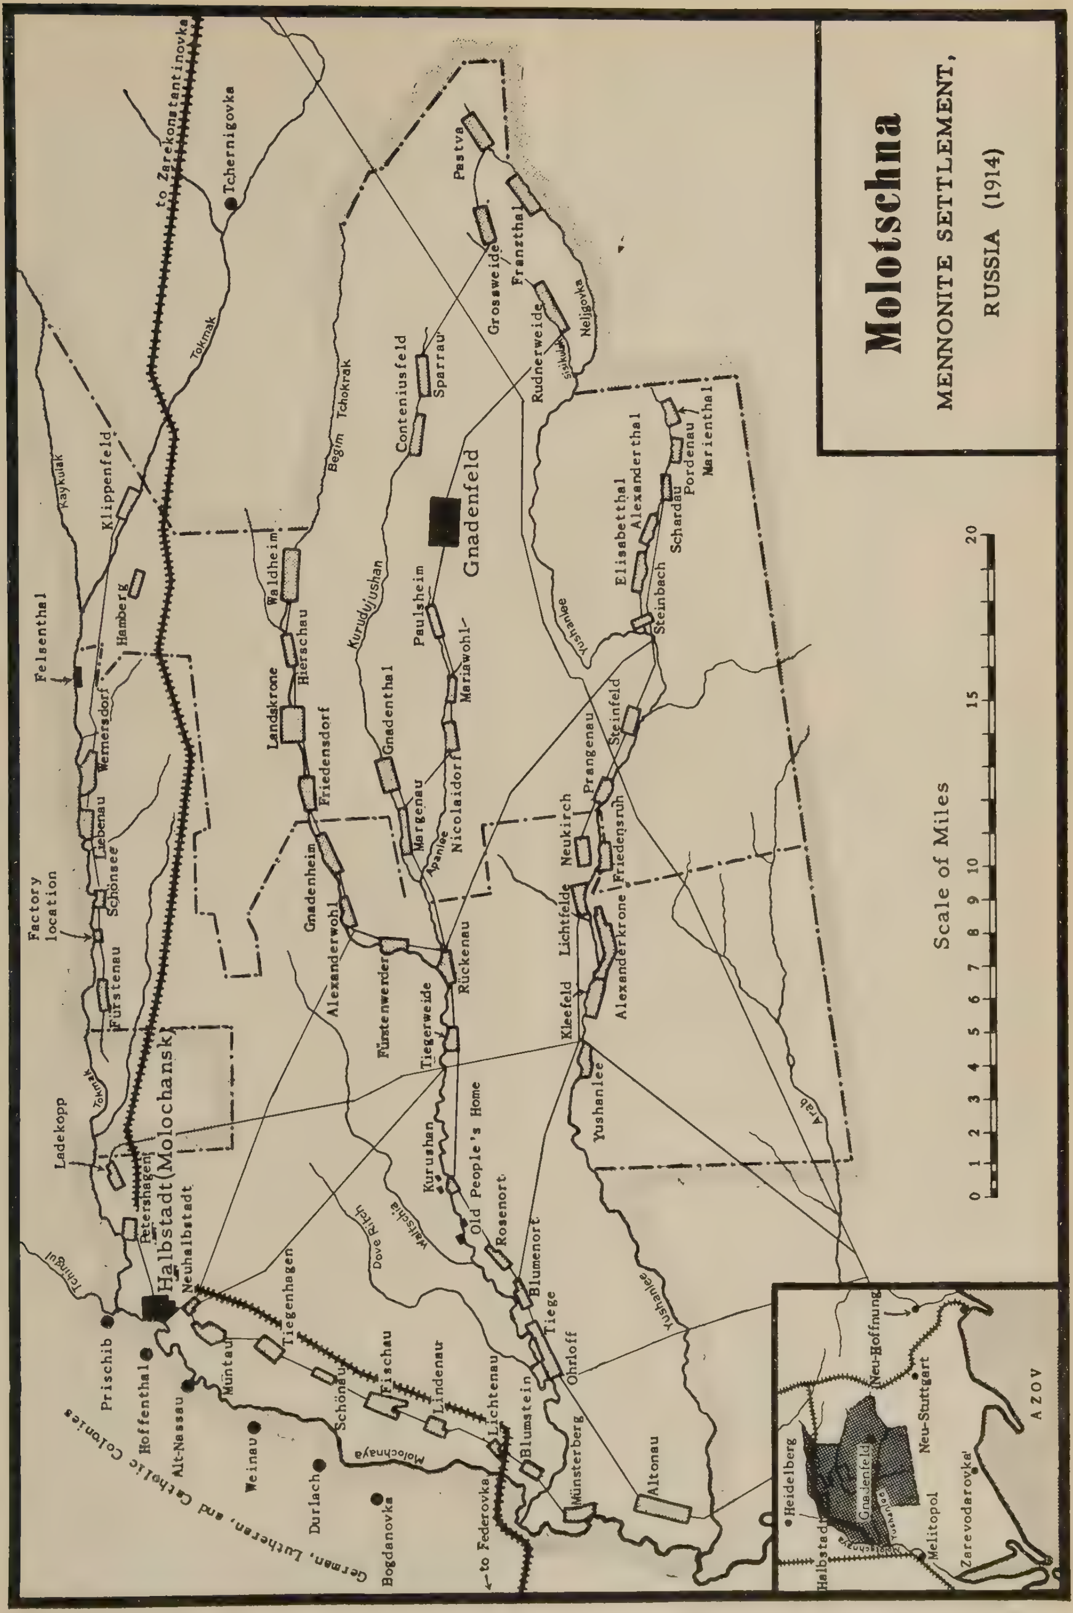
These are the names of the 60 Molotschna villages and hamlets with years when founded, number of "full farms" (175 acres), "half size farms," and individuals (landless) who had only a house and possibly a few acres of land (1860), and total acreage of each village.



Molotschna
MENNONITE SETTLEMENT,
RUSSIA (1914)
Scale of Miles
0 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 15 20
to Zarekonstantinovka
Tchernigovka
Tokmak
Kaykulak
Klippenfeld
Begim Tchokrak
Contenius feld
Sparrau
Pastva
Grossweide
Franzthal
Rudnerweide
Neligovka
Sisikulak
Gnadenfeld
Felsenthal
Hamberg
Waldheim
Hierschau
Landskrone
Paulsheim
Mariawohl
Kuruduyushan
Elissbetthal
Alexanderthal
Schardau
Pordenau
Marienthal
Steinbach
Yushanlee
Wernersdorf
Friedensdorf
Gnadenthal
Nicolaidorf
Margenau
Apanlee
Steinfeld
Prangenau
Liebenau
Schönsee
Factory location
Fürstenau
Gnadenheim
Alexanderwohl
Fürstenwerder
Rückenau
Tiegerweide
Neukirch
Friedensruh
Lichtfelde
Alexanderkrone
Kleefeld
Yushanlee
Ladekopp
Petershagen
Halbstadt (Molochansk)
Neuhalbstadt
Kurushan
Old People's Home
Rosenort
Dove Rikch
Tchingul
Prischib
Hoffenthal
Alt-Nassau
Weinau
Durlach
Bogdanovka
Tiegenhagen
Müntau
Schönau
Fischau
Lindenau
Lichtenau
Blumenort
Tiege
Ohrloff
Blumstein
Münsterberg
Altonau
Molochnaya to Federovka
German, Lutheran, and Catholic Colonies Arab Heidelberg
Halbstadt
Gnadenfeld
Neu-Hoffnung
Neu-Stuttgart
Melitopol
Zarevodarovka
AZOV

Village	Founded	Full Farms	Half Farms	Landless	Acreage
Halbstadt	1804	21	—	28	5192
Neu-Halbstadt	"	—	—	39	2259
Muntau	"	17	8	38	5327
Schönau	"	19	4	24	4722
Fischau	"	16	12	23	4854
Lindenau	"	19	4	29	4938
Lichtenau	"	18	6	26	4808
Blumstein	"	20	2	51	5888
Münsterberg	"	22	—	24	4997
Altona	"	21	2	31	5200
Ladekopp	1805	20	—	29	4762
Schönsee	"	19	2	26	4633
Petershagen	"	17	6	19	4330
Tiegenhagen	"	19	4	24	4822
Ohrloff	"	21	—	26	4908
Tiege	"	20	—	23	4503
Blumenort	"	19	2	23	4503
Rosenort	"	19	2	27	4776
Fürstenau	1806	20	2	37	5283
Rückenau	1811	14	12	34	4978
Margenau	1819	19	10	31	5551
Lichtfelde	"	16	8	27	4876
Neukirch	"	17	6	26	4633
Alexandertal	1820	15	12	26	4808
Schardau	"	16	8	28	4719
Pordenau	"	19	2	27	4676
Mariental	"	17	6	36	5065
Rudnerweide	"	28	10	46	7778
Grossweide	"	21	6	31	5551
Franztal	"	10	28	25	5251
Pastwa	"	17	2	23	5292
Fürstenwerder	1821	18	4	33	4752
Alexanderwohl	"	25	10	26	6691
Gnadenheim	"	22	4	29	6388
Tiegerweide	1822	22	4	32	5465
Liebenau	1823	20	—	22	5594
Elisabethtal	"	22	6	29	4460
Wernersdorf	1824	29	2	45	5640
Friedensdorf	"	27	6	26	7209
Prangenau	"	16	8	33	6388
Sparrau	1838	32	16	37	4936
Konteniusfeld	1832	25	10	33	8618
Gnadenfeld	1835	34	12	38	6691
Waldheim	1836	34	12	56	8862
Landskrone	1839	36	8	34	9439
Hierschau	1848	30	—	30	8489
Nikolaidorf	1851	22	—	8	6561
Paulsheim	1852	25	2	10	4207
Kleefeld	1854	37	6	38	4995
Alexanderkrone	1857	40	—	25	8662
Mariawohl	"	21	—	4	8100
Friedensruh	"	28	4	24	3858
Steinfeld	"	29	2	6	6302
Gnadental	1862	30	—	9	5524
Hamberg	1863	25	2	5	4779
Klippenfeld	"	27	—	14	5343
Fabrikerwiese	"	3	—	10	959
Felsental	1820	—	—	—	—
Yushanlee	1811	—	—	—	—
Steinbach	1812	—	—	—	—

Economic Life. Recently published information shows that the Mennonites who came to the Molotschna had been more prosperous in West Prussia on the average than the Chortitza settlers, and included a number of experienced and aggressive farmers. Also they could profit from the experiences of the Chortitza settlers, and the soil was good. Johann Cornies (q.v.) and the Agricultural Association (q.v.) headed by him did much to overcome the pioneer difficulties. Cornies successfully demonstrated on his estate which crops were most suitable for the steppes and introduced and constantly improved cattle, sheep, horses, etc. He introduced summer fallow and suitable grains for the steppes. His introduction of fruit trees and an afforestation program were of great consequences far beyond the Mennonite settlement. Through the support of the Guardians' Committee (q.v.) of the government his experience and experiments bore fruit even among the nomadic tribes of the neighborhood and the Russian population.

Alexander Petzholdt, who visited the Molotschna Mennonites in 1855, gives a very good description of the agricultural life at that time. Their machinery was comparatively primitive; they were raising mainly sheep, cattle, horses, silk, and grains, including summer wheat, rye, barley, and oats. He found that the Mennonites had planted 7½ million fruit and shade trees (Petzholdt, 180). Industry was in its early stages, with a number of mills, silk factories, carpenter and smith shops, brick factories, oil presses, breweries, etc. The products were much in demand among the population outside Molotschna. Some 500 non-Mennonites found employment among the Mennonites at that time (p. 187).

Around 1850 great changes took place in the life of the Molotschna Mennonites. With the increase of the population, the improvement of agricultural machinery, and the introduction of the hard winter wheat, a more intensive farming came about. Winter wheat became the chief crop and as a result factories of agricultural machinery and a milling industry developed. In addition many branches of business were introduced. Favorable soil and climatic conditions, the industry of the majority of the farmers, and farsighted leadership made the Molotschna settlement a garden spot of the Ukraine and one of the most successful Mennonite settlements of Russia (see also Agriculture, Business). However, the settlement also had to solve a growing problem usually referred to as the landless (q.v.) question. The table "Villages of the Molotschna Settlement" gives a vivid picture of the land distribution. By 1860 the great majority of the population was landless. The number of families had increased rapidly, and parceling out a normal-sized farm (175 acres) was prohibited. The surplus population usually obtained some land to build little cottages at the end of the village and eked out a meager living as laborers or artisans. Unfortunately the landowners resisted all attempts to provide the landless with better opportunities to secure land or the right to vote. Since only the owners of farms had the right to vote, the landless were denied this right. Finally in 1866 the landless population had persuaded the Russian government to distribute the community surplus and reserve land, which had been rented out mostly to the well-to-do farmers. Each family thus received 16 dessiatines (some 40 acres) of land and with it the right to vote. By 1869 the land had been distributed among 1,563 families.

This was, however, only a partial and temporary solution of a continuously increasing problem. Gradually a colonization system was developed by which the surplus population was given the opportunity to establish their own homes on new settlements called daughter colonies or settlements. The administration of the mother settlement created funds for the purchase of new lands, and supervised the purchase, the financing, and the distribution of the land. Most of the daughter settlements originated on this basis, although some smaller settlements were started through private initiative. The following are the names of the most important settlements or the areas in which they were located; many scattered villages and estates are not mentioned. It is worthy of note that the Chortitza settlement had established daughter settlements much earlier, the first in 1836 at Bergthal. But the Molotschna established more settlements than Chortitza in 1862-1901.

Molotschna Daughter Settlements

Name	Province	Year Established	Number of Villages	Acreage
Crimea	Taurida	1862 ff.	25	108,000
Kuban	Kuban district	1863	2	17,550
Brazol (Schönfeld)	Ekaterinoslav	1868	4	150,000
Zagradovka	Kherson	1871	16	56,130
Auli Ata	Turkestan	1880	4	9,450
Memrik	Ekaterinoslav	1885	10	32,400
Neu-Samara	Samara	1890	12	59,400
Davlekanovo	Ufa	1894	scattered	—
Orenburg	Orenburg	1894	8	29,700
Suvorovka	Stavropol	1894	4	10,800
Olgino	Olgino	1895	2	11,920
Terek	Caucasus	1901	15	76,960

In addition to this, Molotschna Mennonites purchased in their neighborhood and in various other provinces smaller and larger estates. Also they established places of business and industries. The largest and best-known estates were those of Johann Cornies at Yushanlee and Tashchenak; Brodsky near Melitopol, Crimea; and Apanlee.

In the large Mennonite settlements in Siberia many villages were established by Molotschna settlers. They had over 100 villages with an acreage of over one million.

According to the estimates for forestry service taxation, the property of the Molotschna settlement before World War I (1914) amounted to 51,600,000 rubles ($25,800,000), which was no doubt a low estimate.

The Mennonites of the Molotschna settlement, like most of the other Mennonites of Russia, lived in villages (q.v.), which were administered by a Schulze (mayor). The total settlement had an administration under the leadership of an Oberschulze located at Halbstadt (q.v.). In 1870 the settlement was divided into two administrative units (volost), Halbstadt and Gnadenfeld. Halbstadt included 31 villages and two estates, while Gnadenfeld had 26 villages and one estate (see map). In addition to these two, Ohrloff was also significant as a cultural center. The local administration (obshestvo) was subject to the district administration (okrug), which in turn was subject to the Guardians' Committee (q.v.).

The men who served as Oberschulze at Halbstadt, Molotschna, were Klaas Wiens 1804-6, Johann Klassen 1806-8 and 1812-14, Gerhard Reimer 1809-11, Peter Töws 1815-20, Johann Klassen (Ohrloff) 1824-26, Johann Klassen (Tiegerweide) 1827-32, Johann Regier 1833-41, Abraham Töws 1842-47, David Friesen 1848-64, Franz Dück 1865-66, Abraham Driedger 1867, Kornelius Töws 1868-72, Abraham Wiebe 1873-78, Peter Dück 1879-81, Klaas Enns 1882-84, Johann Enns 1885-88, Peter Neufeld 1889-98, Franz Nickel 1899-1906, Dietrich Dyck 1906-10. When Gnadenfeld became an independent volost the following served as Oberschulze: Wilhelm Ewert 1870, Franz Penner 1871, Peter Ewert 1872-75 and 1877-78, Gerhard Fast 1876, David Unruh 1878-87, and Gerhard Dörksen 1887.

Molotschna had a mutual fire insurance agency and a Waisenamt (q.v.), which took care of the orphans of the settlement and regulated inheritance.

Cultural and Religious Life. In the early days cultural and religious life was on a higher level in the Molotschna than in Chortitza. This was probably due mostly to the fact that the Molotschna Mennonites had stayed in their home country (West Prussia) longer, had there undergone more influences in education and had more vital religious experiences because of contacts with Pietistic groups, and were of a generally higher economic status. However, as settlers they had to overcome the same hardships and problems of pioneering as the Chortitza people. In the realm of education (q.v.) they had the advantage of having Johann Cornies (q.v.) as an outstanding pioneer. Teachers like T. Voth, H. Heese (q.v.), and H. Franz paved the way to higher goals. In addition to an improved elementary educational system a secondary educational system followed gradually with its Zentralschulen (q.v.), Mädchenschulen (q.v.), and teacher training and business schools (see Education Among the Mennonites of Russia). The Molotschna Mennonites were also ahead of the other Mennonite settlements in Russia as well as in America in the realm of hospital (q.v.) and deaconess (q.v.) work.

The Mennonites of the Molotschna settlement were mostly of the Flemish (q.v.) branch. Only the village of Rudnerweide was of the Frisian (q.v.) branch. In 1805 the first 18 villages were organized into one congregation, the Ohrloff-Petershagen-Halbstadt Mennonite Church (q.v.), with Jakob Enns as elder. Klaas Reimer (q.v.) separated from this group in 1814 and founded the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.). Another separation occurred in 1823 which resulted in the organization of the Lichtenau-Petershagen Church (q.v.). Later this congregation was subdivided into the Margenau-Schönsee (q.v.), Pordenau (q.v.), and Alexanderkrone (q.v.) congregations. In addition to these the following congregations were organized among the settlers that came later: Rudnerweide in 1820 (q.v.), consisting of the Frisian Mennonites alone, Alexanderwohl in 1820 (q.v.), Gnadenfeld in 1834 (q.v.), and Waldheim in 1836 (q.v.), which were all of the same Old Flemish or Groningen Flemish background. The latter two represented a conservatism which had been softened and awakened through Moravian and Pietistic influences. In addition to these congregations there existed independent congregations in most of the daughter settlements of the Molotschna.

Gnadenfeld became the center of an active religious life, promoting better education and missions. Heinrich Dirks (q.v.) of Gnadenfeld was the first Mennonite missionary from outside Holland. It was in these circles that the Pietist Eduard Wüst (q.v.) found response and caused a revival. This revival was welcomed and promoted by men like Bernhard Harder (q.v.), but also caused a break resulting in the founding of the Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.) in 1860. However, the difference between these two groups was never as great in the Molotschna as in Chortitza. Men like P. M. Friesen tried to combine the best characteristics and traditions of both, founding the "Allianz" group or Evangelical Mennonite Brethren (q.v.) in 1905. The Mennonite Brethren as well as the Friends of Jerusalem (q.v.) established settlements on the Kuban (q.v.) River in the Caucasus. In 1880 Hermann Peters (q.v.) led a group of Molotschna Mennonites to Central Asia (q.v.), where they found like-minded chiliasts in the followers of Klaas Epp (q.v.). As a whole the Molotschna Mennonites maintained a balanced and active program of Christianity that aimed to manifest itself in all areas of life.

When the Mennonites of Russia in the 1870's had to accept state service, the Mennonites of the Molotschna led in the negotiations with the government and also in the emigration to America. The Molotschna Mennonites went mostly to the United States, while the Chortitza Mennonites and their daughter settlements preferred Canada. Of the total of some 18,000, half must have come from the Molotschna. The now available passenger lists have not yet been investigated as to where the immigrants came from. Those that stayed accepted forestry service (q.v.) and later also hospital work.

In 1905 the Molotschna settlement had the following congregations (the figures in parentheses indicate the year of founding and the total membership including children): Halbstadt (1895; 1174), Lichtenau (1823; 3338), Petershagen (?; 722), Schönfeld and branches (1868 ff.; 763), Blumenfeld (1872; 135), Rosenhof (1870; 419), Ohrloff (1804; 980), Herzenberg (1881; 80), Alexanderkrone (1890; 1305), Neukirch (1863; 890), Alexanderwohl (1820; 680), Schönsee (1830; 1425), Gnadenfeld (and branches) (1834 ff.; 1151), Pordenau (1842; 1771), Rudnerweide (1820; 2548), Margenau (1832; 2876), Waldheim (1836; 219). The Mennonite Brethren were organized as the Rückenau Mennonite Brethren Church, with a number of branches (1860; 1977).

In 1926 the total membership (including children) of the combined Mennonite congregations in the Molotschna was 15,036, of the Mennonite Brethren 2,501, and the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren 810, a total of 17,347. Another source says there were 20,706 Mennonites in the Molotschna settlement in 1922. Taking into consideration the natural increase it may be concluded that some 4,000 must have emigrated to America in 1922-26.

After World War I. World War I had the same effect on the Molotschna settlement as on the other settlements in Russia. The suffering inflicted by the Bolshevik Revolution, the bandits of Machno (q.v.), the civil war, drought, and starvation was gradually overcome, partly through American Mennonite relief (q.v.). According to a report entitled "American Mennonite Relief Scheme" there was a population of 20,706 in the Molotschna in 1922, of whom 11,134 received relief food. The Association of Citizens of Dutch Origin (Verband Bürger holländischer Herkunft, q.v.) did much to prevent great disaster, and to help to restore the economic, cultural, and religious life. The NEP (q.v.) period made this restoration possible. Soon, however, the great Mennonite emigration to Canada set in (1921), which was discontinued by 1927. Again in 1929 a small number succeeded in leaving Russia for Canada. How many of the 25,000 emigrants from Russia who went to North America after World War I came from the Molotschna has never been established.

In 1930 the collectivization and the deportation of "kulaks" to the slave labor camps (q.v.) began. Most of the churches were closed and ministers exiled. The meetinghouses were turned into club houses, nurseries, schools, granaries, etc. All schools became state schools with a Communistic curriculum and philosophy of life. The Mennonite teachers either had to adjust themselves or be exiled.

In 1937-38 in the Molotschna, just as in the other Mennonite settlements, many hundreds of men were taken by night and exiled. Little is known about their fate. Numerous exclusively Russian villages were established among the Mennonite villages of the Molotschna settlement. When the war between Germany and Russia broke out in 1941 many of the Mennonite men and women had to dig trenches west of the Dnepr River. Some were taken prisoners of war there by the German army. During the early days of the German attack the Soviets sent all Mennonite men over 16 years of age eastward. When the German army approached the total remaining population was ordered to meet at the stations of Halbstadt, Stulnevo, Tokmak, Lichtenau, and Feodorovka on Oct. 1, 1941. Those that came to Lichtenau and Feodorovka were loaded on freight trains and sent east. Those who came to the depots of Halbstadt, Tokmak, and Stulnevo waited for five days, when the German army overran the territory, so that none of these were sent eastward. As a result of this evacuation and deportation in the Molotschna some 20 of the Mennonite villages had no Mennonite population left when the German army approached in 1941. They were Altonau, Münsterberg, Blumenstein, Lichtenau, Lindenau, Ohrloff, Tiege, Blumenort, Rosenort, Kleefeld, Alexanderkrone, Lichtfelde, Neukirch, Friedensruh, Prangenau, Steinfeld, Elisabethtal, Schardau, Pastwa, and Grossweide. In some other villages the population had shrunk to half its normal size. Since the war information has been received from many of those evacuated; seemingly most of them were settled in Kazakhstan, Siberia. Here their life was at first extremely hard. Many perished and many members of families have not yet been able to locate each other to reunite. During the most recent years conditions seem to have improved. Even worship services have been arranged for, at places.

During the German occupation of the Molotschna the Mennonites who had remained in the area began to revive their former way of living in the realm of agriculture, religious life, and education. Gradually the Mennonites began to farm privately; ministers were elected, churches reopened, and religious instruction and baptismal services were held. All this was of short duration. In the fall of 1943, when the German army withdrew, the total remaining Molotschna Mennonite population also went westward by wagons to be settled in the Warthegau (q.v.), their ancestral home along the Vistula River in western Poland. When the Red army invaded Germany in 1945, the newly resettled Mennonites fled westward with the local population. At the end of the war some of the refugees found themselves in the Russian zone of Germany. Most of them were forcibly repatriated. Even some of those who had escaped into the British, American, and French zones were seized and returned to Russia. It is estimated that some 35,000 Mennonites had been evacuated from Russia to Germany in 1943, but only some 12,000 of them found their way to Canada and South America; the rest were sent back to Russia. We can assume that of these 12,000 emigrants not more than half were from the Molotschna settlement. With the help of American Mennonite relief agencies they found new homes in South America and Canada. Little is known about the present fate of the 60 villages and hamlets which constituted the Molotschna settlement, one of the most prosperous undertakings in Mennonite history, except that their former Mennonite inhabitants have been scattered over Siberia, Central Asia, Canada, and South America. Recent correspondence received from Russia indicates that some Mennonite families either stayed in the Molotschna villages or returned after World War II. If the report regarding the village of Liebenau is typical, there must be a number of Mennonite families residing in the Molotschna villages today. An eyewitness reported in 1957 that of the 53 original prewar buildings of Liebenau, only 8 still stand. Among the 15 families living in the village, there were some Mennonites, some of whom had intermarried with Russians. Liebenau and the neighboring Russian village of Ostriekovka together formed a collective farm. (Menn. Rundschau, July 10, 1957, p. 2.) Similar reports have come from other places in the Molotschna settlement.

There are also indications of worship services attended by Mennonites in the Molotschna region; whether Baptist-sponsored or Mennonite is not known. Now that there is greater freedom of movement in Russia, people from Northern and Eastern Russia return to visit their home community in the Molotschna. Whether nostalgia and newly won freedom will make it possible for greater numbers to return and to concentrate in some areas or villages remains to be seen. (See also Russia, Ukraine, and articles under churches and institutions referred in this article.) C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft; F. Isaac, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908); H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, Man., 1951); B. H. Unruh, Die niederländisch-niederdeutschen Hintergründe der mennonitischen Ostwanderungen (Karlsruhe, 1955); A. Klaus, Unsere Kolonien (Odessa, 1887); C. E. Bondar, Sekta Mennonitov v Rossii (Petrograd, 1916); Adolf Ehrt, Das Mennonitentum in Russland von seiner Einwanderung bis zur Gegenwart (Berlin, 1932); D. G. Rempel, "The Menn. Colonies in New Russia . . . 1789-1914" (unpublished doctoral dissertation at Stanford University, California, 1933); C. Krahn, ed., From the Steppes to the Prairies (Newton, 1949); D. H. Epp, Johann Cornies (Ekaterinoslav and Berdyansk, 1909, and reprint Steinbach, Man., 1946); J. Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitza in Süd-Russland (Munich, 1928); Gerhard Fast, "The Mennonites under Stalin and Hitler," Menn. Life II (April 1947) 18 ff.; A. Petzholdt, Reise im Westlichen und südlichen europäischen Russland im Jahre 1855 (Leipzig, 1864); J. Neufeld, "Die Flucht, 1943-46," Menn. Life VI (January 1951) 8 ff.; Horst Quiring, "Die Auswanderung der Mennoniten aus Preussen 1788-1870," Menn. Life VI (April 1951) 37 ff.; H. Dirks, Statistik (Gnadenfeld, 1906); "Statistik . . . ," Unser Blatt II (1926) 51; "Aus vergilbten Papieren," Unser Blatt I (1926) 171 f.; D. H. Epp, "Historische Uebersicht über den Zustand der Mennonitengemeinden an der Molotschna vom Jahre 1836," Unser Blatt III (1928) 110-12, 138-43; Hermann Epp, "From the Vistula to the Dnieper," Menn. Life VI (October 1951) 14 ff.; H. Dirks, Mennonitisches Jahrbuch (1903-13); Die Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Russland . . . 1914 bis 1920 (Heilbronn, 1921); ML III, 154-58.

Molotschna Agricultural Association was organized at Halbstadt in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, Ukraine, in 1912. During the first year a membership of 90 was reached. A subdivision of the association was a society concerned with the improvement of the breeds of horses and cattle at Molotschna. The promoter of the association was Johann Wiebe of Ohrloff, a nephew of Johann Cornies. Little is known about the scope of its activities. (Dirks, Jahrbuch, 1911-12, 164.) C.K.

Molotschna Fire Insurance, Molotschna Mennonite settlement, South Russia, was organized in the early days of the settlement on principles established earlier among the Mennonites of Prussia. Each village had a fire warden (Brandschulze), and each district (volost) a fire marshal (Brandältester). A special commission inspected the houses to see whether they were built and maintained in line with the instructions of the fire insurance organization. Every village had and maintained a fire engine located in a special building in the center of the village next to the school. C.K.

H. Goerz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1951) 184.

Molotschna Home for the Aged, located on the Kurushan River in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, South Russia, was started on 90 acres of community land owned by the Halbstadt volost (district) in 1903 as a centennial monument to the founding of the Molotschna settlement. The land was donated, and the capital for the building of a 40,000 ruble structure was raised through assessment. The large modern brick building opened in 1906 was equipped to house 50 guests, but was to be enlarged to accommodate 100. The charges for the guests per person were 10 rubles per month. The cost of maintenance for 50 guests amounted to 6,000 rubles per year. The home was managed by a committee of which Elder A. Görz was the chairman in 1910. Among those who served as house parents were Mr. and Mrs. J. Epp and F. Willms. C.K.

P. M. Friesen, Brüderschaft, 661; H. Goerz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1951) 150; Dirks, Jahrbuch, 1911-12, 113.

Molotschnaer Evangelische Mennonitenbrüderschaft was organized at Yushanlee, Molotschna, Russia, on May 16, 1905, the protocol of the founding being signed by Isaak Ediger, Peter Schmidt, H. Günter (as elders), A. Nachtigal (minister), N. Ediger, P. Enns, C. Klaassen, J. Boschmann, P. Stobbe, P. Ediger, J. Dick, J. Boldt, J. Enns, Jakob Dick, H. Harder (members). In 1905 the congregation had a council of elders (Aeltestenrat), with Isaak Ediger as leading minister; in 1910 the elder was H. Günter.

The reason for founding a new congregation by accepting and soliciting members from other congregations was given as follows: (1) "That members of a church of God must believe with all their heart in Jesus Christ . . ." and (2) "There was a desire for fellowship with all children of God who are concerned with walking uprightly before God. . . ." Some of the members of the Mennonite Brethren Church were voted into the council of elders: Jakob Reimer, Peter Unruh, and Jakob Kröker.

The background and cause for the founding of this congregation was the influence and work of men like F. W. Bädeker (q.v.) and Ströter (q.v.), who emphasized unity of believers, the body of Christ or the congregation, the second coming of Christ, etc. A warm evangelism prevailed in the group and it was an aim to have fellowship with children of God outside their own group on broader scale than was customary among the Mennonites of Russia. Baptism by immersion was practiced, but sprinkling and pouring were also recognized. (For additional details concerning the background see Evangelische Mennoniten-Gemeinden.) The congregation had a place of worship in the village of Lichtfelde.

Under the Soviets the new congregation disintegrated. Many of its members were exiled and others emigrated to Canada and South America. In Canada they organized into similar congregations which later joined the Mennonite Brethren Church; in Brazil they organized and joined the General Conference Mennonite Church, while in Paraguay they still exist as the Evangelische Mennoniten-Gemeinde. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 722-24; H. Dirks, Statistik . . . (1905) 59, 69.

Molotschnaer Mennoniten-Kirchenkonvent (a conference of ministers and elders) was organized by the ministers and elders of the churches of the Molotschna Mennonite settlement around 1850, although (according to Isaac) it was probably loosely functioning under different names before this date. Many of the documents published by Isaac even before 1850 bear such titles as "Vorstand" or "geistlicher Lehrdienst." Sometimes the term "Kirchenkonvent" is used to refer to the ministers of a single congregation. Gradually the name "Molotschnaer Mennoniten-Kirchenkonvent" came into use to include the elders and ministers of all congregations of the Molotschna settlement. The Kirchenkonvent met regularly to discuss significant questions pertaining to the spiritual life and well-being of the individual churches and the total brotherhood. Resolutions passed at the meeting were presented to the individual congregations for approval.

At the time of the revival caused by evangelists like Eduard Wüst (q.v.), with the result that several new Mennonite branches were founded, the Kirchenkonvent dealt with the problems arising from this movement. When the General Conference (Allgemeine Bundeskonferenz, q.v.) was founded in 1910, this body took care of most of the problems, particularly the executive committee of this Conference, known as the Kommission für Kirchenangelegenheiten (q.v.) or KfK. C.K.

H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1950); F. Isaac, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908).

Molotschnaer Mennonitischer Schulrat (Molotschna Mennonite School Board) was created in 1869 to supervise and promote the educational program of the Halbstadt and Gnadenfeld districts of the Molotschna settlement, Ukraine, South Russia. The seal of the organization was in Russian ("Petchat Molotchanskago Mennonitskago Utchilishchnago Soveta"). This organization took over the responsibilities and functions of the Agricultural Association (q.v.) in the realm of education. The first chairman of the organization was Philipp Wiebe. Other members were Peter Schmidt, Andreas Voth, Franz Dyck, and Peter Isaak. Representatives of the ministry during the first years were Isaac Peters of Pordenau, Dietrich Gaeddert of Alexanderwohl. Later significant members were Aron Rempel, Gustav Rempel, Daniel Unger, Abr. Görz, Heinrich Ediger, Gerhard Klassen, Heinrich Franz, H. A. Neufeld, Heinrich J. Janzen, Heinrich Jantz, Peter A. Ediger, Heinrich Unruh, J. K. Klett, P. H. Heese, David Nickel, Peter Unruh, Jacob Esau, Johann Dürksen, Benjamin Ratzlaff, and David Claassen.

Branches of the Molotschna Schulrat were formed in the Crimea, Brazol, Zagradovka, etc. The periods of the Schulrat activities can be divided as follows: (1) Under Andreas Voth the foundations were laid. He created a fund of 2,000 rubles to help young men prepare for the teaching profession, and received from the government the silver medal "For Zeal." Before he retired all the schools in the Molotschna settlement had adopted a uniform curriculum and had introduced the Russian language as a subject. He promoted teachers' conferences (Lehrerkonferenzen) and the introduction of Mädchenschulen (secondary schools for girls), a parallel to the Zentralschulen (secondary schools for boys). (2) The second period followed under P. H. Heese and J. K. Klett (1884-96), both of whom deserve much credit for the continued interest in the improvement of the elementary and secondary education among the Mennonites of the Molotschna settlement and in Russia in general. (3) The third period of the Molotschna Mennonite Schulrat is marked by a decline (1896-1914). During this period of Russian nationalism when the Mennonite educational system was subjected to the Department of Education, the activities of the Schulrat were paralyzed. Other organizations took its place. (See Mennonite Teachers' Conference, Russia.) C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 645; D. P. Enns, "Die mennonitischen Schulen in Russland," Mennonitisches Jahrbuch (Newton, 1950); Peter Braun, "The Educational System of the Mennonite Colonies in South Russia," MQR III (1929) 169-82.

Momber, a widely ramified family, which is found in the records of the Danzig Mennonite Church as far back as 1650, and which lived for the most part in Danzig until the end of the 19th century. The progenitor of the family, Anthony de Momper (b. 1580 in Amsterdam, d. about 1610 in Danzig), emigrated from the Netherlands to Danzig on account of religious oppression, and changed the name to Momber.

The Dutch ancestors of Anthony Momber can be traced back to 1440 in Brugge, Belgium. Jean de Momper I and his son Jean de Momper II (1485-1540), noted landscape painters in Brugge, were Catholic. The next son, Jodocus (Joos) de Momper I, alias van Lyons (b. 1516 in Brugge, d. 1580 in Antwerp), also a painter, became a Calvinist. His son Bartholomäus I (b. 1535, famed painter, publisher, art dealer, and guildmaster in Amsterdam) was the father of Jodocus (Joos) de Momper II (1564-1635), who is still known for his landscapes in various European galleries, and who was a painter, etcher, and guildmaster in Antwerp, a friend of van Dyck and probably also of Rembrandt. Van Dyck and de Momper painted each other's portraits.

Another son of Jodocus I, Hendrik de Momper (Momboir, b. 1540 in Amsterdam), was the father of the emigrant Anthony de Momper mentioned above. Anthony as well as his brothers Hendrick and Hans, who stayed in Amsterdam, became Mennonites. Another Anthony Momber was a member and probably a deacon of the Flemish congregation of Amsterdam in 1629 (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 571). Anthony's descendants in Danzig were craftsmen. Many served in various offices in the Mennonite congregation in Danzig. Abraham Momber, the oldest representative listed in the church records of Danzig (Oct. 3, 1650-May 20, 1712), was chosen deacon by the Flemish congregation in Danzig in 1694, and preacher in 1703. His wife Maria de Veer (1661-1742) was appointed as deaconess of the congregation in 1720. Anton Momber (1670-1735) was widely known as the founder of the first coffeehouse in Danzig (about 1700), in which German and foreign newspapers were read and which was comparable to the London coffeehouse. At the home of Jacob Momber (1704-72), a merchant, the elders of the congregation held a meeting to discuss arrangements for the care of the poor and a place for religious services during the bombardment of Danzig in 1734.

His son Hans Momber I (1742-1815), a deacon and preacher in the Flemish congregation, was according to the church chronicles, "gifted with rich talents and skilled in speaking and writing." For several years he collaborated with Peter Thiessen and Jakob de Veer in compiling the first German hymnal for the Danzig church, translating some hymns from the Dutch and writing others himself. Some of his hymns are still to be found in the Danzig hymnal. He had a special gift for composing hymns for special occasions, some of which have been preserved. He was a leader in the merger of the Flemish and Frisian branches of the brotherhood in 1808.

His cousin Berend Momber (March 15, 1755-April 25, 1840), a merchant, was the first Mennonite to acquire citizenship when Danzig was incorporated in Prussia. The Danzig state library contained his extensive manuscript of the history of his family during the siege. His wife Cäcilie lost her life in the bombardment of the city in 1813.

August Momber (March 9, 1807-Dec. 16, 1882) established the linen business that grew from small beginnings into one of Danzig's leading industries. In 1869 he became a member of the church council. He took an active part in the change in the position of the congregation on nonresistance, mixed marriages, and the admission of members of related groups. He cheerfully sacrificed for the common good, and enjoyed the esteem of all.

When he lost his sight in 1880 his son Julius Momber (Dec. 25, 1839-Dec. 5, 1900) succeeded him on the church council. He and his brother Otto (Jan. 30, 1847-May 5, 1929) carried on the paternal business.

Julius was from 1876 an active member of the church council and promoter of the Vereinigung (q.v.; Conference of German Mennonite Churches). In the political life of his city he filled several posts of honor, and was also a patron of the arts.

The oldest son of August Momber, Albert Momber (July 26, 1837-June 6, 1909), was a teacher in the Danzig Gymnasium and in 1901 took the place of his deceased brother Julius on the church council. He was a highly honored figure in the public life of the city. The name was still common in the congregation at the time of its dispersal in 1945.

Some members of this family were found in Königsberg (q.v.), East Prussia, while Hermann Momber was a "possementierer" (lacemaker, or merchant) and a distiller of brandy about 1735. Others were found in Berlin. W.M.

H. G. Mannhardt, Die Danziger Mennonitengemeinde (Danzig, 1919); Menn. Bl.; ADB XXII, 158-60; family archives; Gesch.-Bl. VIII (1956) 22, 27 f.; ML III, 158 f.

Mömpelgard: see Montbéliard.

Momper, Jodocus de, a painter: see Momber.

Monatsblätter aus Bethel College, later Monatsblätter, successor to School and College Journal, was the 16-page, 6½ x 9, monthly periodical published by the board of directors of Bethel College January 1903-June 1918, when it was succeeded by the Bethel College Monthly, an all-English publication. From January 1903 to December 1909 it was a separate publication issued in a parallel series with the Bethel College Monthly. From January 1909 to June 1918 it was published in combination with the Bethel College Monthly, appearing ten times a year during this period. Its purpose was to promote the denominational and religious interests of Mennonites through the publication of articles of Biblical, historical, and general cultural interest. Its aim was to gain friends for higher education among Mennonites. David Goerz, its editor 1903-8, wrote extensively on deaconess work and his travels to India and Russia. Other editors were P. H. Richert, P. J. Wedel, Emil R. Riesen, J. H. Langenwalter, J. F. Balzer, and H. H. Wiebe. J.F.S.

Mönchshof, an estate near Schweinfurt, Bavaria, Germany, which was farmed by Mennonites until the end of the 19th century, who together with those at Bildhausen (q.v.) formed a Mennonite congregation (Menn. Bl., 1856, 80), which has been merged with the Trappstadt (q.v.) congregation since the 1880's. (ML III, 160.) NEFF.

Monchy, de, a Dutch family of French Protestant descent, which about 1650 moved to the Netherlands as military officers, settling at Gouda. Many members of this family, from about 1740 living at Rotterdam, Holland, were Mennonites. The first de Monchys in Rotterdam were brewers and distillers; after about 1800 they were mostly engaged in trading, banking, and the directorate of the Holland-America Line. Two of them were noted physicians of Rotterdam. S. J. R. de Monchy (b. 1880 at Rotterdam), also a Mennonite, was burgomaster of Arnhem 1921-34 and of The Hague 1934-50. Marius Jacobus de Monchy, b. 1909 at Rotterdam, a musician and composer, is an organist in the Rotterdam Mennonite Church. The following members of this family served in the Rotterdam Mennonite church council: Engel Pieter de Monchy I (1793-1883), a merchant, later president of the Nederlandsche Handel-Maatschappij (Dutch Trading Co.), a member of the First Chamber of the States-General, who also was a trustee of the A.D.S. (Dutch Mennonite General Conference); then Michiel Marinus de Monchy (1820-98), a merchant, thereupon president of the Rotterdam Bank, Salomon Jean René de Monchy (1824-1917), director of a trading company, Engel Pieter de Monchy II (1836-1919), a broker, all three sons of Engel Pieter de Monchy I, Salomon Jean René de Monchy II (1863-1930), a merchant, and Henri Gérard Jean de Monchy (1882-), son of Engel Pieter de Monchy II, director of a trading company. vdZ.

Ned. Patriciaat XXV (1935) 142-62; N.N.B.Wb. I, 1342-45; IV, 1006 f.

Mönchzell, a village in the Heidelberg district of Baden, Germany, pop. (1933) 582, railway station Meckesheim on the Elsenz, was from 1896 to 1916 the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Previously Meckesheim (q.v.) had been the center; in 1916 the congregation merged with the Sinsheim (q.v.) congregation. Services were held every two weeks on the Mönchzell estate. There were approximately 36 members. The family names were Bechtel, Fellmann, Mosemann, and Binkele. (ML III, 160.) W.F.

Mongolia, a highland on the continent of Asia, which now belongs to Russia. In Inner Mongolia, the smaller southern division of the country, the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren of America opened a mission in the city of Chotzeshan, about 250 miles north of Peking, with several subsidiary stations. Buildings were erected for evangelization, school, and hospital. The inhabitants of the city and the district showed a wish for the Gospel and participated actively in the services. The establishment of the Communist regime in China in 1950 put an end to the mission. (ML III, 160). HEGE.

Monnikendam (Monnickendam), a town (1947 population 2,762, with 169 Mennonites) in the Dutch province of North Holland, from the beginning of the Reformation a center of Protestant activity. On Nov. 20, 1527, Wendelmoet Claes (q.v.) of Monnikendam was burned at the stake in The Hague. Though this martyr is listed in Offer des Heeren and the later Dutch martyrbooks including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, she was not an Anabaptist in the strict sense but a "Sacramentist" (q.v.), a group which helped to prepare the soil upon which Anabaptism could flourish.

In Monnikendam there were soon many Anabaptists. In 1534 the Catholic priest of Monnikendam reported that probably two thirds of the city was "contaminated with the Anabaptist doctrine." In 1535 the persecution in North Holland began, with its center in Monnikendam. Many Anabaptists hid in the reeds or fled to Amsterdam. Therefore the number of Anabaptist victims who were natives of Monnikendam is not very high. At Monnikendam Arent Jacobsz was executed in 1539 with his wife and son. Among the Anabaptists of Monnikendam revolutionary Münsterite influence was very strong, and many of them were in the boats which crossed the Zuiderzee in March 1534 en route to Münster. When the persecution subsided there was a large group of peaceful Anabaptists in the city. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 62 persons here in 1563-65 and later another six persons. Pieter Willems Bogaert (q.v.), who was a preacher (ca. 1565) and elder (1588) of the Frisian congregation at Monnikendam, presented to William of Orange the considerable sum the Dutch Mennonites had raised to help in the liberation of Holland from the Spanish yoke. Concerning the history of the Mennonites of Monnikendam there is little information. Besides the Frisian congregation there was a Waterlander congregation, with which the Frisian seems to have merged soon after 1600.

In 1675 the Monnikendam congregation, then numbering 150 members, requested admission to the Lamist Sociëteit. Some four decades earlier it had joined the Rijper (Waterlander) Sociëteit. In all the collections organized by the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs, several times in 1672-1736 in behalf of the persecuted Mennonites in Switzerland, the Palatinate, Jülich, Prussia, and Lithuania, the congregation of Monnikendam contributed liberally, though their number was rather small and decreased with the decline in the population of the town whose business of shipping to the Baltic Sea was severely injured by the wars in which Holland was involved at that time.

In 1771-1806 Jan Nieuwenhuyzen (q.v.), founder of the "Maatschappij tot nut van 't Algemeen" (q.v.), served the Monnikendam congregation as preacher. He was followed by Govert Jans van Rijswijk 1806-8, Reitze de Vries 1809-14, and 1817-58, Jacob Julius 1860-62, J. van der Ploeg 1863-83, S. J. Dekker 1884-91, J. N. Wiersma 1894-96, E. M. ten Cate 1896-1904, E. Pekema 1907-9, F. F. Milatz 1910-18, and P. H. Veen 1919-33. After a vacancy of nearly two years in the pulpit the congregation made an agreement in February 1935 with the neighboring Edam (q.v.) congregation, and has since been served by the Edam pastor.

Concerning membership no figures were available for the 19th century. In 1847 the baptized membership numbered 60; it was 85 in 1897, 74 in 1955. There is a ladies' circle. The present church dates from the 19th century; it has a copper lectern from the 17th century, no doubt from a former meetinghouse. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 20, 31, 75, 80, 94, 98-100, 110, 113, 116 f., 137, 445, 708, 860, 1164, 1180; II, Nos. 2142 f.; II, 2, No. 296; Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 24, 44, 332, 355; II, 204, 232; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 87, 173-75, 340, 349; Mellink, Wederdopers, 158-64 and passim; ML III, 160.

Monnikendam, Keizer van, an Anabaptist martyr: see Arent Jacobssen.

Monroe County (Miss.) Amish settlement, now extinct. A small colony of Old Order Amish moved to western Monroe Co. and eastern Chickasaw Co., Miss., from Newton Co., Ind., in the winter of 1895-96. The address of the settlement was Gibson and Aberdeen. The first to acquire land in Monroe County were John T. Yoder and Eli E. Miller, when they purchased two plantations with 3,300 acres. The settlement at its largest consisted of about 25 families. By 1904 all of the Amish settlers had sold their land and moved back north. About 1937-38 a few families again bought homes near Aberdeen, and in 1949 about 8-10 families were living in Monroe County, but no congregation developed. J.A.H.

Monroe First Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Monroe, Snohomish Co., Wash., a member of the Pacific District Conference, was organized on April 22, 1918, with 33 charter members, with the help of P. R. Aeschliman. The first settlers came from Oklahoma and Kansas in 1911. The congregation purchased the present church site in 1922. The hall, completely remodeled in 1946, seats 250. The membership in 1956 was 86, with George W. Kopper as pastor. G.W.K.

Monschau (Mondschau, Monjoie, Monjou, Montjoie), a town in the Eifel (q.v.) Mountains in the district of Aachen, Germany, the birthplace of the martyr Maria van Montjoie (q.v.), executed there in 1552. It is not very likely that Maria's death was an isolated instance, but about Anabaptism-Mennonitism in Monschau there is not much information. Elder Theunis van Hastenrath visited Monschau about 1550, but did not preach or baptize in the town. Ottius published a letter of 1557 which states that there were in the Eifel area more than 50 congregations, most of them with a large membership, of Moravian Hutterites (see Merlanders). Later there was a Mennonite congregation in or near Monschau. On Jan. 24, 1711, Jan Helgers, preacher of Burtscheid near Aachen, wrote a letter to Abr. Jacob Fries at Amsterdam, informing Fries, the treasurer of the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs, that the Mennonites of Monschau had been expelled from hearth and home and were now planning to settle in the Dutch province of South Holland; Jan Pluys, their preacher, had already moved there, and they hoped to earn their living by farming. vdZ.

J. H. Ottius, Annales Anabaptistica (Basel, 1672) 130; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1305; DB 1909, 123; Der Mennonit IX (1956) No. 1, p. 10; No. 7, p. 108; Walter Scheibler, Geschichte der Evangelischen Gemeinde Monschau 1520-1939 (Aachen, 1939) 15-33, "Die Wiedertäufer im Monschauer Land."

Monsheim, a village near Worms, Rhenish Hesse, Germany, since 1820 the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Previously the center had been Kriegsheim (q.v.). At the time of the engagement of the first trained minister, Leonhard Weydmann 1819-36, a new church was built at Monsheim and a parsonage was bought near by. Official records show that the Amsterdam Mennonite Church contributed 600 gilders for this church and parsonage; the proceeds from the sale of the old church in Kriegsheim were also applied to this purchase. The land for the site was apparently donated by the Möllinger family in Monsheim. Much of the work of the building was done by the members according to a fixed schedule and assessment. A workman lost his life in the erection of the building.

In 1836-68 the preacher of the Monsheim congregation was Johannes Molenaar (q.v.), who is known for his formulary, catechism, and hymnal, as well as other literary works. In 1838 several families who were dissatisfied with his work joined another congregation.

In 1859, when the last lay preacher of the neighboring Obersülzen (q.v.) congregation died, that congregation joined with Monsheim for preaching services, though keeping its own organization in all other respects. In 1866 Obersülzen built a church of its own. In that year the congregation at Oberflörsheim (q.v.), which had for some years been served by Molenaar, merged with Monsheim. In 1867 Adolf Ellenberger succeeded Molenaar as pastor at Monsheim, and served until 1889.

Until 1872 the Monsheim congregational singing was led by choristers (Vorsänger). "Anyone who has ever had the opportunity to hear such singing will never have a moment's doubt as to its artistic or edificatory value," says one of the old church documents. In 1872 the Monsheim church acquired an organ. In 1881 a new church constitution was adopted, which had been drawn up in 1869 and circulated among the members. It stipulated that the preacher should as a rule have formal training, and the council should have at least six members. Baptism was to be administered in the late summer and communion observed four times annually.

In 1886 the congregation joined the Vereinigung (Conference of German Mennonite Churches), represented in Berlin by Christian Finger, who was also chosen treasurer of the council. In 1886 a fund was established for the congregation. His successor was his son Hermann, who served on the council 1907-29. On Sept. 5, 1889, the congregation was incorporated through the efforts of Jakob Finger (q.v.), the brother of Christian Finger, minister of state. In the fall of 1889 the old parsonage was sold and a new one bought. In 1892 the church was remodeled. The preachers of the congregation in more recent times were Philipp Kieferndorf 1889-94, Gerhard Haake 1896-99, Johannes Hirschler 1899-1926, Walter Fellmann 1927-45, Emil Händiges 1945-54, and Alexander Prieur 1954- . The constitution stipulates that at least 30 services are to be held in Monsheim each year, and 20 in the subsidiary congregation in Obersülzen. In 1895 the Monsheim congregation had about 300 members; in 1939 only about 200, who lived in many neighboring villages. The membership in 1955 was 286, including 74 refugees from the East. W.F.

Ernst Correll, Das schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925); ML III, 160 f.

Mont des Oiseaux (German, Vogelsberg), the location of a Mennonite children's home in Northern Alsace located within a few rods of the German border near the village of Weiler some three miles from Wissembourg, commonly called the Weiler Children's Home. In the summer of 1945 the Mennonite Central Committee, with the help of several French relief organizations, opened the Weiler Children's Home under the direction of Mme. Roger Georges, for the purpose of giving good food and care to approximately forty undernourished or temporarily homeless war-suffering children between the ages of two and six years. As soon as conditions permitted, the MCC sent food, clothing, and American personnel to the home. The home is surrounded by a beautiful forest which provides unusual opportunity for educational and recreational activities.

In the spring of 1947 Mme. Georges was replaced by an American representative, Mary Byler. During the years that followed, a state-recognized kindergarten was opened, summer Bible camps were organized for children between the ages of 7 and 14, and the main building was enlarged and equipped with modern conveniences. More significant than these physical changes, however, were the changes in the nature and purpose of the work. With time, the need for war relief naturally decreased and the home, trying always to help where the need seemed the greatest, found itself caring for children from divorced or separated parents, illegitimate children, or children whose parents were ill. Increased attention was given to the mission opportunities these homes and children presented.

In 1951 the "Association Fraternelle Mennonite," an official organization of the French Mennonite churches, purchased the children's home property for 6,000,000 French francs (approximately $17,142) plus a 25 per cent sales tax. Then followed a five-year period of transition as MCC help decreased and French participation increased. By the fall of 1956 the home was operating independent of MCC help (except for continued shipments of food and clothing) and under the direction of Regina Nussbaumer, Basel, Switzerland. It is probable that within the near future the home will prepare to receive mentally retarded children in order to meet what appears to be the most urgent present-day need and also in order to receive increased governmental financial support. M.B.C.

Mont Tramelan, a Mennonite school situated in a French-speaking area of the Bernese Jura, Switzerland. The language of instruction is German. The enrollment is some thirty; the teacher is P. Pulver. This school, like those at La Chaux d'Abel, Montbautier, and Moron, is subsidized by the state, while those of Jeangisboden, La Paturatte, and Le Perceux are financed privately. vdZ.

Montana was admitted to the Union in 1889. In 1955 the total Mennonite membership in the state was over 800. Soon after 1900 Mennonites began to arrive as individuals and as family groups. The first congregation established was Mountain View (MC), founded in 1903 near Creston not far from Kalispell in the far northwest corner by Amish Mennonite settlers from Oregon. In 1955 it had 98 members. Old Order Amish families settled in Dawson County in 1903, and General Conference Mennonites in 1906.

The Old Order Amish lost several members through migration; the rest joined the Red Top Mennonite (MC) Church near Bloomfield, Dawson Co., which was organized in 1917. A church was built by this group in 1936 and enlarged in 1952. The membership of the church in 1955 was 59. Some members of the Red Top Mennonite Church moved to the near-by city of Glendive and organized the Little White Chapel congregation in 1948. It acquired a church in 1949, which was remodeled in 1952. The membership in 1955 was 39. Another small Mennonite (MC) group was reported at Coalridge, Sheridan Co., with 10 members in 1955, organized as a congregation in 1916.

General Conference Mennonites who settled in Dawson County in 1906 organized the Bethlehem Mennonite Church (q.v.) at Bloomfield in 1910. The first meetinghouse was built in 1912 and was enlarged several times. Membership of this group was 155 in 1955. Several families of this group settled in Glendive, building their own house of worship in 1948. In 1950 it became an independent congregation, with a membership of 60 in 1955.

General Conference Mennonites and Mennonite Brethren settled along the Missouri River at Frazer and Wolf Point and north as far as Lustre and Larslan in eastern Valley County during the early years of World War I (1915-16). The Northern District (GCM) sent workers to the Lustre-Bethel area from 1917 on. In 1924 the groups at Lustre and Volt organized as the Bethel Mennonite Church (q.v.). This congregation numbered 84 members in 1955. The Bethel Mennonite Church (q.v.) at Wolf Point is first reported in 1935. In 1955 this congregation totaled 83 members.

The Mennonite Brethren organized a church at Lustre (q.v.) in 1917, erecting a church building in 1923. A group at Volt also organized in 1917 but has been affiliated with the Lustre group. The total Lustre M.B. congregation numbered 133 in 1952. The group at Larslan (q.v.) was organized in 1945, and in 1952 reported a membership of 37. Small groups of Mennonite Brethren existed for brief periods at Chinook, Whitefish, Hydro, and Poplar.

The Evangelical Mennonite Brethren were also represented in the original settlement of the community about Lustre (q.v.). This group was organized in 1917, building its first meetinghouse the same year, and a new church ten years later. In 1954 its total membership was 103.

All of the Mennonite churches in Montana are located in the far northeast corner of the state, except the congregation at Creston in the far northwest corner.

All Mennonite groups in Montana passed through a particularly painful crisis during World War I. The use of German was prohibited in the church services and the minister at the Bethlehem Mennonite at Bloomfield was abducted and held prisoner under threat of being lynched. (See Menn. Life, October 1952.)

One institution is being sponsored in Montana on an inter-Mennonite basis, viz., Lustre Bible Academy.

The G.C.M. Church established extensive mission work among the Cheyenne Indians on the Tongue River Reservation in Southwestern Montana. This was begun in 1904 by Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Linscheid, followed by others, including Mr. and Mrs. Rodolphe Petter in 1916. Churches have been maintained at Busby (q.v.), Lame Deer (q.v.), and Birney (q.v.) with a total membership of 283 in 1950.

In 1952 there were 11 Hutterite Bruderhofs in Montana, with a total population of 919. The four Dariusleut (q.v.) Bruderhofs, settled in 1935 and 1945-47, were located near Lewistown, the seven Lehrerleut Bruderhofs, all settled in 1945-50 mostly between Choteau and Valier, with one almost at the Alberta border near Sweetgrass, and south of Augusta. By 1955 an additional Lehrerleut Bruderhof was settled near Cut Bank, almost at the Alberta border. (See article Hutterian Brethren, with maps.) J.F.S.

John H. Lohrenz, The Mennonite Brethren Church (Hillsboro, 1950); G. S. Rempel, A Historical Sketch of the Churches of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren (Rosthern, 1939); Menn. Life IX (July 1954) and VII (October 1952); Minutes and Reports, Northern District Conference (GCM); "Missions, Home and Foreign, of the General Conference Mennonite Church" (Mennonite Biblical Seminary, Chicago, 1953); Chris A. Buller, "Fifty Years in Dawson County, Montana," Menn. Life IX (July 1954); Rufus M. Franz, "It Happened in Montana," Menn. Life VII (October 1952).

Montanus, Herman, a Reformed "alumnus" in Leiden, later a Remonstrant (q.v.) preacher, and finally, attracted by Socinianism, he joined in the criticism of the traditional doctrines of the church. In 1647 he wrote a booklet on the inadequacy of infant baptism, with the title Nietigheydt van de Kinder-doop, noyt voor desen soo overvloedelyk ende klaerlyk uyt kerckelycke historien, Oudvaderen, en voornamelyck uyt de H. Schrift bewesen (Amsterdam, 1647, 1648, 1700, 1702, 1848). On the basis of the sources he proves that infant baptism is unscriptural, and that in spite of Tertullian's protest Augustine established the ceremony as a general church custom in the fourth century. He attributes the gradual replacement of adult baptism by infant baptism to Augustine's doctrine of original sin, which counts newborn infants as sinful. Montanus names all those who through the centuries protested against infant baptism, and shows (at least apparently) that in certain localities of Italy adult baptism was practiced throughout the Middle Ages.

The Mennonites are mentioned only once in a marginal note. Does this indicate that Montanus was interested primarily in the criticism of the church, and only secondarily in faith? Or did he assume that Mennonite practice was known? He names (p. 91) Pacimontanus, i.e., Hubmaier (q.v.), who died at the stake in Vienna, and who opposed Luther's teaching. On the whole the book still deserves to be read as a compilation of material opposing infant baptism, aside from the considerable material on the subject which had already been written by the Mennonites. (ML III, 162). H.Q.

Montanus, Johannes Fabricius: see Fabricius Johannes.

Montau, a Mennonite congregation in former West Prussia, near Neuenburg (Schwetz district). According to documents preserved in Danzig this settlement had existed since 1568, for on Feb. 2, 1568, a number of Dutch Mennonites had moved in from the Danzig Werder—Thomas and Peter Jansen, Leonhard von Rho (garbled; probably Leenaert van Rhoon), Bernhard von Baygen (Berent van Bargen), Andreas (Andries) Unrau, and their companions and relatives—and concluded a rental contract with Hans Dulzky of Roggenhausen; it included the villages of Montau and Sanskau, an area of 50 hooves. The further settlement of the Schwetz-Neuenburg lowlands apparently radiated from here. The documents also indicate the Dutch origin of the settlers. Other evidence of this origin is seen in the architecture and in the Dutch Bibles preserved in some of these homes. Dutch was the language used in preaching until the 18th century. Later, when the Mennonites spread over the entire lowland, a subsidiary church was built at Obergruppe in 1776.

In course of the 16th and 17th centuries there were several additional immigrations from Holland. The Montau group was the first to settle near the left bank of the Vistula River, and gradually spread out over a wide area; as early as 1598 a number of Mennonites from Montau settled near Sanskau to begin the cultivation of this area. Others settled at Gruppe, Deutsch-Westphalen, Gross-Lubin, Neunhuben, Dragass, all in the neighborhood of Montau. In the late 18th century some of its members moved to Brenkenhoffswalde and to Deutsch-Kazun. The area of Montau was in the 17th and 18th centuries struck by various calamities. About 1620 the Mennonites had some difficulty with the governors, but in 1623 obtained freedom from military service and quartering. About 1657 during the Swedish-Prussian war Mennonite property was severely damaged by the passing armies; the floods of the Vistula repeatedly damaged the fields and the houses, particularly in 1677, when a number of farms were destroyed and many people and cattle perished, and many fields were ruined by the sand washed over them. A few years later they suffered a total crop failure. In 1727 the passing armies (Polish, Saxon, Swedish, Russian) plundered the farms to such an extent that they had to sell some of their land to pay their taxes. After 1772, when this area was occupied by Prussia, conditions were somewhat improved; but during the Napoleonic wars (1806-15) the congregation again suffered severely. In many of their tribulations the Montau Mennonites were financially supported by the Dutch Mennonites.

In the 16-18th centuries the Montau congregation belonged to the Frisian Mennonite branch. At a conference held in Montau in 1568 delegates from Danzig, Elbing, the "Kleine Marienburger Werder," Montau, and Thorn resolved to side with the Frisian party in the Netherlands. The first elder was very probably Hilchen Schmidt (Hylke Smit), who was commissioned by the Haarlem congregation in 1588 to depose Quiryn van der Meulen (q.v.) from the office of elder in Danzig.

The date of the building of the first church is not certain. But records show that there was one in 1568. This was a frame building with thatched roof. By 1859 it had become so badly ruined by several floods of the Vistula that it had to be practically rebuilt. The congregation later had two large churches, one in Montau with a small tower and a clock, which was built in 1898, Sister (a deaconess) Marie Schröder having willed a large amount to the congregation for this purpose. It had two stained glass windows. The other church was in Gruppe (q.v.), without a tower, built in 1865. The congregation had no cemetery. Concerning the membership there are no exact figures before 1789. In the 16th and 17th centuries the congregation must have been rather small, apparently not more than 100 baptized members, but during the 18th century there was a rapid increase. In 1789 the membership (including children), numbered 847; 829 in 1845, 536 in 1917, 375 in 1941 (300 baptized members and 75 children).

Montau was served by the following elders after about 1661: Hans Baltzer (1628-1706), from ca. 1661 until 1702; David Schroeder served probably 1702-6. He was followed by David Block (1663-1756), preacher from 1714, elder 1738-56; Frans Gerts (d. 1757), preacher 1725, elder 1756-57; Abraham Schroeder (1718-81), preacher 1754, elder 1758-81; Steffen Kerber (1734-1800), preacher 1767, elder 1781-1800; Peter Kerber (1760-1814), preacher 1795, elder 1801-14; Peter Kerber, Jr. (1782-1821), preacher 1801, elder 1814-18; Hans Goerz (1794-1830), preacher 1814, elder 1821-30; Peter Foth (1795-1850), preacher 1826, elder 1830-50; Isaac Kopper (1809-56), preacher 1826, elder 1850-56; Peter Bartel (1812-79), preacher 1840, elder 1856-79; Gerhard Kopper (1840-1928), preacher 1871, elder 1881-1925; Wilhelm Tyart (1868-1932), preacher 1897 in Gruppe, elder Montau-Gruppe 1926-32; Bernhard Kopper, preacher 1924, elder 1934-45.

For centuries the congregation held to the old doctrines and practices, including nonresistance. The North German law issued on Nov. 9, 1867, threatening to deprive the Mennonites of their old privilege of freedom of military service also confused the congregation in Montau. After much correspondence and several audiences at Berlin, the church council accepted a new church constitution drawn up by Elder Peter Bartel, which permitted members to accept noncombatant service, as offered by the Order of Cabinet of March 3, 1868, but threatened to excommunicate those choosing military service; this was, however, never carried out. The question of military service caused the Obergruppe congregation to split off from the Montau church in 1869; the new group refused to tolerate soldiers as members, whereas the Montau congregation did not exclude such members. In 1920 the breach was healed, and the combined brotherhood was then called the Montau-Gruppe congregation.

Church records were kept since the 17th century. The important documents were preserved in the Danzig archives. In the village of Gruppe the congregation had an almshouse.

A large endowment for ministers' salaries vanished during the inflation of 1923. The members were mostly farmers, though there were also tradesmen and craftsmen among them. In 1939 the congregation had about 400 members, who lived in the neighboring villages and the cities of Graudenz and Neuenburg. Between 1918 and 1939, while the area belonged to Poland, some German members of the congregation were expelled to Germany; other emigrations also took place. Though there were some transfers from other denominations, the membership declined by about one hundred. In 1945 the congregation was dissolved by mass flight westward like all the other Prussian congregations.

G.K., vdZ.

L. Stobbe, Montau-Gruppe. Ein Gedenkblatt an die Besiedlung der Schwetz - Neuenburger Niederlassung (Montau, 1918); H. Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg a. d. Lahn, 1952) 18 ff., 47, 73 ff.; Felicia Szper, Nederl. Nederzettingen in West-Pruisen gedurende den Poolschen tijd (Enkhuizen, 1913) 139 f., 203, 206; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1564, 1609, 1647 f., 1652, 1667 f.; II, 2626, 2651; ML III, 162 f.

Montauerweide, in the Marienburg Marsh near the Vistula, West Prussia, was in 1730 rented in long-lease to a number of Dutch farmers; soon the majority of the inhabitants were Mennonites, belonging to the congregation of Zwanzigerweide, later Tragheimerweide (q.v.). Among the names are Unrau (6), Stobbe (3), Penner (2), Sibert (2), Schultz (2), Harder, Claass, Tgart, Ewert, Harm, Pauls, Jantz, Nickel, Ediger, Frantz, Bartel, Woelms, Block Baltzer.

vdZ.

Felicia Szper, Ned. Nederzettingen in West-Pruisen (Enkhuizen, 1913) 122 f.; H. Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg a. d. Lahn, 1952) 40, 84 f.

Montbautier, a Mennonite school in the Bernese Jura, Switzerland; the teacher is A. Amstutz, and the enrollment about thirty. Although it is located in a French-speaking area, the teaching medium of this school is German. It is subsidized by the government. vdZ.

Montbéliard (Mömpelgard), a town (pop. 13,600) in eastern France, close to the Swiss border, 12 miles south of Belfort, is located in a densely settled industrial region. It was once the capital of the gravure of Montbéliard, which was a possession of Württemberg from 1397 to 1796.

The first Mennonites came to Montbéliard as refugees from Bern, Switzerland, in the early 18th century. They had connections with other Mennonites who had fled to the bishopric of Basel in the Swiss Jura and to the gravure of Neuchatel. Others came from the Rappoltstein area which was especially hard hit by the order of Louis XIV expelling the Mennonites from Alsace in 1712. Many Mennonites, especially from the Markirch (Ste-Marie-aux-Mines) (Leber) Valley, went to Montbéliard, and a rather strong congregation was organized in this region. The Mennonites settled exclusively on the estates of Duke Leopold-Eberhard, who had dispossessed many of his subjects and found these foreigners very welcome, the more so when they soon proved themselves to be honest and competent farmers. Their presence was naturally resented by the populace, but they were protected by the counts, although the counts made it clear to the Mennonites that they were merely tolerated and refused to give them any written contracts. The Mennonites were permitted to have their own cemetery, which is still in use, and to organize a school, and they were released from the oath. But they were refused permission to build a church. They began a church record in 1750, the first church record among the Swiss Mennonites. Among the Mennonite family names found in the region of Montbéliard in 1759 were Roth, Frey, Schmucker, Mosimann, Meyer, Krähenbühl, Kohler, Baumgartner, Eicher, Schuhmacher, Oberli, Kauffman, Hostetler, Gerber, and Wählti. From 1765 Hans Rich was for a long time the elder of this Amish congregation.

In 1790 there was a wave of emigration to Poland, the reason for which is no longer clear, when several groups from Montbéliard and some from the Upper Alsatian congregations emigrated to Poland. The old church book, which dates back to 1750, says of the migration: "So Samuel Stoll (preacher) and Christian Känel (elder) with their companions and travelers went away together on Sept. 22, 1790, from Montbéliard to Poland in the Palantinä Värsowie. Hans Schindtler led them as far as Ulm, so they arrived in Ulm on Oct. 4; then they traveled on the Danube to Vienna and arrived on Oct. 24, 1790. May God the Father lead them further." A list compiled in 1793 contains 36 family names with a total of 50 persons (including children) who comprised the congregation.

The French Revolution, which united Montbéliard with France, brought much unrest into the congregation. All citizens had to swear an oath and be enrolled in the National Guard. The Mennonites protested. The central government granted their request and peace was restored in the congregation. Nor were they drafted in the Napoleonic wars. The idea of sending delegates to the emperor with a petition in 1809 originated in Montbéliard.

Up to this time the Mennonites had been renters. But gradually they began to acquire property. This is probably the reason why there was no movement to the interior as was the case in the Lorraine congregations. The German language could also be maintained much longer here. There was repeated influx from Alsace and Switzerland. On the other hand the congregation lost many members to other churches through marriage, and many emigrated to America.

Services were held in private homes in and around Montbéliard, as far as the adjacent portions of the Jura, where many Swiss families had settled. When the congregation built a church in 1833 the mountain families formed a congregation of their own, known as the Seigne congregation (Sennergemeinde). This congregation, which had at first a rather large membership, gradually died out, the families moving into the vicinity of Montbéliard and Porrentruy (Pruntrut) in Switzerland.

The Montbéliard congregation also survived a critical period. The determined holding to the German language, which only a few understood, conflict between leading personalities, and lack of contact with other Mennonites had a baneful effect. But conditions soon changed. Ministers from Switzerland visited the congregation. The French language was adopted for singing and preaching. Conference activity increased, and signs of a new life became apparent.

The Montbéliard congregation suffered least during World War I, since it was not in a zone of combat. Also many of its members were citizens of Switzerland and were consequently not drafted. Religious services could continue regularly. After the war a new increase came from Alsace with increased life, so that the old "du Canal" church, in use from 1832, became too small. A new church was built at la Prarie and dedicated in 1930, with a seating capacity of 400. Services are held here every Sunday, besides Sunday school, prayer meetings, Bible study, hymn sings, and evangelistic meetings. The membership, numbering 250 in 1795, 150 in 1887, was 300 in 1956, including unbaptized children. P.So.

Church records; Delbert L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 85, 87-89; Mannhardt, Jahrbuch 1888, 42; ML III, 163 f.

Monterey Mennonite Church (MC), located on Route 1, Bird-in-Hand, at the little village of Monterey in Upper Leacock Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., is a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference. The first meetings of the congregation were held the first Sunday of October 1946. The membership is largely urban. Glenn Esh was ordained by the congregation and serves as its minister; O. N. Johns is the bishop. The membership in 1956 was 200. G.Es.

Montevideo (pop. ca. 750,000), the capital of Uruguay, has had some Mennonite inhabitants ever since the first European Mennonite immigrants, largely refugees from the Danzig area with a few from the Lemberg area of Poland and a few from Russia, arrived in October 1948. In 1956 there were approximately 200 of these immigrants living in the city. A congregation, the Montevideo Mennonite Church which meets at Vilardebo 964, has been organized in the city; it had 220 members in 1956 and belongs to the Uruguay Mennonite Conference (affiliated with the General Conference Mennonite Church in North America). There is also a Mennonite Brethren congregation of 79 members, which meets at Calle Pedro Berro 1114, called the El Ombu congregation, since many of its members live in the El Ombu colony. There is also an M.B. Bible School in the city. The Mennonite Church (MC) of North America established a mission in the city in 1954 with four workers. The MCC has had a center in the city since 1948, and now owns the house at Vilardebo 964. The Mennonite Biblical Seminary, a bilingual (Spanish and German) training school, operated by a board composed of representatives from all the Mennonite groups in South America who desire to co-operate and supported by the mission boards of the M.C. and the G.C.M. churches in North America, was established in 1956. It also is located at Vilardebo 964. H.S.B.

Montezuma Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church is located near Montezuma, Gray Co., Kan. The first members arrived in 1912. In this group there was Peter A. Friesen, the first resident minister, who served the congregation until 1918. Before 1915 the worship services were conducted in homes and in a small frame meetinghouse, which was later enlarged, and in 1946 replaced by a new brick structure with a seating capacity of 900. The German language, formerly used in the services, has now been replaced by the English. The members are of Dutch-Russian Mennonite descent and the Low German dialect is still spoken in many homes. The Sunday school was organized in 1935. Three sewing circles are functioning. Several members of the congregation are actively engaged in missionary work. The local burial plan organized in 1940 is operating successfully. Bethel Home (q.v.) for the aged was built in 1950. The membership in 1957 was 386, with Daniel J. Koehn as minister in charge. The congregation survived the dust storms and extreme drought of the 1930's. A.Un.

Montfoort, Pieter van, a Catholic priest, was a negotiator of the Court of Brussels (Governess Maria of Hungary) with the Anabaptist kingdom of Münster in 1534-35. Jan van Geelen (q.v.), who acted as the ambassador of Münster, visited van Montfoort at Amsterdam and Brussels and, while preparing Anabaptist revolts in the Netherlands, received from van Montfoort a safe-conduct. After van Geelen's death during the attack on the Amsterdam town hall on May 10, 1535, the negotiations were broken off, and van Montfoort, having incurred the wrath of the hoodwinked authorities by his gullibility, was sentenced to death, but pardoned in March 1537. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 127, 153; DB 1899, 1-20; Grosheide, Verhooren, 20 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, passim, see Index.

Montgelas, Maximilian Joseph (1759-1838), a statesman of Bavaria, Germany, was appointed state and conference minister on Feb. 21, 1799, by Elector Maximilian Joseph (q.v.). His influence was determinant in the change in the political system of Bavaria. It is due to his progressive views that the Mennonites were granted full citizenship upon their request in 1801 and that the right of redemption (see Jus Retractus) passed against them on April 29, 1726, was annulled on Aug. 17, 1801. Hege.

E. Correll, Das schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925); ML III, 164.

Montgomery County, Pa., a heavily populated county in southeastern Pennsylvania in which the Mennonites first settled in 1702 at Skippack, an outpost of the Germantown congregation (q.v.). Gradually the Skippack settlement expanded, and new settlements were made at Towamencin, Salford, Worcester, Providence, Franconia, and Plains, all by 1740. The large Souderton congregation was established in 1879, and since 1930 a large number of mission stations, bringing the total baptized membership (1955) of the Franconia Conference (MC) congregations and mission stations in Montgomery County to about 2,900. The Oberholtzer division of 1847 resulted in the formation of several new permanent congregations (GCM) in the county: Schwenksville (1847), Souderton (1887), and Lansdale (1928), with a combined membership in 1955 of over 1,200. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ have only a few congregations in the county: Royersford, Graterford, Harleysville, and Hatfield, with a total membership of 307 in 1956. The Brethren in Christ have three congregations: Graterford, Souderton, and Stowe, with 175 members in the three churches. Montgomery County was the scene of the Funkite (q.v.) schism of 1778. The Franconia Conference Mennonites have a large home for the aged at Souderton, the Eastern Mennonite Home, built in 1916, and enlarged in 1921. The Eastern District Conference (GCM) has a Home for the Aged at Frederick, established in 1896. The Christopher Dock Mennonite (High) School (MC) was established near Lansdale in 1954. The two most valuable Mennonite historical items in the county are the alms books of the Skippack and Franconia congregations, kept by the deacons since 1738 and 1767 respectively. Montgomery County was the home of the colonial Mennonite writer, Bishop Henrich Funck (q.v.), of the famous schoolmaster Christopher Dock (q.v.), and of the Hunsickers, father and son, who founded Freeland Seminary (now Ursinus College) at Collegeville, in 1848. It should also be mentioned that of the congregations of the Franconia Conference only in Skippack was footwashing observed as a church rite before the 20th century. Both the Skippack congregation of the Franconia Conference, and the (independent) Lower Skippack congregation (q.v.), still observe the ceremony. From the Skippack congregation the practice gradually spread, mostly since 1900, to the other congregations of the conference. The name "Franconia Conference" derives from the Franconia Meetinghouse in Franconia Township, which has long been the chief place of meeting of the ministerial body in conference sessions. J.C.W.

Montgomery Female Institute was a private girls' school organized at Collegeville, Montgomery Co., Pa., about 1851 by a Mennonite bishop (previously in succession MC and GCM), who had become an independent, Abraham Hunsicker (1793-1872), and two other persons, J. W. Sunderland and Luannie Sunderland. In their announcement the founders expressed this position: "We believe the female mind endowed with powers and capabilities quite equal to those of the other sex. . . . We have a twofold object in view,—first, to provide correct and thorough instruction in the ordinary branches of learning . . . ; second, to afford. . . a more extensive course in the sciences and liberal arts. . . ." The institution was incorporated in 1853. Sunderland served as president. The name was soon changed to Pennsylvania Female College. The last class of graduates completed their work in 1875. The total number of graduates from 1853 through 1875 amounted to over 100. After 1875 the school ceased to exist. J.C.W.

Theodore W. Bean, History of Montgomery County (Philadelphia, 1884) 419 f.

Monthly Letter of the Mennonite Women's Missionary Society (q.v.) was the first publication of the Women's Missionary organization of the Mennonite Church (MC). It began as an annual letter in 1919 (first issue March 1), became a quarterly in 1920, and a monthly in 1921. It was a single sheet broadside, 8½ x 10 in., until Vol. IV (1922) when it became a 4-page folder, continuing as such to the end of 1927. It was edited by the general secretary of the organization who was Clara Eby Steiner (Mrs. M. S. Steiner) from the beginning until her retirement in 1926. The society was disbanded at the end of 1927 and the paper discontinued with the November-December 1927 issue (complete file in GCL). It was succeeded by the Missionary Sewing Circle Letter (q.v.), published by the General Sewing Circle Committee of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, which began publication July 1930.
H.S.B.

Montreux, France: see Münsterrol.

Monument Mennonite Mission (MC), the first mission of the Mission Advocates of Lancaster Co., Pa., located in a Union meetinghouse on Linville Hill, Lancaster County, was opened on Sept. 21, 1895. It continued intermittently until 1926. The neighboring congregations of Mt. Pleasant and Kinzer very definitely and variously benefited from the work. Isaac E. Hershey and Emanuel E. Keneagy were the first superintendents. The closing of the nickel mines near by in the first decade of this century affected the attendance. I.D.L.

Moody, Dwight Lyman (1837-99), the leading evangelist of American Protestantism in the 19th century (beginning in 1870), whose work was of immeasurable influence upon American religious life. He was also the founder of the Northfield School at Northfield, Mass. (1879, 1881), and of Moody Bible Institute at Chicago, Ill. (1886), the finances for which came from the enormous profits of the songbooks which he and Sankey published (Gospel Hymns, etc., over $1,250,000 in royalties).

Moody's revivalistic work indirectly influenced the Mennonites of North America, particularly the more English-speaking Mennonite Church (MC). The Moody Bible Institute has had considerable influence on Mennonites through the attendance of Mennonite students from about 1895 on, through its publication, the Moody Monthly, and through its radio programs (WMBI) and the summer Bible conferences which it has sponsored throughout the country.

A major source of Moody's influence on the Mennonite Church (MC) was through John F. Funk (q.v.). Funk became acquainted with Moody in 1861 when they were fellow teachers at the Milwaukee Depot Mission Sunday School. They were close friends for several years. Funk regarded highly his association with Moody, and records in his unpublished memoirs that he owed to Moody the vision of better things in the Mennonite Church, including Sunday schools, young people's meetings, and evangelism. He described to a friend Moody's influence by saying that Moody was so full of religious enthusiasm that one could not help being moved or drawn by him into a blessed religious experience. Without doubt, a significant contribution to the Great Awakening in the Mennonite Church (MC) in 1875-1900 was Moody's indirect influence in various ways, especially through Funk.
H.S.B.

Richard Day, Bush Aglow; the Life Story of D. L. Moody (Philadelphia, 1936); W. R. Moody, D. L. Moody (New York, 1900, 1930).

Mooi-Land, a Dutch Mennonite home for the aged at Doorwerth, near Arnhem, province of Gelderland. It was opened on June 13, 1936, and enlarged in 1952. vdZ.

Moravia, in the 16th century often called "the promised land" of the Anabaptists. During the Middle Ages it was a margravure and part of the Kingdom of Bohemia. As such it experienced also the rise and spread of Hussitism in the 15th century. When this pre-Protestant movement settled down to become a quiet sectarian church, several names appeared for it, such as Bohemian Brethren (q.v.) and Picards (a nickname erroneously derived from Beghards). Under this last name the movement was widely spread also in Moravia during the 16th century, to be sure among the Czech-speaking population only and with practically no contact with the German-speaking people of that land.

In 1526 the last king of Bohemia (and incidentally also king of Hungary) fell in a battle against the Turks, and Archduke Ferdinand of Hapsburg (q.v.), his brother-in-law and later emperor, became king of Bohemia and of (a small part of) Hungary. Being a staunch Catholic he naturally tried to make Bohemia and Moravia thoroughly Catholic, an endeavor in which, however, all the Hapsburgs failed up to 1620. The provincial estates (Landstände) were exceedingly jealous of their local autonomy and resented all aggressive interference from the government in Vienna, Austria. They elected (and the Hapsburgs approved) a governor (Landeshauptmann) from their midst as head of the provincial (thoroughly feudal) government and also as their spokesman in Vienna at the Hapsburg court. On the other hand King Ferdinand was never certain whether his orders to this governor were actually carried out or not; thus he often sent his orders instead to the Bishop of Olmütz (Olomouc), the ecclesiastical ruler of Moravia. Moravia had three "royal" cities: Olmütz, Brno, and Znaim (Znojmo); provincial diets (Landtage) were held alternately in these three cities, with proceedings in the Czech language (for details see Olmütz). Until 1636 Olmütz was the capital of Moravia; after that year Brno became the capital. There were many smaller cities, too, such as Nikolsburg or Austerlitz, but they had the character of centers of large manorial estates rather than of cities in the modern sense. Here the lords could act more or less as they pleased.

It was these lords (some of them Protestants) who practiced such a degree of religious toleration that this country rightly stands out in the 16th century as a unique area of refuge for those fleeing religious persecution. Perhaps only Poland could compete with it to any extent; the rest of Europe knew nothing but persecution of those who did not conform. Franticek Hruby discusses at great length the roots of this liberal attitude. He is certain that it was by no means derived from economic motives only (sectarians being usually good and reliable workers); perhaps the Hussite-Picard tradition of more than half a century had something to do with it, and likewise the old feudal pride in independence. In short, not only Anabaptists of all shades but many other left-wing groups of the age of the Reformation found a welcome refuge in Moravia for shorter or longer periods. As far as the records go, there was only one execution for reasons of nonconformity in Moravia, namely, the burning at the stake of the Anabaptist brother Thoman Waldhauser in Brno in 1528 (Geschicht-Buch, 45 f.). But at that time Brno had a city government and was rather cool to manorial or feudal tradition.

Perhaps the earliest report on sectarian activities is found in a printed book of 1526 by Oswald Glaidt (q.v.), which records a religious debate in Austerlitz in March 1526, sponsored by a nobleman John Dubchansky, who wanted to achieve a sort of unification of all non-Catholics (Utraquists, Lutherans, and independent groups, one of them called Habrovans). Oswald Glaidt, the recorder, was at that time not yet an Anabaptist. A few weeks after this debate, Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.), since May 1525 an Anabaptist preacher, arrived in Nikolsburg (q.v.) upon the express invitation of the nobleman Johann von Liechtenstein (q.v.), lord of Nikolsburg and himself a sympathizer with Hubmaier's views. Most likely Liechtenstein was later baptized by his illustrious guest. From that time on Anabaptism found a foothold in Moravia. Glaidt also went to Nikolsburg, as did Hans Hut, Ambrosius Spittelmaier, Jacob Wiedemann, and many more. Soon Anabaptism experienced its first split: Hubmaier and Spittelmaier defended the use of the sword (Schwertler), while Hut, Glaidt, and Wiedemann opposed it, hence were derisively called Stäbler (staff-bearers; see Hutterian Brethren). As persecutions intensified elsewhere, a stream of refugees now poured into Moravia, coming from Tirol and other Hapsburg areas, as well as from South Germany, Bavaria, Württemberg, etc. In the 1530's three main groups are observed: Hutterian Brothern (destined to survive all the vicissitudes of history), Gabrielites (q.v.), who first left for Silesia but around 1545 joined the Hutterites, and Philippites (q.v.), some of whom likewise joined the first-named group, while others returned to Germany, when for a few years even Moravia attempted to expel its Anabaptists. Besides these three main groups there were also "Swiss" Brethren, i.e., Anabaptists who did not practice community of goods. Whether they were actually Swiss is not known, but it is certain that small groups of them existed as late as 1591 and even 1618 (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 152, note). There were also the Pilgramites, apparently the followers of Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.). Leopold Scharnschlager (q.v.) was for a while their leader (in the 1530's). But the number of independent groups other than Anabaptists was far greater. Several published lists and other reports show that at certain places, such as Austerlitz, there existed at least 13 or 14 sectarian (non-Catholic) groups. The earliest list, of 1556 (Krebs, 511), enumerates 20 such sects. De Wind published several such lists (of 1567 and later) which name, besides Picards, Lutherans, and Calvinists, various Anabaptist groups (one called Austerlitzer Brüder), then "Arians, Samosatenes, and Sabbatarians" (apparently all three names for the anti-Trinitarian Socinians, all of whom were immigrant Italians), then Adamites and similar marginal groups, practically all of them (except the Socinians) German-speaking people now living in Czech surroundings. De Wind also names some of the more outstanding manorial lords who made the opportunities for these groups available. Besides the lord of Nikolsburg (Liechtenstein), there was the lord of Austerlitz, Ulrich von Kaunitz, who was perhaps the most broad-minded of all (Austerlitz was said to have been at times a real "Babel"), then Johann von Lipa, lord of Kromau and Schäkovitz (incidentally the man who also offered a safe refuge in 1537 to Paracelsus, the famous physician of that day), Heinrich von Lomnitz, lord of Jamnitz, who is said to have ransomed Anabaptist brethren from the dungeon of Passau (MQR 1955, 61), and, strangely enough, also the Abbess of Maria-Saal near Brno, the mistress of Auspitz (q.v.), another well-known center of Anabaptism. Apparently she needed reliable tillers of the soil and skilled craftsmen more than anything else. Somewhat later the lords of Seelovitz, the Zierotin (q.v.) family, became outstanding as protectors of the Hutterian Brethren and broad-minded lords. Three of these Zierotins, Friedrich (d. 1598), Karl, and Ladislaus Velen (1619-21), were also governors of Moravia and exerted a beneficent influence regarding the life of the Anabaptists in Moravia.

Only twice did it happen that King Ferdinand had his way and the lords had to yield; viz., 1535-36 and 1547-51. These were hard times for the Anabaptists (and most likely also for the other left-wing groups). In 1535 Ferdinand came for the first time personally to a provincial diet, and prevailed upon the reluctant lords to expel all "heretics." It was then that the Philippites left Moravia for good (except a few remnants; see Pulgram), and that Jakob Hutter addressed his famous letter to the governor Johan Kuna von Kunstadt, to be sure without success. The Brethren had no choice and began wandering hither and thither. Fortunately, the stern measures did not last for very long, and in 1537 new Bruderhofs could be established again on various estates (see Schäkovitz). In 1546 Ferdinand came again to Moravia. Things looked favorable for the Hapsburgs; the Turks had been defeated (at least for the moment) and Ferdinand's brother, Emperor Charles V, held the Protestants in check in the Schmalkaldian War. Now the danger for the Brethren was even more serious than a decade earlier. They began new settlements in near-by Slovakia (q.v.), then belonging to the Kingdom of Hungary, where the Hapsburgs had not yet gained much influence. But even here the situation became somewhat critical in 1548-53 (see Holitsch). Thus the brotherhoods shuttled back and forth between Moravia, Lower Austria, and Slovakia. Nowhere did they find a place of rest. It may have been in these dark years that they began to dig out the underground tunnels found all over that area and called in Czech Lochy (q.v.), i.e., Löcher, meaning holes. They are pathetic witnesses of persecution. The Hutterites, however, tried again to write to the governor (Wenzel von Ludanitz) in 1545, with small success, as could have been anticipated. (Beck, 169-73.)

But the political scene changed again; the Turks threatened again from Hungary, and Charles V was defeated by the Schmalkaldians. Thus around 1551-52 peace came for the Brethren, making it possible for them to develop permanent settlements (Bruderhofs). From 1551 until about 1600 the peace was but very little disturbed. The Hutterian Brethren called this period the "Golden Era." Their number multiplied now by leaps and bounds, mainly because of newcomers from many countries (Germany, Switzerland, Austria, etc.); their activities were so successful that the jealousy of the surrounding population was aroused. Jesuits arrived in Nikolsburg in the 1570's, but neither they nor other priests (Erhard, q.v., Fischer, q.v.) could do much harm to the brotherhood which was so powerfully protected by the nobles.

The Hutterites were, however, not the only Anabaptists in Moravia, although they are the only ones of whom there is a continuous record. It is known that until the end of the 16th century Swiss Brethren also lived in Moravia (though in small numbers) and Pilgramites, the Marpeck group. As for the Swiss Brethren (besides what Beck had to say; see above) a remarkable event is known through a Dutch booklet, Het Brilleken of 1630 (Mart. Mir. D I, 400 f., E 365-67), which tells of the visit of "Greek Brethren" from Thessalonica to these Brethren in Moravia around 1550, and also of the flight of one of these Swiss Brethren (who later tells this story) around 1620. As for the Pilgramites one of their most precious possessions, Marpeck's Verantwortung (1542), was copied in Moravia (now preserved in the library of Olmütz). This manuscript contains a letter of 1571 by a certain Wernhard Riepl of Klein-Teschau, Moravia, concerning certain theological arguments among these brethren, referring back to a tract by Leopold Scharnschlager (Loserth, Quellen, 35). This is apparently the latest reference available for the existence of the Marpeck group in Moravia and elsewhere.

One of the "administrative" centers of the Hutterites between 1565 and 1620 was the Bruderhof at Neumühl, ten miles east of Nikolsburg, which became the residence of four successive head bishops or Vorsteher, viz., Walpot, Kräl, Braidl, and Dietrich (for details see Neumühl). It was here that the large chronicle was written, where all the outgoing and incoming correspondence was handled and filed away, where some of the famous codices (Epistel- and Artikel-Büchlein) were written, and where the important community regulations (Gemeindeordnungen, q.v.) were formulated. It was also here that Polish anti-Trinitarian visitors were entertained. All practical and doctrinal decisions of the second half of the 16th century seem to have originated at this place.

Unfortunate conditions brought this flowering to a bitter end. A Turkish-Hungarian war brought the invasion of undisciplined hordes, who inflicted severe tribulations upon the brotherhood: murder, rape, torture, arson, carrying away of women and children, war in its worst aspect, coming upon people who were nonresistant and therefore helpless in the face of such dangers (see Böger). Three hymns in the Hutterite hymnal tell of those terrible years (the "Botschkai Lieder," Lieder d. Hutt. Brüder, 804-12). The detailed story is also told in all their chronicles. In addition to all this tribulation came intensified demands from the Emperor Rudolph II (residing in Prague) for money (actually war loans), which the Brethren emphatically refused to give, thus provoking renewed threats (correspondence in the Geschicht-Buch, 443-46 and 477-80). And then the Catholic Counter Reformation (q.v.) came into full swing in the formerly liberal margraviate of Moravia (see Dietrichstein, Cardinal Franz von, the new lord of Nikolsburg). The number of Bruderhofs declined but they still were strong spiritually and in organization.

Then once again it appeared that good fortune would make it possible for the brethren to continue their work, internally by building up their brotherhood, externally by sending out missioners to the farthest corners of the German-speaking territories (such as East Prussia; see Elbing). When in the Bohemian Rebellion of 1618-19 the Hapsburgs lost their old kingdom, and Frederick, the prince-elector of the Palatinate, became the ruler (later called "the Winter-King," 1619-20), things looked somewhat hopeful again. Frederick himself was a Calvinist, but for the moment he was definitely graciously inclined toward all sectarians. When he came to visit Moravia he also stopped at some Hutterite colonies (such as Kromau), where he was given presents and promised his royal protection (Hruby). This did not last longer than one winter, however. In 1620 Frederick lost the battle at the White Mountain (near Prague) and had to flee; with it the fate of the Protestants (and Anabaptists) in the Hapsburg lands was sealed. Emperor Ferdinand II, supported by Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein, now insisted upon total expulsion of all non-Catholics. No lord could any longer protect the Hutterian Brethren, who thus suffered both from the unrestrained military hordes (e.g., Dampierre's cavalry), and the ruthless orders of the authorities. The severity of this suffering through war can still be felt in reading the moving three "Pribitz hymns" of 1620-22 (Lieder d. Hutt. Brüder, 821-38; see also Pribitz). Lives were lost and goods destroyed or confiscated. And then one Vorsteher, Hirzel (q.v.), betrayed a number of hiding places of their savings, thus leaving the Brethren nearly penniless.

After 1622 no Anabaptist could remain in Moravia any longer. A few lords tried still to employ some single individuals on their estates, but as the Thirty Years' War progressed also these had to be sent away. Slovakia promised at least for a while a safe refuge (see Slovakia). As for the non-Hutterites, there is no knowledge at all concerning their fate.

And yet the crafts of the Brethren even after that tragic war continued to attract the interest of Moravian nobles. As Hruby proved, the famous Habaner ceramics (q.v.) were found throughout the 17th century in the inventories of Moravian castles and manor houses. The same is true regarding the Hutterite cutlery (knives) and their beautifully worked clocks, to be found on many a tower. But otherwise Moravia like Bohemia had been thoroughly reconverted to Catholicism. The old feudal independence faded away and the great period of Moravian history was over.

In 1918 Moravia became part of the Czechoslovakian Republic. At that time it still had more than 600,000 Germans among its 2.7 million population. When, in 1937, two Hutterite Brothers from America visited the country they reported that remnants of their old settlements were still extant and that even some vague recollections lingered on here and there. Today, all Germans have been expelled from Czechoslovakia, and the country has become completely Slavic. R.F.

Loserth, Communismus; Fr. Hruby, Die Mährischen Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1935, with new Czech source material); P. Dedic, Die religiösen und kirchlichen Verhältnisse in Mähren im 16. Jahrhundert (1922, dissertation in manuscript at the University of Vienna, Evangelical-Theological Faculty); H. De Wind, "A Sixteenth Century Description of Religious Sects in Austerlitz, Moravia," MQR XXIX (1955) 44-53; for older works see Friedmann's bibliography in Archiv für Ref. Gesch. XXVI (1929) 176-78; ML II, 711-17.

Moravian Church (or Moravian Brethren), the name in America and England of the church known in Europe as Unitas Fratrum, Brüder-Unität, or Herrnhuter (Gemeinde). Its history is divided into two distinct parts, viz., the "old" (1457) and the "new" (1722 or 1736) Brüder-Unität. Whereas the former group was nearly exclusively made up of members of Czech nationality (both in Bohemia and Moravia), the new Brüder-Unität has been predominantly German. Its spiritual and organizational center was and still is Herrnhut in Saxony; its guiding spirit was the inspired and "pietistic" leader Ludwig Count von Zinzendorf (q.v.). This new, re-established church, in many ways similar to the German Lutheran state church and yet independent of it as well as of any state, now became very aggressive, evangelizing and doing extensive mission work. Soon it spread to West and East, that is, to England and America on the one side and to Russia on the other.

Since the article Bohemian Brethren (q.v.) discusses the historical background, and the article Moravians in the Netherlands (q.v.) the particular development of this group during the 18th and 19th centuries, the present article will restrict itself to contacts between Moravians and Anabaptism.

As far as the "old" church (in Czech called Jednota Bratrska) is concerned, its contacts with Anabaptists in Moravia (none in Bohemia) are minor, apparently primarily because of language barriers. The Anabaptists never worked among non-German groups and, on the other hand, the Moravians not among non-Czech people. Moravia (q.v.) in the 16th century was a most tolerant country; thus both groups could live peacefully side by side without too many visible contacts. In 1534 the Bohemian Brethren abolished their practice of adult baptism, retaining only a form of "confirmation" with their adolescents, thus adding another reason for mutual distance. Early in the 17th century the last bishop of the Bohemian Brethren, John Amos Comenius (Komensky), more than once expressed his admiration for the Hutterian Brethren and his sympathy for their suffering while being expelled from Moravia. He called their constitution "perfect as with no other society in the world" (Fragen über die Unität, 1633), and again in 1661, "I have known these simple Brethren from my youth on, and I know that they always held to their faith."

In the 18th century, however, when a new church arose in Herrnhut burning with missionary zeal, contacts with Anabaptists became almost inevitable, even though the two groups represent rather different spirits of Christian witnessing. J. T. Müller in his excellent study of 1910 (see bibliography) collected all available evidence concerning these contacts, a condensation of which may also be found in Friedmann's book, Mennonite Piety (51-54). Since contacts with Dutch Mennonites are dealt with in another article, and of contacts with Mennonites in Germany and Switzerland nothing essential has become known, this article is concerned exclusively with contacts with Hutterites, both in Slovakia and in Russia.

The first document of significance is a letter of Count Zinzendorf of 1727, handed to a Slovakian Hutterite brother visiting Herrnhut. In this letter the basically different orientation becomes quite apparent: "To follow the ordinances of the perfect church [most likely he meant the practice of community of goods] . . . is not our primary concern. . . . Each one should ground himself in Jesus Christ and thus receive regeneration from above. It is on this that we base all brotherhood. . . . We believe in an invisible church of Jesus in the spirit."

A second letter by Zinzendorf (1731) to the brethren in Slovakia deals with the Lord's Supper and its meaning. Again the difference between the new spirit of Pietism (q.v.) and that of old-type Anabaptism becomes obvious. "The coming together (at least twelve times a year), the testing, eating, drinking, believing, possessing [of sacramental grace], feeling, enjoying—this is what I must testify out of a sincere love." Most likely the Hutterian Brethren in Slovakia had little understanding for this kind of "subjectivism" and emotionalism. Their Lord's Supper (q.v.), celebrated usually twice a year, meant something very different to them. They were rather ignorant of the new trend of "enjoying one's own salvation"; to them the Supper meant simply commitment to the path of discipleship and strengthening of the spirit of genuine community and brotherhood.

In 1782 a Hutterite brother Jakob Walter (q.v.) of Sobotiste in Slovakia, on his way to his brethren in the Ukraine, passed through Herrnhut and there received help and support; likewise some later emigrants from Slovakia. Apparently the Moravians considered them as some remnants of the older Unitas Fratrum.

Quite remarkable is the contact of the Hutterite Brethren with Moravians in Russia, the Hutterites living in Radichev (q.v.) in the Ukraine, the Moravians in Sarepta on the Volga River, some 700 miles to the East. This contact covers the period of 1797 to 1811; the main actors were Johannes Waldner (q.v.), the Vorsteher at Radichev, and Johann Wiegand (or Wygand), pastor of the Brüdergemeinde in the Volga district. In 1802 the latter visited the Hutterite Bruderhof and thereupon reported in detail of his experiences (Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 413-18). He assured the reader that "not only the Moravians but also the Hutterites consider as the sole foundation of all righteousness and salvation the merit of Jesus Christ" (Zieglschmid, 415). But immediately afterwards he lamented the formalistic rigidity of the Hutterites, who had not changed since the 16th century, and he likewise deplored their lack of a missionary spirit. The two groups exchanged writings, and in one of his letters Johannes Waldner highly praised Spangenberg's Idea Fidei Fratrum (one of the basic texts of the Moravians). But the gulf between the two groups remained unbridged, mainly due to the Moravians' insistence on infant baptism. In 1803 Wiegand asked Herrnhut for some relief work among the Hutterites, and added that such help might also promote further rapprochement and in the long run perhaps even complete fusion. When Wiegand died in 1808 Waldner sent a letter of sympathy to his successor, full of personal warmth and appreciation even though he could not avoid saying, "There are a number of points between us which separate us. . . . But we want to bear with each other in the love of Jesus since we are one in the great work of redemption and reconciliation through the blood of Jesus" (Friedmann, 54).

The archives of the Herrnhut center still have the gifts received from Johannes Waldner, namely, one booklet containing catechetical instructions and the form for the ceremony of (adult) baptism (50 pages), two sermons to be preached at Easter time on the occasion of the Lord's Supper (Abendmahlsrede) of 1644 (140 pages), one sermon for Christmas concerning the deity of Christ, written at Kesselsdorf (q.v.), Slovakia, in 1657, and a hymn describing the exodus of the Carinthians in 1756 and the new beginning in Transylvania until 1760, 50 stanzas in 19 pages (perhaps composed by Matthias Hofer). The archives hold also the entire correspondence mentioned above, including letters by Waldner to Wiegand's successor Friedrich Gregor.

R.F.

J. T. Müller, "Die Berührung der alten und neuen Brüderunität mit den Täufern," in Ztscht für Brüdergeschichte, 1910; idem, Geschichte der Böhmischen Brüder, 3 vv., 1922-31 (v. I: 1400-1528; v. II: 1528-1576; v. III: 1548-1793 [Polnische Unität] and 1575-1780 [Bömisch-Mährische Unität]); R. Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949); Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch; J. Loserth, "Deutsch-Böhmische Wiedertäufer, ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Reformation in Böhmen," in Mitteilungen des Vereins für die Geschichte der Deutschen in Böhmen, 1892; for Comenius see M. Spinka, John Amos Comenius, That Incomparable Moravian (Chicago, 1943); Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 169-73; ML I, 279-85.

Moravians in the Netherlands. In the Netherlands the Moravian Brethren or "Brüdergemeine" are usually called Her(r)nhutters after their center Herrnhut in Silesia, Germany. In the Netherlands they established a center at 's-Heerendijk near IJsselstein in 1736, moving to Zeist in 1746, both in the province of Utrecht. They still occupy the estate at Zeist. These Hernhutters opened a mission in the Dutch colony of Surinam as early as 1735. Though sometimes vehemently attacked and made suspect by the Reformed Church, a number of Reformed ministers and others protected and assisted them. They also found much contact with Mennonites. Among their first Mennonite friends were Jacob Schellinger of Amsterdam, who loaned money for the purchase of 's-Heerendijk in 1736, and Joannes Deknatel (q.v.), the noted pastor of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation, who was on very friendly terms with Count von Zinzendorf, the general leader of the Brethren movement. The revivalism and evangelism of the Brethren, promoted and supported especially by Deknatel, took root among the Mennonites. Places of extensive Moravian influence among the Mennonites about 1740-50 were Amsterdam, Haarlem, Hoorn, Groningen, Blokzijl, Norden, Akkrum, Oldeboorn, and Terhorne. A number of Mennonites, though not many, definitely joined the movement, including Jacob and Cornelis Schellinger of Amsterdam, Jan Broeks and Sybern Claases of Terhorne, Gerrit Synes and others of Akkrum, Volkert de Graaf, the minister of Blokzijl. Jan van Calker of Kampen joined the Brethren in 1741; in 1743 he sold his property and moved to Herrnhut, but soon returned to the Netherlands, settling at Sappemeer. Other Mennonites, like Deknatel, Dirk Messchaert of Hoorn and his wife Janneken Beets, Joost Daams, the preacher of Haarlem, Maria Voorhelm, the wife of J. H. Schneevogt of Haarlem, also joined the Moravians, but later left them. Many Mennonites participated in Moravian communion services, usually held in the homes of the members or adherents.

In a few towns congregations were founded, which received a large proportion of their members from the Mennonites, e.g., Akkrum, where a (small) Hernhutter congregation was in existence *ca.*1746-97. After Deknatel had become somewhat estranged from Zinzendorf (in 1748) and no longer supported the movement, the interest of the Mennonites in the Moravian Brethren decreased. vdZ.

W. Lütjeharms, Het philadelphisch-eucumenisch streven der Hernhutters in de Nederlanden in de achttiende eeuw (Zeist, 1935) passim; Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1454.

Mörchingen: see Morhange.

Morden, Man., a town (pop. 1,862) located 6 miles west of Winkler and 60 miles southwest of Winnipeg, is the seat of the Mennonite Brethren Old People's Home, an M.B. congregation with 176 members, and a local unit of the Bergtal Mennonite (GCM) Church. (ML III, 167.) H.S.B.

Morden (Man.) Mennonite Brethren Church, a member of the Northern District Conference, was organized Jan. 12, 1930, with 32 members, under the leadership of D. D. Toews. John Andres served as its first pastor. He was followed by John F. Braun and F. H. Friesen, the present (1955) minister. The membership in 1955 was 176, half of whom live in the country. The congregation at first rented Alexander Hall, and in 1935 purchased a brick building which it used for its meetings for some time. In 1946 a new church, which has a seating capacity of 400, was erected in the town of Morden. D.J.R.

Morgan and Moniteau Counties, Mo., are located in the central part of the state along the Missouri Pacific Railroad. The Mennonites settled in Piolet Grove Twp., Moniteau Co., and Moreau Twp., Morgan Co. This settlement has two Mennonite churches. Mt. Zion Mennonite (MC) Church (in Morgan County) has a membership of 54 (1955). The Bethel Mennonite (GCM) Church (in Moniteau County) has 141 members (1955).

In October 1865 Christian Luginbühl, P. P. Lehman, Sr., and Ulrich Welty, of the Sonnenberg settlement in Wayne Co., Ohio, made a trip through Missouri and Iowa to find land for a settlement. Christian Luginbühl bought a farm 8 miles south of Tipton, Mo. In April 1866 he, together with four other men, moved with their families from Wayne County to this new settlement. In the following decade more came from Wayne County. Most of the Polk Co., Iowa, Swiss Mennonite settlement moved here in 1867-68. Numerous families came from Rockingham Co., Va., and various other Mennonite (MC) settlements in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Michigan. In 1871 the church divided peacefully into the two present congregations. D.L.G.

Jesse H. Loganbill, Souvenir Album of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Founding of the Bethel Mennonite Church in Morgan and Moniteau Counties near Fortuna, Missouri (Berne, 1917); Peter P. Hilty, Seventy-fifth Anniversary of the Bethel Mennonite Church (California, Mo., 1942); D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953).

Morgantown, Pa., is a village of 365 inhabitants on the headwaters of Conestoga Creek in Berks County. Amish Mennonites and Mennonites (MC) live in and around the town. It is near the center of the oldest permanent Amish settlement in America, they having arrived there approximately 200 years ago. Three Mennonite churches are located in the adjacent area—Conestoga (q.v.), Oley (q.v.), and Rock (q.v.), as well as the Conestoga Christian Day School. Farming is the chief occupation of the community, although many local businesses are Mennonite owned. The area was originally settled by Welsh in the 18th century. The village has also a Methodist and an Episcopal church. The Pennsylvania Turnpike goes by the town. There are mining developments near by. G.M.S.

Morhange (German, Mörchingen), a town (pop. 1,914) in Lorraine (q.v.), France, 25 miles southeast of Metz, was the seat of a small Mennonite congregation, which was founded about 1720 by Alsatian Mennonites of Swiss Amish descent after the Mennonites had been expelled from Alsace (q.v.) in 1712 by decree of Louis XIV. The Morhange congregation was never very large and was further weakened by emigration to America in the early 19th century. Nevertheless it built a small meetinghouse in 1856 near the town and a cemetery on the Hinsingen estate near Gros-Tenquin, the home of elder Joseph Hirschy. About 1893 they were joined by the families of the Dieuze (q.v.) congregation who lived on the German side of Lorraine, while those living on the French side joined the Nancy (q.v.) congregation. Nevertheless the membership showed a steady decline, chiefly because the families were small. Early in World War I bloody battles were fought near Morhange; when peace came there was no minister left. Services were, however, begun again, conducted in French by visiting ministers. In 1940 the membership (children included) numbered 35. Charles Baechler (d. 1952) was ordained minister in 1939, but there was no elder in the congregation after World War I, the congregation being served by elders from Toul, Sarrebourg, and Montbéliard. Meetings ceased at the beginning of World War II (1939). During the war the chapel was damaged and has not been repaired. The remaining members joined either Diesen or Pont-a-Mousson, a branch of Toul. P.So., J.H.Y.

Morija Deaconess Home, located at Neu-Halbstadt, South Russia, was the first and only Mennonite deaconess home to be established in Russia, opened on Dec. 3, 1909. A 3-year course offered theoretical as well as practical instruction to Mennonite girls, who offered to dedicate their lives as Christian nurses in Mennonite charitable institutions. The deaconess home also served as a mother house, keeping and caring for the nurses in sickness and old age. The institution was organized as a private charitable organization, all Mennonite churches participating, the initiators being Franz Wall, head of the Muntau Hospital, Peter Schmidt, a rich landowner, and Dr. E. Tavonius, the father of Dr. Erica Tavonius at Fernheim, Paraguay. The home accepted up to 40 nursing students every year. After the Revolution first the religious aspect of the school was changed and in 1927 the last Mennonite head nurse was removed and the deaconess home turned into a medical institute under a Communist leader. (Menn. Rundschau, 1929, No. 34; ML III, 167.) J.A.K.

Morning Star Bible School, since 1949 called the Coaldale Bible School, a school of the M.B. congregations in Alberta, particularly the Coaldale congregation, was founded in 1929. In 1934 the first separate building was erected, the Coaldale M.B. Church having served as meeting place until that time, and in 1949 the present commodious building was erected. In the first 25 years of its existence, over 800 students attended. Among the earlier teachers were A. J. Schierling, J. A. Toews, Sr., J. H. Quiring, D. Ewert, and J. A. Toews, Jr. In 1956 A. P. Regier was serving as principal with a total faculty of three. The school has since 1931 offered a three-year course in Bible and Teachers Training. The peak enrollment was 101 in 1948-49. H.S.B.

Morning View Mennonite (MC) Mission Church, six miles west of Linville, Va., belonging to the Virginia Conference, started about 1924 as a Sunday school that had formerly been a union school. Later the work was carried on in a vacant building near by until it became too small to accommodate the congregation. In 1928 a frame church was built. This church was remodeled and enlarged in 1956. Sunday school is held each Sunday, and preaching twice each month. The membership in 1955 was 42, with Ernest G. Gehman and Clayton Showalter in charge. (ML III, 168.) T.S.

Mornington Old Order Amish settlement, located in Mornington Twp., Perth Co., Ont. When about 1890 a meetinghouse was built north of Poole, a group led by Christian L. Kuepfer and Andrew Kuepfer as ministers and Solomon Kuepfer deacon, continued to worship in homes as had been done from the original organization in 1874. For a few years Old Order Amish bishops from Ohio served communion. In 1891 Samuel Miller and David Miller of Holmes Co., Ohio, helped the Old Order Amish in Mornington to organize a congregation. Christian L. Kuepfer became bishop in 1891, and Solomon Kuepfer was ordained minister in 1911. No Sunday schools were conducted and the German language was used. Ministers have been John J. Kuepfer (1865-1945), ordained minister 1897 and bishop 1913; Jonathan Kuepfer, minister 1916; Henry S. Albrecht, minister 1924 and bishop 1934; and Daniel Steckley, minister 1931.

The congregation held services every two weeks alternating with the Wellesley Old Order group, using the Ausbund. The membership of 135 comprised some 40 families, and services were held at about 30 homes.

About 1945 dissatisfaction led to cleavage in this group. Samuel Steckley was ordained bishop to assist the senior bishop, Henry Albrecht, with the majority of the young people under this leadership. In 1954 this Mornington Old Order Amish district stands divided as follows: Samuel Steckley, ordained minister in 1945 and bishop in 1946, Joseph Z. Kuepfer and Daniel Steckley ministers, Menno J. Kuepfer deacon, as the leadership for 26 families with a membership of 40. The total number of worshipers is 116, with 5 adherents. Services are held in 30 different homes.

Under the leadership of Solomon S. Kuepfer bishop, Jonathan Kuepfer, Simon Kuepfer, and Gideon Streicher ministers, Christian W. Kuepfer deacon, there are 20 families with a membership of 80 and a total of 162 worshipers and 8 adherents. They have worship in 21 homes. (ML III, 168.) J.C.F.

Moron, a small village on an elevation with the same name in the Bernese Jura, Switzerland. The beautifully situated village at an elevation of 3,300 ft., lies three fifths of a mile east of the highway from Biel to Pruntrut (Porrentruy). Moron, attractively surrounded by meadows and fir forests, is the center of the Kleintal (q.v.) Mennonite congregation. The inhabitants are almost exclusively Mennonite. Most of them are the descendants of refugees from the Emmental in the 18th century. The Mennonite census list (Verzeichnis aller Wiedertäuffer nach Namen, Zunamen, Heimat, Wohnort in jedem Oberamt aufgenommen: Kontrollbücher I and II in the state archives in Bern) of 1823 enumerates a number of families who settled in Moron and the vicinity. The narrower circle of the Kleintal congregation with its seat in Moron, including the communes of Souboz, Sornetan, Monible, Chatelat, and Saicourt, showed a Mennonite membership of 147 persons, and that of the Münster (Moutier) district 469 persons. About 1850 Peter Studer of Malleray and David Nussbaumer of La Cote Souboz were preachers. Meetings were held in the farmhouses. Toward the end of the 19th century the desire and the need arose for a suitable building. In 1892 the chapel on Moron was built under the leadership of Christian Gerber, and dedicated in November.

In the midst of the French-speaking region the Mennonites in the Jura have always made an effort to preserve the German language, considering it a necessary condition for their existence. To this end the new chapel of Moron was to serve, by having on its ground floor a German school, where Gottlieb Loosli (q.v.), the elder of the congregation, taught for many fruitful years, especially through the addition of a Sunday school and baptismal instruction.

In 1904 the revival movement in the Jura also seized the Moron congregation, and in the revival meetings held by evangelist Fritz Schüpbach from the Emmental many awoke to new life. Even though the movement was considered extreme in certain circles, it left a trail of blessing in its wake. The girls' society formed in the interest of home missions has continued its service to the present.

In the history of the development of the Moron congregation Loosli's work played an essential part in the organization of choruses, song services, annual celebrations, and revival meetings. The regular meetings are held the first and third Sunday afternoon of every month.

Loosli's death in 1931 was a serious loss for Moron; a second blow was struck in the passing of Elder Hans Geiser on Aug. 28, 1938. (For a more extended account of the history of the Moron congregation, see Kleintal; ML III, 168 f.) S.G.

Morozovo (Neu-Hochfeld), a village in South Russia, founded in 1872 in the province of Ekaterinoslav (q.v.), volost Nikolaipol (formerly Nikolaifeld), by Mennonites from the Chortitza settlement (q.v.). The village owned 5,270 acres of land. In 1913 the population was 350, mostly Mennonites. (ML III, 169.)

Morris, Man., a town (pop. 1,193) 40 miles south of Winnipeg on the (now) Morris River, which runs through the Mennonite settlement into the Red River. Morris is located in a predominantly Mennonite locality. An estimated 200 Mennonites live in town. There are two Mennonite churches in town with a small membership, without full-time pastors, the United Mennonite Church (GCM) and a Bergtaler Mennonite Church.

About six to eight miles northwest of Morris, on the banks of the Morris River, the villages Rosenhof and Rosenort were founded in the fall of 1874 by the Evangelical Mennonite Church (Kleine Gemeinde). Just before World War I these villages broke up and the settlers nearly all moved on their farms. In 1882 about one fourth of the congregation organized into a part of the Church of God in Christ Mennonites (Holdeman). In 1955 the Evangelical Mennonite Church numbers over 1,000 souls with 500 baptized members who worship in a large church built in 1949, about eight miles from Morris. The Holdeman Church numbers about 500, with approximately 250 baptized members, who worship in a church built in 1950, located 2½ miles from the other church. The social relationship between the two churches is good. In 1950 both the town and the rural municipality suffered severely from a major flood. The whole population had to be evacuated to neighboring Mennonite settlements like Lowe Farm and Steinbach, and for seven weeks from the beginning of May to the middle of June the entire area was covered with from one to eight feet of water. The main occupation is grain farming. (ML III, 169.) P.J.B.R.

Morris Gospel Hall (MC) was a preaching outpost of the Kansas City, Kan., Mennonite Gospel Mission. In 1946 it had 22 members. It had its beginning in 1931 as an extension Sunday school of the Mennonite Gospel Mission. In 1946 it became an organized congregation of the South Central Conference with 16 charter members. It was administered in 1946-51 as part of the Twin City Missions, which had a total of 38 members in that year. The work was discontinued in 1951, when the building was destroyed in the great flood. Edward Yoder was the superintendent throughout. Ed.Y.

Morrison Mennonite Church (MC), also known as the Mennonite Brick Church, located about four miles northwest of Morrison, in Whiteside Co., Ill., belonging to the Illinois Conference, was organized in 1868. The meetinghouse was dedicated on Jan. 1, 1873. The membership in 1956 was 16, with Aaron D. Nice as pastor. A.D.N.

Mortier, Jean (Jan) de, was an elder of the Waterlander congregation at Leiden, Holland. He was one of the group of Waterlander, High German, and Frisian leaders who on March 16, 1614, sent a letter to the Mennonites of Bergischland and South Germany to promote peace with them. De Mortier signs this letter "Jan de Mortier, bishop of the church of Walloons at Leyden"; hence it is known that the Waterlander congregation in which he served was composed of French-speaking Walloons, apparently immigrants from southern Belgium. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 544.) vdZ.

Morton, Ill., a town (pop. 2,241) in Tazewell County, ten miles southeast of Peoria. Mennonite pioneers came to the county in 1830. In 1941 the Pleasant Grove and Goodfield congregations (MC) united and erected a church building in Morton, where approximately half of the 193 members now reside. Rural members live within a six-mile radius mainly south and west. Evangelical Mennonites, earlier known as Defenseless Mennonites, are located five miles southwest, and the Pleasant Hill (MC) congregation five miles west. There are approximately 500 Mennonites within a six-mile radius. The Apostolic Christian Church (q.v.) has one of its larger congregations in Morton. The town is noted for its small industries, which include two potteries, two manufacturers of grain elevators, a fence factory, and a washing-machine factory. Mennonites are employed locally and in large industries in Peoria. A number of Mennonites operate their own businesses. L.A.B.

Morton Mennonite Church (MC), in the city of Morton, Tazewell Co., Ill., a member of the Illinois Conference, is a merger of two older rural congregations, Pleasant Grove, near Tremont, Ill., whose meetinghouse was erected in 1879, and Goodfield, near Goodfield, Ill., whose building was erected in 1883. The church was dedicated on May 4, 1941. In 1957 the congregation had 200 members with Kenneth G. Good as bishop. R.D.R.

Morveldinck (Mordelvinck, Maerlincx), Rolef and Jan, brothers who were put to death at Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, on May 18, 1542. With some relatives and adherents they lived at Emlichem and, calling themselves "de vrome Kinderen van Emlichem," they plundered the farms. They were Anabaptists only in name, followers of Jan van Batenburg; in the sentence they are called "adherents of the Crechting group and Davidjorists." (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 246; DB 1917, 141, 177; 1919, 18. vdZ.

Mos (Moser), Wolfgang von, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Mos in the Adige Valley of Tirol, Austria, was arrested in 1529 with seven or eight other Anabaptists, at Vill in the Adige. Each was separately examined. Wolfgang confessed that he had been taught and baptized by Michael Kürschner (q.v.), who had died a martyr's death on June 2, 1529. The eight or nine brethren and sisters were executed on Nov. 16, 1529. Wolfgang Moser was one of the two companions of Jörg vom Hause Jakob (George Blaurock?) when Jörg was imprisoned at Basel, Switzerland, in February 1529. Moser was expelled from Basel, but returned in March with his wife Küngolde. He was again expelled from the city upon Urfehde (q.v.), which his wife, however, refused to render. He returned to the Adige and there lost his life. E.H.B.

Mart. Mir. D 27, E 435; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 74 f.; Paul Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer in der Reformationszeit (Karlsruhe, 1954) 47, 121, No. 262; Paul Burckhardt, Die Basler Täufer (Basel, 1898) 48 f.

Mosa Mennonite Church (MC), located in Mosa Township, about 40 miles west of London, Ont. Early families were Brubacher, Moyer, Snyder, Bergey, Woolner, King, McKay, Saylor, Devitt, and Cressman, who had come from Waterloo County and from the Niagara frontier. In 1875 Henry McKay was called to the ministry here and served until 1902. In 1877 Abram B. Brubacher was ordained minister. By 1883 he inclined to the conservative group and moved to eastern Ohio. In 1907 Nathaniel Bergey was ordained minister. In 1905 under I. R. Shantz of Alberta the membership was strengthened. Over the years services have been held in Cashmere Schoolhouse, S.S. No. 5, Mosa, Austen School, Presbyterian church in Bothwell, in Clachan Hall. By 1934 the membership was reduced to eleven. In recent years it has been revived and the new Bethel Church built. See also Clachan, Aldboro, Austen, Bothwell. (ML III, 169.) J.C.F.

Mosbach, a town and formerly a district of the Palatinate (now Baden), Germany, which included in addition to the Mosbach district also the present Sinsheim district. Shortly after the Thirty Years' War Swiss Mennonites settled in the desolate and depopulated region, arriving in complete poverty and finding employment on the estates of the nobles. As laborers they were welcome, but the exercise of their religion was made difficult. They at first had to meet secretly in the woods for their service, until they were permitted to meet in groups of not more than twenty. In 1652 several families came to Neckarelz in the Mosbach district. Some of them moved away. The census of 1925 listed 41 Mennonites living in the Mosbach district. (ML III, 169.)
HEGE.

Moscorovius, Hieronymus, was an elder of the Polish Brethren (Socianians, q.v.) in Rakov, Poland, who in 1612 together with Valentinus Smalcius (q.v.), a preacher of this group, wrote a letter to the (Frisian) Mennonite congregation of Danzig, Prussia, in which they asked to arrange a union between the Mennonites and the Polish Brethren. Other letters followed, insisting on the union. There were—so they said—differences between both groups: the Polish Brethren did not strictly reject the swearing of oaths, but there were many principles on which they agreed: both the Brethren and the Mennonites were opposed to infant baptism and bearing arms; both meant to be a church of believers, using the ban; both laid much stress on Christian morals. Moscorovius repeatedly insisted on holding a meeting to discuss the problem. This meeting, however, was never held, because the Mennonites did not wish to unite with the Brethren. The leaders of the Danzig Mennonite congregations wrote a number of letters to Dutch Mennonite leaders, Hans de Ries (q.v.) and Reinier Wybrands, asking their advice and their coming in person if necessary. This, however, did not happen. In 1628 the Polish Brethren were suppressed by order of the Polish government. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 664; II, Nos. 2925-39.)
vdZ.

Moscow (Russian, Moskva), founded in 1295, capital of Soviet Russia, population 4,137,018 (1949), has played a significant role in the history of the Mennonites of Russia. Occasionally young men attended the University of Moscow. During World War I, when Mennonite young men served in hospital units under the All-Russian Union of Zemstvos for Relief of Sick and Wounded Soldiers and other organizations, Moscow was the headquarters of these activities. After the Revolution some young men remained in Moscow and others were attracted to study or work in the capital, among them C. F. Klassen (q.v.). The American Mennonite Relief (q.v.) operated in Moscow under the direction of A. J. Miller. The Mennonites of Russia maintained an office of the Allrussischer Mennonitischer Landwirtschaftlicher Verein (q.v.) in Moscow, with Peter Froese as president, which also published Der Praktische Landwirt (1925-26.) The office address was Taganskaya Ulitsa. This organization also served as Mennonite center (Menobshestvo) in Moscow advising and helping many of the Mennonite immigrants to Canada. In 1928 all activities had to be discontinued. Most of the 25,000 Mennonites who left Russia 1923-30 went through Moscow, particularly during the last phase of their migration. In 1929 thousands of Mennonites who planned to leave Russia were stranded in Moscow for many weeks until they were given permission to leave or were forcibly returned home or exiled. During the first years after the Revolution the Mennonites of Russia, under the leadership of Peter F. Froese, took part in the work of the United Council of Religious Bodies in advising the conscientious objectors to war. In 1925 the Allgemeine Bundeskonferenz (q.v.) of Mennonites of Russia convened in Moscow. A complete investigation as to the number of Mennonites who have resided in Moscow has not been made. At present there are very few there. Moscow is the headquarters for the All-Union Council of Evangelical Christian Baptists, with whom Mennonites of Russia and America have contact. C.K.

Mosellanus, Franciscus, a Reformed theologian, one of the most influential clergymen during the rule of the Calvinist Elector Frederick III (q.v.) of the Palatinate, Germany. He was the deacon of the Heiliggeistkirche in Heidelberg 1568-70, and inspector of the Bacharach district 1570-73. He was appointed to represent the national church at the Frankenthal disputation (q.v.), but he did not actually take part in the debate (May 28-June 19, 1571) with the Anabaptists. (ML III, 169.) HEGE.

Mosemann, John Heer (1877-1938), a Mennonite (MC) bishop and leader, was born in Lancaster, Pa., on Dec. 1, 1877, the fifth of the eleven children of Philip and Elizabeth Heer Mosemann, who immigrated from near Trappstadt, Bavaria, Germany, in 1854-55. On Dec. 22, 1901, he married Lillie Swarr Forry. Their six children are Paul, Martha, Esther (Mrs. John R. Mumaw), John, Rhoda (Mrs. J. Clarence Denlinger), and Daniel. His formal education was limited to a short course at the Millersville Normal School 1898-99.

Mosemann became a member of the church in 1895 and was ordained a minister in the Chestnut St. (Lancaster) congregation in 1904, where he served until his death in 1938, being ordained bishop in 1926. He was active in the early missionary and Bible conferences of the Eastern Pennsylvania conferences, and participated in the organization of the Rockland Street Mission in Lancaster, and in founding the later outposts of the East Chestnut Street Mennonite Church.

In the Lancaster Conference Mosemann was active in numerous capacities, serving as secretary of the Conference 1931-37. He was a member on the Publishing Committee of the Mennonite Publication Board 1924-31, was coeditor of The Way 1917-38, and wrote numerous tracts and articles. He was a promoter of Christian education, and served as instructor in the winter Bible school at Eastern Mennonite School. Throughout his ministry he supported his family by means of retail marketing and the manufacture of peanutbutter. His death came Aug. 28, 1938, in Lancaster, with burial in the Millersville Mennonite Church Cemetery. J.H.M.

Moser, a Mennonite family, numerous among the Mennonites in Switzerland, both in the Emmental and the Bernese Jura. From Switzerland many of them because of oppression or hardships moved to Germany (Palatinate) and Alsace. From Courtelary, France, a Moser family emigrated to America in 1754. Others, mostly from Alsace, also settled in the United States in the early 19th century. In the Palatinate the Mosers never were numerous. The Dutch Naamlijst names Peter Mos(s)er as an elder of the Bockschaft congregation in 1757, and Christian Moser (d. 1789 or 90) as a preacher (before 1769) and from 1782 an elder of the Rheingrafenstein congregation near Kreuznach. In America there are many Mosers. Abraham J. Moser published a paper, "Aus dem Leben der Schweizer Mennoniten" in Christlicher Bundesbote of Aug. 11, 1885. Nicolaus Moser (q.v.) and John Moser (q.v.) belonged to this family, but not Wolfgang Moser (q.v.). The name Musser is in all probability a variant of Moser. vdZ.

Moser, John (1826-1908), a General Conference Mennonite elder and leader, was born Aug. 2, 1826, in Wayne Co., Ohio, the oldest son and fourth child of Jakob and Barbara Wahli Moser, who had immigrated among the early settlers to the Sonnenberg Swiss settlement in Ohio in 1821 from Am Stalden, Jura, Switzerland. John married Anna Lehman on Jan. 15, 1852. They moved to Riley Twp., Putnam Co., Ohio, near Bluffton, the following spring, where their ten children were born. He joined the Sonnenberg church on April 10, 1846, and was chosen minister of the Putnam County congregation on Oct. 9, 1853. On Jan. 24, 1864, he was chosen bishop of this congregation, which office he carried out with zeal and fidelity during a period when many changes were introduced into the congregation. During his pastorate of over 50 years he baptized nearly 1,000 persons, married over 200 couples, and, besides his regular sermons nearly every Sunday, officiated at several hundred funerals. He took great interest in the church organizations, such as Sunday schools, young people's societies, missions and evangelistic endeavors, all of which were begun during his ministry. He participated in the ministers' meetings of the Swiss congregations. During his ministry the Swiss congregations of Allen and Putnam counties joined the General Conference Mennonite Church.

A farmer by occupation, he learned the gunsmith's trade and supplied the settlement with rifles of high quality.

Moser compiled the letters of the Amish schism and had them published in 1876 as an answer to the strict avoidance practiced by the Reformed Mennonites and defended in the writings of Daniel Musser. He died July 10, 1908, and was buried in the cemetery of the St. John's Mennonite Church. D.L.G.

Mennonite Yearbook and Almanac (1909) 22-24 with picture; P. B. Amstutz, Geschichtliche Ereignisse der Mennoniten Ansiedlung in Allen und Putnam County, Ohio (n.p., 1925) 124-26 with picture; Johannes Moser, Eine Verantwortung gegen Daniel Musser's Meidungs-Erklärung . . . (Lancaster, 1876); ML III, 170.

Moser, Nikolaus, an elder of the Swiss Mennonites in Friedersmatt near Bowil, Switzerland, who tried in vain to prevent the break between the Amish (q.v.) and the Reist (q.v) groups. In 1709 he wrote a letter to the Mennonites in Holland on behalf of his oppressed brethren describing their desperate plight and expressing his earnest desire that they be reunited. He is said to have died in prison. NEFF.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1255 a; Müller, Berner Täufer, 255; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931) 417, 426; ML III, 170.

Moser, Wolfgang: see Mos, Wolfgang von.

Mosheim, Johann Lorenz von (1694-1755), a noted German Protestant theologian, professor of theology in Helmstädt and chancellor of the University of Göttingen. In his meritorious church history, Institutiones historiae ecclesiasticae recentiores (Helmstädt, 1741), he treats the Mennonites extensively and indeed much more moderately and correctly than other historiographers of that time. He admits that he read the book by Herman Schijn (q.v.), Historia Christianorum, but does not agree that they should not be called Wiedertäufer. He accuses them of maliciously and cleverly concealing the issue, a charge which Gerardus Maatschoen (q.v.) vigorously and skillfully refutes. In his writings, Versuch einer unparteiischen Ketzergeschichte (Helmstädt, 1746) and Anderweitiger Versuch einer vollständigen und unparteiischen Ketzergeschichte (Helmstädt, 1748), he does not mention the Mennonites. The former book does not go beyond the Middle Ages (Waldenses); the latter deals mainly with Michel Servetus. NEFF.

Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 54 ff.; DB 1882, 54; ML III, 170.

Mosiman, Samuel K. (1867-1940), a prominent educator in the General Conference Mennonite Church, president of Bluffton College for 25 years, was born near Middleton, Ohio, Dec. 17, 1867, the second of the fourteen children of Christian and Anna Kinsinger Mosiman. His education included one year at the National Normal Institute at Lebanon, Ohio, and further work at Wittenberg Academy and Wittemberg College, Springfield, Ohio, where he received his B.A. in 1897, and M.A. in 1905. McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago, conferred the B.D. degree upon him in 1905, and Halle University, Germany, the Ph.D. degree for studies in Hebrew, Aramaic, Syriac, and Arabic in 1907. Honorary degrees conferred were Litt.D. from Wittenberg College in 1930 and LL.D. from Bluffton College in 1939.

His first wife (1902), Amelia Krehbiel, died in 1905. In 1909 he married Emilie Hamm. There were no children. In 1897-1903 he served as superintendent of the Mennonite Indian Mission school at Cantonment, Okla. The year after returning from Europe he was professor of Greek and philosophy at National Normal Institute. The following year (1909) he started his career at Bluffton College, which then was Central Mennonite College.

For the year 1908-9 Mosiman served as one of three members on an administration committee of the college. The next year he was elected president, in which capacity he served faithfully and efficiently until 1935. Central Mennonite College, maintained by the Middle District (GCM), became Bluffton College in 1913, directed by a board of fifteen members representing five branches of Mennonites. The first B.A. degrees were conferred on the class of 1915. During his administration five substantial new buildings were erected, the campus enlarged, the curriculum and faculty greatly expanded, for a period even including a theological seminary.

In addition, especially as a minister of the Gospel, he was active in the First Mennonite Church of Bluffton, of which he was a member, served as secretary and president of the Middle District Conference, vice-president of the General Conference, member of the Federal Council of Churches, chairman of the Association of Ohio College Presidents and Deans, and on numerous boards and committees.

While serving as a missionary to the American Indians Mosiman edited for a short time a periodical, The Cheyenne and Arapaho Sword, in the interest of the Mennonite mission at Cantonment (1900-1). While at the seminary he submitted a thesis, "The Existence of Maccabean Psalms in the Psalter," for the purpose of obtaining the Nettie F. McCormick Fellowship in Hebrew for 1904-5. His doctoral dissertation, "Eine Zusammenstellung und Vergleichung der Paralleltexte der Chronik und der älteren Bücher des Alten Testaments," is a recognized piece of research. He also contributed to the International Standard Bible Encyclopedia.

J.S.Sc.

Mosimann (Mosiman, Mosemann, Moseman), a Swiss Mennonite family. Between Signau and Lauperswil in the Emmental in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, there is a hill called Moosegg, meaning Moss Ridge, where the first traces of the Mosimann family appear. The first appearance of the family in the records as Anabaptists is in 1633, when Madlena and Elsbeth Mosemann were taken before the Bernese authorities for belonging to this forbidden sect. From that time until 1670 the Bernese records report nine similar cases against members of the Mosimann family. This is one of the few families that had members who remained in the Emmental region during the times of severe persecution; it is still found in the congregation. Until 1952 Fritz Mosimann was an elder in the Langnau congregation. Others moved to Alsace and Montbéliard in the first years of the 18th century. Fritz Mosimann of the Pfastatt-Mulhouse congregation (1954) was a popular painter of Alsatian landscapes. From Alsace (and Switzerland) several families came to America and others moved to Germany. Several Mosimann families established their homes in America during the 19th century, locating in Lancaster Co., Pa., Butler Co., Ohio, and central Illinois. Among the outstanding Mosimann personalities have been Jakob Mosemann (1795-1876), who emigrated from the Trappstadt congregation, Germany, settling near Bowmansville, Lancaster County. He was ordained preacher (1822) and bishop (1825) in Germany and continued as bishop in the Lancaster Conference, where he was an outstanding preacher and teacher. His grandson John H. Mosemann (q.v., 1877-1938) was also an outstanding bishop (preacher 1904, bishop 1926) in the Lancaster Conference. The latter's son John H. Mosemann was in 1956 a professor in the Goshen College Biblical Seminary and bishop of the Goshen College congregation. Another grandson of Jakob was David H. Mosemann, long a minister in the East Chestnut St. (MC) congregation in Lancaster. Samuel K. Mosiman (q.v., 1867-1940) was president of Bluffton College in 1908-35, and a leader in the General Conference Mennonite Church. Michael Mosimann, born ca. 1820 in Lorraine, came to the United States in 1831, became a leading bishop in central Illinois, later joining the Defenseless Mennonite Church.

D.L.G.

Mottencop: see Stupmann, Wilhelm.

Moultrie County, Ill.: see Douglas-Moultrie Counties.

Moultrie, a village in western Columbiana County, Ohio, near which there was a small settlement of Mennonites (MC), which organized the Georgetown Mennonite Church (now extinct) about 1840. In 1850 Jacob Newcomer donated one-half acre of ground on which the meetinghouse now stands. Henry Newcomer and Henry Walters served as ministers. The church never had Sunday school. The last services were held in 1885.

W.D.S.

Moundridge, a town (1950 pop. 942) in McPherson Co., Kan. The first Mennonite settlers to come to this area were South German Mennonites who came to Kansas in 1874 via Illinois and Iowa. They founded Christian (q.v.) near Moundridge, which was later given up. However, the Mennonites of Moundridge and its community are primarily of Swiss-Volhynian background, who came to Kansas in 1874. Moundridge has a number of stores, a milling company, a co-operative creamery organized in 1932, Co-op Elevator Association organized in 1944, Farmers Co-op organized in 1936, Co-op Federal Credit Union organized in 1947, the Citizen's State Bank, and other businesses. In the early days it had a preparatory school, which is now replaced by a modern high school. The Moundridge Journal has been published since 1886. The Mercy Hospital (q.v.), operated by the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, is located at Moundridge.

Moundridge has two General Conference churches, the First Mennonite Church of Christian (q.v.) and the West Zion Mennonite Church (q.v.). In its immediate community the following churches are located: Hoffnungsfeld (see Hopefield) Mennonite Church, Eden Mennonite Church (q.v.), Garden Township Mennonite Church (q.v.), Emmanuel Mennonite Church (q.v.) and the Lone Tree (q.v.) and Meridian (q.v.) Church of God in Christ, Mennonite congregations. The latter three are not of Swiss-Volhynian but Polish-German background. C.K.

I. G. Neufeld, "Jacob Stucky—Pioneer of Two Continents," Menn. Life IV (January 1949) 46; The Seventy-Fifth Anniversary Services of the Swiss Mennonites, Sept. 5, 1949 (n.d.); P. P. Wedel, Kurze Geschichte der aus Wolhynien, Russland nach Kansas ausgewanderten Schweizer-Mennoniten; L. L. Spalding, "What We Found in Moundridge," Menn. Life VII (July 1952) 131; ML III, 170.

Moundridge Preparatory School was founded in Moundridge, Kan., in 1909, sponsored by the Mennonite School Association (Mennonitischer Schulverein), which consisted of representatives of the West Zion Mennonite Church, the Eden Mennonite Church, the First Mennonite Church of Christian, and the Garden Township Mennonite Church, all of the General Conference branch. The booklet Mennonitischer Schulverein (Moundridge, 1909) contained information about the board of directors (J. C. Goering, chairman, S. S. Baumgartner, secretary), the constitution, the purpose of the school, curriculum, and rules. Among the teachers were P. P. Wedel and Helena Isaac. The school was closed in 1918. (Jahresheft des Mennonitischen Schulvereins, 1910 ff.) C.K.

Mount Airy Mennonite Church (MC), formerly a mission outpost of the Maple Grove (q.v.) church, near Ellicott City, Md., is now an independent congregation, with a membership of 18, and Irvin S. Martin as pastor. I.D.L.

Mount Bethel (Pa.) Mennonite (MC) Church. Mennonites living in northeastern Northampton County, Pa., in the latter part of the 18th century built a meetinghouse on the land of Jacob Kappes of Upper Mount Bethel Township. In 1822 the Mennonites of the area built another meetinghouse near what became later the intersection of Broadway and South Fourth Street in Bangor, Pa. The settlement seems not to have thrived, although the following Mennonite names were represented in the area in 1754: Gross, Culp, Tyson, Moyer, Swartz, Funk, Hess, Fry, Snyder, Martin, Weaver, Bender, Bower, Bowman, Grub, and Nice. Jacob Moyer (1791-1859) of the Swamp district of the Franconia Conference used to go to Northampton County to administer communion to the members there. And John Geil (1778-1866), a preacher of the Lexington congregation of the Franconia Conference, used to preach in Northampton County. The members who were left in the area in 1847 cast their lot with John H. Oberholtzer's new conference, which ordained David Henning (1806-81) to serve as preacher. But shortly after Henning's ordination he united with William Gehman's Evangelical Mennonites. In 1878 Henning and a woman named Elizabeth Warch as "survivors of the said Mennonite Society" conveyed the church property to the Lutherans, and the Mennonite congregations expired. In 1935 the old residents in Northampton County spoke of the former Mennonites with high regard, calling them "Old Meneese" (corruption for Mennist, an old German name for Mennonite). J.C.W.

J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, Pa., 1937) 232-37.

Mount Calvary Mennonite Church (MC), located near Westward Ho, Alberta. The first settlers were the Mervin R. Stanton, John C. Harder, and Earl Buschert families, arriving in 1936. Sunday school was held in the Westward Ho school until 1945 as a mission of the West Zion Mennonite Church near Carstairs. On July 8, 1945, the congregation organized and dedicated its new church. Abraham Reist was given pastoral charge of the congregation by the Alberta-Saskatchewan Mennonite Conference in 1948, having served the congregation for some time before this. The membership was 30 in 1955. E.S.

Mount Carmel Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, near Mt. Carmel, Pa., had 95 members in 1955, with Herbert W. Hartman as pastor.

Mount Clinton Mennonite Church (MC), located one-half mile west of Mount Clinton, Rockingham Co., Va., belongs to the Central Bishop District. Services were held in schoolhouses before the Civil War for Burkholder, Layman, Myers, and Showalter families who had settled in the Muddy Creek "basin." The Weavers, Drivers, Brunks, Heltzels, Heatwoles, and Pences followed after the war. The first meetinghouse was dedicated on Jan. 3, 1875, under the local leadership of Jacob and Joseph N. Driver. The old frame church was replaced by a brick structure on the opposite (north) side of the highway in 1916. This church is one of the four home churches of the Middle District of the Virginia Conference. Today few Mennonites live in this area. It must depend to some extent on Mennonite families who do not live near here. Sem S. Weaver was a resident minister for many years. The membership in 1956 was 109, with C. K. Lehman as pastor. H.A.B.

Mount Hermon Mennonite (MC) Church at Bergton, Hardy Co., W. Va., under the Virginia Conference. In the early years occasional meetings were held at the Moyer school by ministers on their way to more distant points in West Virginia. About the turn of the century services were held more regularly. Later services were held at the Capon Run schoolhouse in Virginia, two miles south. In 1937 a meetinghouse was built between the two schools, a short distance north of the Virginia and West Virginia line. The membership in 1956 was 65, with Linden M. Wenger as pastor, and Rowland Shank as assistant pastor. T.S.

Mount Hermon Mennonite Church (MC), also known as Mutton Hollow Church, located in the Blue Ridge Mountains between Lydia and Geer, Green Co., Va., is a mission church under the Virginia Conference. The congregation was organized in 1938 and services were first held in a Brethren church. In April 1947 a new stone building was dedicated. The membership in 1957 was 20, with Warren A. Kratz as minister. D.R.H.

Mount Joy, Pa., a town (pop. 3,600) located in a fertile and prosperous farming area on the Lancaster-Harrisburg Pike, 13 miles west of Lancaster, was settled in 1735 by Scotch-Irish immigrants from Mountjoy, Donegal, Ireland. The Heistands and Nissleys, Mennonites, had settled there by 1750. Swiss Mennonites claimed the lands back from the highway, but gradually also obtained those over the highway from the Scotch-Irish. By the twentieth century the Swiss had also come into town. A large Mennonite congregation (MC), called Mount Joy, with 394 members, worships in the town, and numerous other congregations surround it. I.D.L.

Mount Joy Mennonite Church (MC), located in Mt. Joy, Lancaster Co., Pa., was organized in 1908 when the present brick meetinghouse, 54 x 88 ft., was built in the southwestern part of the town. It remained a part of the Kraybill circuit until 1949. The membership in 1955 was 381, with Henry E. Lutz as bishop and Henry F. Garber, Amos L. Hess, and Henry W. Frank as ministers. I.D.L.

Mount Joy United Missionary Church, Markham, York Co., Ont., was organized in 1876. In 1957 the membership was 129 with Herbert Shantz serving as pastor. S.S.S.

Mount Olivet Mennonite Church (GCM), located at 2nd and Ohio Streets in Huron, S.D., was organized on July 17, 1945, under the Evangelization Board of the Northern District Conference (GCM) with 17 charter members. On May 12, 1946, this congregation joined the General Conference. In 1956 the church had a membership of 85, and was building a new church and parsonage. Four ministers have served the church in the following order: Jacob A. Friesen, Alfred Regier, B. J. Nickel, and Vernon Buller. V.H.B.

Mount Pisgah Mennonite Church (MC), located about five miles northwest of Leonard, Shelby Co., Mo., and sometimes known as the Cherry Box congregation, was organized probably about 1868, with perhaps 20 charter members. Benjamin Lapp was the first minister and Christian Lapp the first deacon. In 1870 Benjamin F. Hershey, from the Science Ridge congregation, Sterling, Ill., moved into this community and is thought to have been the first bishop of the congregation. The first church was built probably in 1872 about one and one-half miles south of Cherry Box. It was replaced by the present church, located a quarter mile south of Cherry Box, in 1899; this church was remodeled in 1956. The congregation has never been large; the membership in 1956 was 48. Other bishops who have served the congregation were David Kauffman, Daniel Kauffman, J. M. Kreider, Nelson Kauffman, and Daniel Kauffman, the present bishop. Other ministers who have served are John Brubaker, Wallace Kauffman, L. J. Johnston, George Bissey, John M. Yoder, and Daniel Kauffman (ordained bishop in 1952). J.M.Y.

Mount Pleasant, Iowa, is the county seat (pop. 4,610) of Henry County (q.v.), in the southeastern part of the state. In 1874-76 Prussian Mennonite immigrants, who later settled in Kansas and Nebraska, lived in this city temporarily through the influence of Cornelius Jansen (q.v.), who resided in Mount Pleasant in 1874-76. During World War II, from February 1943 to September 1946, Civilian Public Service Unit No. 86, under MCC administration, was located at the Mount Pleasant State Hospital. Conscientious objectors were again employed at the hospital in a Mennonite I-W unit under the new Selective Service program following World War II. M.G.

M. Gingerich, "Mennonites in Mount Pleasant," The Palimpsest (Iowa City) December 1942; M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 229-31.

Mount Pleasant Christian Day School, Fentress, Va., founded by the Mount Pleasant Mennonite (MC) Church, opened in the fall of 1941 with one teacher and seven grades. Since then the eighth grade and first and second years of high school have been added. For a few years the school was conducted in a reconditioned store building, but now has permanent quarters in a new building. The work is financed by the Mount Pleasant Mennonite Church, for the most part by freewill offerings taken in the regular morning church sessions twice a month, and operated by a board of trustees chosen by the congregation.

The teachers of the school have all been Mennonites and the children for the most part have come from the Mennonite homes of the community. It is the purpose of the school to give the children a Christian education under a wholesome environment. The school is open to all, regardless of ability to support it, and to date with only a few exceptions all the children of the immediate church community have attended here. A.D.W.

Mount Pleasant Mennonite Church (MC), formerly called Blanchard, located six miles southeast of Continental, Putnam Co., Ohio, was founded soon after 1830 by the Myers and Shank families from Leiters Ford, Md. The first meetinghouse, built before 1840 near the site of the present building, which was erected in 1918, was displaced in 1866 by one located about four miles farther east. The congregation has always been small, and had no resident minister 1886-1906. A. J. Steiner was ordained for this place in 1906, but was called to North Lima, Ohio, in 1908. For various reasons the pastoral supply was quite irregular until 1950 when Norman O. Smith, the present (1956) pastor, took charge. The membership, which was 40 in 1912, was 47 in 1956. H.S.B.

John Umble, Ohio Mennonite Sunday Schools (Goshen, 1941).

Mount Pleasant Mennonite Church (MC), located near Paradise in the northern tip of Bart Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., was begun as a mission in 1898 in a former United Brethren meetinghouse by the Sunday School Mission (q.v.), under the leadership of B. F. Book and Christian M. Neff. A congregation emerged, which in 1956 numbered 78 with Amos W. Weaver and C. Marvin Eshleman as ministers and G. Parke Book as bishop. A Christian day school for the community adjoins the meetinghouse. I.D.L.

Mount Pleasant Mennonite Church (MC), located in Norfolk Co., Va., is a member of the Virginia Conference. The first settlers came into this area in 1900 and were organized into a congregation on Sept. 17, 1905, by Anthony Heatwole, bishop from Waynesboro, Va., with 16 charter members; J. D. Wert was ordained as pastor. Other ministers who have served the congregation were A. D. Wenger, S. H. Brunk, Amos D. Wenger, and Clayton D. Bergey, who is currently serving the congregation of 174 members (1956). The first meetinghouse was built in 1910 and enlarged in 1952. (ML III, 170.) A.D.W.

Mount Pleasant Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, was located two miles west of Mount Sidney in the North River District, Augusta Co., Va. The church was built in 1870. The congregation probably reached its height in the 1890's. Appointments were filled by Southern and Middle District ministers. The Mennonites moved farther south or left the state. Services discontinued here about 1940. The meetinghouse was sold in 1954. Isaac Grove (1820-99) and Jacob Harshbarger (1855-1906) were the early local ministers. H.A.B.

Mount Pleasant United Missionary Church, located 1½ miles north of Zephyr, Ont., was organized in 1889. In 1957 it had a membership of 24, with Edward N. Chester as pastor. E.N.C.

Mount Vernon Mennonite Church (MC) was begun by the Strasburg congregation as an outpost located in a frame meetinghouse close to the Octoraro Creek in Chester Co., Pa. On June 24, 1948, J. Lloyd Kreider was ordained pastor. The meetinghouse was greatly enlarged and the grounds renovated in 1956. The membership in 1956 was 39. I.D.L.

Mount Vernon Mennonite Church (MC), located along the Brown's Gap Road, at the foot of the Blue Ridge Mountains, one mile east of Port Republic, Rockingham Co., Va. Services were begun here in an abandoned church building, 20 x 60 ft., in January 1954. The present membership is 26, of whom 17 are natives of this rural community now populated mostly by descendants of English settlers. The congregation is part of the Middle District of the Virginia Conference. Three weekly worship services and other activities for the various age groups are under the direction of the pastor, Hubert R. Pellman, and four non-native married couples. H.R.Pe.

Mount View Mennonite Church (MC), located near High River, south of Calgary, Alberta. Elias W. Bricker of Ontario was the pioneer settler in this district, coming with the first home-seekers' excursion sponsored by the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1889. Around 1900-1 other Mennonite families arrived. On April 30, 1901, a meeting was held in Bricker's home, in charge of S. F. Coffman, and a congregation was organized with 11 charter members. Early services were held in the Maple Leaf schoolhouse. In 1902 a church 28 x 42 ft. was built, enlarged in 1939. The membership in 1955 was 19; there was no resident pastor. The following ordained men have served the congregation: Norman B. Stauffer, Isaac Miller, A. H. Wambold, Menno Gingrich, Owen O. Hershberger, Howard O. Stauffer, and Harold Boettger. B.S.

Mount View United Missionary Church, Mt. View Twp., Whatcom Co., Wash., was organized in 1902. Two years later a meetinghouse was erected with a seating capacity of 200. Since 1917 the congregation has conducted an annual camp meeting at Mount View. In 1949 Arcie Grout was the pastor, with 12 members. A.Gr.

Mount Zion Mennonite Church (MC), in Morgan Co., Mo., six miles northeast of Versailles, belongs to the South Central Conference District. It was organized in 1868. In 1871 the congregation was divided on doctrinal questions, particularly on the ordinance of footwashing. One group formed the Bethel Mennonite Church (GCM) of Fortuna, Mo., in Moniteau County; the other was known as the Mount Zion Mennonite Church. The first services were held in a schoolhouse. In 1876 the first church building was erected, replaced in 1905 by the present building. Mount Zion was for some years the church home of Daniel Kauffman, for many years editor of the Gospel Herald. In 1956 the membership was 54, with Leroy Gingerich as pastor. L.G.

Mount Zion United Missionary Church, located five miles east of Queensville, Ont., was organized in 1889. In 1957 it had 17 members with Edward N. Chester as pastor. H.W.Ha.

Mountain Home schoolhouse is the site of an extinct Mennonite (MC) rural mission church under the Virginia Conference, on the Virginia-West Virginia line four miles west of Criders, Va. About 1885 Mennonite ministers were invited to conduct services at this as well as other schoolhouses in this community. Preaching services were held here once a month until 1955. Here the minister stood in West Virginia and preached to his congregation in Virginia. The pastor in recent years was Ray Emsweiler. T.S.

Mountain Lake, Minn., a village of about 2,000 located in the southwestern part of the state in Cottonwood County. In 1873, when the first Mennonites came to this area, it was a little village; by 1880 about 295 Mennonite families had settled in the Mountain Lake community. At the turn of the century the population of the village was 595. Most of these Mennonites came from the Molotschna settlement in Russia. However, a number of Manitoba Mennonite families joined the settlement, who were of Chortitza background. Most of the inhabitants of Mountain Lake at the present time are Mennonites. They also predominate in the surrounding farming area.

In the early days the Mennonites of Mountain Lake had progressive leadership in the realm of education. I. I. Bargen started the Mountain Lake Preparatory School (q.v.) in 1886. This school still exists, although its purpose and name have changed, as the Mountain Lake Bible School. There are three Mennonite groups represented in the Mountain Lake community. The General Conference has a membership of 1,394 (1956) in three congregations—Bethel Mennonite Church (q.v.), First Mennonite Church (q.v.), and Gospel Mennonite Church (q.v.). Three additional G.C.M. churches are located in the communities of Butterfield (q.v.) and Delft (q.v.). The Mennonite Brethren have 452 (1956) members in two churches, Mountain Lake and Carson. The Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church of Mountain Lake consists of 255 members. Of these nine churches four are located within the city limits—three G.C.M. and one M.B.

Mountain Lake has a hospital (see Bethel Deaconess Hospital), nurses' home, Basinger Clinic, Mennonite Aid Society (q.v.), and the Eventide Home. The hospital and the old people's home have served the community over many decades. The present building of the hospital was opened for service in 1921 and the Eventide Home in 1950. The Mountain Lake Observer, published locally since 1894, has at times been in Mennonite hands.

Great changes have taken place in the community. The High German language has been replaced by English. Low German is still spoken among people over 25 years of age. Sixty-three per cent go to Mennonite colleges. Only 35 per cent of the young men were conscientious objectors during World War II. In only 19 of the 34 marriages in 1950, were both partners Mennonites.

When Saskatchewan invited settlers in its pioneer days, 157 families from Mountain Lake accepted the invitation. Many other families and young people have gone to other states and to the cities. On the other hand, non-Mennonites have moved into the city. J.J.F., C.K.

Seventy-five years in Minnesota, 1874-1949. Mennonite Churches in Mountain Lake Community (n.p. n.d.); Jubilaeumsfeier, Mountain Lake, Minnesota, 1875-1925 (n.p., n.d.); Brosamen aus Erfahrungen der Mennoniten in und um Mountain Lake, Minnesota (n.p., n.d.,); Calvin Redekop, "A Changing Mountain Lake," Menn. Life XI (April 1956); F. P. Schultz, A History of the Settlement of German Mennonites from Russia at Mountain Lake, Minnesota (Author, 1938); ML III, 171 f.

Mountain Lake Bible School, formerly known as the Mountain Lake Preparatory School (Deutsche Vorbereitungs-Schule), Mountain Lake, Minn., was started by I. I. Bargen (q.v.) in 1886, who had organized a School Association (Schulverein) of 30 members for this purpose. After two years this organization was dissolved and I. I. Bargen resigned, but J. J. Balzer continued the school. Through his efforts a new School Association was organized in 1896.

The 1905-6 catalog makes provision for two classes of the lower level and four classes of upper level instruction in addition to some elementary school classes. The curriculum indicates that Balzer, who was a graduate of the Gnadenfeld Zentralschule, Russia, patterned his school after the one he was graduated from. In 1901 a commodious building was erected. The enrollment in 1901-2 was 83, 1902-3 was 106, 1903-4 was 116. More than half the students were adults.

In 1912 the Schulverein was dissolved and the control of the school was assumed jointly by five different Mennonite churches in the Mountain Lake community, who administered it until 1936, when another reorganization took place. Since that time the school has been known as the Mountain Lake Bible School (q.v.) and offers in its Bible department a Bible course of two years and six months for adults, and in its parochial department (in which the term consists of nine month) the regular state-required subjects of the first six grades and some courses in Bible and German. In addition to this the Bible School maintains a kindergarten. Among the outstanding teachers have been J. J. Balzer (1886-1914) and Cornelius Wall (1936-1946). In 1954 the school had an enrollment of 105 and five teachers. C.K.

Catalogs of Mountain Lake Deutsche Vorbereitungs-Schule and the Mountain Lake Bible School; J. E. Hartzler, Education Among the Mennonites of America (Danvers, Ill., 1925) 116 ff.; M. S. Harder, "The Origin, Philosophy, and Development of Education Among the Mennonites" (University of Southern California, dissertation, 1949) 244 ff.; ML III, 172.

Mountain Lake (Minn.) Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church originated when Elder Aaron Wall and the ministers Johann Becker, Heinrich Fast, Sr., Peter Schultz, Heinrich E. Fast, and deacon Cornelius Friesen together with a group of fifteen families who had withdrawn from the first and larger of the two pioneer Mennonite churches of Mountain Lake began to meet in the homes for fellowship. This group organized as a church in January 1889 as the Bruderthaler Mennoniten-Gemeinde and built a meetinghouse. In the community it was later commonly known as the "Valley Church" because of the location of the church building about a mile north of the village of Mountain Lake, Midway Twp., Cottonwood County. The name was later changed to "Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church" to accord with the name of the conference to which it belongs and which it helped bring into being and organized in October 1889. The conference was originally known as the "Defenseless Mennonite Brethren of North America."

The first meetinghouse was dedicated June 16, 1889. In 1892 another church was built and the first edifice used as a dining hall, and for a short time (1893-96) as a Bible school. This first building was razed in 1944.

From the very beginning the church stressed Christian education and instituted a Bible school in 1893 known as the Bruderthaler Gemeindeschule. In 1896 a three-story Bible school was built near the church, in which an elementary Bible school was held until 1925. Thereafter for several summers daily vacation Bible school was conducted here. This building was razed in 1947 and the material used for building a modern parsonage in Mountain Lake.

At least 35 members coming from this church have served in various conferences and denominations as missionaries, pastors, or Bible teachers; and a number of its younger members are now in training for Christian service. Other pastors of this church have been D. A. Regier, John N. Wall, H. P. Wiebe, Wm. M. Loewen, and H. A. Brandt. The baptized membership in 1957 was 273. D.A.R.

G. S. Rempel, A Historical Sketch of the Churches of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren (Rosthern, 1939).

Mountain Lake (Minn.) First Mennonite Church (GCM), organized in 1878, until about 1938 called the Mennonite Church of Mountain Lake, had no conference affiliation until 1917, when it joined both the Northern District Conference and the General Conference. The first elder, Gerhard Neufeld, arrived in 1878 from South Russia, whence all members in the early years came. The most common names are Neufeld, Harder, Derksen, Dick, Falk, Friesen. About half of the members are farmers. The first meetinghouse was built in 1882. The second meetinghouse, also a wooden structure, was erected in 1911 with a seating capacity of about 350. It was replaced by a modern brick building with a seating capacity of 710, dedicated in August 1956. In 1947 a brick parsonage was built. As late as 1936 the language of worship was German. In 1937 English was introduced and gradually gained ground, so that at present it is all English, with the exception of a single German Sunday-school class. In 1947-55 L. R. Amstutz was the pastor. He is the first minister called from outside the congregation. The Sunday school was organized about the middle nineties. The first C.E. Society was started in 1906. At present there is also a Junior C.E. Society and a Youth Fellowship organization. There are three mission societies, a men's chorus, and a mixed choir.

Outstanding individuals in the history of the church have been Elder Gerhard Neufeld 1878-1910; Jacob Stoesz, elder 1910-18; I. J. Dick, assistant pastor 1914-20, elder 1920-47; D. D. Harder, minister 1892-1940; I. I. Bargen, who taught in the Sunday school for about 50 years. The membership in 1956 was 423. L. R. Amstutz was succeeded as pastor in 1955 by Willard W. Wiebe. I.J.D.

Mountain Lake (Minn.) Mennonite Brethren Church is an outgrowth of the Carson Mennonite Brethren Church. Since members living in and south of Mountain Lake could not attend the Carson church regularly because of the distance, another meetinghouse was built about five miles south of Mountain Lake. Elder Voth served as pastor of both churches until 1918, when he moved to Canada. In 1901 the building was moved to its present location in Mountain Lake. In 1913 a new church building was constructed, which was enlarged in 1948. N. N. Hiebert served as pastor in 1918-29, succeeded by H. E. Wiens, Dan E. Friesen, and John G. Baerg, the present (1956) pastor. The Mountain Lake and Carson churches conjointly convene at quarterly meetings, alternating the place of meeting. An annual mission festival is jointly observed on July 4, when, as a result of a sale arranged by women's missionary societies, large sums are collected for the work of missions. The congregation has missionaries serving in Africa, Japan, Colombia, Brazil, and other foreign fields. The membership in 1955 was 276. J.A.W.

Mountain Lake Preparatory School: see Mountain Lake Bible School.

Mountain Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, was located in Clinton Twp., Lincoln Co., Ont., in the settlement known as the "Twenty," some 20 miles west of the Niagara River south of Lake Ontario. It and the Moyer church below the escarpment were practically one congregation using two places of worship at the peak of strength. One staff of ministers served both every Sunday in the late 80's. As the families on the mountain either moved away or failed to gather the young people into the church the attendance waned. The church was sold in 1915. From that time Moyer church was the one place of worship. J.C.F.

L. J. Burkholder, Brief History of Mennonites in Ontario (Toronto, 1935) 61.

Mountain Top Schoolhouse, five miles west of Bergton, Va., near the top of Shenandoah Mountain, is the meeting place of a rural mission (MC) church of 16 members. Pastoral care is given by the Northern District of the Virginia Conference. T.S.

Mountain View Amish Mennonite Church, located 1½ miles northwest of Salisbury, Somerset Co., Pa., was built in 1953, as an outpost of the Beachy (q.v.) congregation, which conducts public worship services here every Sunday, preaching services and Sunday school being held on alternate Sundays. E.N.H.

Mountain View Bible College, Didsbury, Alberta, was founded in 1926 by the Mennonite Brethren in Christ (UMC). The school had an enrollment of 35 in 1956-57 and offered work leading to degrees in music, theology, and sacred literature. A fifth year of work leading to the Th.B. degree has been added. An administration building, a music studio, a library and classroom buildings in addition to dormitories comprise the plant. The Conference Tabernacle is also located on the campus. Two of the eight faculty members in 1956 held master's degrees and four had bachelor's degrees. GL.E.

Mountain View Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located north of Bonners Ferry, Boundary Co., Idaho, was organized in 1936. The meetinghouse, built in 1943, was made of lumber from the local woods. The church had 92 members in 1955, with Ernest Dirks and Eddie Justus as ministers in charge. The ministry is unsalaried. The members are of Mennonite and Norwegian descent. H.HOL.

Mountain View Mennonite Church (MC), located 10 miles east of Kalispell and 2½ miles northeast of Creston, Mont., originated in 1903, when Jacob Roth, bishop in the Amish Mennonite Church, moved to Creston from Oregon. Other early settlers were John Eicher, Lee Neuschwander, Peter and Samuel Sutter, Ed Ruckdashel, Joseph Murer, Andrew Bachman, and Peter Eyman. Norman Leroy Kauffman came in the spring of 1911.

In the spring of 1904 a Sunday school was organized. Preaching services in the German language were held every two weeks. Four different buildings were used for these services before the church was built in 1913. During these years this congregation was a part of the Western Amish Mennonite Conference, but in 1916 it joined the Pacific Coast Mennonite Conference and in 1923 became a member of the Alberta-Saskatchewan Conference. In 1955 the membership was 98. The following ministers have served the congregation: Jacob Roth, D. D. Kauffman, Joseph Whitaker, Christ Snyder, John W. Oesch, John G. Hochstetler, who is the present (1955) bishop, and D. D. Brenneman, the present minister. J.G.H.

S. G. Shetler, Church History of the Pacific Coast Mennonite Conference District (Scottdale, 1931).

Mountain View Mennonite Church (MC) is to be built in west-central North Carolina, seven miles south of Hickory. Clayton Gotshall and family of the Franconia Conference in Pennsylvania, while doing some follow-up work, located a former Mennonite family here. Work was begun among the local people. Services are being held in a dwelling house. Truman Brunk of the Southeastern District of the Virginia Conference has bishop oversight of this work. H.A.B.

Mountain View Mennonite Church (MC), the first mission church of the Southern District of the Virginia Conference, is located on the Back Creek, near Lyndhurst, in the Blue Ridge Mountains, in the South River District of Augusta County. The church was built in 1900 and rebuilt in 1953. The early sponsors were Anthony P. Heatwole, Erasmus Shank, and Martin Brunk. Two local ministers, B. Frank Hatter and Silas Brydge, were ordained in the 1940's. In 1957 the membership was 59, with B. Frank Hatter as pastor. H.A.B.

Mountain View (Alberta) United Missionary Church had 24 members in 1953, with Amsey Frey as pastor.

Mountville Mennonite Church (MC), located in the town of Mountville (pop. 1,000) in Lancaster Co., Pa., three miles from the Susquehanna River, is the third meetinghouse for the Manor District, built in 1898, a substantial brick church 50 x 74 ft. In 1955 Elmer F. Kennel was pastor, with 102 members. (ML III, 172.) I.D.L.

Moyer (Moyers, Mayer, Meyer, Meyers, Myers), a large family, some branches of which have many Mennonite members. The various Swiss immigrants to colonial America who bore the name Meyer were not all related to each other. The Moyer Family Genealogy of 1896, a huge volume of over 700 pages, treats various immigrants, some of whom were Mennonites, others not. Among the Mennonite immigrants may be mentioned Christian Meyer (d. *ca.*1751) of Switzerland, who was in Pennsylvania by 1719, settling on the Indian Creek in Lower Salford Twp., Montgomery Co. One of his sons, Christian Meyer, (*ca.*1705-87) was a deacon in the Franconia district of the Franconia Conference (MC), and another son, Jacob Meyer (1730-78), was a preacher at Perkasie (now called Blooming Glen). Immigrant Hans Meyer (d. *ca.*1748) came to Pennsylvania by about 1720 and located in what is now Upper Salford Twp., Montgomery Co. (then Skippack Twp., Philadelphia Co.). A third Mennonite Meyer immigrant was a preacher Peter Meyer, born in Switzerland about 1723, who emigrated to America about 1741 with his mother, three brothers, and a sister. He located in Springfield Township, Bucks Co. In 1773 he was ordained preacher in the Swamp district of the Franconia Conference. His brother Jacob (1721-90) Meyer settled in Saucon Township, now Lehigh County. He was ordained a preacher in the Swamp district in 1752 and bishop in 1763. Jacob's son Samuel Meyer (d. 1832) was also a preacher at Saucon. The variant form Moyer is found widely in the Franconia Conference to this day, and is also common in Ontario to which some members of the family removed. Especially worthy of mention in Ontario was Dilman Moyer (1807-73) of the Twenty congregation at Vineland, now called the Moyer Mennonite Church, ordained bishop in 1850. Daniel Moyer (1812-64), a preacher of the Yellow Creek district in Indiana (MC), was ordained about 1850 and lived near Jamestown where he served the Shaum (now Olive) congregation until his death in a railway accident. Arthur Moyer (1890-1924), of Lehigh County, Pa., served as superintendent of the Welsh Mountain Industrial Mission (MC), New Holland, Pa., until he was shot and killed by a thief in 1924. At the present time in the Franconia Conference among the ordained Moyers are the following: Jacob Moyer, bishop, and Elmer Moyer, preacher at Souderton, and Wilson Moyer, preacher at Blooming Glen. Among the Moyers who were preachers in the General Conference Mennonite Church were Samuel Moyer (1812-91), two of his sons, Manasseh Moyer (1845-1903) and Jacob Moyer (1842-1909); Manasseh's son John F. Moyer (1885-1955) was on the staff of Bethel College, and S. T. Moyer (1893-) is a missionary in India. Elmer Moyer (1889-) served as secretary of the Ontario Conference of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church 1917-33.

In Europe the name Meyer was apparently never prominent in Mennonite circles; Delbert L. Gratz lists Meyer as an Aargau family which left Switzerland because of the severe persecution in the 18th century. The name appeared in a list of Anabaptists in Montbéliard, Württemberg (now in France) in 1759. A Meyer family from Alsace located in Wayne County, Ohio, in 1872, several of whose present-day descendants are in active church work; Elmer Meyer has been deacon at Pleasant Hill, Ohio, since 1936; J. C. Meyer has been professor of history at Western Reserve University, Cleveland, Ohio, since 1923. Willard Moyer is a preacher in the Conservative Mennonite Church at Pigeon, Mich. The Hutterian Chronicle records the selection of a preacher named Hannss Meyer in 1632 and his ordination three years later. (See also Meyer.) J.C.W.

A. J. Fretz, A Genealogical Record of the Descendants of Christian and Hans Meyer (Harleysville, 1896); idem, Genealogy of the Moyer Family (Milton, 1909); E. R. Mueller, Moyer Family History (Halstead, 1948).

Moyer, Manasses S. (1845-1903), a leader in the General Conference Mennonite Church in its formative years, was born in Springfield Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., on Sept. 25, 1845, the son of Samuel and Elizabeth Shelly Moyer. After teaching in schools in Pennsylvania he attended the Mennonite school at Wadsworth, Ohio. Then he taught English at this school in 1871-75. He also taught at Sonnenberg, Wayne Co., Ohio; Bluffton, Ohio; and Lee Co., Iowa. He was married to Anna M. Eyman in Iowa on April 19, 1874. Five children grew to adulthood.

Most of his active life Moyer served in the ministry. He was ordained in 1873 and served as assistant to Ephraim Hunsberger, the pastor at Wadsworth. In 1878 he was called to the Bethel Mennonite Church, in Moniteau Co., Mo., and was ordained elder in 1879. In 1901 he accepted a call from the newly formed Mennonite church at Deer Creek, Okla., serving until his death. He was active in the work of the General Conference, serving on the Home Mission Committee for a number of years. He also was a member of the Foreign Mission Board 1899-1903. He died on Dec. 3, 1903.

Three character traits stand out in the accounts of Moyer's life. He was a tactful leader. In some of the internal difficulties in the Mennonite school at Wadsworth he was recognized as a leader of even temperament and wisdom. He had a conservative disposition, which was noticed at board sessions. He was a man of action when he arrived at a decision. P.R.S.

Mennonite Year Book and Almanac (Quakertown, Pa., 1905); H. P. Krehbiel, The History of the General Conference of the Mennonites of North America (n.p., 1898).

Moyer (Mooyer), Pieter Jansz, a Dutch Mennonite elder, serving in the Flemish congregations of Amsterdam 1624-42 and Leiden 1642 until his death (before 1661). Moyer, who was one of the four authors of the Flemish confession called the Olyftack (1626), also participated in the Middelstum (q.v.) Flemish conference of 1628. In 1649 he was at Hamburg with Isaac Jansz Snep, T. T. van Sittert, and Tobias Govertsz to settle the quarrel in the congregation concerning baptism by immersion or sprinkling. On this occasion he also visited the burial place of Menno Simons. The following two writings by Moyer have been preserved: Wederleg van Conradi Vietoris Bewijs-redenen voor der Martinisten Kinderdoop (Haarlem, 1632) and Volgher op Conradi Vietoris Voorlooper (Haarlem, 1632). In these books Moyer shows himself as a sharp opponent of infant baptism, but at the same time somewhat more progressive than most Flemish leaders were. vdZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) passim; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 558 V, 566; II, 1238, 1240 b, 1242, 1855, 1859; Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III, 243; DB 1881, 38; Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 221 f.

Moyer Mennonite Church (MC), at Vineland, Ont., now known as the First Mennonite Church of Vineland, was organized in 1801, by settlers from Bucks Co., Pa. Six families came in 1786, 8 families came in 1799, and by the close of 1800 there were some 60 persons in this part of Ontario. At the time of organization, an estimated 100 persons constituted the congregation. With the permission of the Franconia Conference (q.v.) Valentine Kratz was ordained minister in 1801 and John Fretz deacon. A log schoolhouse was used at first for the services. In 1810 a site was provided on the farm of Jacob Moyer for the first meetinghouse and cemetery. Samuel Moyer was the first schoolteacher. Jacob (d. 1833) Moyer became minister in 1802, bishop in 1807. Shortly before his death the stone wall bounding the present cemetery was built.

The Moyer congregation reached its greatest strength by 1850. Other bishops who served "The Twenty," as it was called, were Jacob Gross, ordained in 1834, and Dilman Moyer, ordained in 1850. Other ministers were Jacob Moyer, Jr., Abraham Moyer, Daniel Hoch, Abram K. Hunsberger, Daniel Honsberger, John F. Rittenhouse, and Abraham Rittenhouse. The congregation experienced an unusual amount of difficulty through misunderstandings and schisms. First Bishop Jacob Gross withdrew to the Evangelical Association about 1849, with a considerable following. Daniel Hoch (q.v.) left in 1849 and he and his followers used the church east of the Pond at Jordan. For a time he co-operated with the John H. Oberholtzer (q.v.) group in eastern Pennsylvania, then later with the Mennonite Brethren in Christ. The M.B.C. movement of 1874-75 took several members. Again, the division of 1889 separated several families of the Old Order Mennonites, who worshiped in a frame building at the west side of the cemetery grounds. Sunday school was conducted in the late 1840's, with lessons from the New Testament, for the preservation of the German language. The ministry of more recent date consisted of S. F. Coffman (q.v.), who was ordained in Chicago in 1895, came to Vineland shortly thereafter, and was ordained bishop in 1903. He was followed by Wayne North as minister, ordained in 1955. The membership now (1955) numbers 74. (ML III, 172 f.) J.C.F.

Muara Sipongi, a former mission station of the Dutch Mennonites on Sumatra (q.v.), opened by the missionary Nikolas Wiebe on Sept. 26, 1890, three hours distant from Pakanten (q.v.). The region, which is inhabited by the Ulus, "a poor, deeply deteriorated, apathetic, insensitive, and sleepy people," suffered a terrible earthquake in 1892. With a wide participation by the native population the church was dedicated in October 1895. In 1901 Wiebe was followed by Johann Thiessen, who made Muara Sipongi a main station beside Pakanten. In 1911-27 Peter Nachtigal worked there with untiring faithfulness. In 1927 the station was turned over to the supervision of a German missionary society and is served by native workers. (ML III, 173.) NEFF.

Mugango Mennonite Church (MC), located 17 miles south of Musoma, Tanganyika, Africa, is in the Jita and Ruri tribes. The Africa Inland Mission began work among these tribes and turned it over to Elam Stauffer of the East Africa Mennonite Mission on Oct. 1, 1936. The first baptismal and communion services were held at Butata, Majita, on Aug. 13, 1936; four were baptized and 25 received into fellowship from the former mission. On March 14, 1937, two were baptized at Mugango and three received into fellowship. Since all the work of the Majita field is under the supervision of the Muango station, the full beginning of the church there was the result of these two services. The total of this beginning was 34 members. The membership in 1956 was 270. W. Ray Wenger arrived at Mugango on April 10, 1938, and had pastoral oversight of the work until his death June 9, 1945. He was ordained bishop at Mugango on April 24, 1941, for the South Mara area of Musoma District. Elam Stauffer has present pastoral oversight of the Mugango-Majita churches. (ML III, 173.) E.W.S.

Mühldorf, a town on the Inn in Upper Bavaria, Germany, in which, according to a Hutterite chronicle, five brethren were executed for their faith. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 277; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 233; ML III, 173.)

Mühlhausen in Thuringia, Germany, situated on the Unstrut (pop. 36,755), until 1802 a free imperial city, during the Peasants' War the seat and site of execution of Thomas Müntzer (q.v.), later a temporary center of the Anabaptist movement in northern Thuringia.

Anabaptism found its way into Thuringia about 1527 apparently from Franconia, where Hans Hut (q.v.) was working. The first head of the Thuringian Anabaptists was Hans Römer, a furrier of Eisenach. After him his disciple Ludwig Spon of Ershausen became "the soul of the movement" in this area. The preacher Alexander, who also baptized in this region, was seized and beheaded in Frankenhausen in 1533, "one of the noblest characters of Anabaptism."

Early in May of that year seven Anabaptists including Ludwig Spon were imprisoned in Mühlhausen and Treffurt after they had been warned to give up their conventicles in the neighboring villages. They declared that they would rather die than recant or betray their brethren. They would probably have been executed if Philip of Hesse, who had jurisdiction over the region with the dukes of Saxony, had not objected. The seven prisoners were instructed for a while by Balthasar Raidt (q.v.), the pastor at Hersfeld, and released after half a year.

Almost at once the Mühlhausen Anabaptists began to propagandize for their cause in the wider vicinity of the city. They had good success in the village of Neunleiningen, ten miles east. A number of men and women were imprisoned and tried in September 1534. Alerted to the presence of Anabaptists in Mühlhausen by the statements of the prisoners, persecution began anew in the city. A citizen of Mühlhausen, Klaus Scharf, on the rack betrayed the names of his brethren; they were arrested, but soon released when the city council was convinced of their innocence. Klaus Scharf was also given his freedom, but again held Anabaptist meetings in his house.

A center for the Anabaptists in the city was for a time the home of Barbara Meissrod (q.v.), who had been baptized in the fall of 1534 by Heinz Kraut (q.v.). In early 1535 Peter Reusse (q.v.) baptized several women of Mühlhausen. Meetings were also held in the neighboring Gunzelhof, where as many as 20 gathered at one time and where the preacher Mattes baptized. Anabaptists of the city also met in the forests.

The growth of the movement in Mühlhausen stirred up the wrath of the authorities again in 1537; Barbara Meissrod and several others who had met in her home were arrested and examined on the rack. Other arrests followed. George, Duke of Saxony (q.v.), who as patron of the city was at once informed of the affair, ordered the immediate execution of the Anabaptists by drowning. On Nov. 8, 1537, ten were put to death; they were thrown into the Unstrut and their bodies buried on the river bank. Among these were Barbara Meissrod, Jakob Storger, and Klaus Scharf. They went to their death singing "Nun bitten wir den Heiligen Geist." On the way to their execution they are said to have called out to the spectators words derogatory to infant baptism and the Mass, and a call to repentance. A few days later two other Anabaptists were put to death at the same place. Four were driven from the city.

This procedure of terror apparently wiped out the Anabaptist movement in Mühlhausen. But after the death of George in 1539, when the Reformation was introduced into the city, the Anabaptists also became active again, especially since Sebastian Thiel, the pastor of Niederrode near Mühlhausen, was not unfriendly to the movement. Thiel was, to be sure, punished for his attitude at the instigation of Justus Menius (q.v.), who had been put in charge of the reform of the church in 1542, but the Anabaptist movement nevertheless revived to the sorrow of the Eisenach Superintendent, who spared no effort in speaking and writing to eradicate the movement during his two years of office. The preachers were required to preach against them from the pulpit and pray for their conversion. He wrote a new polemic, Von dem Geist der Widerteuffer, which he dedicated to the city council on April 3, 1544.

This booklet had the desired effect. Several citizens and peasants were ordered arrested and cross-examined by the preachers. Those who refused to recant were imprisoned; among these was Ludwig Spon, who was once more at the head of the brotherhood. A year later six brethren were examined, among whom was Christoph von der Eichen (q.v.), who was repeatedly imprisoned and escaped death only through Philip's intervention. He was banished from Mühlhausen with his family, but kept reappearing in the city and the vicinity, obviously a leader, whereas Ludwig Spon disappeared from the records.

Until the 1570's a small remnant seems to have maintained itself under the leadership of Christoph von der Eichen, who caused the authorities of Mühlhausen much concern. The complaints of the pastors were unceasing. In 1564 the governments involved made it mandatory to take serious steps to wipe them out. In September 16 Anabaptists were summoned to a cross-examination, of whom 12, including Christoph von der Eichen, appeared. They were examined at length and strictly admonished to desist from their "horrible error," but in vain. Christoph von der Eichen was questioned a number of times and was finally executed as an "arch-Anabaptist" at Langensalza in the early 1570's. The same fate befell the last Anabaptist of whom there is record in Mühlhausen, Hans Dohn of Lauterbach, who stayed with his brother in the vicinity, and whose doctrine was of a strange dualistic and anti-Trinitarian nature.

After the middle of the 16th century there was beside the Anabaptist movement a libertinistic group, the "Blood Friends," whom Justus Menius in his book, Von den Blutsfreunden aus dem Widertauff (Erfurt, 1551), associates with the Anabaptists; but the cross-examinations of the arrested "Blood Friends" revealed that they would have no part in adult baptism and attacked the teachings of the Anabaptists (Wappler, Thüringen, 190, 193, 205). Several "Blood Friends" were arrested in Mühlhausen in 1551, one of whom probably died at the stake, and others were banished from the city. This group caused the Anabaptist reputation irreparable damage in northern Thuringia. G.H.

P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); idem, Thüringen; ML III, 173-75.

Muhr, Hans (d. 1528), an Anabaptist martyr, was arrested in the summer of 1527 in Styria, Upper Austria, with a number of brethren, among them Leonhard Alexberger, Hans Penzenauer, Sigmund Peutler, Matth. Pürschinger, and Hans Schützenecker. They were asked to recant, but they insisted that they would adhere to the doctrine they had received from Hans Hut (q.v.) until they were shown something better from the Word of God. This statement impressed the authorities of Styria where there was a lack of theologians. The council believed, according to its report to Vienna, that they had listened to the preaching of Hans Hut out of love to the Word of God rather than any malicious intent. King Ferdinand (q.v.) commanded on Sept. 10, 1527, to begin criminal proceedings against the prisoners, but to pardon those who would recant and accept church penance (q.v.) and pay the cost of the trial.

The trial was conducted by Wolfgang Künigl (q.v.) before 35 judges and spectators. The accused were given an opportunity to defend themselves in writing. They declared that it had never entered their minds to act contrary to the imperial laws, brotherly love, and Christian order, as was asserted in the public charge; on the contrary they gave the emperor what was the emperor's and were subject to all human law for the Lord's sake. In their meetings they instructed each other from the Word of God, but not with the idea of doing anything wrong or instigating revolt. Their doctrine was not an innovation, but the teaching of Christ. The baptism they taught they would maintain to the end. Concerning the sacrament of the altar they read nothing in the Bible, but they valued communion as Christ instituted it very highly. They did not believe that the body of Christ was in the form of bread; for Christ said in Matthew 24 and Mark 14, that if anyone said to them, lo Christ is here or Christ is there, they should not believe it.

Künigl was not satisfied with their promise to stop holding secret meetings if they did not also forsake their doctrine. He said he was not obliged to enter into a debate with them on their view of the Scriptures; imperial and clerical law forbade the laity to dispute matters of faith.

The judges were not unimpressed with the statements of the Anabaptists; their verdicts complied only in part with the mandates requiring the death penalty for those who refused to recant. The delegate from Linz, Michael Widmer, said it was difficult for a layman inexperienced in divine and temporal law to make a decision in such a case. But he would obediently subdue his conscience and his reason and sentence them to two additional months of instruction by learned Christians; if they then would not recant, they should be forever banished from the hereditary crown lands; eight delegates from Styria decided that if they did not respond to efforts to convert them, they should be branded on the forehead and expelled; two delegates from Gmunden and Vöcklabruck thought they should also be blinded. The verdict was finally reached that they should be kept in prison until they returned to the right and Christian faith.

Ferdinand, however, declared that this verdict was inadequate and ordered that the six prisoners be burned at the stake if they refused to recant. On the rack they again refused to recant, and confessed that before they had been summoned they had taken communion together and mutually encouraged each other to remain true to their faith. They were executed on March 30, 1528. Hege.

J. Jäkel, Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberösterreich (1889) 32-35; A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin von Linz (Berlin, 1893) 74-84; ML III, 175.

Muiden, a town in Holland on the IJsselmeer west of Amsterdam, where in 1569 two Anabaptist martyrs, Thijs Joriaensz (q.v.) and Jan Claesz (q.v.), were burned at the stake. The latter, a "young fellow of about twenty-five years," lived in the neighboring town of Weesp and moved to Muiden with Thijs Joriaensz to attend religious services. They were arrested and imprisoned in the castle near Muiden. Six months later they were taken to The Hague, and after another six months returned to Muiden, where they were put to death together. Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) had baptized 18 persons here in 1563-65 and another five about 1568. This presupposes the existence of a congregation at Muiden, which is corroborated by the fact that Thijs Joriaensz went to Muiden "to serve the congregation of God with the Word." Very little is known about this congregation. It was still in existence in 1681, apparently united with that of Weesp (q.v.), which was served by the ministers of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation. The membership was only 12 in 1675, and presumably died out soon after. Neff., vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 480, E 828; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 789; II, 2, No. 2343; DB 1872, 61; 1918, 50; ML III, 175.

Mukedi station of the Congo Inland Mission in Africa was founded in 1922. This was the first station located in the Leopoldville province of Belgian Congo, and the second major expansion of the work among the Bampandi tribes. It is approximately 75 miles northwest of Nyanga and separated from the rest of the stations by the wide and treacherous Loange river. A large medical work is carried on with both general and maternity hospitals for Congolese. The mission medical station also serves a large number of European and American personnel of government, business, and missions located in the area. There is also a three-year teacher training school for Congolese preparing to teach in village or regional schools and a two-year Bible school open to graduates of elementary grades. Both these schools accept students from other C.I.M. stations and other missions in the language area.

Data for 1955: 12 missionaries, 9 native church leaders, 127 teachers in Christian day schools, 1,193 baptized members, 1,138 professed Christians awaiting baptism, average daily attendance of 3,570 at all mission day schools of Mukedi and district, 180 communities where the Word is preached regularly, 21 Congolese medical helpers, 1,402 hospitalized patients, 13,223 new cases treated, 564 surgical operations performed. H.A.Dr.

Mulberry (Fla.) was a Mennonite-administered unit under the Brethren-directed CPS Camp No. 27, located approximately 30 miles east of Tampa. The unit engaged in a hookworm eradication program. The unit was opened in September 1943 but in April 1946 it was moved to Bartow, Fla. The Mulberry camp was one of a number selected by the MCC for relief training program, which lasted from November 1943 to May 1946. M.G.

M. Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 252-56.

Mulder, a common Dutch family name, both Mennonite and non-Mennonite, the Dutch word mulder meaning miller. There have been a number of Mennonite ministers by this name, among whom were Claes Mulder, a mason, who was a (lay) preacher at den Burg on the island of Texel until 1710, and at Rotterdam 1710-25, and Abraham Mulder (b. 1893), who at first was an archivist and then became a Mennonite (lay) pastor and served at Aardenburg 1932-41, Giethoorn 1941-46, and Dordrecht 1946. He published some papers on Mennonite history; e.g., "De oudste bewaard gebleven brieven van onze Middelburgse gemeente," "Voordopers Doperdom," and "Menno Simons' Uitgang uit het Pausdom," all published in Doopsgezind Jaarboekje, 1930, 1934, and 1936. He also wrote Uit Verleden en Heden van de Doopsgezinde Zending (n.p., 1947), a booklet to commemorate the centennial of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association. vdZ.

Of special interest is the Mennonite Mulder family found in the "peat colonies" district in the Dutch province of Groningen. Its ancestor (1) Hindrik Wichersz moved from Giethoorn (q.v.) to Veendam (q.v.) to break up the peat moors (the peat being used as fuel), as did the two following generations, being at the same time landowners and farmers. From about 1750 the members of this family are also engaged in business. Most of them then lived at Sappemeer (q.v.). Since about 1860 many of them have been in the professions as engineers, bankers, teachers, and lawyers, spreading all over the Netherlands, and even migrating to South Africa. This Mulder family is related by marriage to other Mennonite families such as Calkema, Van der Goot, Meihuizen, Romkes, Ubbens, and Verveld.

Two grandsons of (1) Hindrik Wichersz were Mennonite preachers at Sappemeer; viz., (2) Hendrik Jacobsz, a farmer, serving the Waterlander congregation 1700-33, and his brother (3) Harm Jacobsz, a tanner, serving the same congregation 1730-72 and the united Waterlander and Groningen Old Flemish congregation 1772-80. The eldest son of (3) Harm Jacobsz, (4) Jacob Harms, was the first to take the family name of Mulder. He had a textile shop at Hoogezand. His brother (5) Heike Harms Mulder, an oil miller, was a preacher of the Sappemeer congregation 1786-d.1833, with which both the Old and New Swiss (q.v.) Mennonite congregations of Sappemeer had merged. He was the last unsalaried minister of this congregation. Great-grandsons of his were (6) Edsge Marten Mulder (1844-1922), who after studying at the Mennonite Theological Seminary served the congregation of Wormer-Jisp 1869-71, and then resigned to study medicine, afterwards being a physician at Graneker, and his brother (7) Marten Edsge Mulder (1847-1928), professor of ophthalmology at the University of Groningen. A great-grandson of (4) Jacob Harms Mulder was (8) Alje Mulder (b. 1846 at Groningen, d. 1919 at Groningen), who after studying at the Mennonite Theological Seminary served as pastor at Wormer-Jisp 1873-74, Zijldijk 1874-88, and Leermens-Loppersum 1888-1905, retiring in 1905.

A number of members of the Mulder family in the 19th century left the Mennonite Church, joining the Reformed and the "Gereformeerde" (Calvinist-Reformed) churches. G.N.S.

J. Huizinga, Stamboek van Fiepke Foppes en Diever Olferts (Groningen, 1887); idem, Stamboek . . . van Samuel Peter en Barbara Fry (Groningen, 1890); E. de Waard et al., De Waarden en het Geslacht de Waard (n.p., n.d.—Groningen, 1937); Naamlijst; family papers.

Mulhouse, France: see Pfastatt.

Mulier (des Mulier, Mullier), a French-speaking Mennonite family, to which belonged Jan de Mulier, who in 1614 was a preacher of the Walloon (French-speaking) Waterlander congregation at Leiden, Holland. Bartholomeus Mulier, from Waarschoot, East Flanders, Belgium, settled as a farmer about 1626 at De Biezen near Aardenburg, Dutch Zeeland Flanders. Pierson des Muliers (q.v.) was probably also a member of this family. In 1547 is found an Anna Muliers in Amsterdam, who was imprisoned because of sympathy with the Anabaptists, but escaped from prison. vdZ.

Le Poole, Leiden, 61, 53, 83; DB 1876, 107; 1889, 95; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 341 f.

Muliers, Pierson (Piersom) de(s), a Mennonite at Brugge, Belgium, warned by a member of the council of Brugge, fled with his wife Claudine le Vettre (q.v.) to Meenen (q.v.). There he was betrayed by a neighbor. Again he escaped through a warning by a councilman; but his wife, because she would not abandon her infant son, was seized in 1567 by the inquisitor Titelman (q.v.) and burned at the stake in Ieper (q.v.) the following year. She is said to have been a beautiful woman, who sang well. Their betrayer had to flee from the city. Pierson's account books were saved by the councilman who rescued him. After leaving Belgium, Pierson de Muliers lived at Hoorn, Holland, and then moved to Leiden (before 1589). He married again, first Peronne Hennebo (d. 1589 at Leiden), then Isabeau de la Motte, and died in 1591. The children of his first marriage were baptized illegally by the parson: Pieter (d. 1568), Nicolaas, Jan (b. 1567), and Margriete, who died at Calais, France, at the age of sixteen. Peronne's children, Maria and Martha, were born at Hoorn: Martha married the preacher Dirk Volkerts Velius (q.v.), the chronicler of Hoorn; their son was Pieter Velius. Isabeau was the mother of Margriete des Muliers, who lived at Gouda. Claudine's son was Nicolaas Mulerius, who obtained his M.D. degree at the University of Leiden in 1589 and soon after left the Mennonite Church to join the Reformed. (Mart. Mir. D 384, E 737; DB 1875, 28-31; ML III, 175 f.) K.V.

Mullem, van: see Mollem, van.

Müller (Dutch and French, Muller; English, Miller, q.v.), a common Mennonite family, of Swiss origin, which means that the early bearers of the name were employed in or owners of a mill. There are a large number of Anabaptist-Mennonite Müllers, who are obviously not all descendants of a common ancestor. Among the earliest Anabaptists there were in 1525-33 a number of Müllers in different parts of Switzerland (Peachey, p. 113, No. 96; 118, Nos. 191-95; 121, No. 263; 134, Nos. 561-65). Among these 16th-century Anabaptist Müllers in Switzerland the following are named: Elsi Müller, of Basel, Hans Müller (q.v.), of Medicon (Geiser, 155, 148), and Heinrich Müller, of Meisterschwanden, emigrated from Switzerland to Moravia (ib., 163). Hans Müller (q.v.), of Grüningen, was imprisoned for his faith at Zürich in 1635-38 (378, 385). Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (D 813, 820, E 1111 f.) names Catharina Müllerin and Ottilla Müllerin and Ulrich Müller. Just Müller (Jobst Möller, q.v.) died as a martyr at Jena, Germany, in 1536 (Geiser, 242). (See also Möller, Georg, and Möller, Heinrich.)

In the 17th century the Müllers were found in Aargau and in the Thun region of Switzerland (Gratz, 47, 48). During the 17th and early 18th centuries many of them left Switzerland because of persecution. Some of them settled in South Alsace; others were in the congregations of Les Bulles and Montbéliard (Gratz, 38, 87). Hans Müller, of Magenheim in Alsace, as early as 1660 signed the German translation of the Dordrecht Confession approved in this year at Ohnenheim. Other members of the Müller family emigrated to the Palatinate, Germany. In 1671 Hans Müller, then 80 years old, and Michael Müller (b. 1640) settled in the Palatinate (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1248; Müller, 203). A number of Müllers have served as preachers in Mennonite congregations in Alsace and in the Palatinate. The Dutch Naamlijst of 1766-1802 names seven of them. In 1936 there were 69 Müllers in 14 Mennonite congregations in Germany—23 in West Prussia, 13 in Northeast Germany, and 33 in South Germany; they were most numerous in Tiegenhagen (ten), Neudorferhof (nine), and Regensburg (nine).

Shortly before 1740 some of the Müller family emigrated from Switzerland to the United States. They were Amish. Other Müllers moved from Alsace to America in the 1740's. Abraham Müller was a preacher of the Conestoga Township congregation in 1793. Joseph Müller, a Hutterite preacher from Moravia, visited ca. 1780 the Mennonite congregations in West Prussia (ME II, 84). Of the Hutterite congregation at Lewar (q.v.), then Austria, now Rumania, Heinrich Müller was an elder from 1742. At Einsiedel, Galicia, Jacob Müller was an elder from 1786 and Johann Müller from 1799.

In the 17th century a Swiss Müller family settled in the Palatinate, Germany. Christian Müller, b. at Gerolsheim and married to Barbara Stauffer, lived at Wallertheim, Palatinate, as did their son Heinrich Müller (1715-95), a farmer, who was a preacher (ordained 1771) of the congregation. Johannes Müller, son of Heinrich, continued the Wallertheim branch of this family, whereas another son, Christian Müller (1752-94), moved to Crefeld. He was a tailor and was married to Elisabeth Schmidt. One of his sons was Samuel Muller (q.v.), who became a Dutch Mennonite minister and professor, and who spelled his name, as all his descendants did, without the umlaut. Another son of Christian Müller of Crefeld was Johannes Müller (1786-1853), who moved to Amsterdam and founded a bookstore annex to a publishing house. Dr. Johann Peter Müller (q.v.) was a son of this Johannes Müller.

The Muller Dutch Mennonite family is descended from Samuel Muller. Some of his children were Christiaan Muller (1813-96), the Mennonite pastor of Koog-Zaandijk (1838-68), Elisabeth Muller (1815-85), married to Pastor A. M. Cramer (q.v.), Frederik Muller (1817-81), the founder of a well-known bookstore and print shop at Amsterdam (his daughter Henriette was married to Pastor A. K. Kuiper, q.v.,), Hendrik Muller (1819-98), a merchant at Rotterdam, a member of the Provincial States of South Holland and the First Chamber of the States-General (1881-98), Pieter Nicolaas Muller (1821-1908), a banker and literary man, and Femina Geertruida Henriette Muller (1826-1909), founder of the union of kindergartens at Amsterdam. Among Samuel Muller's grandsons were Pieter Lodewijk Muller (1842-1904), professor of history at the universities of Groningen and Leiden, Samuel Muller Fzn (1848-1922), state archivist and historian at Utrecht, Jacob Wybrand Muller (1858-1945), professor at the universities of Utrecht and Leiden, Samuel Muller Hz (1852-1915), a noted historian; Hendrik Pieter Nicolaas Muller (1859-1941) was an ambassador of the Netherlands at Bucharest and Prague; and Samuel Cramer (q.v.) and Gerrit Kalff, professor of Dutch literature at the University of Leiden. Of these, Cramer was a Mennonite pastor, while others have served as deacons. Frederik Muller wrote a study on the present Amsterdam Mennonite Singel Church (DB 1863). vdZ.

J. W. Muller, Das Geschlecht Müller aus Gerolsheim (Amsterdam, 1950-51); Ned. Patriciaat XIX (1930-) 152-62; Winkler Prins Encyclopedia (6th ed., 1952) 61-64.

Müller, Anthoni, an elder in the High German Anabaptist brotherhood, who co-operated in composing the significant writings of 1544-46 known as Pilgram Marpeck's (q.v.) Verantwortung and the Testamentserläuterung. These two comprehensive works were only recently made available for examination, and with Marpeck's Vermahnung are very important source materials on the doctrine of the Anabaptists in the time of their origin. Nothing else is known about Anthoni Müller's life and work. HEGE.

J. Loserth, Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte der oberdeutschen Taufgesinnten im 16. Jahrhundert (Vienna, 1929); ML III, 176.

Müller, Ernst (1849-1927), a Reformed clergyman and historian, was born in Bern, Switzerland, on May 10, 1849, the son of the apothecary Christian Müller. His youth was spent in Bern. He studied theology in the universities of Bern, Jena, Tübingen, and Leipzig. In 1873 he entered the service of the Reformed Church in the canton of Bern. His first pastorate was Reichenbach in the Bernese Oberland, where he preached 1874-84. In the latter year he took a similar position at Langnau in the Emmental (q.v.), serving there until his death on March 26, 1927. He was an enthusiastic promoter of many charitable undertakings.

In the Emmental he came in contact with the Mennonites and became acquainted with their manner of life and their principles. He was deeply interested in the Anabaptist movement and took great pains to study its history from the original sources. His great book, Geschichte der bernischen Täufer, which was published at Frauenfeld in 1895, deserves all respect. The foreword states correctly, "The justification for the existence of this book lies in the fact that this part of Swiss church and cultural history has never been presented, and is intended to fill a gap not only here, but also in the history of the great spiritual movement of the Reformation, which is customarily known as Anabaptism." Again in the introduction, "Above all it will be of interest to the Mennonites to have a presentation of their history, for this brotherhood is a church of martyrs, the justification of whose existence and whose strength lie in its history. The willingness to sacrifice and the devotion to ideals revealed by those who suffered for their faith deserves to be snatched from oblivion as a monument to the character of our people."

In recognition of his work the University of Jena in 1904 conferred upon him an honorary doctor's degree. (ML III, 176.) S.G.

Müller, Gallus, an outstanding opponent of the Anabaptists in Tirol, Austria, in the 1530's and 1540's, was one of the few who tried to counter the Anabaptist movement by peaceable means rather than by bloodshed and influenced the pertinent measures of the government in this direction. All that is known of his life and career is the material found in connection with the records of Anabaptist persecution.

Gallus Müller was born at Fürstenberg, studied theology, and was said to have accepted a pastorate in 1522. In 1526, when he was pastor at Tübingen and professor at the university, he was one of the theologians chosen by Ferdinand, who was then the ruler of Württemberg, to attend the religious colloquy held on May 21, 1526, at Baden in Aargau, Switzerland. There he became acquainted with Eck (q.v.) and Johann Faber (q.v.). When the exiled Duke Ulrich returned to Württemberg and adopted a Protestant program for the University of Heidelberg, there was no longer room for Müller. He then was appointed court preacher for the government of Upper Austria in Innsbruck, and assumed the position in May 1535. Ferdinand agreed to his appointment because he was aware that other rulers sought him, and because he needed a learned clergyman for ecclesiastical negotiations. His sermons were very popular and were attended by great crowds. His first difficult assignment was to convert Jakob Hutter (q.v.), who had just been brought to prison. Müller no doubt did all that lay in his power, but against a man who had made up his mind to adhere to his faith and if necessary seal it with his blood, even more eloquent speakers than Müller would have failed.

In March 1537 the pastorate of Ingolstadt was offered Gallus Müller, but he preferred to remain in Innsbruck. He now took pains to convert the Anabaptists captured at Imst and in Petersberg, especially Sebastian Hubmaier (alias Glaser, q.v.), Hans Grünfelder (q.v.) of Lüsen, both of whom were executed, and the Hellriegel family. He was successful only with Oswald Hellriegel and N. Knaufel.

Meanwhile Matthias, Cardinal and Archbishop of Salzburg, called a meeting of the provincial synod in Salzburg. Ferdinand appointed Müller as one of the representatives, with detailed instructions on his policies. The records show that he was really in earnest about removing the offensive practices of the clergy and in the church. By meeting these just complaints on the part of the populace, by teaching, and by raising the moral standards he did more to eliminate the growth of Separatism than by the bloodiest persecution.

Persecutions were of course not lacking. In April 1538 Lienhard Lochmeier (q.v.), an Anabaptist leader, was brought in, and Müller working with the suffragan of Brixen persuaded him to make a public recantation; but when they also requested that he try to convert some of his brethren, he accepted the plea of his fellow prisoner Offerus Griesinger (q.v.) to repent and reject the pardon offered him. There were voices that blamed this backsliding on Müller's overzealousness. The law took its course with Lochmeier. Müller was equally unsuccessful with Ursula Hellriegel (q.v.) and Georg Liebich (q.v.), who was imprisoned in the Vellenburg. But he succeeded with two backsliding Anabaptists in June 1539.

Like Faber in Vienna, Müller was the official adviser of the government in Innsbruck, and very conscientious in formulating and in executing the mandates passed against the Anabaptists. It was he who drew up the mandate of Nov. 28, 1539, in which the Anabaptists are called not only sacramentists, iconoclasts, and falsifiers of the Scripture, but also revolutionaries, "who think of revolt by day and night, and taking away with them their earthly goods they commit themselves to improper and unheard-of communion and brotherhood." As a measure of combating them the mandate ordered cutting off their food supply; and in those places where they were not vigorously pursued soldiers should be quartered until the heresy was wiped out. This mandate was sent out on Dec. 16, with orders to have it affixed to the church doors and read to the people on the following Sunday and holiday, and once a month thereafter.

Müller was now appointed by Ferdinand to the vacant parish of Tirol-Meran, but declined on the ground that he was too old for the position. Not a popular figure with the local priests, he became a hated one, when in August 1546 he was assigned to the task of rooting out concubinage among the clergy. The authorities, temporal and ecclesiastical, were ordered to support him in the reform. The synod which met in Brixen a week later made celibacy mandatory for the clergy; Müller was one of the leaders responsible for calling this meeting.

In June 1540 Müller was honored by accompanying the Bishop of Trent to the religious colloquy which was held in Hagenau. In the next year, when Ferdinand was enraged by the offensive conduct of the clergy, he ordered a pastoral inspection; again Gallus Müller was one of the two men appointed by the bishop to make this inspection in the Inn Valley in 1542.

In 1543 the pastorate of Tirol-Meran again fell vacant, and this time Müller accepted it. In consideration of his services in "the conversion of Anabaptists," his church tax was sharply reduced. This concession was a step in raising the clerical standards; for "the growth of the sects not only in Tirol, but also in the entire Roman Empire is caused by the great dearth of priests, so that even on excellent benefices it was impossible to place skilled and learned priests."

In Meran (q.v.) Gallus Müller had to cope not only with Anabaptists, but also with Lutherans. The latter had such a large following among the people, including the nobility and the mayor, that they were able to call a preacher of their own in 1544 to preach in their homes. Though Müller tried to correct the matter, he was reproached by the government with harboring the "vagrant" priests. Müller replied in self-defense that the Lutheran preacher had so large a following among the most respected classes, that he had been threatened with physical violence, that a mob of women had treated him very roughly; he therefore asked for protection and satisfaction. The preacher was then banished, the mayor deposed from office, and the women who had led the mob put into prison on bread and water; peace was thus temporarily established. Müller, for reasons of age and health, decided to resign from his benefice at Meran and retire to Tirol. The resignation was accepted, but Müller had to remain until a competent successor could be found. Meanwhile the authorities were ordered to see that he received adequate protection and honor, and to punish any who offended him.

A few weeks before, Charles V had written from Gent requesting Müller's participation in a disputation to be held at Innsbruck between the Catholics and the Protestants; there is no information on his work in that colloquy nor of his death. LOSERTH.

Loserth, Anabaptismus; idem, Zwei biographische Skizzen aus der Zeit der Wiedertäufer in Tirol; papers of Beck published in Ztscht des Ferdinandeums für Tirol und Voralberg, third series, 277-302; ML III, 176-78.

Müller (Möller), Hans, an Anabaptist martyr from Königsberg (q.v.) in Franconia, Germany, was seized in 1530 and drowned at Frankenhausen in Thuringia. (Wappler, Thüringen, 92 f.; ML III, 179.)

Müller, Hans, an Anabaptist of Medikon, Grüningen district of the canton of Zürich, Switzerland, was arrested in 1529 because of his Anabaptist views. When he was ordered to attend church he replied that he would confer with his brethren; the city council also met when weighty matters were to be discussed, and they should follow the Golden Rule and let him do likewise. A letter he wrote in prison to the council reveals his knowledge of the Bible, when he explains that his conscience should not be forced, faith being a free gift of God. In another letter he asks for patience with him, for "faith cannot be picked up like a stone." The magistrate Berger said of him that he was otherwise a "fine, upright fellow." (ML III, 178.) NEFF.

Müller, Hans, a member of the Swiss Brethren community in the Grüningen district of the canton of Zürich, Switzerland, was arrested in 1635 as an obstinate Anabaptist; he was held for 20 weeks "under much cross, strife, and temptation" and was then released for a month to consult with his brethren whether they would join the state church. He was then again seized and imprisoned, and released on the condition that if he could not join the church, he should at least be obedient to the government in other respects. In 1639 he is said to have been seized again, but to have escaped. His wife was therefore taken in his stead and the order proclaimed in the Reformed churches that no one should give him food or drink. He accepted the offer of safe-conduct and presented himself to the authorities, whereupon they imprisoned him for 60 weeks, 16 of them in chains. He escaped on Good Friday. His wife too, who had been hard pressed, escaped. Their property was confiscated. From it the government drew an annual rental of 1,000 guilders (Mart. Mir. D 811, E 1109). The fugitives evidently settled at Gerolsheim and Wallertheim in the Palatinate, Germany. Some of their descendants moved to Crefeld and to Holland, and achieved wealth and distinction. (ML III, 178 f.) NEFF.

Müller, Hans (Hans von Utikon), was imprisoned in the monastery prison in Zürich, Switzerland, in 1639. When he became seriously ill, "some of his companions" helped him escape. But he died soon afterward of the consequences of his imprisonment. (Mart. Mir. D 814, E 1113.) vdZ.

Müller, Heinrich, of Meisterschwanden, an Anabaptist martyr, also known as Heinrich Sumer, organized an emigration of Swiss Mennonites to Moravia, was chosen preacher there in 1581, was seized in Zurzach, Switzerland, in 1582 with Jakob Mändl (q.v.), taken to the town of Baden, and cross-examined there in the courthouse in the presence of a large crowd of spectators. All attempts to convert them having failed, they were sentenced to die by drowning. On the way to the site of execution "they spoke cheerfully to the crowd admonishing them to repent and be converted from their sinful life to God. They sang together joyfully . . . lifting their voices in lovely melody and praise to God. They sang so harmoniously that the multitude . . . marveled." Mändl was drowned first; another effort was made to convert Müller, but he rejected it and died. Three songs were written upon their death. NEFF.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 281; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 408-10; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 752-56; Wolkan, Lieder, 234 f.; Mart. Mir. D 749, E 1057; J. Heiz, Die Täufer im Aargau (Aargau, 1902) 41, 79; ML III, 179.

Müller, Jakob (1753-1827), born at Ibersheim, South Germany, was the first elder of the Mennonite Church at Einsiedel, Galicia, and an outstanding pioneer leader of that settlement. A number of his letters written to relatives in the Palatinate, which were printed by Bachmann, contain valuable information about the early Mennonite settlement in Galicia. He died Sept. 11, 1827, having served the congregation for 43 years. C.K.

P. Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen 1784-1934 (Lemberg, 1934) 134-43.

Müller, Jakob, b. 1834 in Ehrenfeld, d. 1914 at Rohatyn, Galicia, formerly Austria, now Poland, was an elder (ordained 1883) of the congregations at Lipovce and Podusilna. For a time he lived on the estate "Tura" at Lipovce, which he sold in 1892 to rent an estate near Davidov. Peter Bachmann then succeeded him as elder. C.K.

Peter Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen 1784-1934 (Lemberg, 1934) 280, 288.

Müller, Johann (1773-1835), became elder of the Einsiedel Mennonite church, Galicia, on Sept. 11, 1827, after the death of the first elder, Jakob Müller. His correspondence with relatives in the Palatinate and with Elder Johann Donner was published by Peter Bachmann. In 1830 Johann Müller and six others bought a part of the estate Zavidovice and established the daughter settlement Neuhof (q.v.), where he died Aug. 22, 1835. C.K.

Peter Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen 1784-1934 (Lemberg, 1934) 203-11.

Müller, Johann, b. 1802 at Einsiedel, Galicia, d. there on March 2, 1857, was the father of the estate dealer (Güterhändler) Peter Müller. He was elected elder 1839. He maintained a lively correspondence with the Mennonites in South Germany and Prussia and visited the latter. In 1849 he bought a part of the estate Horozanna near Falkenstein and there with others established a new settlement. C.K.

Peter Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen 1784-1934 (Lemberg, 1934) 218-30.

Müller, Johann, b. 1823 at Navarya, Galicia, formerly Austria, d. 1888 in Blyszcsyvody, married Magdalene Kintzi, was ordained minister in 1846 and elder June 19, 1864, at Neuhof. He co-operated with his brother, the real estate dealer (Güterhändler) Peter Müller, in establishing the Ehrenfeld settlement in 1864, of which he was elder. In 1865 he established a school fund for Mennonite students and in 1871 he published the Glaubensbekenntnis für Taufgesinnte der galizischen Mennonitengemeinden. C.K.

Peter Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen 1784-1934 (Lemberg, 1934) 250 f.

Müller, Johann Peter (1829-1907), a Dutch Mennonite minister, was born at Amsterdam on Sept. 24, 1829. He studied theology at the Mennonite Seminary in Amsterdam, served the congregations of Mensingeweer 1854-57, Rotterdam 1857-61, retired for reasons of health in 1861, then served at Zwartsluis 1867-72, and Emden 1872-1904; then he retired. In 1869 he received the title of Doctor of Theology at the University of Leiden. He is the author of the books, Geschiedenis der ontwikkeling van het christologisch dogma in de Grieksche Kerk (his doctoral dissertation) and Die Mennoniten in Ostfriesland vom 16. zum 18. Jahrhundert, a work which was unfortunately not completed. The first part was published at Emden in 1887; the second part without place or date of publication. Müller also published Drei Predigten (Emden, n.d.-1890). He was influential in the formation of the Vereinigung (q.v.; Conference of German Mennonite Churches), after an attempt to form such a union at Friedelsheim in 1874 had failed. Johann Peter Müller was married to M. Th. Rutgers of Baflo, Groningen; his son Paulus Müller (1863-1924) was director of a publishing house at Amsterdam. Johann Peter Müller died March 25, 1907. (ML III, 179.) Neff., vdZ.

Müller, Johannes (1598-1672), a Lutheran preacher and theologian, wrote while he was in Hamburg, Germany, the book Anabaptismus. Das ist: Wiedertauffer Irthumb, wie dieselbige in der Mennisten Glaubens Bekändtnis zu Hoorn gedrucket, an den Tag gegeben, vnd zu verführung einfältiger Christen ausgestrewet werden (Hamburg, 1645; second ed. Hamburg, 1668; third ed. Lübeck-Leipzig, 1695). The immediate occasion for writing this book was the transfer of a member of the state church to the Mennonites. The book deals with the 33 articles of the confession of faith drawn up by the Old Frisian leaders P. J. Twisck (q.v.) and Sywaert Pietersz and found in the preface of the Groot Offerboek (i.e., Historie der Warachtighe getuygen Jesu Christi . . . , Hoorn, 1617). A separate edition of this confession was edited and published in Hoorn 1620, and is also found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (D I 409-50, E 373-490). From the 33 articles Müller extracts 26 errors. Though his theological equipment is obviously superior, the book is not an adequate refutation, but a polemic, which though correct on a few points (such as original sin) does not understand the Biblicistic concern of the Mennonites. The effects of this refutation are not known. O.S.

B. C. Roosen, "Kurze Zusammenfassung der Gesch. der Hamburg-Altonaer Menn.-Gem.," in Ztscht für Hamburgische Gesch. III (1848) 78-108; ML III, 179.

Müller, Johannes, a master in the guild of goldsmiths in Ulm, Württemberg, Germany, influential in the treatment of religious questions in the second decade of the Reformation. He was a member of the rather large Anabaptist congregation in Ulm. In 1528 he became a voting member of the city council (Keim, 120 and 265). The scant records indicate that he tried to establish Anabaptist principles. When the council discussed the 18 articles of the Ulm church order (chiefly the work of Martin Bucer, q.v.) in May 1531 he proposed leaving the matter of baptism open (op. cit., 225). Even though his suggestions did not carry, it is nevertheless worthy of note that in the following month the council invited the clergy of the city and district to the city hall (Rathaus) to express their view on the 18 articles, so that none should have occasion to complain of compulsion (Thudichum, 640). He appears to have been influential in the attitude toward the Anabaptists in other imperial cities of upper Swabia. He also had some contacts with Oecolampadius (q.v.), whose position on infant baptism was more liberal and who maintained connections with Bucer; the two sent their greetings to him through Ambrosius Blaurer (q.v.) and Konrad Sam (Schiess I, 251) on July 1, 1531. It is not impossible that he had a voice in determining the attitude of tolerance toward the Anabaptists in the decisions of Memmingen (q.v.), the idea of which was conceived in Ulm. HEGE.

K. Th. Keim, Die Reformation der Reichsstadt Ulm (Stuttgart, 1851); T. Schiess, Briefwechsel der Brüder Ambrosius und Thomas Blaurer I (1908); Fr. Thudichum, Die deutsche Reformation II (Leipzig, 1909); ML III, 179 f.

Müller, Karl (1852-1940), a German Lutheran church historian, professor of history at the universities of Berlin, Halle, Giessen, Breslau, and (1903-22) Tübingen. In addition to the studies he made in various fields of ancient and medieval church history, his most significant work is his Kirchengeschichte (Mohr, Tübingen), a comprehensive history of the church, which, however, he was unable to finish. Written in a good literary style, the book not only gives facts, but presents them in their interrelationship and interprets their development. Volume II (Part I published in 1902 and Part II 1919) offers a rather extended discussion of the Anabaptists, with a clear distinction between the revolutionary and peaceful branches of the movement. The concerns of the Anabaptist movement, which he considers the third large Reformation group beside the Lutheran and the Swiss wings, find a sympathetic evaluation; e.g., "It was significant enough that in the midst of the dissolution of all relationships there was here a brotherhood which placed holiness of living above all else and at the same time gained a footing among the lower classes, filling them with an independent religiosity" (p. 330).

Of Müller's many writings several are of indirect interest to the Mennonites for their treatment of certain problems: Kirche, Gemeinde und Obrigkeit nach Luther (1910); Luther und Karlstadt (1907); Die Waldenser und ihre einzelnen Gruppen bis zum Anfang des 14. Jahrhunderts (1886).

Müller was on the board of directors of the Association for Reformation History (Verein für Reformationsgeschichte), and was responsible for the publication of "Quellen zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer." (RGG IV, 263 f.; ML III, 180.) P.S.

Müller, Peter, b. 1825 in Einsiedel, Galicia, d. 1873 in Podusilna, known as a "Güterhändler" (real estate dealer), played an unusually important role in the economic life of the Mennonites of Galicia. His grandfather Johann Müller (1773-1835) and his father Johann Müller (1803-57) were elders, of the Einsiedel congregation. Thus far the Mennonites had spread by purchasing smaller estates for daughter colonies. Peter Müller changed the course of the economic development completely. In 1862-72 he purchased six large estates (Viszenka, Blyszczyvody, Troscianiec, Dobrovlany, Lipovce, and Podusilna) and urged Mennonites to sell their small farms and borrow money to buy portions of the estates. Thus through the activities of Peter Müller the crowded settlements were gradually abandoned and the Mennonites settled on scattered estates.

As a result the old settlement of Einsiedel disintegrated in the 1870's. Peter Müller even went to the Palatinate to invite Mennonites to come to Galicia. A number of families and individuals came. Also in the preservation of archival material Peter Müller rendered valuable service to the Mennonites of Galicia. He copied 24 of the early letters, which Peter Bachmann used in his book, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen (p. 168). The era of Peter Müller marked the turning point in the history of the Mennonites of Galicia, bringing prosperity, cultural adjustment, and a widening outlook. On the other hand, now that the Mennonites were scattered over a large area and their former isolation was broken they were in serious danger of being submerged in a general process of secularization and disintegration. C.K.

Peter Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen 1784-1934 (Lemberg, 1934) 168.

Muller, Samuel (1785-1875), a Dutch Mennonite theologian, was born in Crefeld, Germany, on Jan. 18, 1785. He was a son of Christian Müller and Elisabeth Schmidt. His mother died when Samuel was only six years old, his father when he was nine. In Crefeld he spent a "youth without joy," went to Amsterdam in 1801 to study theology at the Mennonite Seminary under Gerrit Hesselink (q.v.) and ancient languages at the Athenaeum under van Lennep. The regular services of the Amsterdam Mennonites did not satisfy him. "His heart had needs which could not be filled by the offerings of the preachers" (Sepp). He was appointed ministerial candidate and served at Zutphen.

Samuel Muller preached his first sermon on Dec. 6, 1806, at Zutphen; in 1809 he went to Zaandam-Oostzijde, and in 1814 he was called to Amsterdam. His work here was fraught with blessing. Although he stood on a basis of evangelical supernaturalism, he considered the orthodox pietism of his colleague Jan ter Borg (q.v.) such a threat to the brotherhood, that he felt compelled to raise his voice in warning. (See Muller's letter to the church council, DB 1897, 27 f.) Ter Borg resigned.

Meanwhile Muller in 1827 succeeded Rinse Koopmans as professor (q.v.) at the seminary. At his request Wopko Cnoop Koopmans (q.v.), Rinse's son, was given the other Mennonite professorship. On Oct. 7, 1828, he delivered an inaugural address in Latin, Oratio de muneris sancti ratione recte aestimanda (Concerning the Virtue of Reason in Sacred Matters) (Amsterdam, 1829). Muller lectured in dogmatics, pastoral theology, and Mennonite history. In the field of history he was a pioneer. He not only wrote articles on the subject himself, but succeeded in interesting a number of his students in the history of the church. He began to systematize the comprehensive library in Amsterdam, finding many a valuable document in the process. In 1854 he published the first catalog of the Library. He was editor of the Naamlijst (q.v.) of 1829 and published in 1837, 1840, and 1850 a Jaarboekje voor de Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in de Nederlanden, commonly called Muller's Jaarboekje. Of the edition of 1837 he was the sole author. Here, after a list of congregations and ministers, there are four studies in Mennonite history, on the names "Mennonites" and "Doopsgezinden," on Dutch Mennonite editions of the Bible, on the relation between the Mennonites and the Dutch government, and on the lay ministry among the Mennonites; he wrote on the importance of Dutch Mennonite history and on some poems of Vondel (q.v.) (published in DJ 1840), and an excellent paper on the history of theological training among the Dutch Mennonites (DJ 1850). His greatest strength, however, lay not in the field of history, but in pastoral theology, especially homiletics.

Until 1836 Muller remained a preacher of the Mennonite congregation in Amsterdam. When he resigned he published a collection of sermons, Leerredenen. From now on he could devote himself entirely to the education of future ministers, and he did this with great devotion. It was his aim to raise the Mennonite brotherhood and its preachers to the same level of learning as that of the other churches: he succeeded, as he reports in the DJ 1850, 188.

In addition to his work as an educator Muller found time to serve in other capacities. He was for many years on the directing board of the Association for the Common Welfare (Maatschappij, q.v., tot nut van't algemeen), the Dutch Bible society, and the Teyler (q.v.) Theological Society. He lent a strong hand in the founding of the A.D.S. (Dutch General Conference) in 1811, and gave the festival address at the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the society; he was active in organizing the Dutch Mennonite Mission Society (q.v.) in 1847 and for many years served as its chairman.

Muller wrote relatively little, for he felt himself called to work within the Mennonite brotherhood rather than the outside world. He wrote a number of historical articles in DJ and DB; a number of articles for other magazines, some criticisms, three biographical sketches for the Society for Dutch Literature, a volume of sermons, also Feestrede ter viering van het 50 jarig bestaan der A.D.S. in 1861, and De Geschiedenis van het ontstaan en de Vestiging der A.D.S. (n.p., Amsterdam, 1861). Twice the University of Leiden conferred an honorary doctor's degree upon him, in philosophy in 1827, and theology in 1836.

In 1844 Muller sharply criticized J. H. Halbertsma (q.v.) who attributed the decay of the Dutch Mennonites to their "obsolete orthodoxy" (see Muller's Beoordeeling van eenige Kerkredenen van J. H. Halbertsma, Amsterdam, 1844), and when shortly after 1850 Professor Jan van Gilse (q.v.) introduced liberal theology into the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and about 1870 Liberalism had penetrated into most of the Dutch congregations, Muller was earnestly grieved and occasionally sounded a warning note.

In 1856 Muller resigned from his chair at the seminary. He was of more than ordinary importance, wielding a wide influence upon the brotherhood and helping individual congregations in need. His was a powerful, positive personality with a determined will. This virtue, practiced to excess, led to a sharpness of utterance and a hardness that estranged many from him, including some of his students. His aspiration was always rather in the direction of high attainment than of winning personal approval. Nevertheless he was always able to distinguish between a cause and the personalities involved, as is shown by his friendship for ter Borg, even after the latter had begun to entertain views that seemed ruinous to Muller; and likewise when Jan de Liefde (q.v.), under the influence of the pietistic "Réveil" (revivalism), in 1845 left the church and severely criticized the spiritual conditions of the Dutch Mennonite brotherhood. A stenciled copy of Muller's diary is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite library.

On April 15, 1812, Muller married Femina Geertruida Mabé, a widow from Haarlem. She died in 1870, leaving eight children. Muller's descendants include a number of important scholars. vdZ.

Chr. Sepp, Levensschets van Dr. Samuel Muller (Leiden, 1876); idem, Proeve eener Pragmatische Gesch. der Theologie in Nederland (Amsterdam, 1868) passim; DJ 1910, 21-34 (with portrait); N. van der Zijpp, Gesch. der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) passim; Walther Risler, "Samuel Muller, ein Krefelder als Professor am Mennonitischen Prediger-Seminar in Amsterdam" in Die Heimat XXVII, 1956, Nos. 1-2 and 3-4; DB 1867, 4; 1884, 49; 1885, 55 f., 92-95; 1888, 128; 1897, 11-70 passim; 1898, 20, 129; 1901, 9, 17-23, 144 f., 149, 162; ML III, 180 f.

Müller, Ulrich, an Anabaptist martyr, a preacher in the gravure of Kyburg of Switzerland, was seized on Aug. 31, 1640, taken to Zürich, and imprisoned in the monastery tower until he died after 35 weeks in chains. (Mart. Mir. D 820, E 1119; ML III, 181.)

Müllerin, Catharina, an aged woman, was arrested at Zürich, Switzerland, in 1639; after enduring many hardships she was finally released. (Mart. Mir. D 813, E 1111.) vdZ.

Müllerin, Ottila, was imprisoned in 1639 at Zürich, Switzerland, with Barbara and Elisabeth Meylin and Barbara Kolbin. Notwithstanding severe examination they all remained steadfast. After some time they succeeded in escaping from prison. Ottila Müllerin apparently was the wife of Hans Müller (q.v.). (Mart. Mir. D 813, E 1112.) vdZ.

Mullingar Mennonite Brethren Church of north Saskatchewan, located 5 miles south of Mullingar or 110 miles northwest of Saskatoon, was organized in 1928 under the leadership of M. K. Unrau, with a membership of 23. That same year logs were gathered for the erection of a church building. The pioneering conditions were rugged. Approximately 95 individuals have been members of the church. Most of these have moved away. In 1954, when the membership had dwindled to eight, the group became an affiliate of the Glenbush (q.v.) M.B. Church and the building was sold. B. J. Derksen was the last pastor of the Mullingar congregation. J.H.E.

Müllner (Müller), Ulrich (d. 1531), an Anabaptist martyr from Klausen (q.v.) in Tirol, Austria. He was arrested with his wife by the church authorities of Brixen at Christmas 1527, because the Anabaptists had held meetings in his house. He was apparently not yet a member of the brotherhood. Georg, Bishop of Brixen, reported the results of the trial to the Innsbruck government on the next day, and asked what punishment should be meted out. The government officials replied that the bishop should inquire of the learned men in his district and pass their opinion on to the government. At the same time the Innsbruck authorities sent the bishop copies of all the mandates that had been printed, with the request that he publish them in Brixen (Loserth, I, 567).

In the meantime Müllner joined the Anabaptists. In 1531 he was arrested again. He freely admitted belonging to the group, and was therefore executed in October 1531. His steadfastness made a deep impression on the people and was recounted decades later by eyewitnesses (Loserth, I, 500; II, 196). Müllner was the father of minor children, who were deprived of their father's property. Three years later their guardian appealed for its return to them (Loserth, I, 540). (Loserth, Anabaptismus; ML III, 181 f.) HEGE.

Mülner, Johannes, an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on Jan. 30, 1528, at Bamberg, Germany.

P. Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910) 450; ML III, 182.

Mumaw, Henry A. (1850-1908), an influential Mennonite (MC) layman, physician, and early educational leader in the Mennonite Church (MC), was born near Winesburg, Holmes Co., Ohio, Jan. 27, 1850, the son of George Mumaw and Catharine Brenneman, second of eight children. On June 27, 1872, he married Malinda Blosser; they had three children. He graduated from the Smithville (Ohio) High School, attended Alliance College, Alliance, Ohio, and taught in the public elementary school near his home for a time, also in certain business schools at Wooster and Wadsworth, Ohio. He moved to Elkhart about 1878 and was for a time employed in the shop of the Mennonite Publishing Company. In February 1886, he was graduated from the Hahnemann Medical College in Chicago and practiced as a homeopathic physician in Nappanee and Elkhart, Ind., also for a time at Orrville, Ohio. He died on April 1, 1908, at Elkhart.

Mumaw's interest in publication led him to found the Words of Cheer, a Sunday-school paper for children, which he published for two years, 1876-78, at Orrville, then sold to the Mennonite Publishing Company at Elkhart. It is still published under the same name at Scottdale, Pa. His interest in education led him to establish several business schools, most of them of short duration: Elkhart and English Training School (later called Elkhart Normal School) in 1882-85; Elkhart Institute of Science, Industry, and Art in 1894, from which he withdrew in 1898 to found Elkhart Normal and Business College in the same year. The latter has continued in operation to date as the Elkhart Business College. The Elkhart Institute (q.v.) was taken over in 1895 by the Elkhart Institute Association and made a church school, which was moved to Goshen in 1903 to become Goshen College. Mumaw was the first president of the Elkhart Institute Association, and his son-in-law Aaron C. Kolb (d. 1935, married to his daughter Phebe, who lives in Kitchener, Ont.) the first secretary. H.S.B.

Mumaw, Levi (1879-1935), the second of nine children of Amos and Catherine (Shaum) Mumaw, was born near Winesburg, Holmes Co., Ohio, Nov. 6, 1879. When he was a child the family moved to Elkhart Co., Ind., and after 16 years returned to Ohio, settling in Wayne County. He was married June 9, 1903, to Fannie Shoemaker (d. 1921). In 1923 he was married to Alice Hershey, Manheim, Pa., who survived him. No children survived.

In 1910 Mumaw was called to Scottdale to serve as treasurer of the Mennonite Publishing House. In a few years the work of secretary was combined with that of treasurer and he continued to serve as secretary-treasurer of the Publishing House until his death. It was in this period of 25 years of devoted service to the publishing interests of the Mennonite Church that he made his greatest contribution.

Other important offices were given to Mumaw. He was chosen secretary of the Mennonite Relief Commission when it was organized in 1917. When the various Mennonite groups organized the Mennonite Central Committee in 1920 he was elected executive secretary-treasurer, which office he held until his death in 1935. When the Mennonite Relief Committee (under the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities) replaced the Mennonite Relief Commission in 1926, by action of both the Mission Board and Mennonite General Conference, he was elected secretary and continued to serve in that capacity until his death. He was vice-president of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities 1927-35. By virtue of the offices which he held in these bodies he served on the executive committees of the Mennonite Publication Board and the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities.

Mumaw was song leader in the local congregation for many years, and was often called to serve in this capacity in church-wide meetings. When the Church Hymnal, published first in 1927, was in preparation he took care of all business matters relating to its compilation, and read the proof for both words and music. He died at Scottdale on June 4, 1935. J.L.H.

John Umble, Mennonite Pioneers (Elkhart, 1940) 137-51.

Mummasburg, Pa., five miles northwest of Gettysburg, was laid out as a town in 1820, and the Mennonite meetinghouse built by 1823 from community funds. The first preachers were Bishop Abraham Roth, David Reiff, and George Throne, followed by Christian and Daniel Shank with Martin Whisler. Earlier they worshiped in a building where Flohr's Schoolhouse between New Salem and Cashtown now stands. There a cemetery holds some of the early settlers. In spite of a schism in 1927, when the Fairfield General Conference Mennonite Church was formed, and another in the forties, when the Bethel Mennonite Church, now in the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference (MC), was formed, the congregation in 1956 numbered 54 members. Amos W. Myer and Roy M. Geigley are the ministers assisting Bishop Richard Danner. I.D.L.

München-Gladbach, a city (1950 pop. 122,388) in Rhineland, Germany (formerly often only Gladbach, now Mönchen-Gladbach). In the 16th and 17th centuries there were many Anabaptists in the city, and particularly in the country around it. The first information about them concerns the execution of Vit (q.v.) tho Pilgrams, who is recognized in the cross-examination as an Anabaptist, in the district records as a Lutheran, and in the Martyrs' Mirror as a "High German brother." He was seized in the winter of 1532 but was released upon the petition of friends and relatives. In 1537 he was again seized, put on the rack after a lengthy imprisonment in Grevenbroich, and after another trial with torture in Gladbach, in which he persisted in his faith as fully as in the first trial he was burned at the stake on May 26 in Gladbach with a sack of powder around his neck. The region around Gladbach was full of Anabaptists. In Odenkirchen (q.v.) the pastor and chaplain were Anabaptists; Adam Pastor (q.v.) lived there for a time and Theunis van Hastenrath had baptized there. In 1554 Grevenbroich horse guards appeared in Hardt "on account of Anabaptists." From the records of the second church inspection of Jülich in 1550 (the first one of 1533 did not include Gladbach) it is seen that there were numerous "innovators" in the Gladbach region, for the authorities were ordered to present a list of Anabaptists, Sacramentists, etc., to the secretary.

Theunis van Hástenrath confessed that he had baptized four persons in Gladbach broich and in Hoeven; of these four Paetzgen Bruwers is still named as one of the unchurched in the inspection of 1560. This inspection says concerning Gerhard von Schechtelhausen, that he could not comprehend that the true body and blood of Christ were actually in the sacrament; but he accepted it with the word in spirit and in faith. The stadholder of Gladbach was ordered to be on the look-out for suspicious books and booksellers. The government and the church tried with all measures to stop the movement. They brought the noted clergyman Matthys von Aachen, who stayed in Gladbach a week, preached against the Anabaptists, and disputed with them. It is worthy of note that the people of Gladbach in the church inspection of 1560 asserted that they knew of no Anabaptists or rebaptized persons. They had recognized that the quiet industrious people who were for the most part native Gladbach people, had nothing to do with fanaticism of the Münsterite Anabaptists. Nevertheless the persecutions continued.

Theisz Rueden from Dülken, who was imprisoned on July 26, 1565, in Cologne with other Anabaptists, said that in the previous year he had been baptized between Gladbach and Viersen by Heinrich Krufft (q.v.) and Matthias Servaes (q.v.), the leaders who had been preaching and baptizing in the region of Gladbach. The only other preacher he knew was "das Lämpgen," who however had been deposed from his office. This was Lambert Kramer (or Lemken, q.v.), who was important for the history of the Gladbach congregation and who stood with Zillis in the question of the ban and avoidance in marriage against the inexorable position of Menno Simons. He is expressly called "a High German preacher," and represented the moderate point of view of the High Germans. Matthias Servaes, who was also imprisoned in Cologne in 1665, favored unity and did not approve of excessively severe discipline, and in this spirit he admonished his Brethren in his correspondence from the prison.

In the same year the pastors of Jülich and Düren were dealing with the Anabaptists in the Gladbach district. They were to try to turn these erring ones from their error through the mercy of the Almighty. They and their preachers should be granted safe-conduct in writing.

In 1653 the Gladbach Anabaptists stated that they had been living there for more than one hundred years and had been the first to begin the trade of weaving and had propagated it. It is a question how in spite of all the decrees, of all the persecution and suppression, they were able to stay so long at one place. The answer is given in a letter to the duke by the abbott Hecken in 1574: in the city and parish there were 150 Anabaptist families who "for their promotion (Fortpflanzung) had their preference above all others with the (ducal) officials." The magistrate (Vogt) Johann Gryn was holding his hand over them but the church did not relent in its persecution. In 1575 Daem auf der Scheuten was expelled from the country. His estates were inventoried and his three children were compulsorily baptized. Johannes Vits was ordered with other Anabaptists to appear before the theologians. The abbey did not permit any non-Catholic renters to lease its estates and did not allow the Anabaptists to have any Catholic servants. The Kirchenvroge (der Sent) in its first question deals with the Anabaptists. But the congregation continued and in 1591 sent Toenis Comes as its representative to the Anabaptist conference at Cologne. In 1599 they were again banished from Gladbach and their estates confiscated. Most of them found a refuge in Rheydt, where the official hunted them up. As their chief minister and leader Claes in Sittard is named. This is Claas Wolters, "the preacher" who in the list of Gladbach Anabaptists of 1622 is named as the first of those living in the parish. His full name was Claas Wolters Kops (q.v.) of Aldenhoven. It was said he was born in 1559, the son of Wolter Kops in Hoen and Bilken ter Meer, and it is supposed that the father was pastor Wolter N., who is named in 1540 at Odenkirchen as being suspect of Anabaptism, and who preached in Hüls and Crefeld about 1550. Claas Wolters in 1611 in Haarlem, Holland, induced Leenaerdt Clock to leave the "Bevredigde Broederschap" (q.v.). Abraham Rietmacher of Aachen made this charge against Claas: It was an offense among the Anabaptists that some carried on a great mercantile business and even admitted Diener am Wort into their businesses in order to collect much money and property. This statement is aimed at the "High German preacher," who is designated as Claas Wolters. According to the list of 1622 he was carrying on a great mercantile business with yarn and linen cloth and had much capital and also a great estate. In the list 151 families and individuals are listed, most of them weavers and merchants. Two were elders in the congregation. Some had come to the congregation from Cologne. The edicts became sharper. In 1639 a number, mostly those without financial means, emigrated to Nijmegen and became citizens there. Soon the fate of those who had remained in Gladbach was also to be decided. They had to leave their home. A list drawn up by them in 1654 names 142 families and individuals with their wives, the number of children, vocation, property, and servants. In the signature of this list they describe themselves as "those who have themselves baptized upon their confessed faith." This is still the name by which Gladbach Anabaptists called themselves; they had never called themselves "Taufgesinnte" or indeed "Mennonites"; for as High Germans these terms did not describe them.

The fact that they had in 1639 purchased from the Count Palatine the right to remain in residence in Gladbach was of no benefit to them in 1642. They had to seek a new home. Many remained in the neighborhood to await developments. Others settled in Crefeld, Nijmegen, and Goch. Later they are found in Wickrath and Rheydt, until they also had to leave these places and then settled in Crefeld. A list of 1669 names 65 persons who had not availed themselves of the privilege of selling their possessions. Not until well in the following century had all Mennonite property passed into other hands. Some individual Anabaptists tried in vain to return to Gladbach. One single one, Johann Floh, succeeded in 1667 by giving the promise that he would introduce Dutch bleaching for the especial benefit and profit of business. He was even allowed to enlarge his possession at Lüpertz in Harterbroich, but in 1694, in the final expulsion from the Jülich district, he had to leave Gladbach permanently. But even in 1743 his grandson Jacob Preyer still owned the house and the bleaching establishment there.

The ducal officials lamented the expulsion. Their income had declined so sharply that the magistrate (Vogt) at Gladbach proposed in 1705, "that the expelled Anabaptist be again soon admitted in the country for the sake of business." But in vain. The congregation of the High German Mennonites in Gladbach had come to an end in 1654. W.N.

Rembert, Wiedertäufer; Brasse, Urkundenbuch und Geschichte der Stadt und Abtei Gladbach; Redlich, Jülich-Bergische Kirchenpolitik II, 7; Növer, Die alte Handweberei, p. 74; Mitteilungen der Westdeutschen Gesellschaft für Familienkunde (1935) p. 311; Risler, "Das München-Gladbacher Mennonitenverzeichnis," in Beiträge z. Gesch. rhein, Menn., 1939, 94-130; Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik en vooral te Maastricht (The Hague, 1937); P. C. C. Guyot, Bijdragen tot de Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden te Nijmegen (Nijmegen, 1845) 44, 59, 60-62; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 536; DB 1874, 6 ff., 68 ff.; ML II, 116.

Munich (München), capital of Bavaria (q.v.), Germany, pop. (1950) 831,017, in which there were Anabaptists for a time during the 16th century; like the Lutherans they were violently persecuted and subdued within a few years. Even before Emperor Charles V issued his mandate against the Anabaptists the dukes William IV and Louis issued one on Nov. 15, 1527, "one of the strictest edicts ever passed in religious matters" (Winter, 16). As in other cities, most of their followers were craftsmen, some of whom became martyrs. As early as 1527 a small congregation was formed which met quietly in the suburbs. As soon as these meetings became known severe persecution set in. Until their trial those who were seized were thrown into the dungeon of the Falkenturm, a tower from which no one ever emerged without severe (capital) punishment; "some had their limbs cut off, some were beheaded, some were cast into the Isar and drowned, and some were burned alive at the stake" (Winter, 35).

One of the first martyrs burned at Munich was Georg Wagner (q.v.) of Emmering. He was executed on Feb. 8, 1527, on the square of the Frauenkirche. His steadfastness made a deep impression and was described in a broadside of the day. It was repeatedly printed; it appeared in the Jahrbuch für die evangelisch-lutherische Landeskirche Bayerns (1906) and in the Rheinisch-Westfälischen Gustav-Adolf-Blatt of Feb. 1, 1909, from a copy in the central library of Zürich.

This execution did not have the effect expected by the church and the government. After Wagner's execution Leonhard Dorfbrunner, a Teutonic Knight from Nürnberg (q.v.), preached for a short time in Munich and baptized four persons there in the fall of 1527, Christof Schufler and his wife, and Georg Schachner (Nicoladoni, 206). The latter was chosen as head of the group, and had been a leader in the Augsburg brotherhood, helping to introduce a systematic care of the poor (Roth, 11 and 86).

After the decree of the dukes was issued, persecution increased in Munich. Three weeks later Martin Pasensner of Jesenwang was made inquisitor to seek the Anabaptists out (Winter, 30 and 177). In a short time he seized Augustin of Perwanger of Günzlhofen (q.v.) at Fürstenfeld-Bruck and his brother Christoph, who were beheaded on Jan. 7, 1528, together with a miller (Beck, 24). On Jan. 28 of that year six men were burned alive in a hut and the wives of two of them with a widow Baumgartner drowned and then burned (Jörg, 744 and Sender, 188). One of them, Hans Feyerer (q.v.), was a preacher (Beck, 24). In the same year another Anabaptist preacher, Oswald Binder (q.v.), and Buntzer, the head of the congregation, concerning whom nothing more is known, were beheaded at Munich (Roth, 84). Oswald may be identical with Oswald Schäffler, of whom the Hutterian chronicles say that he was a preacher and was beheaded in Munich in 1528 (Beck, 29).

But the number of Anabaptist martyrs in Munich is not limited to these 15 persons. A list compiled by the Hutterian Brethren in 1581 names only eight, and a supplementary list three more (Beck, 277 and 310). A contemporary chronicler, Clemens Sender, in his Chronik der Stadt Augsburg, which extends to the year 1536, gives the number of martyrs as 32, commenting that the three women among them "were much more stubborn than the men" (Sender, 189). The last martyr to die in Munich was Christian Gasteiger (q.v.), who was captured at Ingolstadt on May 30, 1586, and beheaded on Sept. 13, at Munich.

The period of Enlightenment finally brought about a change in the treatment of religious minorities. Under Maximilian I Joseph (q.v.) an effort was made to settle Mennonites from Lorraine and the Palatinate in south Bavaria; several families settled near Munich and organized a congregation, meeting in the farm homes. After 1880 Mennonites from Baden also took farms in the neighborhood. The two groups united in 1892, and employed a preacher (Emmanuel Landes) with Regensburg and Eichstock (q.v.). In 1939 the congregation had 130 members and 40 children, and in 1956 it had 185 baptized members and 32 children. Most of them are farmers, and live in 18 villages. Services are held in a hall in Munich. The congregation belongs to the Vereinigung (q.v.). HEGE.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Chr. Hege, "Die Ansiedlung badischer Mennoniten in Südbayern," Menn. Bl., 1905, 68 f., 75 f.; J. E. Jörg, Deutschland in der Revolutionsperiode von 1522-1526 (Freiburg, 1851); A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin von Linz (Berlin, 1893); Fr. Roth, "Zur Gesch. der Wiedertäufer in Oberschwaben," in Ztscht les hist. Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg XXVIII (1901); Cl. Sender, Chronik der Stadt Augsburg (1894); V. A. Winter, Gesch. der baierischen Wiedertäufer im 16. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1809); Wiswedel, Bilder II; ML III, 182 ff.

Munich (or Rosehill) Mennonite Brethren Church is located eight miles east of Munich, Cavalier Co., N.D., and is a member of the M.B. Central District Conference. It was organized Dec. 27, 1897, under the leadership of Johann Enns, who served the congregation as minister 15 years. At that time the church had approximately 60 members. A church building was erected in 1898 and remodeled in 1927. Ministers who served this congregation were John Guenther for 32 years, B. B. Fadenrecht, contemporary with him for 18 years, David Hooge 1942-47, G. W. Schroeder 1948-54, and Arthur Harder 1955-57. The membership in 1956 was 62. David Hooge, G. W. Schroeder, Arthur Harder, and Leroy Schroeder were also teaching in the Community Bible Academy. A.A.D.

Münichau, Helene von: see Freyberg, Helene von.

Munsels, Leonhard: see Leenhart Munsels.

Münster, a village southeast of Colmar, Alsace, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation, now extinct.

Münster, a Mennonite family of Hamburg, Germany. Its ancestor, Hans Münster (1588-1626), was probably a farmer in the Wilster Marsch, Holstein, Germany. His son Elias Jansen Münster moved to Glückstadt (q.v.), from where his son Jan Elias Münster (d. 1716) moved first to Hamburg, then to Altona, where he was a merchant and deacon of the Mennonite church, as were his sons and grandsons Herman, Jan Elias, Peter, and Peter Münster, Jr. Most of them took part in whaling and equipped whaling vessels, as had Jan Elias in 1681-1714. Whether Cornelis Jan Munster (d. 1717), a cloth merchant, who in 1676 moved from Bommel, Dutch island of Overflakkee, to Rotterdam and here in 1679 became a preacher of the Flemish congregation and 1688-91 served as elder, was a member of the same family, is doubtful. vdZ.

B. C. Roosen, Gesch. der Menn. Gemeinde Hamburg I and II (Hamburg, 1886-87), passim; Wanda Oesau, Hamburg's Grönlandsfahrt (Glückstadt, 1955) 131 f.; DB 1908, 115.

Münster Anabaptists (usually called "Münsterites"). Münster, capital (1955 pop. 150,000) of Westphalia, Germany, has a university, has been a bishop's see since the 8th century, and became a member of the Hanseatic League during the 13th century. The buildings in the center of the city revealed its bloom during the Middle Ages until World War II, when 90 per cent of them were destroyed. Most famous among its churches are the cathedral (1225), St. Ludger (1200), St. Martin (14th century), and the Gothic St. Lambert (14th century). The population of Münster is predominantly Catholic.

Reformation of Münster. In 1532-35 Münster became a center of radical Anabaptism, in which many persecuted religious and social reformers found refuge. Peculiar economic, social, and religious conditions in the city brought this about. The city was ruled by a city council and the bishop, who had his own court. The fact that Münster was a member of the Hanseatic League speeded up the participation of the guilds of the city in public affairs. At the time of the Reformation, the guilds participated in the government, leaving the common people in the background. When Luther's reformation spread, his ideas were brought into the city by merchants. The cathedral school of Münster spread Humanism. Early religious reformers were Johann Glandorp and Adolf Clarenbach (q.v.). By 1524 the religious reform movement was assuming definite forms. The peasant revolt of 1525 stirred the masses of Münster, who began to demand improvements in economic, social, and religious conditions. Criticism was directed against some monasteries which were creating strong competition for the weaving industry. By 1527 Bernhard Knipperdolling (q.v.) had become the leader of the masses.

In 1531 the religious unrest of the city received stimulation and guidance from Bernhard Rothmann, a former priest who had visited Wittenberg and Strasbourg, and was in touch with the reformers of these centers. He preached the Lutheran message. When the authorities wanted to stop him, he was protected by the powerful guilds of the city. During the same year he published a confession of faith which reveals no fanatic influences. This gave direction to the masses. On Feb. 18, 1532, the Lambert church was taken over by his followers. By Aug. 10 of that year all the churches except the cathedral were occupied by evangelical ministers: Brixius of Norden, Henric Rol (q.v.), Gottfried Stralen, P. Wertheim, and G. Nienhoven. The guilds and the common people were taking over and the council and bishops were losing out. Rol and Dionysius Vinne (q.v.), representatives of the Wassenberg (q.v.) reform movement who had arrived at the end of 1532, furthered the religious activities of the city. Early in 1533 Heinrich Staprade (q.v.) and Johann Klopreis (q.v.), also Wassenberg reformers, arrived. The reform movement of Münster gradually divided into two major camps: the conservative Lutheran group and the democratic Sacramentarian wing which was ready to accept Anabaptist ideas.

Anabaptism in Münster. Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), who had spread Anabaptist beliefs and practices in East Friesland and the Netherlands since 1531, also secured followers in Münster. Thus far there had been severe criticism of Catholic and some Lutheran practices, but with the preaching and practice of believers' baptism the representatives of the radical reform movement of Münster introduced a new motto and symbol. On Aug. 7 and 8, 1533, a religious discussion was held between the Wassenberg representatives adhering to Anabaptist ideas and Catholic and Lutheran ministers. Those favoring Anabaptist innovations were ordered by the city council to have their children baptized. Rothmann was removed from his office. On Nov. 8, 1533, his Bekentnisse van beyden Sakramenten Doepe vnde Nachtmaele . . . was published. In addition to his name, it bore the signatures of Rol, Klopreis, Vinne, Staprade, and Stralen, dated Oct. 22, 1533. Concerning baptism this confession says it "is dipping into water, which the candidate desires and receives as a true sign that he has died to sin, been buried with Christ, and arises in a new life, henceforth to walk not in the lusts of the flesh, but obediently according to the will of God" (Keller, 131). This booklet prepared the way for the practice of baptism upon confession of faith.

On Jan. 5, 1534, Bartholomeus Boeckbinder and Willem de Cuyper, representatives of Jan Matthys (q.v.) of Haarlem, who had been baptized by Melchior Hofmann, appeared in Münster. They baptized Rothmann, Klopreis, Vinne, Rol, Stralen, and Staprade. Now Jan van Leyden (q.v.) and Gerrit Boekbinder appeared in Münster. Gradually peaceful Anabaptism grew into a caricature. Rothmann wrote Eyne Restitution . . ., which appeared October 1534, in which he urged a restitution of the apostolic church. On Feb. 9, 1534, the city hall was seized, and on Feb. 23 Bernhard Knipperdolling became mayor of Münster. On Feb. 27 all those who refused to be baptized were expelled from the city. Johann Lenning and Theodor Fabricius, who had been sent to Münster by Philip of Hesse to restore the evangelical order, had to leave without accomplishing their task. Münster became the refuge of all persecuted, desperate people and the "New Jerusalem" of radical Anabaptism. Evangelists spread the news that the Lord had chosen Münster to establish His kingdom on earth. Particularly many of the sorely oppressed Dutch Anabaptists, who were suffering severely under Catholic authorities, considered this a God-sent message. Many sailed from Amsterdam and other cities across the Zuiderzee en route to the "New Jerusalem." Most of them were arrested and returned to their homes, or imprisoned, many being put to death. Others were prevented by the magistrate from leaving their home communities. Nevertheless, large numbers succeeded in reaching Münster.

Meanwhile, Bishop Franz of Waldeck, the ruler of the territory, had begun the siege of the city. Already before this event the original Anabaptist principle of nonresistance had been weakened through the fanatical view that the "children of Jacob" would be actively engaged in helping God punish and annihilate the "children of Esau," at the time of the establishment of the kingdom of God. On April 4, 1534, Jan Matthys, a fanatical representative of this view, was suddenly seized by a foolhardy inspiration to go outside the city walls with a few followers to disperse the besieging army, as in the days of Israel. He fell in this attempt. Jan van Leyden took his place in the city, cleverly exploiting the situation. He appointed 12 elders and gave them authority in the city. Early in 1534 he published a tract entitled Bekentones des globens und lebens der gemein Criste zu Monster (Confession of Faith and Life of the Church of Christ at Münster), which was sent to Philip of Hesse. In December 1534 Rothmann published an appeal to take up arms in revenge and in defense of the church of Christ at Münster (Eyn gantz troestlick bericht van der Wrake unde straffe des Babilonischen gruwels . . .). A unique episode in the drama of Münster was Hille Feicken who sacrificed herself in an attempt to kill the bishop as Judith had beheaded Holofernes in Israel. She was captured and put to death.

In addition to armed resistance, two new characteristics were soon promoted by Jan van Leyden. One of them, not entirely unknown in Anabaptist history, was the principle of community of goods. Marxian writers like K. Kautsky (Vorläufer des neueren Sozialismus, 3rd ed., Berlin, 1947), and scholars like Hans van Schubert have investigated and presented the basis and the purpose of this institution of community of goods. Schubert (Der Kommunismus der Wiedertäufer in Münster und seine Quellen, Heidelberg, 1919) attempted to trace the idea of the community of goods back to early Christian writers and Plato. One has the feeling that it is hard to establish an unbroken line of this principle from Plato to the Münsterites. The Bible-reading Anabaptists, interested in the restitution of the early Christian church, found enough information and inspiration in the Jerusalem church, in which community of goods was practiced. In their attempt to establish a "New Jerusalem" they simply imitated the pattern before them.

More complicated is the reason for introducing polygamy. Jan van Leyden introduced it against the judgment of some of the more serious ministers such as Rothmann, Rol, and Klopreis. It probably was originally an impulse of the "king of the new Zion." On the other hand, in the "New Jerusalem," the capital of the "New Israel" in which the children of light were fighting the children of darkness, according to the pattern of Israel in the Old Testament, "King David" could with the same justification introduce this Old Testament practice. In addition to this, it served at the same time as a social welfare practice since the number of men continued to decrease during the siege of the city. One of Jan van Leyden's wives was "Queen" Divara, the widow of Jan Matthys; another wife was the daughter of Bernhard Knipperdolling.

The New Testament beliefs of the Anabaptist movement of Swiss background were transplanted to Strasbourg, where the Lutheran lay evangelist Melchior Hofmann became superficially acquainted with them. In Münster they were transformed through the fanaticism of Jan Matthys and Jan van Leyden into a carnal Old Testament-oriented earthly "kingdom of God." Not much of the early vision, spirit, and essence of Anabaptism were retained. Naturally it is hard to distribute a proper balance of the blame for this development. The ruthless persecution which Anabaptists underwent in the Low Countries could produce only fanaticism among people without true leadership, seeing no way out.

Jan van Leyden found some opposition. Rol and some others who did not agree with Jan van Leyden had left Münster in the spring of 1534. A revolt led by Heinrich Mollenhecke was brutally suppressed. On Aug. 31, 1534, a second powerful attack of the besiegers was repulsed after which Jan van Leyden was proclaimed "king of the New Zion" by Johann Dusentschuer (Jer. 23:2-6; Ezek. 37:21). Jan had a throne erected at the market square where he held court. Anybody who opposed the dictator was crushed. One of Jan van Leyden's ambassadors was Jan van Geelen (q.v.), who traveled through the Netherlands recruiting followers for the "New Jerusalem" at Münster, distributing Rothmann's latest book, Van der Wrake (Concerning Revenge), and trying to create "Zions" in the Netherlands at Amsterdam (q.v.) and Bolsward (q.v.). Jan van Leyden sent out 27 apostles, including Vinne, Klopreis, Stralen, and Slachtscaep, most of whom were put to death. The expected help from the Netherlands could not reach Münster, although individuals succeeded in getting into the city. Jan van Leyden with a small male population managed to keep the enemy outside the walls. The aged and ill were sent outside the city in order to preserve the meager supplies. Finally on June 25, 1535, the bishop's army gained entrance through betrayal from within. Heinrich Gresbeck led a group through a gate into the city. Jan van Leyden, Bernhard Knipperdolling, and Bernhard Krechting were cruelly tortured, displayed in various parts of the country, and put to death on Jan. 23, 1536. Their corpses were hung on the tower of St. Lambert's church. The cages are still hanging on the same tower. Most of the male population were put to death; only a few, e.g., Hinrich Krechting (q.v.) managed to escape. Rothmann evidently also escaped, although no trace of him was ever found.

After 1535. Scholars do not agree what the future religious affiliation of Münster would have been if the Anabaptist catastrophe had not occurred. The Catholic writer Tücking states that without the will of the bishop the Reformation would not have succeeded in Münster nor any other place. Ludwig Keller, on the other hand, states that if it had not been for the Anabaptists, the city of Münster would have remained evangelical like some of the neighboring cities. Brune says that it is a tragedy that Hermann von Wied, Duke of Cleve, and Franz von Waldeck, who later favored the Reformation, prevented it at this time. Although it is true that Protestantism was suppressed in the city of Münster and other places of Westphalia during the Catholic Counter Reformation, it is nevertheless likely that the result would not have been very different if the Münster tragedy had never occurred. Wherever possible, the Catholic Church took advantage of any situation to gain lost ground and to fortify its position. The Münster incident was used by the Catholics to defeat not only Anabaptism, but also Protestantism in general, while the reformers used the Münsterite label for all Anabaptists, including the peaceful wing. Even modern Protestant scholarship has not fully overcome the effects of this prejudice.

Protestantism, and with it Anabaptism, indeed experienced a setback in Münster and the surrounding territory, from which it never fully recuperated. It is, however, wrong to assume that Anabaptism immediately died out in the province of Westphalia after 1535. As in some other places Anabaptism continued in Westphalia for many decades. Numerous smaller and larger congregations existed. Among them were Dortmund, Osnabrück, Soest, Minden, Coesfeld, and Lemgo. Gradually they disappeared. Since they could exist only as an underground movement, information concerning these congregations is scarce. In a recent study, Der Kampf um eine evangelische Kirche im Münsterland, Friedrich Brune has presented the history of the struggle of the Protestant church in and around Münster. This book also contains valuable information pertaining to the courageous small Anabaptist groups. In his report regarding the Catholic attempts to exterminate Protestantism during the Counter Reformation, he relates that in 1612 Bishop Ferdinand was particularly interested in converting the numerous Anabaptists. Brune states that at this time Anabaptists were by no means a dangerous revolutionary or fanatical sect. The people called them "Tibben" (q.v.), while they themselves addressed each other simply as brethren, Christians, or church of Christ. They were pious, industrious, and reliable citizens and highly honored by their neighbors. They were found in the following cities in 1612: Warendorf, Freckenhorst, Harsewinkel, Beelen, Bocholt, Ahaus, Ottestein, Wessum, Wüllen, and Vreden. Even one of the Catholic priests of Warendorf was an Anabaptist sympathizer. Severe measures of the Counter Reformation necessitated the emigration of these Anabaptists to Gronau (q.v.), Emden (q.v.), Hamm (q.v.), Emmerich (q.v.), Winterswijk (q.v.), or Zutphen (q.v.). (Brune, 55, 122.)

Brune believes that many who had been attracted by the Münsterite movement did not really share the radical views promoted by the leaders, and returned to a sane evangelical Biblical Christianity, and that it is an error to mention only the sobering effect of catastrophe on misled radical Anabaptists, since many of the Anabaptists of Westphalia had nothing to do with this radicalism. Many of those called Anabaptists should be classified as evangelical Christians because "it is a fact that on the whole gradually in the time of sobering and quietness some of the Anabaptists joined the Evangelicals, above all in later times the Reformed Church" (p. 56). (For a detailed treatment of this question, see the article Westphalia, the places listed above, and Münsterites in the Netherlands.)

Münster in the Press. No other topic of the Reformation and particularly the Anabaptists has received as much attention throughout the centuries as the Anabaptists of Münster. Opponents of the movement in the Catholic and Protestant churches, scholars and journalists in all groups, fiction writers and artists, have through four centuries found this subject a fertile field. Even today novels and dramas dealing with some phase of the Münsterite movement appear almost annually.

During the beginning of the Anabaptist movement of Münster, Bernhard Rothmann and his coworkers published a number of writings as mentioned above. Correspondence between representatives of the Münsterite movement and the chief Reformers, such as Melanchthon and Martin Luther, has been published (Bahlmann, 122). Immediately after the collapse of Münster numerous reports were published under the usual name Newe Zeittung, in which the tragedy of Münster was described. Bahlmann lists at least 20 of these pamphlets in his bibliography for 1535 (p. 142). Among the early reporters on the Münster tragedy was Urbanus Rhegius, who wrote De Restitutione regne Israelitici . . . (1536), which was reprinted and also translated into German (Bahlmann, 155). He had previously written Widderlegung der Münsterischen . . . (Wittenberg, 1535). Very popular was Warhafftige historie, wie das Evangelium zu Münster angefangen, vnd darnach durch die Widderteuffer verstöret . . . by Henricus Dorpius, which was published in 1536 and reprinted in the same year with a preface by Bugenhagen at Strasbourg. It was again published and edited by Friedrich Merschmann at Magdeburg in 1847. C. A. Cornelius claimed that Fabricius actually wrote the book or furnished the main source of information. Even though presented from a biased point of view this source is very valuable because of its early date. The Amsterdam Mennonite Library has a Dutch translation of it in manuscript form (see Corvinus).

Another early writer was Antonius Corvinus (q.v.), who wrote Acta: Handlungen . . . (1536) and De miserabili Monasteriensium Anabaptistarum obsidione . . . (1536). (The tract of 1536 entitled Waarachtige Historie . . . mentioned in ME I, 720, was not written by Corvinus but by Dorpius. See above.) Konrad von Heresbach (q.v.) of Cleve reported his observations to Erasmus in two letters, which were used to produce a tract entitled Konradi Heresbachii J. C. Historia Anabaptistica . . . which went through a number of editions (see Heresbach). Justus Menius (q.v.) wrote Von dem Geist der Widerteuffer, with a preface by Luther (1544).

Lambertus Hortensius (q.v.) wrote Tumultuum Anabaptistarum . . . (Basel, 1548), of which numerous editions and translations appeared, particularly Dutch. Hortensius presents a detailed though somewhat biased account of the events in Münster. Most of the editions are illustrated.

J. Sleidanus (q.v.) wrote De statu religionis . . . (1555), which appeared in numerous Latin editions and in German translation. Heinrich Bullinger (q.v.) wrote among other things Der Widertöufferen ursprung . . . (Zürich, 1560). G. Nicolai translated the book and added to it what he deemed necessary for readers of the Low Countries. It was published at Emden in 1569. (BRN VII, 667.)

Hermann Hamelmann (q.v.), a Lutheran minister of Oldenburg, wrote Historiae renati evangelii . . . around 1570, in which he relates important information and data although presented in a somewhat biased manner. The book was first published at Lemgo in 1711. In 1913 Kl. Löffler published Hamelmann's Reformationsgeschichte Westfalens (Latin). Hermann von Kerssenbroick (q.v.), who attended the cathedral school in Münster at the time when the Anabaptist movement started, later wrote two books: Anabaptistici furoris Monasterium . . . (which was copied by hand. In 1730 and 1750 inadequate editions appeared, in 1771, 1900, and 1929 German editions were published) and Belli Monasteriensis contra Anabaptistica . . . (Cologne, 1545).

The only actual witness living in Münster during the Anabaptist reign who survived to write an account of it was Heinrich Gresbeck (q.v.), who caused the downfall of the kingdom by showing the bishop's army how to enter the city. His Bericht von der Wiedertaufe in Münster was published by C. A. Cornelius in Die Geschichtsquellen des Bistums Münster II (Münster, 1853). B. N. Krohn published Geschichte der fanatischen und enthusiastischen Wiedertäufer . . . (Leipzig, 1858) and compiled over 50 volumes of material which was destroyed in Hamburg during World War II. J. H. Ottius treated the Münsterites in Annales anabaptistici . . . (Basel, 1672).

Since 1800 scholars have paid considerable attention to the Anabaptists of Münster. Among those who have made substantial contributions in this field of investigation during the 19th century we name H. Jochmus, J. Hast, H. A. Erhard, H. F. Jacobson, D. Harting, J. C. Fässer, K. Ziegler, K. Hase, M. Goebel, H. Kampschulte, K. Rembert, H. Detmer (for titles of their contributions, see Bahlmann, "Die Wiedertäufer zu Münster. Eine bibliographische Zusammenstellung," pp. 167-70, Ztscht f. v. Gesch. u. Alterthumskunde, Münster, 1893).

The most important contributors in this field of research, who introduced a more objective method of investigation during the past centuries, were C. A. Cornelius, Ludwig Keller, and Joseph Niesert. These men not only freed the account of the usual preconceived denominational notions about the Anabaptists, but they also made available most of the sources on the subject. Niesert published Beiträge zu einem Münsterischen Urkundenbuche I (Münster, 1823) and Münsterische Urkundensammlung I (Coesfeld, 1836). Cornelius published Berichte der Augenzeugen über das Münsterische Wiedertäuferreich (Münster, 1853) and Die niederländischen Wiedertäufer während der Belagerung Münsters 1534 bis 1535 (Munich, 1869). Keller published some sources in his Geschichte der Wiedertäufer . . . (Münster, 1880) and Die Gegenreformation in Westfalen und dem Niederrhein (3 vv., Leipzig, 1881-95).

Especially Cornelius and Keller were instrumental in introducing an objective scholarly method of research not only on the Münster Anabaptists but on Anabaptists in general. Among the writings of Cornelius, the following should be mentioned: Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs . . . (Leipzig, 1855) and Historische Arbeiten vornehmlich zur Reformationszeit (1899). Keller wrote the book already referred to, Geschichte der Wiedertäufer . . . (Münster, 1880); Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer nach dem Untergang des Münsterschen Königreichs (1882); Die Wiederherstellung der katholischen Kirche nach den Wiedertäuferunruhen in Münster 1535-37 (1882). Other scholars who made valuable contributions during the past century were Johann Döllinger in his Die Reformation . . . (3 vv., 1848);

Leopold Ranke, Deutsche Geschichte im Zeitalter der Reformation (3 vv.); Paul Bahlmann, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Kirchenvisitation im Bistum Münster 1571-73; W. E. Schwarz, Die Akten der Visitation des Bistums Münster . . . (1571-73) (Münster, 1913).

During the 20th century some outstanding contributions have been made in the realm of further investigation by Friedrich Brune in Der Kampf um eine evangelische Kirche im Münsterland, 1520-1802 (Witten, 1953) which presents valuable information on the Anabaptists in Westphalia after 1535. The book has an up-to-date bibliography on the Protestant movement within Westphalia. Heinrich Detmer made numerous contributions regarding Rothmann, etc. Klemens Löffler wrote Die Wiedertäufer zu Münster 1534-35 (Jena, 1923), which constitutes an eyewitness account based on Kerssenbroik, Dorpius, and Gresbeck. Hugo Rothert published Westfälische Geschichte (Vol. II, 1950) and Der Kampf um Münster 1531-35 (1925), which discusses the Anabaptists. Hans von Schubert investigated the basis of the Münsterite communism in Der Kommunismus der Wiedertäufer in Münster und seine Quellen (Heidelberg, 1919). Ernst Reichel wrote Die Vorstellungen der Münsterischen Wiedertäufer über ihr Verhältnis zur Welt und zu ihren Mitmenschen (Tübingen, 1919). H. Rothert's Das Tausendjährige Reich der Wiedertäufer zu Münster, 1534-55 (Münster, 1948) was published the second time.

Melchior Hofmann, the initiator of North German and Dutch Anabaptism, has received considerable attention during the last decades. The most recent study was made by Peter Kawerau on Melchior Hofmann als religiöser Denker (Haarlem, 1954). As the title indicates, it is an attempt to reconstruct the theological content and the basic religious concern of the writings of Hofmann. Writers who previously dealt specifically with Hofmann were A. Hulshof, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg (Amsterdam, 1905); W. I. Leendertz, Melchior Hofmann (Haarlem, 1883); F. P. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann, ein Prophet der Wiedertäufer (Haarlem, 1885). In addition to these writings, all major books on Dutch Anabaptism deal with Melchior Hofmann. The writings of Hofmann were published in Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica V (Hague, 1903). Rothmann's Restitution was published in Flugschriften aus der Reformation VII (Halle, 1888), and his Bekentnisse van beyden Sacramenten and Van erdesscher unnde tytliker gewalt were published with introduction by Detmer and Krumbholtz, in Zwei Schriften des Münsterschen Wiedertäufers Bernhard Rothmann (Dortmund, 1904). Detmer wrote Johann von Leiden . . . (2 vv., Münster, 1903-4).

The relationship between the Münsterites and the peaceful Anabaptists has always been a controversial subject from the time of the writings of Menno Simons against Jan van Leyden to the present. Many have written about it. The opponents of the Anabaptists emphasized the similarities between the fanatical Münsterites and the Biblical Anabaptists, while the Mennonite writers denied or minimized the relationship between the two. Kautzky and others have claimed that Anabaptism was a revolutionary movement and not a religious reformation. E. B. Bax in Rise and Fall of the Anabaptists (London, 1903) concludes that the Anabaptists were "the forerunners of Modern Socialism, and, as such, let us spare them a passing tribute of recognition!" Gabriel d'Aubarede wrote in a similar vein in La Revolution des Saints (1946).

In 1917 Karel Vos (q.v.) published an article on this subject in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen, to which W. J. Kühler responded in the same yearbook in 1919. They continued their controversy in De Gids of 1920 and 1921. Kühler presented his final views in his book, Geschiedenis der Nederlandsche Doopsgezinden in de zestiende eeuw (Haarlem, 1932). He maintained that the Biblicist type of Anabaptism, with the exception of the practice of adult baptism, had existed in the Netherlands before Melchior Hofmann's coming in 1531, that the Münsterite development was a deviation from the Anabaptist Biblical line, and that Menno Simons and others continued to promote true Anabaptism. Vos claimed with Kautzky that Anabaptism was primarily revolutionary; after the tragedy of Münster it became a "peaceful" movement. John Horsch entered this discussion when he wrote "Is Dr. Kühler's Conception of Early Dutch Anabaptism Historically Sound?" (MQR VII, 1933, 48-64, 97-126). The most recent publication on the Münster Anabaptists is that by A. F. Mellink (q.v.), De Wederdopers in de Noordelijke Nederlanden (Groningen, 1954). The author follows the Kautzky-Marxian line, considering the whole problem as an economic struggle of the desperate masses who used a religious vocabulary to state their needs.

One of the urgent and significant tasks in Anabaptist research is to investigate the following questions objectively. To what extent does Münster Anabaptism contain original Anabaptist views? Which of the ideas and practices of the fanatical Anabaptists were caused by local conditions in Münster and the Netherlands? It is one-sided to present the Münster struggle purely as an attempt of the lower classes to improve their economic status. On the other hand, it is also one-sided to dissociate the Münsterite radicals from all Anabaptist ties. Münster Anabaptism is unthinkable without the social and economic developments of the city as well as the preaching of Luther's message by Rothmann and others. Only on this soil could the Lutheran lay evangelist Melchior Hofmann and the fanatical Jan van Leyden plant their seed successfully. This does not give the Catholic Church of Münster any reason to wash its hands in innocence regarding the tragedy of Münster. These conditions, including those created by the church, were a part of the background for the tragedy.

A recent striking discovery has been made which shows that Pilgram Marpeck's Vermanung of 1542 is largely a revision of Rothmann's Bekenntnisse van beyden Sacramenten of 1533 (Frank Wray, "The Vermanung of 1542 and Rothmann's Bekenntnisse," Archiv für Ref.-Geschichte XLVII, 1956, 243-51).

Münster in Fiction, Drama, and Art. In the realm of literature and art the Münster Anabaptists have proved very attractive. Before World War I three dissertations were written on the topic of the Münsterite Anabaptists in German literature. Hermann Bitter wrote Der monsterschen ketter bichtbok (Münster, 1908); Wilhelm Rauch wrote Johann von Leiden, der König von Sion, in der deutschen Dichtung (Leipzig, 1912); and Hugo Hermsen, Die Wiedertäufer zu Münster in der deutschen Dichtung (Stuttgart, 1913). Hermsen lists six publications in this area by contemporaries and 21 novels and dramas from 1777 to 1904. August E. Scribe wrote the opera Le Prophéte with music by Meyerbeer (Paris, 1849), which was translated into German.

Some of the most significant novels and dramas along these lines during this century are the following: Bernhard Kellermann, Die Wiedertäufer von Münster (drama) (Berlin, 1925); F. Reck-Malleczewen, Bockelson (Berlin, 1937); H. Specht, Heil'ge Feuer (Nordhorn); H. S. Rehm, Das tausendjährige Reich (Rothenfelde, 1925); Ludwig Wegmann, König im Käfig (Münster, 1935); F. Dürrenmatt, Es steht geschrieben (drama) (Basel, 1945); H. Müller-Einigen, Die Menschen sind alle gleich (Bern, 1946); F. Th. Czokor, Der Schlüssel zum Abgrund (Hamburg, 1955); H. Paulus, Die tönernen Füsse (Bonn, 1953); Ypk fan der Fear, De breugeman komt (Drachten, 1953); B. Stroman, Obbe Philipsz (Hilversum, 1935); G. Hoogewerff, De Zwaardgeesten (The Hague); M. Jacobse, De drie kooien (poems) (Kampen, 1947).

In the realm of art the Münsterite incident has also been popular. The most significant contemporary artist to deal with the subject was Aldegrever, who produced paintings and etchings of the most significant leaders. His works have been reproduced by Geisberg in Die Münsterischen Wiedertäufer und Aldegrever (Strasbourg, 1907). George Tumbült in Die Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1899) deals at great length with the objects of art pertaining to the Münsterite Anabaptists. H. Schmitz in his book Münster (Leipzig, 1911) also devotes a chapter to the Münster Anabaptists in art. The catalog of an Anabaptist exhibition of 1935 in commemoration of the 400th anniversary contains much information about art and other items pertaining to Münsterite Anabaptists. The title is Die Wiedertäufer. Katalog der Ausstellung des Landesmuseums der Provinz Westfalen in Münster i.W. in der Galenschen Kurie, August-November 1935 (illus.). The most significant modern artist dealing with the subject is Joseph Sattler, whose 30 etchings pertaining to the Münster Anabaptist kingdom are reproduced in Die Wiedertäufer (Berlin, 1895). Ida C. Ströver, "Die Wiedertäufer in Münster," in Westfälische Kunsthefte IV (1933) contains 35 drawings. Some of the emergency bank notes (Notgeld) circulated in the city of Münster during the inflation of 1922-23 depict Jan van Leyden and the history of the Münsterites.

A question which needs investigation is the course of Anabaptism in Westphalia after 1535. Brune has given a good account of what happened to the Protestant movement and indicated the way regarding the Anabaptists. Keller has also done some work regarding the Anabaptists. The archives of Westphalia, particularly the records of the Church inspections of the Counter Reformation, partly published, contain much information. Local archives of places where Anabaptists lived also furnish information. Much of the source material has been made available by Niesert, Keller, Cornelius, and the annual publication, Zeitschrift für vaterländische Geschichte und Alterthumskunde; Die Geschichtsquellen des Bistums Münster. The most important archives are the Staatsarchiv Münster and Bischöfliches Diözesanarchiv of Münster. The most comprehensive bibliography of the Münster Anabaptsts can be found in Bahlmann, "Die Wiedertäufer zu Münster" (Zeitschrift f. v. Gesch. u. Alterthumskunde LI, Münster, 1893); Klemens Löffler, "Zur Bibliographie der münsterischen Wiedertäufer" (Zentralblatt f. Bibliothekswesen XXIV, 1907); F. Brune, Der Kampf um eine evangelische Kirche im Münsterland, 1520-1802 (Witten, 1953) 181-87; K. Hase, Das Reich der Wiedertäufer, 2nd ed. (Leipzig, 1860), 146-74; K. W. Bouterwek, "Zur Literatur u. Geschichte der Wiedertäufer . . . ," Ztscht d. Berg. Geschichtsvereins I (1863); Realencyklopädie f. prot. Theologie u. Kirche XIII, 539. Hans Schiedung, Beiträge zur Publizistik und Bibliographie über die Münsterischen Wiedertäufer (dissertation, Münster 1934) does not deal with bibliography. Most of the books mentioned in this article are found in BeCL, GCL, and AML. (ML III, 185 f.) C.K.

Münster Anabaptists in the Netherlands. Not only in the city of Münster but also outside the city Jan van Leyden had a large number of adherents, particularly in Holland. They had been won over to the revolutionary principles by the propaganda of Münster, e.g., by Rothmann's Van der Wraecke. Besides this, conditions in Holland in 1534 promoted this course: growing persecution, economic conditions such as unemployment and famine in many cities, and finally the declining kingdom. Most of the Dutch Anabaptists were disciples of Melchior Hofmann and eagerly shared his chiliastic views, and when the expected kingdom of God failed to come on earth, this fact, added to the other adversities, psychologically prepared the soil for the luxuriant germination of the seeds of sedition and insurrection sown by the Münster emissaries like Jan van Geelen (q.v.). Many of the Dutch Anabaptists abandoned their peaceful principles and the Biblical faith. Revolts and assaults took place (March 1535) at Oldeklooster (q.v.) near Bolsward, Friesland, and on the town hall of Amsterdam (May 10-11, 1535). The Anabaptists had apparently planned attacks on Leiden, Woerden, The Hague, Oudewater, and other towns; Benschop, IJsselstein, and Poeldijk were important centers of revolutionary activity, and a number of the Amsterdam Anabaptists also held the Münsterite views. After the fall of Münster, June 1535, most of these revolutionary Anabaptists returned to peace, as for example Jan Matthijs van Middelburg (q.v.) and Jan Smeitgen (q.v.); but others desperately persisted in their rebellious ideas. Of this group after the death of Jan van Geelen, Johan van Batenburg became the leader; hence they were often called Batenburgers. Even after his death (Vilvoorde 1538) the revolutionary Anabaptists did not yet die out. Until 1544 their adherents were active in the Netherlands. Hundreds of them were put to death.

Karel Vos (q.v.) and following him A. F. Mellink (q.v.) are of the opinion that until ca. 1544 the Dutch Anabaptists were nearly all of the revolutionary type, a gathering of the poor, unemployed, illiterates, in short "the dregs of the population" (Vos in De Gids, 435, 436, 441 f., 448; Mellink, 419), and that with a few exceptions the Dutch martyrs between 1531 and 1540 were revolutionaries (Vos, DB 1917, 169 ff.). Vos and Mellink also consider the Dutch Mennonites in general, even Menno Simons, to have sprung up from the Münsterites (Vos, Menno Simons, 36-42). Vos accused de Hoop Scheffer and Kühler of falsifying history for reasons of "Mennonite prudery," by refusing to accept the descent of Mennonitism from Münsterism (Vos, in De Gids, 434). And Mellink (Wederdopers, 367, 419) even exceeds Vos by claiming that all history as written by Mennonites is falsification, from van Braght to Kühler.

This theory has been well refuted by Kühler and others. It should be pointed out that a number of outstanding leaders of the Dutch Anabaptists, such as Jacob van Campen, Jan Paeuw, and Paulus van Drunen, definitely rejected Münsterite doctrines, that among the Anabaptists in Belgium (Antwerp, Gent, Brugge) there are few traces of sympathy with Münster, and that both Menno Simons and Dirk Philips wholeheartedly repudiated Münsterism. Already in his Foundation Book of 1539, Menno sharply criticized in unambiguous terms such Münsterite doctrines as the "sword" and polygamy.

After the Münster episode the rulers and governors of many countries in Western Europe found a strong motivation for the persecution of the Anabaptists. Though they mostly were well aware of the fact that there were peaceful as well as revolutionary Anabaptists, neither ecclesiastical nor temporal authority attempted to make a distinction between them—hence the increase of persecution in Holland, where thousands were put to death. In Germany the events of Münster were also made a pretext for severe suppression of the Anabaptist-Mennonites.

Catholic, Lutheran, and especially Dutch Reformed (Calvinist) historians dealing with Anabaptist-Mennonite history never tire of telling the story of Münster, and in spite of better information by open-minded and neutral historians like Gottfried Arnold (q.v.) historians have continued to recent times to assert that as the Swiss-German Mennonites are the spiritual descendants of Thomas Müntzer (q.v.), the Dutch Mennonites are the children of Münster (see Historiography). Guy de Brez (q.v.), one of the first opponents of the Mennonites in writing, warned the governments against them. Now, he says, they are peaceful and law-abiding, sweet lambs, but they may soon be wolves, rebellious again, as they have formerly been. This insinuation, copied and expanded by a large number of Calvinist authors, who until the 18th century felt themselves obliged to caution against "Mennonite boldnesses," has frequently been the cause of annoying and even harsh measures by the magistrates against the Mennonites. For this reason Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) and Herman Schijn (q.v.) published their writings, energetically denying the Münsterite descent of the Mennonites and refuting their Calvinist opponents. Thus Münster and Münsterism in many ways caused incalculable harm to the cause of the loyal Anabaptism and Mennonitism, which, as Neff says (ML III, 186), "were able to maintain themselves to the present only by their endurance and faithful adherence to Biblical concepts." vdZ.

K. Vos, Menno Simons (Leiden, 1914); idem, "Kleine Bijdragen over de Doopersche beweging in Nederland tot het optreden van Menno Simons," in DB 1917, 74-202; idem, "Revolutionnaire Hervorming," in De Gids IV (1920) 433-50; A. F. Mellink, Wederdopers; J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, Geschiedenis der Kerkhervorming in Nederland . . . tot 1531 (Amsterdam, 1873) 611 ff.; W. J. Kühler, "Het Nederlandsche Anabaptisme en de revolutionaire woelingen der zestiende eeuw," in DB 1919, 124-212; idem, "Het Anabaptisme in Nederland" in De Gids I (1921) 250-78; N. van der Zijpp, "Menno en Munster," in Stemmen uit de Doopsgez. Broederschap II (1953) 6-20; Galenus Abrahamsz, Verdediging der Christenen, die Doopsgezinde genaamd worden (Amsterdam, 1699); H. Schijn, Geschiedenis dier Christenen, die . . . Mennoniten genaamd worden (Amsterdam, 1743); John Horsch, "Menno Simons' Attitude Toward the Anabaptists of Münster," MQR X (January 1936) 55-72; ML III, 185 f.

Münsterberg (Montagne de Moutier), in the Emmental (q.v.) in the Bernese Jura, Switzerland, where a small congregation was formed by refugee Mennonites from the Emmental (q.v.) in the early years of the 18th century. Some may have come somewhat earlier. As early as 1595 the prince-bishop Jakob Christof demanded of the provost in Münster that the filth of the damned sect of the Anabaptists in the Holy Roman Empire be removed. Upon the insistence of several Jura communities the prince-bishop in 1731 ordered the expulsion of the Mennonites, but withdrew his mandate when the landowners appealed in behalf of the quiet, orderly mountain dwellers. Nevertheless the toleration was arbitrary, they were not permitted to buy land, and they must remain in the mountains. Thus the congregation of the Münsterberg was able to organize and develop unmolested. Peter Ramseier (b. 1706) was chosen as preacher in 1730, and elder in 1732. Ramseier must have been an important preacher in the brotherhood, for he was called to peace conferences in the Palatinate with other brethren four times—in 1762, 1766, 1770, and 1782, in an attempt to heal a schism among the Palatinate brethren.

Early in the 19th century the Münsterberg congregation reached a period of considerable prosperity. With members living on isolated farms in the adjacent communities of Perfitte, Eschert, Grandval, Roche, and Courrendlin the congregation numbered 258 souls. The elder and preacher at that time were respectively Peter Sprunger and Peter Habegger. Traces of blessing were also left by the Mennonite schoolteacher Johann Baumgartner, who implanted the Word of God into the hearts of the children. The deacon was Peter Lehmann, whose son Peter Lehman (q.v.) became preacher in 1848.

On account of difficult economic conditions many Mennonites on the Münsterberg decided to emigrate to America. In March 1852 a company of about one hundred left Münster and settled in the virgin forests of Indiana. From the dense oak forests the pioneers built log houses and valuable farms, and built the thriving town of Berne (q.v.), Ind., named after their homeland.

In 1874 when freedom from military services was no longer granted in Switzerland, another considerable group emigrated from the Münsterberg congregation to America; the Münsterberg congregation shrank in size. The above Peter S. Lehmann was one of the leaders in this emigration, and died in 1899 as the elder of the Berne Mennonite congregation.

In the 20th century, when the Münsterberg congregation faced dissolution through repeated emigrations, the few remaining families united with the Kleintal (q.v.) congregation.

In 1939 there were only three families left in the Münsterberg part of the Kleintal congregation. In the hospitable home of the blind aged Christian Habegger (Combe de Roche) monthly meetings were held every summer, at which one of the ministers of the Kleintal congregation preached. S.G.

Chronik der Familie Lehmann; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); N. G. Frankhauser, "Emmentalische Täuferansiedlung in Amerika," in Alpenhornkalender 1934; D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953); ML III, 184.

Münsterberg, the name of two villages in the Mennonite settlements in Russia. The first was founded in the southwest of the Molotschna (q.v.) settlement in South Russia in 1804 by Mennonites from West Prussia and named for a village in the old home country. It was one of the nine oldest Mennonite villages of the Molotschna settlement and embraced 4,592 acres of land. Some of the land was salty. The land on the elevations was fertile. The lower lands with their fields and orchards suffered from floods. The families that arrived later usually settled on the higher land. In 1913 the village had two motor-driven mills, a tile factory, and four large shops. It had about 400 Mennonite inhabitants in 70 families. During and after the Revolution the village suffered under Communism. Many inhabitants were sent into exile and some have come to America.

A second village with this name was founded by Molotschna Mennonites in the Zagradovka settlement in 1874 in the province of Kherson. It contained 3,200 acres and had a population (1913) of about 250. In October 1919 the village was attacked by bandits, and most of the inhabitants lost their lives. Neither of the two villages is occupied by Mennonies today. HEGE.

G. Lohrenz, Sagradowka (Rosthern, 1947); ML III, 184, f.

Münstermaifeld, near Coblenz in Germany, where in the 17th century a number of Amish families settled, whose descendants were still found there in the 19th century. (DB 1885, 12.) vdZ.

Münsterrol (French, Montreux), a former (Amish) Mennonite congregation in France, some five miles from Belfort (q.v.). The congregation was founded about 1750 by immigrants from the Swiss Jura. Their first ministers were Klaus Engel of Münsterrol, Peter Klopfenstein of Bourogne, and Michael Müller of Chavanatte. The Münsterrol congregation is not found in the Naamlijst. vdZ.

Delbert Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists and Their American Descendants (Scottdale, 1953) 93.

Muntau, a village in the northwest of the Molotschna Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in South Russia. It was one of the oldest settlements of Mennonites emigrating from West Prussia, Germany, to the province of Taurida. In June 1804, 21 of the 162 families who went to Russia in 1803 and spent the winter in the Chortitza settlement (q.v.) settled here. The beginnings on the grass-covered steppes were extremely difficult for these settlers. They could not build their homes until 1805-6. The village owned 4,870 acres of land. In 1913 the population was about 400, mostly Mennonites. The land, with an 18-inch layer of fertile topsoil, was well suited to the raising of grain. In 1830 a forest was planted, which was kept in prime condition and was very beautiful. The industries of the village included a mill and a starch factory. In 1852 the village built its own school. An endowment given by Franz Wall in 1889 made possible the erection of a hospital, which was enlarged in 1911 and offered the best of service to the people in the vicinity. In 1913 there were three doctors and eight nurses on duty. In that year there were 643 patients with 9,523 days of nursing care. (ML III, 186 f.) HEGE.

Muntau Hospital, located in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, Ukraine, was established as a private enterprise in 1880 (or 1889?) by Franz Wall. After the death of the founder in 1906, his son Franz Wall, Jr., continued the work, assisted by his sister Elisabeth, a nurse. Before World War I it was enlarged to a 60-bed capacity. Franz Wall was exiled after the Revolution, and his sister came to Canada. The leading doctor was Erich Tavonius, who served the hospital as physician 1900-27. In 1909 Morija (q.v.), a deaconess institution closely connected with the Muntau Hospital, was established to train nurses. In 1913 Dr. Tavonius headed the hospital, assisted by Dr. Seiler as oculist and Dr. Büttner. After the Revolution the hospital was nationalized. (Dirks, Jahrbuch 1913, 179; Unser Blatt II, 1927, 307.) C.K.

Munter, Jan, b. 1570, d. about 1620, and his wife Sara van Tongerloo, b. 1578, d. after 1639, members of the Waterlander congregation at Amsterdam. As owner of the former bakery of the East India Company, he placed this building at the disposal of a group of English Brownists (q.v.) in 1608, who under the leadership of John Smyth (q.v.) had separated from the main body. In 1615 this group, then led by Thomas Pigott (q.v.)—Smyth had died in 1612—merged with the Mennonite Waterlander congregation. The English, using their own language in the meetings, continued to hold services in the "Jan Munter's bakhuis" until 1639, the year of Pigott's death. vdZ.

J. G. de Hoop Scheffer and W. E. Griffis, History of the Free Churchmen (Ithaca, N.Y., n.d.-1922) 143-46, 166-68.

Muntzenheim, a village near Colmar, Upper Alsace, France, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation, now extinct, the remaining members having joined the Colmar (q.v.) congregation. At Muntzenheim a preachers' conference was held in 1896, which was the beginning of new conference activity in Alsace. vdZ.

Müntzer, Thomas (1488/9-1525), was perhaps the most controversial figure of the period of the German Reformation, a man who has been called at various times the "beginner of the great Anabaptist movement," the forerunner of modern socialism, the beginner of the mystical-spiritualistic movement in Germany, a religious socialist, the leader in the Peasants' War 1525, and other such designations, none of which really fit this versatile man who during the decisive last five years of his life (1520-25) changed his position almost from year to year. Karl Holl's assertion that most of the catchwords or slogans of the German Reformation during its formative period were made current by this fiery and restless mind is acceptable. Noble and deep thoughts mingle in his writings with rather coarse and rude expressions, not to say offensive passages; genuine spirituality alternates with fanciful inspirationism. At the end, in spite of his position as a priest and preacher, one may legitimately ask: Was he still a Christian?

The literature about Müntzer is extensive but not too enlightening, providing for each author an occasion for personal interpretation of an ambiguous personality, thereby using categories often wanting in precision. Praise and blame, love and hatred speak from these writings, but no author seems to be able to be fully neutral and detached. But since Müntzer has quite persistently been called the "originator of the great Anabaptist movement" it is desirable that a careful and objective study be made of his relation to Anabaptism.

Thomas Müntzer was born in Stollberg in the Harz Mountains ca. 1488-89. He received a good academic education which familiarized him with the Bible and the mystics, and with Plato and St. Augustine and the classic Christian writers, which were required in higher education at that time. He had a brilliant and dynamic mind. In 1513 he became a Catholic priest, was soon promoted as provost (Propst) of a monastery, and in 1519 he became father-confessor of a nunnery. It was about that time he also became acquainted with Martin Luther. In 1520 he was a priest in Zwickau (Saxony), where he met Nicolaus Storch, the inspirationist and "prophet" who proclaimed that the Bible is secondary to the direct revelation of God to His chosen servants. Müntzer felt akin to this viewpoint and began to develop his own doctrine of the "spirit." Soon unrest and disturbances set in (they were to follow this man from now on wherever he chanced to preach) and he had to flee the city in April 1521.

Next Müntzer was in Prague (until February 1522), where he drew up the "Prague Manifesto" in four different versions, two in German, one in Czech, and one in Latin. This Manifesto was the real program for his further life. He wanted to start a "new church," the church of the spirit. He called it the "spirit of the fear of God." The German and Czech versions of the Manifesto appealed to the plain people (Am Volk zweifle ich nicht); the Latin version, much milder, addressed itself to the scholars, the humanistically educated readers. The Manifesto is a visionary document, but like all of Müntzer's later writings is confused and without clear-cut orientation. Certainly its program was not Scriptural in any concrete sense. Müntzer had little success in Bohemia, the old land of John Hus, and as he left it he began a period of restless wandering. He passed through Wittenberg during Luther's absence at the Wartburg and lodged in the home of Carlstadt, who was sympathetic to some of his ideas but unwilling to go all the way with him.

From Easter of 1523 until August 1524 Müntzer was a priest or preacher (things were still fluid in these years) in Allstedt, a small town in the Harz area, in the neighborhood of rich ore mines which produced a restless class of miners (Bergknappen), always eager to promote social changes. His sermons were attended allegedly by 2,000 hearers even though Allstedt had hardly more than a few hundred population. In Allstedt he now wrote a number of liturgical tracts concerning (infant) baptism and the German Mass. These liturgical writings are a clear indication that his reforms were a deviation from Catholicism in degree only, not in substance. He did not propose the establishment of a completely new church. He distributed the sacraments in both elements (instead of the one of the Catholic practice) and read the Mass in German interspersed by German hymns instead of using the Latin—that is all. As for baptism the records are contradictory; some say that every two months he baptized all the infants, others that he postponed baptism until the children were six or seven years of age. He never in his life baptized adults.

In Allstedt he married, like Luther, a former nun, and reared children. This fact seems to indicate his break with the old church, but one cannot claim that the new church in Allstedt was Protestant or Lutheran in any specific sense. The Reformation was still in its formative years. For the time being he had not yet broken with Luther; in fact, he sent him a rather conciliatory letter on July 9, 1523. In this same year he also wrote a letter to his brethren in Stollberg. Of all his writings this letter breathes a spirit nearest to the evangelical spirit of the later Anabaptists. It is the only document of this kind and has been carefully analyzed by Annemarie Lohmann. Unfortunately, he soon pursued other directions: in the winter of 1523-24 he founded the Allstedt League, a strange conspiratorial society which was to carry out the Prague program, if necessary even with violence. Here Müntzer lost altogether his sense of reality and embarked on a road of romantic fanaticism. Luther recognized this correctly when he called Müntzer a Schwärmer (fanatic). The new church should be radical; "ungodly people" should not be allowed to exist. Soon a nearby Catholic chapel went up in flames.

The two princes of Saxony, Duke John and Prince Elector Frederick the Wise, were embarrassed by Müntzer and did not know what to do, being themselves in favor of the Lutheran reforms. Therefore as they passed through Allstaedt they invited Müntzer to preach for them and explain his theology. On July 13, 1524, he preached in the castle in the presence of the princes his famous "Sermon on Daniel." In it he claimed that the authorities were given the sword to eradicate the ungodly, but insisted that if they did not do their duty the sword would be taken away from them (Dan. 7) and given to the people; "for the ungodly have no right to live except as the elect grant it to them." Obviously the princes were now even more confused than before and asked Luther for advice. No persecution was considered for the moment, as Luther still advised lenience. But unrest in Allstaedt prompted Müntzer to flee at night over the city walls. On Aug. 15, 1524, he arrived in Mühlhausen, Thuringia, and soon became a preacher in a church here. This city was to become his real misfortune, for here he met another preacher, Heinrich Pfeiffer, who might be called a real social-revolutionary comparable to John Ball of the English Peasants' War of 1381. Soon the Mühlhausen city council was overthrown and things looked almost like events ten years later in Münster. But after two months, early in October 1524, Müntzer had to flee again. This time he turned south, stopping in Nürnberg, where he may have met Hans Denk, the rector of the School at St. Sebald's. Müntzer's fiery mysticism might have impressed this sensitive man, but his stay was too short to produce any major influence upon him. In Nürnberg Müntzer also had (later, most likely) two new tracts printed: the Hochverursachte Schutzrede (a vitriolic pamphlet in which he called Luther das geistlose, sanftlebende Fleisch zu Wittenberg) which attacked the Protestant doctrine of original sin, and the Ausgetrückte Emplössung des falschen Glaubens, of which more is to be said later.

November and December 1524 Müntzer spent in the South, in Griessen in the Klettgau (Swabia) near Schaffhausen, and in Basel, Switzerland, where he was the guest of Oecolampadius and Hugwald. Not much is known about these eight weeks of restless wandering, but it may be assumed that they merely increased his "prophetic" fancies. Bullinger's claim that he met and converted Hubmaier on this trip is without any foundation and is rather unlikely, even though Griessen is only 15 miles distant from Waldshut, where Hubmaier was living.

In February 1525 Müntzer was back in Mühlhausen, to which city Heinrich Pfeiffer had returned by the end of December 1524. At this point Müntzer placed upon the rebellious peasants his last hope and chance of carrying out his apocalyptic program. Between February and May of this year he may rightly be called the preacher of the peasants, encouraging them mainly during the last three weeks to violent action—expecting at any moment the great crisis of mankind. On May 15 the tragic battle at Frankenhausen was fought (or rather not fought by the confused and discouraged peasants), followed by the senseless massacre which ended the Peasants' War in Thuringia. Müntzer, who tried to hide, was caught, imprisoned, and soon tortured to make him yield a full confession of all his misdeeds. He recanted, accepted the Mass according to Catholic rites, and wrote a farewell letter to his followers in Mühlhausen which is a complete turnabout from his former position. On May 27, 1525, he was beheaded. His symbol and heraldic sign had always been " a red cross and a naked sword."

The biographical sketch has indicated that Müntzer could not possibly have been the "beginner and originator of the great Anabaptist movement" (as in our day Böhmer and Holl have claimed). In view, however, of the persistency of this claim further discussion is needed. We may distinguish here between the factual and pragmatic evidence on the one hand, and on the other, the possible influences from the viewpoint of a history of ideas where evidence is usually of a more indirect nature.

Factual evidence for Müntzer's connection with the Anabaptists is almost completely lacking. Harold S. Bender has proved this with great thoroughness. The legend of such causal influences started with Bullinger in his Der Widertoufferen Ursprung (Zürich, 1560), where he claims that Müntzer was the beginner of Anabaptism "down there in Saxony." That was written 35 years after Müntzer's death and naturally without any documentation. Bullinger also says that Hubmaier was "completely confused by Müntzer" (er sey durch ihn ganz verkehrt worden), again without any proof. The fact is that Bullinger in none of his earlier books ever mentioned such a theory, and it must be assumed that he more or less invented it later. Bender conjectures that he did so for the purpose of freeing the Zürich Reformed Church from any "reproach" that Anabaptism had its origin in Zürich—which it actually had.

Unfortunately, Bullinger's invention was an appealing theory and has been repeated many times since, in part perhaps because the Müntzer story is so much better known than the story of the early Anabaptists. Neither Holl nor Böhmer seems to have been very familiar with the origins of the Anabaptists (e.g., Conrad Grebel); hence they were inclined to follow the pattern which was first set by Martin Luther, namely, to lump together all nonconformists, "left-wing" groups and individuals, as fanatics (Schwärmer), without much discrimination of categories. Since the tragic events of Münster (1534-35) provided evidence that violence could also develop in connection with some forms of Anabaptism (though not with the evangelical type) there was little hesitation to give Bullinger full credence.

What are the facts? Müntzer himself never baptized adults; in fact he somewhat minimized the significance of baptism in general. "Neither Mary, the mother of God, nor the disciples of Christ had been baptized with water." True baptism takes place only through the Holy Spirit. To be sure, he also says, "As they made babes into Christians, Christians became children," but nowhere does he follow up this idea, and for all practical purposes continued to baptize children, either as infants or as six- and seven-year-olds. In 1524 he published a new baptismal liturgy, Von der Tauff wie man die heldt (dealing with infant baptism of course). Annemarie Lohmann, who carefully analyzed the issue, says that adult baptism was definitely contrary to Müntzer's basic ideas. Nevertheless, she too speculates that it was perhaps "Müntzer's interpretation of the cross as a sort of baptism" which might have influenced people who were then seeking "an external symbol for the inner baptism of the cross." . . . "All this is, of course, but a conjecture and lacks any proof. . . ." It is not very clear how this connection is to be understood.

Now as to concrete contacts. First of all, the very first act of adult baptism took place in Zürich in January 1525, when contacts with Müntzer were out of the question. His sojourn in the Klettgau in December 1524 did not produce any known contact with the Conrad Grebel circle in Zürich. Moreover the long letter by Grebel to Müntzer of Sept. 5, 1524, shows that Grebel and his friends were familiar with Müntzer's two earlier tracts, Von dem getichten Glauben, and Protestation odder Empbietung (both written in Allstedt, 1524). Both these tracts were still rather moderate in tone, the former dealing in the main with the idea of the "cross," the other criticizing infant baptism. Grebel now wrote that he was glad to find in these tracts some familiar ideas and he welcomed Müntzer as a brother in the spirit. But then he reproached Müntzer on two points: one, his emphasis upon church liturgy (Deutsche Messe), and two, because of certain rumors that Müntzer was advocating the "sword." This the Grebel friends emphatically opposed and therefore warned the unknown "brother" not to continue in this way. Müntzer never received this letter, and the Grebel circle had no further knowledge about Müntzer's activities. Thus nothing can be deduced from this letter, except that no real contact existed and that Zürich went ahead with their new brotherhood of regenerated Christians independently of anything outside their circle. One indirect contact between Müntzer and the Grebel group was the visit of a brother of Hans Huiuf (one of the Grebel group in Zürich), who came from Halle to Zürich and had known Müntzer.

The same holds true with regard to Müntzer's supposed influence on Hubmaier (who was baptized by Reublin at Easter of 1525), Bullinger's claim notwithstanding.

Three additional possible contacts must be investigated: Hans Denk, Hans Hut, and Melchior Rinck. Müntzer's contact with Denk in Nürnberg, if it took place at all (Fellmann denies it), was very brief and superficial; moreover it had nothing to do with Denk's later turn to Anabaptism, and can therefore be dismissed. The situation with regard to Hans Hut, however, is different. He must be called a former friend of Müntzer who supposedly spent a few days in Hut's home in Bibra. Hut then received a manuscript from Müntzer, the Ausgetrückte Emplössung des falschen Glaubens (1524), and was asked to manage its publication. (Hut as a book peddler might have been better acquainted with printers willing to risk such a publication.) Hut thereupon approached the journeymen of the Nürnberg printer Hans Hergott, who in the absence of the master actually printed the pamphlet clandestinely. When the councilmen of Nürnberg heard of it, the journeymen and Hut were imprisoned and the book edition was destroyed. (Only one or two copies survived.) In his court trial in 1527 Hut openly admitted this act. Was he then a Müntzerite? To some extent, yes, mainly with regard to Müntzer's apocalyptic expectations that the end of this world-aeon had drawn near and that the new era was about to come at any moment, indicated by wars and rumors of war. Müntzer's apocalypticism seems to have appealed to Hut's frame of mind, but not his doctrine of the sword. At the battle of Frankenhausen Hut was present; whether as an itinerant book peddler or as a curious onlooker is hard to say. He had no part whatever in the events and soon left. A year later, in the spring of 1526, in Augsburg, he was baptized by Hans Denk and became truly a "new man."

It might be argued that in spite of his conversion, Hut nevertheless promoted certain Müntzerite ideas throughout his itinerant activities as an Anabaptist missionary up to his early death in 1527.

What about this argument with its crucial bearing on the question of Müntzer's relation to later Anabaptism? True enough, Hut preached "the cross," that is, the suffering church, and in this message sounded somewhat like a Müntzerite. But an analysis reveals that it is only the key word "cross" which is the same as with Müntzer; its meaning, however, is very different with Hut, as will be shown presently. The same holds true with regard to Hut's "spiritualism," i.e., the idea that the Word of God can be interpreted rightly only by those who are filled by a spirit akin to that of the Holy Scriptures. No word of direct inspiration or of dreams can be found in all of Hut's teaching, as far as is known. Again, the key word "spirit" is the same, but the content is different. If Hut was a "spiritualist," he was a Biblical one, as were Michael Sattler and all the early Anabaptists, but he really was not a spiritualist at all. Müntzer, on the other hand, was an inspirationist (like David Joris a decade or so later), and understood the idea of the "spirit" much more subjectively than any Anabaptist. To him the "inward scripture" outbade the "Holy Scripture." Lydia Müller thinks that this was also the position of at least some leading Anabaptists but cannot prove it. Anabaptists at no time minimized the unconditional Biblical faith.

Finally, it is known that Hut passionately opposed the "sword." In Nikolsburg in 1526 he debated this issue with Hubmaier, who defended the use of the sword under certain conditions. When Hut saw the impasse he left Nikolsburg, continuing his Anabaptist mission of cross and love. Incidentally, Müntzer, his former friend, had very little to say concerning this Christian love; Lohmann expressly states that "the idea of love drops inadvertently into the background," all the more when Müntzer preached the needed eradication of the ungodly. Thus Hut cannot be a useful witness for Bullinger's theory and its late defenders, even though some common key words actually appear in both camps. It is their meaning which matters, not the terms as such.

There remains one last contact with later Anabaptism: Melchior Rinck. This contact is a real one. Rinck was openly a Müntzerite, and in fact he even boasted that God had spared him at Frankenhausen that he might carry out Müntzer's plans more successfully and bring them to a happy end. He apparently owed to Müntzer his first spiritual awakening and was grateful for that, but perhaps understood only part of Müntzer's message. Rinck's own later writings do not continue Müntzer's fancies concerning dreams and the violent overthrow of the ungodly. After becoming an Anabaptist in May 1527 at Worms as a result of his contact with Hans Denk and Jakob Kautz, he became one of the most effective leaders of early Anabaptism in Thuringia, until he too experienced the very cross of all true confessors in martyrdom sometime after 1545, having been in prison since 1531. In no way may he be called a "beginner" of Anabaptism or even one of its leading figures. And after becoming an Anabaptist he shows no trace whatever of Müntzer's ideas. He could not have been a channel of transmission of these ideas into Anabaptism.

But what about indirect influences on later Anabaptism by Müntzer's writings? A brief review of some of the major points of possible contact and similarity in the realm of ideas between Müntzer and the Anabaptists, in other words, continuities of Müntzer's ideas, reveals the following facts.

Cross. To Müntzer the cross meant two things: outwardly human suffering through sickness, poverty, and the hostility of people; and inwardly Anfechtung, i.e., doubt, error, and unbelief. A "cross" of such a kind is utterly foreign to the Anabaptists, who become "disciples of Christ" only through rebirth and determination to follow the commandments of Christ. On the other hand, suffering for the sake of truth, the idea of a "church under the cross" (Grebel) never occurred to Müntzer, who had no revealed truth in the first place to be witnessed to and no church either. Thus even though the term "cross" appears frequently in Müntzer's writings—sometimes also called "the bitter Christ" (vs. the "sweet Christ" of Luther)—it means something different. When he vaguely indicates that whoever experiences the cross experiences inner spiritual baptism, that idea is not in itself to be equated with the Anabaptist doctrine of the cross.

Spirit. To a certain extent all early Anabaptists had a good share of spiritualism in their understanding of the Holy Scriptures; but the latter remained the rock foundation upon which they built their faith. No fanatical dreaming can ever be found among them, and Lydia Müller's claim that the appreciation of the Scriptural Word drops into the background with the Anabaptists just as with Müntzer is simply a misstatement, since she confounds the occasional Anabaptist term "inner word" with Müntzer's inspirationism.

Gelassenheit, i.e., yielding to the will of God and not following one's own imaginations, was a frequent term in Müntzer's earlier writings when he was still under the influence of the German mystics, and also a central idea with the Anabaptists. Müntzer had learned a great deal from these German mystics, through whose writings he apparently grew spiritually in the earlier period of his life. But soon he gave it up; it was "basically against his very nature," which nature was unrest, passion, activity, and challenge. A man who wanted to kill all the ungodly could have little Gelassenheit, even though he might preach it as an ideal.

Adult baptism. Concerning this little needs to be added. Müntzer was not interested in it (as so many radical spiritualists were not), and would hardly have understood its new meaning with the Anabaptists as a sealing of the inner rebirth, making men determined to walk the narrow path of discipleship.

Lord's Supper. Remembering his liturgical tracts (Deutsche Messe) it becomes evident that to Müntzer the celebration lacked completely the Anabaptist meaning of a symbol of sharing, akin to the "love-feast" idea. Lohmann expressly states that Müntzer's tracts were extremely "conservative" in character, i.e., nearer to a modified Catholicism than to Lutheranism or any radical idea. For that reason he continued to the end to speak of the "Mass" and not of the Lord's Supper.

Church. This is perhaps the most difficult item of all, and has never been fully studied. Most authors think that here at least are to be found similarities with Anabaptism. The Anabaptist idea is that of a voluntary free church of genuine believers as opposed to the ecclesiastical institution of both Catholicism and Lutheranism (state church, people's church). A careful analysis, however, will destroy even this most persistent argument. To be sure, in the Prague Manifesto of 1521 Müntzer passingly said that in Bohemia the "new church" would arise. It was to be the church of the new aeon, the church without the ungodly, an apocalyptic vision, no concrete reality. This is theory. But what was Müntzer's practice? First, he remained to the very end of his life a priest-preacher both in Allstedt and in Mühlhausen city churches, and hence never actually opposed an institution of that kind (either Catholic or Lutheran in nature). Second, his Allstedt League was anything but an Anabaptist brotherhood; it was rather a secret society to promote the imminently expected kingdom of God by means of wiping out, if need be by the sword, all (Catholic) superstition—a chapel was burned down—and all ungodliness. Of a restitution of the primitive church in the Anabaptist sense there is no trace whatever, since Müntzer completely lacked the idea or vision of discipleship and obedience to the Word of God.

It is true that at times Müntzer also taught that the true reign of Christ could come only by genuine "kenosis," that is, emptying oneself of all worldly desires and humbling oneself to the will of God. But then he contradicted himself by claiming (at another place) that those who were prepared by the "fear of God" were now entitled to reign and rule, for they alone knew the will of God. Obviously no doctrine of the church could follow from such a confused theology. Since he continued as a state church preacher, it cannot be claimed that the "believers' church" originated with Müntzer.

Eschatology. This may be omitted here, since it is but marginal with the Anabaptists. Hans Hut, to be sure, was much attracted by it, but when it came to preaching the new birth and discipleship he voluntarily restrained himself and kept his apocalyptic ideas silent. With Müntzer it was the exact opposite. Only by these ideas about the change of the world did he find an inner justification for all his violent and revolutionary actions.

The writings of Hans Denk have recently been carefully studied by the editor of the new 1956 edition of Denk, Walter Fellmann, for evidence of possible literary influence of Müntzer's writings on Denk. Surprisingly Fellmann found twenty-four passages in Denk which echo Müntzer's terms or phrases, and concludes that "the literary dependence on Müntzer's mysticism is noticeable." J. J. Kiwiet thinks that this may be explainable through a possible common source of both, i.e., the writings of the German mystics, particularly Theologia deutsch, rather than a borrowing by Denk from Müntzer. Grete Mecenseffy ("Die Herkunft des oberösterreichischen Täufertums") believes that Hans Hut's mystical ideas had their origin in Müntzer's writings. Granting both Fellmann's and Mecenseffy's point, it remains only to say that the mystical ideas were not the essence of Anabaptism and that no evidence has been brought forward which would contradict any of the points made above.

In summary we may agree with Annemarie Lohmann that the years 1524-25 appallingly show how this erstwhile mystically minded man, who knew so much about suffering and human tragedy, became more and more shallow (Verflachung). Since all his six major tracts and sermons date from 1524, it is after all this Müntzer whom we have to consider first, not the man of the Prague Manifesto (1521), confused and equivocal though this document also appears. This weakening of Müntzer's former spiritual position is a tragedy in itself, the result not of any "kenosis" but of a self-centered and romantic fanaticism.

That Müntzer represented a tremendous spiritual power for his time, being a passionate awakener, is true enough. That he was a "beginner of Anabaptism" in any sense whatever is, however, just as incorrect as the opposite claim which sees in him a forerunner of modern socialism. Since his writings are contradictory, such attitudes might be read into them; but any such interpretation does not do justice to his true nature.

But what was Müntzer then, after all? Were it not for his activism, Müntzer might be placed beside David Joris, the inspirationist. This activism, however, with all its hazy orientation toward a goal to be achieved by the sword, brings him into the neighborhood of the "kingdom of Münster" of 1534-35. Müntzer had nothing essential in common with evangelical Anabaptism, which arose when he was about to pass from the scene, and which became victorious simply by being a "church under the cross." R.F.

Karl Holl, "Luther und die Schwärmer" in his Gesammelte Aufsätze (2nd and 3rd ed., Tübingen, 1923) 420-46; Heinrich Böhmer, "Thomas Müntzer und das jüngste Deutschland," in his Gesammelte Aufsätze (Gotha, 1922) 187-222; H. Böhmer and P. Kirn, Thomas Müntzers Briefwechsel (Leipzig, 1931, containing also the four versions of the Prague Manifesto); Otto Clemen, "Das Prager Manifest Thomas Müntzers," Arch. f. Ref.-Gesch. (1933) 73-81; Joachim Zimmerman, Thomas Münzer, ein deutsches Schicksal (Berlin, 1925); Annemarie Lohmann, Zur geistigen Entwicklung Thomas Müntzers (Leipzig, 1931), the best work of all; Otto H. Brandt, Thomas Müntzer, Sein Leben und seine Schriften (Jena, 1933), an excellent edition of Müntzer's tracts in modernized German together with other source material; Carl Hinrichs, Thomas Müntzer, Politische Schriften mit Kommentar (Halle, 1950), contains Müntzer's last three and most important writings; idem, Luther und Müntzer (Berlin, 1952); H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel (Goshen, 1950) 198 f. and passim; idem, "The Zwickau Prophets, Thomas Müntzer and the Anabaptists," MQR XXVII (1953) 3-16 (basic); Wiswedel, Bilder I; idem, "War Thomas Müntzer wirklich der Urheber der grossen Taufbewegung?" in Mühlhauser Geschichtsblätter XXX (1929) 268-73; idem, "Inner and Outer Word," MQR XXVI (1952) 171-93; K. Schulz, "Thomas Müntzers liturgische Bestrebungen," Ztscht f. Kirchengesch. XLVII (1928); Paul Wappler, Die Täuferbewegung in Thüringen (Jena, 1913); W. Metzger, "Müntzeriana," Thüringisch-Sächsische Ztscht f. Gesch. u. Kunst XVI (1927); Grete Mecenseffy, "Die Herkunft des oberösterreichischen Täufertums," in Archiv für Ref.-Gesch. XLVII (1956) 252-8; George H. Williams, ed., Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers (Library of Christian Classics XXIV, Philadelphia, 1957), reprints Müntzer's "Sermon Before the Princes" in English, with an introduction, pp. 47-70, also Grebel's letter to Müntzer with an introduction, pp. 71-85; Walter Fellman, Hans Denk Schriften, Part 2: Religiöse Schriften (Gütersloh, 1956); Robert Friedmann, "Thomas Müntzer's Relation to Anabaptism," MQR XXXI (1957) 75-87.

The Böhmer school produced the following monographs, in all of which Heinrich Böhmer's thesis concerning Müntzer as the beginner of the Anabaptist movement is discussed and conditionally respected: K. Ecke, Schwenckfeld, Luther und der Gedanke einer apostolischen Reformation (Berlin, 1911); H. Neusser, Hans Huth (Berlin, 1913); C. Sachsse, Balthasar Hubmaier als Theologe (Berlin, 1914); L. Müller, Der Kommunismus der mährischen Wiedertäufer (Leipzig, 1928); Annemarie Lohmann, Zur geistigen Entwicklung (Leipzig, 1931).

A considerable number of socialist-Marxist studies in Müntzer have appeared since Engels' work on the great Peasants' War. The latest book is by a Soviet-Russian scholar, M. M. Smirin, Die Volksreformation des Thomas Müntzer und der grosse Bauernkrieg (Berlin, 1952; 675 pages), in which the author distinguishes between the "Reformation of the Princes" (Luther) and the "Reformation of the working people" (Müntzer); A. Meusel, Thomas Müntzer und seine Zeit (Berlin, 1952) repeats the same idea; see also K. Kleinschmid, Thomas Münzer (1952). Of similar character are the earlier volumes: P. Friedländer, Thomas Münzer (Redner der Revolution VI, Berlin, 1926), and L. G. Walter, Thomas Munzer 1489-1525 et Les Luttes Sociales à L'Epoque de la Reforme (Paris, 1927); and to a lesser extent Michael Freund, Thomas Müntzer. Revolution als Glaube, Eine Auswahl aus den Schriften Thomas Müntzers und Martin Luthers zur religiösen Revolution und zum deutschen Bauernkreig (Deutsche Schriften V, Potsdam, 1936); ML III, 187-91.

Muravyevka, a village in the Mennonite settlement of Alt-Samara or Alexandertal (q.v.) in the province of Samara, about 80 miles north of the city of Samara, was founded in 1863 by Mennonites from West Prussia, when the Russian government granted permission for 100 additional families to immigrate. In 1913 the village had 59 Mennonite inhabitants and maintained a German school. (ML III, 191.) Hege.

Muria is the name of the conference of the Mennonite congregations around Mount Muria on the island of Java (q.v.), Indonesia. In 1940 the congregations in this territory, which resulted from the work of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association in this area in 1851-1940, became independent, and a number of them formed a kind of conference. The Muria conference started with 10 congregations with a membership of about 2,000; now (1955) it consists of 30 congregations with nearly 4,000 members. vdZ.

Muristalden Teachers' Seminary, a teacher-training school in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, founded by Pietists within the Reformed Church in 1854. The founder was Pastor Friedrich Gerber. Its founding occurred in a politically restless time, when political liberalism was accompanied by religious liberalism. Its purpose was to train teachers in a thoroughly Christian spirit. Tuition fees cover about one third of the cost, the rest being raised by voluntary contributions. Annually about 20 young men are graduated. The young Mennonites of Bern who plan to teach usually attend Muristalden. One of the teachers at this school was Dr. Adolf Fluri, who was the author of the valuable Beiträge zur Geschichte der bernischen Täufer (Bern, 1912). A.-T.

Gedenkschrift zum 50-jährigen Bestand des Evangelischen Seminars auf dem Muristalden, Bern 1854-1905; Hugendubel, Lebensbild von Pfarrer Friedrich Gerber (Basel, 1908); Hadorn, "Gesch. des Pietismus der Schweiz" (Ms.); ML I, 615 f.

Murphy Hutterite Bruderhof near Glenwood, Alberta, founded in 1927 by members of the East Cardston Bruderhof. Joseph Hofer was chosen as their preacher in 1927. In 1947 the Bruderhof numbered 58, with 20 baptized members. D.D.

Murton, John, an English refugee, belonged to a congregation of Independents in Amsterdam in the early 17th century. At first this church had some interest in the Mennonites, but after John Smyth (q.v.) with a number of adherents left the Independents, planning a union with the Waterlander Mennonites (effected in 1615), Thomas Helwys (q.v.), then the leader of the Independent group, turned more and more to Calvinism. In 1611 the Independents returned to England; about 1614 Helwys died and Murton became the leader of the group in London (occasionally called an Anabaptist congregation). Murton was an inspiring leader and during his leadership, which lasted until after 1645, the Independent congregation, which met at Newgate in London, flourished, though persecution by the state church and internal controversy continued to weaken it. Murton protested against the persecutions in an address to the King of England pleading for freedom of religion: "A most humble supplication of many of the king Majestys loyal subjects . . . who are persecuted only for differing in religion." Still more than his predecessor Helwys, Murton was in sympathy with the doctrines of Calvinism. In 1620 he published A description of what God hath predestinated concerning man. Not all the members agreed with this Calvinism; this was apparently the reason why shortly after 1620 Elias Tookey (q.v.) and 15 others were expelled. They held the Anabaptist views of free will and believers' baptism, and in 1624-26 contacted the Dutch Mennonites for a union, which, however, was not effected.

Of Murton's personal life not much is known. Neither the year nor place of his birth or death are available. On Aug. 23, 1608, he was married at Amsterdam to Jane Hodgkin. The marriage certificate says that he was born about 1583 and had lived at Gainsborough, England, before he came to Amsterdam. During his stay in Amsterdam he was a furrier. He is said to have been a zealous and capable man. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1351, 1367; J. G. de Hoop Scheffer and W. E. Griffis, History of the Free Churchmen (Ithaca, n.d.—1922) 148, 153, 178 f., 190, No. 53.

Musa, Antonius (ca. 1490-1547), a Lutheran clergyman, city pastor in Jena, Germany, beginning 1524, was one of the inspectors chosen in Saxony after the passing of the mandate of Jan. 17, 1528, against the "Anabaptists, Sacramentalists, and fanaticism." He was also assigned the task of cross-examining a number of Anabaptist prisoners and of persuading them to rejoin the church. On Dec. 1 and 6, 1535, he questioned Heinz Kraut (q.v.), Jobst Möller (q.v.), and Hans Peissker at Jena in the presence of several members of the city council and Philip Melanchthon (q.v.) and Kaspar Cruciger (q.v.). The three were executed on Jan. 26, 1536, at Jena. On Jan. 13, 1536, Musa together with Melanchthon and Cruciger worked on the conversion of four imprisoned women on the Lüchtenburg near Kahla, and on the next day with Melanchthon three men imprisoned in Kahla. Several weeks of work were required to achieve this end, whereupon the prisoners were released in February and March.

Among those who recanted were Anna and Ursula Möller, whom Melanchthon had described to the Elector of Saxony as being particularly obstinate (Corp. Ref. III, 21). Their resistance melted when they were informed that their husbands had been beheaded, since they refused to enter the Lutheran Church. Those who yielded to such compulsion were released without punishment, even when seditious intentions were evident, as Musa thought was the case with the Anabaptists who had been freed (letter of Musa to Stephen Roth, city clerk of Zwickau in Corp. Ref. III, 12-14).

The resistance of the Anabaptists to adopting the Lutheran creed is understandable in the light of conditions in many parishes. Thus after his church inspection Musa wrote to Stephen Roth that there were very few educated men who preached Christ; some ranted against the Papists, others against the secular government; but very few taught what repentance, faith, and love are (Clemen, 74). On Oct. 3, 1534, he wrote to Roth that those who were everywhere reckoned as preachers of the Gospel did not preach Christ (Clemen, 77), and on May 22, 1537, he wrote that the preachers were abusing the pulpit to rant against the papacy; meanwhile the dear congregation snored, correctly feeling that it was no concern of theirs (Clemen, 67).

After the Anabaptist executions in Jena, which stirred up much excitement, Musa was no longer comfortable there. On Feb. 22, 1536, he wrote to Roth that he was about to resign his position on account of the intrigues of some ungodly persons (Clemen, 67). He would have liked to go to Zwickau if there had been a vacancy for him. In 1538 he was made superintendent at Rochlitz. He died in 1547. HEGE.

O. Clemen, Beiträge zur Ref.-Gesch. aus Büchern und Handschriften der Zwickauer Ratsschulbibliothek I (Berlin, 1900); Corpus Reformatorum II and III (1835 and 1836); Wappler, Thüringen; ML III, 191 f.

Musculus (Meusslin), Wolfgang (1497-1563), a clergyman who in 1512 entered a Benedictine monastery at Lixheim, Alsace, left it in 1527 and became a Protestant. For a time he served as deacon at the minster in Strasbourg. In 1531 he was called to the church of the Holy Cross in Augsburg (q.v.), Germany. Here he attacked the Anabaptists in speaking and writing, but was of a more lenient nature than his colleague Urban Rhegius (q.v.), who had left Augsburg on Aug. 26, 1530. The peak of the Anabaptist movement in the city was already past. The leaders of the brotherhood had been in prison for three and one-half years. Soon after his arrival Musculus and his colleague Bonifacius Wolfhart began his attempts to convert them. Jakob Daschser (q.v.), who had been in prison since Aug. 28, 1527, and had written 40 hymns there (Kamp, 27), recanted on May 16, 1531; Jakob Gross (q.v.) after over three years in prison did the same on June 22. Other members of the Augsburg Anabaptist group were imprisoned in the meantime and released upon recantation. Some were expelled from the city, and threatened with beheading if they returned (Roth, II, 407).

The discussions of the city preachers with the Anabaptist prisoners led Musculus to write a pamphlet on the oath in order to make it clear to the populace that swearing is not forbidden; many citizens were refusing to give the required oath before the court. In 1530, on the occasion of the meeting of the Reichstag, when the oath was required of all citizens, some of them preferred to be put out of the city (Roth, II, 408). The booklet was published on July 28, 1533, in Augsburg with the title, Ain frydsams vnnd Christlichs Gesprech ains Euangelischen auff ainer, vnd ains Widerteuffers, auff der andern seyten, so sy des Aydschwurs halben thund, and contains 34 pages. It is written in the form of a dialogue, in which a Protestant named Friedenreich tries to persuade an Anabaptist named Adolf that swearing is not forbidden. It is the oldest polemic against the Anabaptists on the subject of the oath, though the Confession of Augsburg (q.v.) had three years previously taken a position in Article 16, which says, "Here the Anabaptists are damned" because they teach that to render "the required oath is not Christion." Martin Micronius (q.v.) in 1535 published a Dutch translation of Musculus' booklet with the title Een claere, ende Scriftelicke onderrichtinghe van den Eedt, wat hy sy: ende hoe dat hy gebruijct ende misbruijct can werden Waer toeghedaen is een clein anhancksel, den seluen handel angaende, Door Marten Mikroen.

Musculus also refuted the doctrines of the Anabaptists in his commentaries on the Gospels (Roth, III, 247). After the Augsburg Interim in 1548 Musculus had to leave the city and fled to Bern, where he was employed as professor of theology. HEGE.

F. Grimme, "Wolfgang Musculus," in Jahrb. der Gesellschaft für lothringer Geschichte und Altertumskunde V, 2 (1893) 1-20; A. Kamp, Die Psalmendichtung des Jakob Dachser (Greifswald, 1931); Fr. Roth, Augsburger Reformationsgesichte (1904 and 1907); ML III, 192.

Music, Church. Music, vocal and instrumental, was a regular part of Old Testament temple worship. The early Christians used vocal, but not instrumental, music in their worship. Christ and His disciples in the upper room before the betrayal "sang an hymn." The Apostle Paul (Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16) urged his churches to sing "psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs," and James advised a "merry" Christian to "sing psalms" (Jas. 5:13). John the Revelator pictures the victorious Christians singing the song of Moses and the Lamb in the future glory. Paul and Silas sang praises in prison (Acts 16:25), as many persecuted Christians and martyrs have done since.

The early Christian congregational singing, one-part in character, was gradually supplanted by liturgical singing (promoted greatly by Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, 333-97, and still more by Pope Gregory the Great, 598-604), which became the exclusive function of the clergy, assisted by special male choirs, who sang only in Latin in the West. The organ was introduced into church music in the West by Charlemagne (ca. 800). In the Middle Ages only the small groups outside the church such as the Albigenses and Waldenses continued congregational singing, in the vernacular, and also used singing in their evangelistic efforts. Because of the effective use of singing by the "heretical" groups, alert Roman Catholic leaders like Berthold of Regensburg (d. 1272) urged the use of singing in the vernacular by the church because "the heretics were leading people astray" by "composing songs and teaching them to the children in the streets."

But it was the Lutheran Reformation which first restored congregational singing in the vernacular, though with the retention of the organ. Luther's first published order of service (Deutsche Messe, 1526) provided for two or three hymns to be sung by the congregation. Luther himself composed some songs and wrote some hymns. Lutheranism, however, as did Anglicanism, retained the liturgical type of worship service.

It was the Reformed phase of the Reformation which did away with the liturgy altogether and made congregational singing the people's part in the worship service. At first, however, Zwingli, though a lover of music, banished both singing and the organ from the church service, basing his position on Amos 5:23. It was not until 1598 that singing was reintroduced into the worship in Zürich.

Although Conrad Grebel himself, in line with Zwingli, also opposed all music including singing in worship, the early Anabaptists made much use of singing almost from the beginning, and many Anabaptists wrote hymns, over 130 Anabaptist hymn writers being known. One section of the Ausbund consists of hymns which were "composed and sung at Passau in the castle (prison) by the Swiss Brethren," as the title states. Without doubt hymns were a factor in Anabaptist evangelism, both sung and read. Christian Neff says (ML II, 86), "A flood of religious songs poured over the young brotherhood like a vivifying and refreshing stream. The songs became the strongest attractive force for the brotherhood. They sang themselves into the hearts of many, clothed in popular tunes. They were mostly martyr songs, which breathed an atmosphere of readiness to die and a touching depth of faith. And those that did not report on martyr steadfastness admonished the listener to a devout faith, which was to prove itself in love. Sanctification and its demonstration in life and death is their glorious content." By the middle of the 16th century five printed Anabaptist hymnals had appeared, in addition to numerous song leaflets and handwritten materials (the Hutterite hymnal was not published until 1914, although hymn codices have been preserved from as early as 1570).

Congregational singing has thus been a regular part of Anabaptist-Mennonite worship from the beginning. In Europe it has largely remained one-part singing in Holland, but by the second half of the 19th century was developing into four-part singing, especially by congregational choral groups, in South Germany, France, Switzerland, and somewhat later in Russia and North America.

The use of the reed organ and pipe organ in worship was introduced into the Dutch Mennonite churches in the fourth quarter of the 18th century (first case in Utrecht in 1765), but not until considerably later elsewhere. It was little used in Russia at any time, and is still not permitted in the more conservative groups in North America including, for instance, the Mennonite Church (MC). It came into general use in the other American groups about the turn of the 20th century. About one third of North American Mennonites now use the organ or piano in worship.

Choirs (q.v.) are not used at all in regular worship anywhere in Europe, and in North America only in those groups which use an instrument in worship, and even then not uniformly. Choirs are, however, often used for special occasions in South Germany, France, Switzerland, and now again Russia, as well as in South America and most North American groups including the M.C., but not in the strictly conservative groups. Before the use of an instrument, and now in groups not using it, the congregational singing has been and is led by a song leader called a chorister (q.v.) or Vorsänger.

The church music of the Mennonites is completely nonliturgical. Since Mennonites have produced almost no composers of church music of their own, although in Anabaptist times they produced many of their own hymns, they have used the tunes (q.v.) of other Protestant churches. They have thus also been influenced by their environment and affinities in the type of church music used. Pietism, Methodism, and revivalism have all had their influence. This influence has been particularly noticeable in the past two generations in South Germany, France, Switzerland, Russia, and America; Holland and North Germany have remained largely untouched. This has resulted in the displacement of much of the older, slower music of the chorale type by a faster and lighter type commonly known as the "gospel song." Recently a wholesome return toward the solider type of music is noticeable, while retaining the best of the gospel songs.

Conscious effort has been made in certain North American groups to maintain and improve the quality of congregational singing as well as the quality of music used. "Singing classes" or "singing schools" were widely used in the Mennonite Church (MC) for this purpose, both to teach the rudiments of music and improve hymn interpretation. Chorister training conferences and church music institutes have also been held in this group. A standing committee of the Mennonite General Conference, the Music Committee created in 1909, has sponsored these and other measures, as well as having responsibility for editing hymnals for the church. Among the outstanding leaders of church music in the Mennonite (MC) Church have been C. H. Brunk (1845-1921), J. D. Brunk (1872-1926), S. F. Coffman (1872-1954), J. W. Yoder (1872-1956), and Walter E. Yoder (1889-). All of these men have also composed some music for hymns which are included in the hymnals of the church.

The church music of the Old Order Amish is unique among Mennonite groups by virtue of their four century-long traditional and continued use of both hymns and tunes. The sole hymnal used in the regular public worship is still the ancient Swiss Brethren hymnal, the Ausbund (first ed. 1564), probably the oldest Christian hymnal in continuous use. This hymnal, though indicating the tunes to be used with the hymns, has never printed any notes, and no tune-book has ever been published. The tunes have been handed down from the beginning by memory; many of them have been identified as coming directly from 16th-century religious and folk-tunes. J. W. Yoder transcribed some of the Amish tunes and published them with the words in Amische Lieder (1942). Recordings have also been made of a number of the tunes, which have been deposited in the Library of Congress and Goshen College Library. Rote perpetuation of the 16th-century tunes has naturally resulted in considerable "distortion."

The Old Colony Mennonites in Manitoba, Mexico, and Paraguay have had a similar experience in their church music as the Amish, except that their tunes go back only about half the length of time. They are still using as their hymnal essentially the Geistreiches Gesangbuch of their Russian-Prussian ancestors, first published as a noteless hymnal in 1767 at Königsberg. The tunes indicated in the hymnal have been handed down by rote, and hence have also been subject to distortion, although for a short time the Franz Choralbuch of 1860 was used in Russia by a part of the later "Old Colony" immigrants to Canada. Both Old Order Amish and Old Colony Mennonites, as well as the Hutterites, still sing in what is called the "old" or "slow" style. (See also Chorister, Choir, Hymnology, and Tunes.)

H.S.B.

Charles Burkhart, "Church Music of the Old Order Amish and Old Colony Mennonites," MQR XXVII (1953) 34-54; Rosella Duerksen, "Anabaptist Hymnody of the Sixteenth Century. A Study of Its Marked Individuality Coupled with a Dependence upon Secular and Sacred Music Style and Form" (unpublished dissertation, Union Theological Seminary, N.Y., 1956); ML II, 85 f.

Music, Church, in the Netherlands. During the persecution hymn singing in Anabaptist-Mennonite meetings was practiced as circumstances permitted it. After persecution ended hymn singing was regularly practiced. The singing was led by a "voorzanger" (precentor); musical instruments including organs were not tolerated as being too worldly. Not until 1765 was a pipe organ placed in a Dutch Mennonite meetinghouse. This first organ was built in the church of Utrecht. Other congregations soon followed: Haarlem (Klein Heiligland) in 1771, Leiden 1774, Rotterdam 1775, Amsterdam (Lamist church) 1777, Zaandam (Nieuwe Huys) 1784, Amsterdam (Zonist church) 1786. Though there was here and there some resistance against organs, yet the introduction nowhere led to discord.

During the 19th century nearly all congregations acquired organs, mostly pipe organs, sometimes a simple harmonium. By 1905 only seven congregations in the Netherlands had no organ; this was not because they were opposed to organs but because the money was lacking. Now (1955) all Mennonite churches are provided with organs.

Musical instruments, other than organs, are not used in Dutch Mennonite churches. Congregational singing is always in unison. Sometimes, particularly on special days like on Christmas or the installation of a new pastor, there is choir singing. Choir singing as a regular part of the order of service, as practiced among some American Mennonite branches, is unknown in the Netherlands.

In the 16th and early 17th centuries it was the common practice to sing two hymns at the meeting, one at the beginning and one at the close. During the 17th century the custom gradually developed to sing three times during a meeting. This practice was obviously borrowed from the Calvinist liturgy. Now singing three times and occasionally once or twice more is usual in Dutch Mennonite services.

The first Dutch Mennonite hymnbooks used in the 17th century, such as Veelderhande Liedekens (q.v.) of 1560 and following reprints, Een Nieu Liedenboeck (q.v.) of 1562, Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (q.v.) (at the same time the hymns found in the Offer itself) of 1563 and following editions, Het Tweede Liedeboeck (q.v.) of 1583, Veelderhande Schriftuerlycke Nieuwe Liedekens by Leenaerdt Clock, of 1597, and Sommige andachtige ende leerachtige Gheestelicke Liedekens (q.v.) of 1597, are without notes, as are most 17th-century hymnals, such as the Kleyn and the Groot Hoorns Liedtboeck (q.v.), the Rijper Lietboecxken (q.v.), Stapel's Lusthof der Zielen (q.v.), and many others, and also some 18th-century hymnals like Alle Derks' Lusthof des Gemoeds (q.v.). As late as 1814 a reprint of the Kleyn Hoorns Lietboeck appeared without notes. In all these hymnals a melody (or often two) is suggested at the top of each hymn to which the hymn can be sung. These tunes, obviously all familiar to the congregations, were derived from both spiritual and secular songs. Often it was the tune of a psalm. A large number of the old secular songs with their melodies are found in Florimont van Duyse, Het Oude Nederlandsche Lied, 3 vv. (1907). The first Dutch hymnbook to break with the tradition of having no notes was the Lietboeck by Hans de Ries of 1582, in which the entire section containing psalms has notes, while in the following sections only a few hymns have notes, the others having only the indication of a tune. The 18th- and 19th-century hymnals, being usually collections of hymns borrowed from other hymnals, mostly non-Mennonite, took over the melodies from these hymnbooks together with the texts.

Later hymnals used by the Mennonites, such as Protestantenbond-bundel (q.v.), Leidsche Bundel (q.v.), and the Doopsgezinde Bundel (q.v., 1944), contain a list which shows the source of each hymn and melody as well as the composer. Only the Doopsgezinde Bundel indicates Mennonite composers, including in its supplement seven melodies composed by Jacob Bijster (b. 1902), the organist of the Haarlem Mennonite congregation.

There are no Dutch Mennonite composers, either of secular or of church music. Pastor W. H. toe Water composed the music of the Elspeet Broederschapshuis song, while Pastor L. Bonga wrote both the words and the music of the hymn of the Friese Doopsgezinde Jongerenbond (q.v.). vdZ.

N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 108, 110 f., 112-14, 242 note 14; DB 1863, 19 f., 1904, 244; D. F. Scheurleer, De Souterliedekens (1894); F. C. Wieder, De Schriftuurlijke Liedekens (The Hague, 1900); Wolkan, Lieder; J. A. N. Knuttel, Het geestelijk lied in de Nederlanden voor de Kerkhervorming (1906).

Music, Church, in Prussia, Poland, Russia, and Descendant Communities in North America. The articles Hymnology of the Mennonites of West and East Prussia, Danzig, and Russia, Choirs in Prussia and Russia, Chorister, and Choral-books have treated extensively various aspects of Mennonite church music in this area. The Mennonites of Dutch-Prussian background did not differ greatly in their attitude toward music from the Swiss Brethren, or from the Reformed Church, which used music in worship only to a limited degree. Mennonites, being nonliturgical in their worship, placed more emphasis on the preaching of the Word of God. In fact, there are some claims that the early Prussian Mennonites did not sing during their worship services (ME II, 875). If this was the case, it was likely because they were compelled to worship God quietly in order not to attract attention. The singing was as a rule in unison and restricted to congregational singing without instrumental accompaniment. The early hymnbooks had no notes, but indicated for each hymn a melody, which was transmitted by rote from generation to generation. The hymn tunes were either brought from Holland or borrowed from the Lutherans. The singing was slow, very much as it is found today among the Old Colony Mennonites of Mexico or the Amish and Hutterites. Only after Mennonite spiritual life had been influenced by the pietistic revival movement in Prussia and Russia through German Pietism and the English Baptists, was the traditional singing transformed by faster singing and new melodies. A significant development along these lines was the introduction of written and (later) printed choral-books through which four-part singing and modified faster melodies were introduced. These were first used in the schools, later by village and community choirs, but only gradually and with opposition in congregational singing. The great promoter of improved singing in Russia in school, home, and congregation was Heinrich Franz (q.v.), who published the Choralbuch (q.v.) in 1860. After this came the lighter gospel songs of T. Köbner (Glaubensstimme) and E. Gebhardt (Heimatklänge, etc.), which were introduced by the Mennonite Brethren, who had adopted them through their Baptist contacts. The Mennonites of Russia used ciphers instead of notes in their melody books.

Even though the congregations gradually accepted a more modern form of music, four-part singing was introduced only with difficulty in some places. Some groups consistently refused the faster and modified melodies, clinging to the old-fashioned slow tunes. This form of singing was transplanted by the Mennonites of the Old Colony in Russia to Canada in the 1870's and from there by the Old Colony Mennonites to Mexico in the 1920's.

Already in Russia congregational singing and the renditions by choirs reached high levels. After the Revolution song festivals and choir schools were among the few church activities left to them. Unser Blatt reported about them regularly in 1925-27, when this publication ceased and the choirs had to discontinue their work. (By 1956 the choirs were reported singing again.) The Mennonites of this tradition in North and South America, regardless of conference affiliation, continue these practices on even a larger scale. As a rule congregations have no regular orchestras, but congregational as well as choir singing is almost always accompanied by an organ or piano. All these activities can also be found in G.C.M. or related congregations and communities of Pennsylvania-German or Swiss background.

High schools of Mennonite communities usually rank high in their performances. The musical organizations of communities like Berne, Ind., Kansas, South Dakota, and Manitoba are strong; their programs and the annual rendition of The Messiah, The Seven Last Words, and The Creation by Bethel College, Bluffton College, Tabor College, and Freeman College are attended by thousands of people. Some congregational choirs have become noted for the quality of their performances; this can also be said of the college choirs and other musical organizations which travel regularly to give programs in the constituency. The Mennonite Singers of Bethel College made two trips to Europe where they sang in Mennonite and non-Mennonite communities.

The music festivals of Manitoba under the direction of K. H. Neufeld and Neil Unruh, the Mennonite Symphony Orchestra of Winnipeg under the direction of Ben Horch, and the Bornoff School of Music in Winnipeg under the direction of John Konrad, have done much to maintain traditions brought from Russia and to improve the standard of musical performance. F. C. Thiessen and K. H. Neufeld did much to improve church music in the M.B. Church in Canada, and H. C. Richert likewise in the same group in the United States.

Similar activities in vocal and instrumental music can be found in the solid Mennonite communities of the other provinces of Canada and the United States. The colleges have done much to improve and foster good quality of music through their educational programs. At the time when the Mennonites changed from the German to the English language there was a general decline in quality of music, since the traditional German hymn was replaced by the lighter gospel song. In this process the Mennonite colleges have made a very significant contribution in keeping alive the tradition of singing hymns and singing them well. The effects of this are noticeable in the congregational singing of the constituency and in the newer hymnbooks which have been published during the last years (see Hymnology). Walter H. Hohmann, Lester Hostetler, and also other leaders have done much to improve the standards of music. Graduates of Mennonite schools are also teaching or directing choirs in non-Mennonite communities. (See also Minister of Music.)

The contributions of the Mennonites as composers of hymn tunes are not as significant as their accomplishments in musical performances. Few, if any, of their works have found a general acceptance beyond their own circle. Of the 558 hymn tunes of the Christian Hymnal of the Church of God in Christ Mennonites, twenty-two are of Mennonite origin, an unusually large number of hymns of Mennonite origin in a Mennonite hymnal. Among the composers of tunes of the Great Plains, Walter H. Hohmann and Herbert C. Richert have probably been most productive. The latter published Young People's Sacred Songs, for which he wrote all the hymn tunes. In addition to this the Mennonite Brethren Church Hymnal contains eight of his hymn tunes. Among Hohmann's compositions and arrangements are Immortality (North Newton, 1945), Bless Thou the Lord (Chicago, 1948), Jesus Put Forth His Hand (Chicago, 1949), and Hymns and Chorales for Men's Voices (Newton, 1955). No doubt other Mennonite musicians have composed music for hymns, published or unpublished. C.K.

Musical Instruments have only comparatively recently been introduced into Mennonite churches as an aid in worship. The first instrument was the pipe organ, installed in the Mennonite church of Hamburg-Altona, Germany, in 1764, and in the Mennonite church at Utrecht, Netherlands, in 1765. Other Dutch Mennonite churches followed in rapid succession. The Prussian Mennonites introduced their first organ in the Neugarten church in 1778; the Danzig church installed one in 1806, after which others followed. The introduction of the organ made the old chorister (q.v.) or Vorsänger system obsolete. Gradually this honored office disappeared, although in some churches the organ and Vorsänger competed for some time. The Danzig Mennonite Church introduced a written Choral Buch in 1806 specifically for the organist. It contains 111 different chorale titles, of which 86 are Bach harmonizations.

The introduction of musical instruments in the Mennonite churches of Russia occurred considerably later. Here it was primarily the reed organ which was used in churches. Only a few of the Mennonite and Mennonite Brethren churches introduced this instrument (Gnadenfeld) before World War I. The guitar was also used, particularly at youth meetings in Mennonite Brethren circles in connection with the lighter Gospel songs. An extreme wing of the M.B. used in its early stage various musical instruments such as barrel organs, drums, flutes, and violins, most of which were soon discarded (A. H. Unruh, 113).

Among the more conservative Mennonites of Russia and also among those who later settled in Canada and Mexico the use of musical instruments in worship services was not tolerated. The Old Colony Mennonites still forbid instruments entirely. In the early days of the Reformation the more radical reformers, e.g., Zwingli, Calvin, and the Anabaptists, discarded the use of musical instruments. This became a tradition perpetuated for centuries. It was taken for granted that the musical instrument was to be used only for worldly entertainment; the introduction of musical instruments in the church would mean the opening of the gates of the church to secular and sinful influences. Today in the General Conference Mennonite Church, the Mennonite Brethren, the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, the Evangelical Mennonites, and the Mennonite Brethren in Christ, the use of the musical instruments has been accepted for worship services. The Brethren in Christ General Conference in 1955 authorized the use of musical instruments by congregations desiring them. Those churches who can afford the cost and have a sense of appreciation install pipe organs. If not, they may have an electronic organ, a reed organ, or a piano. The latter is used particularly in churches where the lighter Gospel songs are preferred above the chorales and hymns.

The first pipe organ installed in an American Mennonite church was at West Swamp, Pa., in 1874. By 1890 most of the Eastern District Conference (GCM) churches were using either a pipe or reed organ. The Berne (Ind.) Mennonite Church installed a reed organ in 1890 and a pipe organ in 1914. Eva Sprunger's centennial history of the Berne church (First Hundred Years) says, "Instrumental music was considered sinful and was not allowed. . . . It was not until 1901 that opposition was sufficiently overcome to pass a resolution permitting the use . . . in the Sunday School." The Western District (GCM) passed a resolution in 1881 leaving the decision regarding the use of musical instruments in worship to the individual congregations.

All schools of the General Conference and most other groups use musical instruments. The first musical instrument was an organ used at the Wadsworth (Ohio) school, which had been brought from Europe by J. G. van der Smissen, whose wife, Hilegonda Jacoba Deknatel, had received it from her father, Johannes Deknatel, of Amsterdam. Later this organ was used at Bethel College, where it is now a part of the Kauffman Museum collection.

Reed organs were introduced into the Swiss, French, and South German churches east of the Rhine about the turn of the 19th century. Pipe organs are, however, to this day not in use.

The Mennonite Church (MC), and the more conservative groups of Swiss-South German background, such as the various Amish groups and the Old Order Mennonites, have maintained a form of worship in which the instrument has no place. The prohibition of instruments is based in part on a long-standing tradition, but is also based on the desire to maintain strong congregational singing and the fear that the use of instruments will harmfully affect this. In some areas of the Mennonite Church for a time, and always among the more conservative groups, the use of musical instruments has been forbidden even in the home. Some conferences, such as the Virginia Conference (MC), made it a conference regulation for a time that ordained ministers should not have instruments. George R. Brunk, Sr., was a vigorous opponent of musical instruments and largely responsible for the introduction of this spirit into the Virginia Conference. From the beginning instruments have not been allowed in the buildings of the Eastern Mennonite College, nor are they used in the music department there. The same rule applied at Hesston College from the beginning until about 1950. No such policy has been applied at Goshen College. C.K.

Music Issue, Menn. Life III (April 1948); A. H. Unruh, Die Geschichte der Mennonitenbrüdergemeinde (Winnipeg, 1954); N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 108, 242 note 14.

Musselman (Musselmann, Moselmann), a Mennonite family name, probably Swiss in origin, found in both Europe and America. Mennonite Musselmanns are still found in Germany, viz., in Baden, Bavaria, and Württemberg, and formerly also in the Palatinate. Worthy of mention is Elder Johannes Musselmann (1881-1955 of the Heilbronn (q.v.) congregation in Württemberg, who was ordained preacher in 1924 and elder in 1937. Jacob Musselman emigrated from Europe (according to tradition, from Germany) in 1743 and settled in Bucks County, Pa. He bought land which included the first Swamp (MC) meetinghouse (near the present West Swamp General Conference Mennonite Church), but for which no deed had been granted. His son Michael Musselman was ordained preacher in the Swamp district before 1773. Michael's son Samuel Musselman (1764-1842) became a bishop (MC) in the Swamp district. The name Musselman is also found in Lancaster County, Pa. One of the members of the Lancaster County Musselman family was the promising John S. Musselman (1881-1913), superintendent of the Welsh Mountain Industrial Mission and a volunteer for the India Mission field, who died of typhoid fever before leaving home. Prominent fruit canners of Adams County, Pa., were C. H. Musselman and Ivan Z. Musselman. Samuel H. Musselman (1855-1929), father of Ivan Z. Musselman, was a prominent lay leader in the Lancaster County Mennonite (MC), treasurer of the district mission board, and fellow commissioner with S. C. Yoder in the visit to the South American mission field, 1919-20. About 1803 Peter Musselman removed from Pennsylvania to Ontario, where he served as a Mennonite (MC) preacher. The last minister in the Mennonite Church in Jo Daviess County, Ill., in the 19th century was Michael Musselman, a member of the Bavarian settlement which was made in the county about 1840. Perhaps the most prominent General Conference Mennonite preacher with this name was Samuel M. Musselman (1875-1938) of Bucks County, Pa., who served pastorates in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Iowa, and Kansas. Three representatives of the family served prominently in the ministry of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, Pennsylvania Conference: Harvey B. Musselman, ordained 1893; his son, B. Bryan Musselman, ordained 1916; and William B. Musselman, ordained 1886. J.C.W.

Musselman, Harvey B. (1868-1956), an outstanding leader of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church in Pennsylvania, was born in Lehigh Co., Pa. He entered the ministry in 1890 and was ordained in 1893 by the Pennsylvania Mennonite Brethren in Christ Conference. He was married to Annie M. Bans in 1888, to which union were born three children. He held pastorates at Royersford, Spring City, Lehighton, Weissport, Bethlehem, and Mt. Carmel, Pa.; served as presiding elder for 18 years; and was president of the Orphanage and Home Board, the Foreign Mission Board, and the Executive Board of the M.B.C. Conference. J.A.Hu.

Musselman, Samuel H. (1855-1929), an outstanding lay leader in mission and Sunday-school work in the Lancaster (MC) Conference, was born on the Musselman homestead near New Holland, Pa., on Oct. 24, 1855, the son of Christian Musselman and Catherine High. In Nov. 22, 1877, he married Anna Zimmerman. They were baptized at Weaverland in 1878. In 1893 he (with I. W. Martin) organized the first Weaverland Sunday school and served as superintendent for 25 years. As chairman of the Welsh Mountain Board, he saw his dreams materialize in an industrial mission (1898) and the Red Well evangelistic work. For years he was an active worker on the Weaverland Missions Committee in their enlarging program into Chester County. He saw this committee amalgamated with the Eastern Board of Missions and Charities. He was active in the Lancaster Sunday School Mission and served on the Executive Committee of the Mission Board. In the fall of 1919 he with S. C. Yoder made an inspection trip to the Argentine in prospecting for a mission program there. He was a mover for the Oreville Old People's Home and served on this Board from 1903 for many years. He died Nov. 26, 1929. I.D.L.

Musselman, William Brunner (1860-1938), a prominent leader of the M.B.C. Church in Pennsylvania, was born in Lehigh Co., Pa., the son of Jonas and Lucy Musselman. He began to preach in 1883 and in 1886 was ordained by the Pennsylvania Mennonite Brethren in Christ Conference. In 1879 he was married to Mary A. Oberholtzer. To them were born 10 children, 5 boys and 5 girls. He held pastorates at Reading, Bethlehem, and Allentown, Pa., and served as presiding elder, member of the executive board of the general conference, and president of the Gospel Worker Society. He was a member of all of the general conferences from 1888 to 1916. J.A.Hu.

Mussen, Beene Gerrits (d. in 1783 at an advanced age), was in 1727-83 an elder of the congregation of Giethoorn-Noord (q.v.), Dutch province of Overijssel. This was a Danzig Old Flemish congregation, and during Mussen's eldership still had contacts with the Flemish congregation at Danzig, West Prussia. Mussen guided his congregation according to conservative, strict principles. In 1768 he banned Berend Thijssen Rijkmans, who, being more progressive than his elder, had attended the meetings of the Giethoorn-Zuid congregation. A number of members sided with the banned brother. By the intervention of the provincial government of Overijssel and mediation of the Mennonite congregations of Haarlem and Amsterdam the quarrel was reconciled, but some years later the majority of the members of Giethoorn-Noord left the congregation to found a new, less conservative congregation at Zuidveen (q.v.) in 1774.

Mussen (according to tradition) did not write his own sermons, but read sermons written by the Amsterdam Danzig Old Flemish Elder Peter van Dijk, which sermons had been given to Mussen by van Dijk's heirs. Mussen taught from the catechism by Pieter Boudewijns (q.v.). (DB 1878, 14-26; Naamlijst, passim.) vdZ.

Mutual Aid. The Anabaptists strove to reproduce as nearly as possible the life of the early Christian Church and to imitate the life of Christ. The Mennonites, being direct descendants of the Anabaptists, have tried to do the same. In doing this they have insisted on the right of the individual to interpret the Scriptures for himself without the aid of priest, but by the illumination of the Holy Spirit. This emphasis on individual freedom under the guidance of the Holy Spirit manifested itself in daily life in not being bound by law but living by the Spirit. It is this freedom from legalism and a dependence upon individual conscience in the grace of God that enabled them to live out their convictions despite all opposition and persecution. It is these principles that gave them the vision and confidence to try to establish a "Kingdom of Heaven" on earth in their own communities. It was not an attempt to build a kingdom on a universal scale. It was simply a kingdom of voluntary believers, adding others who wished to join their group. It was in such an atmosphere of freedom and Christian brotherliness that mutual aid could flourish. Mutual aid had its roots intertwined with the very roots of Mennonite religious principles.

Another distinctive principle of the Mennonites was the belief in the complete separation of the church from the state and from dependence upon it for any kind of support. In applying this principle they manifested a willingness to provide the necessities of life for all within their group. Positively, they believed in the possibility of a way of life based on mutual love and respect for fellow believers, so that an organization of Christians could be established on a community basis where love and brotherhood could be expressed in daily life, since a true follower of Christ would so conduct himself as to place the welfare of others before his own. This was Jesus' own teaching, although history reveals that not all His professed followers have accomplished His ideal or even aimed at it.

Another Mennonite principle has been an emphasis on the simple life, applied in matters of clothing, food, furnishings, and in all outward appearance. With this simplicity were stressed industry and thrift. Frugality and industry generally produce prosperity, at least in a material sense. It was so with the Mennonites; but they aimed at a reasonable prosperity for the group rather than for only a few within the group. The concept of a brotherhood church leveled all class distinction, and brought condemnation upon anyone who tried to exploit another. Likewise, emphasis on simplicity tended to counteract any feeling of sophistication and superiority. With few outward possessions to display individuality, the tendency to covet was reduced to a minimum. With a minimum of jealousy, selfishness, and sophistication, there is possible a maximum of mutual aid and brotherly helpfulness.

One evidence of the high regard of the Mennonites for each other's welfare was their opposition to claiming interest on loans. They refused to accept interest themselves and paid it unwillingly to others. Money, they believed, should be lent for the benefit of the borrower rather than the lender. Proper fraternal relations forbade the exploitation of the needs of a brother; besides, the practice was contrary to the teachings of Scripture: "You must not exact interest on loan to a fellow-countryman of yours, interest on money, food, or anything else that might be exacted as interest" (Deut. 23:19). Again they read in the sacred Word that the Christian "does not put out his money on interest, nor take a bribe against the innocent" (Psalm 15:5).

These principles of the earlier Mennonites and the Anabaptists are based on the literal interpretation of the Sermon on the Mount. An attempt to live out these teachings and imitate the Apostolic community can scarcely help but result in mutual aid, if not semi-communism. Christian brotherhood and mutual aid are inseparable. A second source of mutual aid practices may be found in the cultural patterns of the medieval and Reformation periods, where certain forms of mutual aid were expressed in the village communities. The Mennonites have, throughout their history, lived in rather compact communities and when they migrated they did so in groups rather than by individual families. This in itself is an evidence of the loyalty to, and dependence upon, one another.

The evidence of the practice of mutual aid among Anabaptists is clear and cumulative. From the beginning in Zürich they insisted on the obligation of a brother to help his brethren in need. This emphasis lies behind the repeated and continued charge of their opponents that they advocated and practiced communism, which was, however, not true. Hans Leopold, a Swiss Brethren martyr of 1528, said of the brethren, "If they know of any one who is in need, whether or not he is a member of their church, they believe it their duty out of love to God to render help and aid." Heinrich Seiler, a martyr of 1535, said, "I do not believe that it is wrong that a Christian own property of his own, but yet he is nothing more than a steward." Heinrich Bullinger, the bitter enemy of the Brethren, wrote in 1560, "They teach that every Christian is under duty before God from motives of love to use, if need be, all his possessions to supply the necessities of life to any of the brethren who are in need." A Strasburg Protestant who had visited a Swiss Brethren baptismal service near that city in 1557 reported that a question addressed to all candidates for baptism was "whether, if necessity required it, they would devote all their possessions to the service of the brotherhood and would not fail any member that is in need, if they were able to render aid." (All quotations from the Anabaptist Vision.)

Russia. Two examples of mutual aid in an extreme form in Mennonite history are the Hutterites (q.v.) with their practice of Christian communism (from 1528 on) and the short-lived Plockhoy (q.v.) co-operative colony on the Delaware in colonial America (1662 ff.). A third, more normal example is the large number of mutual aid practices of the Mennonites in Russia (1788-1917).

The following will present a representative picture of mutual aid in a typical Mennonite community in Russia as it existed in the 19th century. The Mennonites grouped themselves into small farm villages of 20 to 30 families each, each family having 65 dessiatines (175 acres) of land. The land was divided into strips so distributed that all would share the good and the bad land wherever there was difference in its fertility. Each village had a common pasture and each family had several acres for gardening immediately adjoining the house. In the Volga region the title to the land rested in the village; in South Russia it rested in the head of the family. C. Henry Smith gives a good brief description of some mutual aid activities in one village community: "While these colonies were not communistic in their organization, yet the villages frequently undertook municipal enterprises for the common good. Some villages had a common granary stored with grain for the lean years and for the benefit of the poor. Occasionally also they held tracts of land for later distribution as the population grew. In 1820 the communal sheep flock of the Old Colony (Chortitza) consisted of 1,000 merinos, and the annual income from the communal ferry across the Dnieper was two to three thousand rubles. The communal distillery also netted a substantial profit for the common treasury that year" (Coming, 34).

During the early days in Russia the villages had no banks for their money, since in a rural community of the 18th century money played only a very small part in the life of a people. What little cash people had was kept at home. One of the older immigrants who remembers life in those Russian villages remarked that it was much easier to help someone else when the money was kept within constant reach. In later years, banks of mutual credit were established, which accepted deposits from any person and transacted all legal commerical business, lending money not only for agricultural purposes but for promotion of manufacturing and trade. But these banks were based on membership, and money was lent to members only. The Waisenamt, however, established before the mutual credit bank, was most characteristic of the village community and its mutual aid practices. It was in fact a trust organization formed to assist minors who were orphaned, and to administer their inheritance funds. The money could be invested, saved, or distributed according to the best interests of the parties concerned. Evidence that the Waisenamt satisfactorily served a need is the fact that it is still in existence in a number of Mennonite communities of Russian background, especially in Canada and Paraguay.

Another interesting illustration of mutual aid among the Russian Mennonite villages was the practice of assisting a widow at the death of her husband. Immediately after her husband's death the widow would name "two good men" to take charge of her affairs. This was not compulsory, but it was generally done. The widow usually chose the closest friends of her husband, who considered it both an honor and a religious duty to serve in such a capacity. All service was rendered free even if it took many days with teams of horses to perform the necessary work. Problems with regard to children, finances, or even remarriage were all first discussed by the widow and her advisers before action was taken. This was an effective way of helping a member who had sustained misfortune; it offered an opportunity for the friends of the deceased to show their appreciation for his friendship, and at the same time was a way of relieving the widow of undue worry and the fear of exploitation. Moreover, there were no lawyers' fees to be extracted from whatever financial balance the husband may have left. It was an expression of mutual aid of the simplest yet most genuine sort.

To improve their economic condition and the quality of their livestock, the Russian Mennonites practiced mutual ownership of stock to a limited degree. A high-grade stallion, bull, ram, or other male animal might be purchased by the community and thus made available to each farmer to improve his herd. During the winter months, when these animals could not be fed in the common pasture, they were taken from one farmer to another for several weeks at a time, thus distributing the cost of feeding and care. The reputation of the Mennonites for raising high-grade stock spread far and wide and in this way representatives from Jewish, Russian, and other German communities came to the Mennonites for advice on how to improve their own herds as well as to buy stock from them.

A further evidence of the way mutual aid pervaded the spirit of the Russian Mennonites was the community land fund for the purchase of new lands for the oncoming generation. When a new area was opened up for settlement any Mennonite married couple having no other farming land was entitled to one farm and a lot in the new settlement. Parents from both sides usually supplied the young couple with means sufficient to equip the new farm. If they were unable to do so, the couple was given a start at the expense of the community through a common fund, repayable or not repayable, as in each case was considered most advisable. In this way young people were helped to begin life on their own, and at the same time given a sense of status in the community. As the land in the new communities was paid for by the settlers, the money was put into a revolving fund for the future purchase of another settlement. In this way generation after generation could be provided for. Following this method, the Mennonites expanded within the course of a century from a poor immigrant group of 8,000 to a flourishing population of 45,000 (by 1914, 100,000), generally prosperous farmers and landowners.

Another instance of mutual aid among the Russian Mennonites was the fire insurance plan (Brandordnung) which had been brought along from West Prussia in the late 18th century. Each member had his property valued as he saw fit. No premiums were paid. The officers in the associations held their offices without pay as honorary positions. After a loss by fire or storm, each member contributed pro rata according to the value of his own property. The aim of this plan was to levy the assessment in proportion to the ability to pay. The clearing of the debris and the hauling of brick and stone and other building material for reconstruction was then done jointly by the whole village free of charge. Likewise the heavy work, such as setting up the frame of the building, was done free of charge. The insurance money paid out in cash to the loser was actually only for building material. This is an excellent example of mutual sharing of the loss from an unavoidable hardship.

One of the universal practices of the Mennonites has always been to provide for their own aged and poor. In Russia this was done in an admirable way, admirable in the sense that it did not tend to degrade the recipients to the point of being outcasts or of losing complete self-respect. The poor were given an opportunity to contribute something of value in return for the charity they received. It was the practice for each village to have a common fireproof storehouse at one end of the village to which each farmer contributed in times of prosperity to provide against lean years, perhaps a sack of wheat, a sack of rye, and a half sack of barley. This not only served as a source of supply for the dependent poor, but also as an emergency source for any member of the community who might suffer a crop failure.

The freedom which Catherine the Great and her successors granted the Mennonites to develop their culture in the way they thought best resulted in the turning of vast treeless steppes in Southern Russia into productive farm lands and prosperous villages. Given this complete independence, the Mennonites developed their thriving economy built entirely around and on the idea of mutual aid. Mutual aid was practiced not only in the economic, social, and political aspects of life, but pervaded almost every activity. The ideals and principles of working together for the common welfare of all became the accepted way of doing things. To carry on activities on a selfish, extremely individualistic basis without thought of the effect on others would have been considered a gross sin, causing one to be avoided by his fellow men. This would have been the severest punishment for anyone in a small village where fellowship and companionship were the very basis of happiness. It is likewise a significant fact that this extensive practice of mutual aid was not discontinued when prosperity came. The tendency was rather to increase the mutual services. The practices of mutual aid can thus not be said to be desirable or practical only in times of grave necessity or in times of struggle for existence.

America. Because the Mennonites in America are scattered widely from Pennsylvania to California, and from Ontario to British Columbia, and because of the differences or divisions within the Mennonites themselves, it is impossible to speak of American Mennonites as one group. The illustrations that will be used in this part of the study are, however, as representative of the various groups of Mennonites as possible who in general have common basic beliefs and attitudes regardless of minor differences in policy and practice. But some mutual aid practices seem to be universally characteristic of Mennonites. One of these is the practice of providing for their own poor and orphans. It is very unusual for Mennonites to send their dependent members to county or state institutions. If the particular local church conference does not have an institution for the purpose of caring for its aged and poor, provision is often made in private homes of friends or of relatives. At least 38 homes for the aged and 7 children's homes are maintained by the American Mennonites. A second mutual aid practice which is common to many Mennonite communities is that of providing hospital care. At least 14 hospitals are owned in whole or in part by Mennonites. Often these hospitals and old people's homes are located in the same locality, thus making it convenient to provide medical care for the aged and also making it easier to manage the two institutions under one head. The fact that Mennonites are concerned with such matters as care for their own sick and for their economically underprivileged reveals the depth of feeling and the sense of mutual responsibility that they have for each other. It is likewise an evidence that the Mennonites assume the care for and welfare of their own dependents as part of their Christian duty.

A third type of mutual aid among Mennonites is fire and storm insurance societies. It seems significant that the mutual aid organizations are especially strong wherever losses from causes beyond the control of man are suffered, such as sharing responsibility for losses due to fire, storm, accident, sickness, and death. Such a mutual insurance plan is undoubtedly the oldest form of organized mutual aid among the Mennonites. The earliest records available show that mutual insurance was practiced by some Mennonites in Europe in the beginning of the 17th century, and had its origin among the Mennonites in Germany in 1663, when a group then living in West Prussia organized the Tiegenhöfer Privat Brandordnung. This association was still in operation with its office at Tiegenhof up to the time of the Russian invasion in 1945, which wiped out the Mennonite communities there. Practically every American Mennonite region has its own fire insurance society based on the principle of mutual aid. These societies are very old in America, some dating back at least a hundred years. Very often they existed for years in unorganized forms without written constitutions whereby to govern themselves, and many of them did not keep records of proceedings of business conducted.

Mutual aid developments of more recent years include the burial aid society, the hospital and medical aid society, the automobile accident insurance plan, and the loan aid plan. A complete list of all known North American Mennonite Mutual Aid organizations operating in 1956 follows, 69 in total.

Mennonite Mutual Aid Organizations in the United States and Canada, 1956

I. Property Insurance Societies - 36

Name	Address	Year Organized	Membership
Alberta Menn. Mutual Aid Society	Coaldale, Alberta		450
Amish Aid Ins. Plan of Ohio Districts	Millersburg, Ohio	1937	5,000
Amish Aid Plan of Ind. and Mich.	Shipshewana, Ind.	1934	3,316
Amish Aid Plan of Kan., Okla. & Oregon	Partridge, Kan.	1890	560
Amish Aid Society of Eastern Pa.	Ronks, Pa.	before 1850	1,500
Amish Menn. Aid Society of Iowa	Kalona, Ia.	1885	160
Amish Menn. Storm and Fire Aid Union	Wellesley, Ont.	*ca.*1858	1,096
Amish Mutual Fire Ins. Ass'n	Parkesburg, Pa.	1922	850
Brotherhood Mutual Ins. Co.	Fort Wayne, Ind.	1917	10,000
Brotherly Aid Plan	Lancaster, Pa.	1950	950
Canada and States Menn. Ins. Ass'n	Mt. Lake, Minn.	1874	4,000
Canadian Menn. Mutual Ins.	Altona, Man.	1923	500
Fire and Storm Aid Plan of the Ref. Menn. Church	Lancaster, Pa.	1923	900
Franconia Menn. Aid Plan for Mutual Fire Ins.	Lansdale, Pa.	1936	1,000
Ill. O.O. Amish Mutual Aid Plan	Arthur, Ill.		820
Man. Menn. Mutual Ins. Co.	Steinbach, Man.	1874	2,800
Menn. Aid Ass'n	Topeka, Ind.	1911	2,608
Menn. Aid Plan	West Liberty, Ohio	1896	205
Menn. Aid Plan of the Pacific Coast	Reedley, Cal.	1922	2,500
Menn. Aid Plan of S.D.	Freeman, S.D.	1882	4,000
Menn. Aid Society of S.D.	Marion, S.D.	1922	241
Menn. Aid Union	Baden, Ont.	1864	2,442
Menn. Aid Union of Kan.	North Newton, Kan.	1906	2,050
Menn. Hilfs-Plan	Moundridge, Kan.	1900	3,000
Menn. Mutual Aid Ass'n	Kalona, Ia.	1913	600
Menn. Mutual Aid Society	Bluffton, Ohio	1866	852
Menn. Mutual Fire Aid Plan	Hagerstown, Md.	1924	475
Menn. Mutual Fire Ins. Ass'n	Intercourse, Pa.	1893	8,116
Menn. Mutual Fire Ins. Co. of Sask. Ltd.	Waldheim, Sask.	1917
Menn. Mutual Hail Ins. Co. for W. Can.	Hepburn, Sask.	1916	3,145
Menn. Mutual Ins. Ass'n of Ohio	Orrville, Ohio	1897	5,550
Menn. Union Aid	Montezuma, Kan.	1942	1,410
Prairie Menn. Mutual Fire Ins. Co.	Herbert, Sask.	inc.1941	600
Red River Mutual Fire Ins. Co.	Altona, Man.	1874	5,500

Name	Address	Year Organized	Membership
Virginia Menn. Property Aid Plan	Harrisonburg, Va.	1911	1,286
Wash. Co. Menn. Mutual Ass'n	Wayland, Ia.	1950	130
*Menn. Indemnity, Inc.	Goodville, Pa.	1956

*A reinsurance organization of Mennonite Insurance Societies

II. Automobile Aid Insurance - 7

Brotherly Aid Liability Plan for the Lancaster Menn. Conf.	Leola, Pa.	1955	484
Goodville Mutual Casualty Co.	Goodville, Pa.	1926	18,000
Menn. Automobile Aid, Inc.	Goshen, Ind	1954	(1957) 1,686
Michigan Menn. Mutual Auto Aid	Fairview, Mich.	1939	150
Mutual Auto Aid of the Menn. of Wash. Co., Md.	Hagerstown, Md.	1945	264
Pigeon River Menn. Mutual Auto Aid	Owendale, Mich.	1950	75
Virginia Menn. Automobile Aid Plan	Harrisonburg, Va.	1933	761

III. Burial Aid Societies - 14

Alberta Menn. Relief Society	Coaldale, Alberta		450
Beerdigungs-Verein zu Leamington, Ont.	Leamington, Ont.	1935
Menno-Friendly Beneficial Assoc.	Philadelphia, Pa.	1908
Menn. Aid, Inc.	Goshen, Ind.	1949	1,276
Menn. Aid Society	Mt. Lake, Minn.	1897	4,139
Menn. Burial Aid Soc.	Altona, Man.	1910
Menn. Mutual Burial Aid	Halbstadt, Man.	1940	276
Pacific Menn. Aid Soc.	Reedley, Cal.	1941	650
Menn. Mutual Supporting Soc. of Arnaud-St. Elizabeth	St. Elizabeth, Man.	1934	680
Mutual Burial Fund	Montezuma, Kan.	1940	274
Mutual Support Society	Starbuck, Man.	1926	855
Niagara Mutual Funeral Soc.	Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ont.	1934	2,146
Vineland Beerdigungs-Kasse	Vineland, Ont.	1934	2,450
West Abbotsford and Clearbrook Menn. Church Funeral Aid	Abbotsford, B.C.	1952	263

IV. Medical, Surgical, and Hospital Aid Plans - 6

Bethesda Menn. Health Society	Yarrow, B.C.	1935
Coaldale Menn. Health Society	Coaldale, Alberta	1943
Menn. Aid, Inc.	Goshen, Ind.	1949	(1957) 18,655
Menn. Health Society	Coaldale, Alberta	1931	300
Menn. Hospital Soc. Concordia	Winnipeg, Man.	1928	1,663
Menn. Mutual Aid of Ont.	St. Catharines, Ont.	1944	2,550

V. Loan Aid Organizations - 6

Christian Service Foundation	Ft. Wayne, Ind.	1949
Crosstown Credit Union Society Ltd.	Winnipeg, Man.	1944	1,336
G.C. Menn. Mutual Service & Aid Assoc.	Newton, Kan.	1945
Menn. Brotherhood Aid Assoc.	Bluffton, Ohio	1949	151
Menn. Mutual Aid, Inc.	Goshen, Ind.	1945
Western Canada Menn. Land Settlement Ass'n	Plum Coulee, Man.	1954	450

The spirit of mutual aid has also been vigorously expressed in migration and colonization aid, sometimes on a large scale. The Dutch Mennonites made substantial cash contributions to Swiss and Palatinate Mennonites migrating to Pennsylvania in 1710-50, in addition to direct relief contributions. The attempted (though failing) settlement of Lithuanian Mennonites in Holland, and the successful settlement of some Swiss Mennonites in Holland, both in the early 18th century, were also financed by the Dutch. The migration of the Russian Mennonites to Canada and the United States 1874-80 was strongly aided by cash and loan contributions raised by the existing American Mennonite groups through regional "aid committees." Similar aid was given to the large group of immigrants from Russia to Canada in 1922-25 and the smaller groups of 1930-31 and 1947-50. The colonization of the major Russian Mennonite settlements in Paraguay (1930, 1947-50) and the Danzig Mennonites in Uruguay (1948-51) was possible only because of the large amounts of financial aid, including loans for land purchase, made by North American Mennonites through the Mennonite Central Committee. The Mennonite Economic Development Associates (MEDA), a group of American businessmen, is supplying substantial amounts of finance capital to aid small-scale industrialization in the colonies. Many young conscientious objectors from the Mennonite congregations in the United States (PAX boys, q.v.) have contributed substantially in labor to the building of homes for Mennonite refugees in Germany (1952 ff.), to which considerable cash amounts were also furnished by contributed funds from America. During and after World War II the major Mennonite bodies in the United States raised considerable sums of money to aid their men in CPS service by financing their maintenance while at work on government-assigned projects, by supplementing their meager wages in certain cases, by supporting dependent wives and children, and by furnishing rehabilitation loans after discharge.

The co-operative barn-raisings among the Old Order Amish are also worthy of note as examples of mutual aid, along with the practice of co-operative planting and harvesting of crops for sick or disabled farmers, a practice which is found in other Mennonite groups as well.

In the South American Mennonite colonies established in Paraguay and Brazil since 1926 and 1930, the spirit of mutual aid has also expressed itself in an organized way in the founding of co-operatives.

Thus it is evident that the ancient and original spirit of mutual brotherhood aid has not only survived among the Mennonites of North and South America, but has experienced a substantial revival and more extensive and intensive application.

Among modern European Mennonites there has been and is almost no organized expression of the spirit of mutual aid which was present in the earlier centuries in largely unorganized form, except in the Danzig-West Prussian area as noted above. (See Community; Community of Goods; Insurance; and Life Insurance.) J.W.F., H.S.B.

J. Winfield Fretz, "Mutual Aid Among the Mennonites," MQR XIII (1939) 28-58, 187-209; idem, "Mennonite Mutual Aid, A Contribution to the Development of Christian Communtiy" (Ph.D. Thesis, University of Chicago, 1941); idem, Christian Mutual Aid, A Handbook of Brotherhood Economics (Akron, 1947); idem, Mennonite Colonization, Lessons from the Past for the Future (Akron, 1944); idem, Pilgrims in Paraguay (Scottdale, 1953); H. S. Bender, The Anabaptist Vision (Goshen, 1944, reprint from MQR XVIII, 1944, 67-88); C. Henry Smith, The Coming of the Russian Mennonites (Berne, 1927); C. Krahn, J. W. Fretz, and R. S. Kreider, "Altruism in Mennonite Life," in Sorokin's Forms and Techniques of Altruistic and Spiritual Growth (Boston, 1954); "A Directory of Mennonite Insurance and Mutual Aid Organizations" (Mennonite Research Foundation, Goshen, 1956).

Mutual Aid Board. The General Conference Mennonites created the Mutual Aid Board at its 1945 general sessions for the immediate purpose of aiding the rehabilitation of young men who had served as conscientious objectors during World War II, since these young men had served without pay and without the discharge bonuses that were given to the men in the military service. The function of the board was to assemble funds on a gift or a loan basis from individuals or conference organizations. These were to be loaned to G.C.M. young men at a low rate of interest. The purpose for which loans were made varied, but among the most common were assistance to young couples in setting up housekeeping, buying livestock and equipment to start farming or to establish a business, completing a college or university education, and purchasing or remodeling modest homes. In 1950 the General Conference reorganized and created the Board of Christian Service which absorbed the Board of Mutual Aid and thereafter made it the committee on Mutual Aid. Thus after 1950 the Board of Mutual Aid no longer officially existed but its work has been expanded. In 1957 it was incorporated. Its services are no longer confined to young men in the service of their country, but provides assistance to all members in need of vocational and economic help to the extent that means are available and deemed necessary by the Mutual Aid Committee. J.W.F.

Mutual Auto Aid of the Mennonites of Washington Co., Md., established at Hagerstown, Md., Dec. 26, 1945, serving 264 members (1953) of the Mennonite Church (MC). H.S.B.

Mutual Burial Fund, organized in January 1940, serves six Church of God in Christ Mennonite congregations: Montezuma, Copeland, Greensburg, Scott City, and Cimarron in Western Kansas, and Crowley, Col. The Fund has a membership of about 800, in 377 families. This plan takes care of all the funeral expenses, including the casket, embalming, undertaker fees, and grave digging. The caskets are made by a brother at an average cost of $90.00. The average complete service of a funeral is $325.00. The members save at least 50 per cent on their funeral expenses.

The expenses for making the caskets as well as those of the funeral directors are taken from the church treasuries. This plan makes it possible for all members to have a more uniform burial, the poor being well provided for. A.Un.

Mutual Support Society of Starbuck, Man., was founded in 1926 by Peter J. Dyck, Elder Johann Klassen, Gerhard Braun, Franz Klassen, and Jacob Rempel, under the name "Starbucker Beerdigungskasse," as a burial aid society, chiefly for the new immigrants from Russia in 1922-25. In 1955 the membership was 855 including children. The burial aid, which was originally $30 per adult and $20 for children under 12, was $250 per adult and $150 for children in 1955. The annual membership fee is $2.00 for adults ($3.00 for one above 40 years of age) and $1.00 for children. H.S.B.

J. H. Rempel, "Etwas über die 'Starbucker Beerdigungskasse," Menn. Rundschau LXXIX (1956) 11.

Muys, Douwe Douwensz, usually called only Douwe Douwensz, was a Dutch Mennonite preacher of the Waterlander congregation of Hindeloopen, Friesland. Being rather progressive, he disagreed with some conservative elements of the Waterlander group, and was thereupon attacked by Cornelius van Huyzen (q.v.) of Emden. Muys replied with Den gesuiverden Toetsteen, of Aanmerkingen op't boek van K. v. Huizen, genaamt Toetsteen van de leere der Doopsgesinde (Workum, 1714). The years of his serving are unknown. He had died before 1731. (Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis II, 626, 627 note.) vdZ.

Myconius (Mecum), Friedrich (1490-1546), a reformer in Thuringia, Germany, pastor in the small town of Buchholz in Saxony, and finally pastor and superintendent in Gotha. Here he carried out a thorough reformation of church and school. He took part in the church and school inspections of 1527 and 1533 and in many theological meetings and discussions. After the death of Duke George he introduced the Reformation in Leipzig and Annaberg.

In these positions Myconius came into frequent contact with the Anabaptists. After the execution of six Anabaptists at Reinhardsbrunn (q.v.) he had some qualms against such violent measures, but was set at rest by Melanchthon (q.v.), to whom he had turned for counsel. He planned to write a booklet against the Anabaptists with Menius (q.v.), but the latter wrote it alone. After his death in 1546 Menius became his successor as superintendent of Gotha. P.S.

"Myconius" in RGG and HRE; Paul Wappler, Die Stellung Kursachsens und des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen zur Täuferbewegung (Münster, 1910); idem, Thüringen; ML III, 192.

Myconius (Geisshüsler), Oswald (1488-1552), a Reformed theologian, born at Lucerne, Switzerland, studied philology at the universities of Bern and Basel, became a Humanistic professor in Basel and Lucerne, then Zürich (1516 f.), where he promoted Zwingli's call to the ministry of the city. In 1520 he turned his attention to the study of the Scriptures. Zwingli had in him an assistant for his Bible study groups well-versed in languages and in the Bible. Myconius as a layman was commissioned by the city council to hold these studies in the Fraumünster Church. His thorough but popular exposition soon attracted large audiences from all ranks. Thus even though he was not a preacher he was an effective promoter of the Reformation.

It is to be assumed that some future Anabaptist leaders also participated in these meetings, for Myconius was acquainted with some of them. Conrad Grebel (q.v.) was in the party in 1518, when Myconius, with Vadian (q.v.) and Johann Zimmermann (Xylotectus), made the first scientific ascent of Mt. Pilatus, which had been shrouded in superstition (Hagenbach, 348). Grebel later left Myconius. With Zwingli, Leo Jud, and Kasper Megander (q.v.), Myconius took part in the disputations with the Swiss Brethren, including that of Jan. 17, 1525, which led to the founding of the broherhood in Zürich (Blanke, 37-40). Myconius also participated in the debate with Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) on Dec. 21, 1525 (Hagenbach, 333). He reported that they had taken part in "nine friendly discussions and serious disputations" with the Anabaptists (Blanke, 45).

When the battle of Kappel (Oct. 11, 1531) claimed the lives of Zwingli and Oecolampadius' assistant, who had also been the pastor of the church of St. Alban in Basel, Myconius succeeded into his position; and upon the death of Oecolampadius in August 1532 he as Zwingli's friend was made the antistes of the Basel church. He also held the chair of New Testament at the university. Myconius now became a prominent opponent of the Swiss Brethren, though after 1531 the death penalty was no longer inflicted upon an Anabaptist in Basel. With Heinrich Bullinger (q.v.), who had just published his first book against the Anabaptists, Von dem unverschämten Frevel, and who became the antistes of the Zürich church after Zwingli's death, Myconius carried on a lively correspondence.

In the synod of Basel (q.v.) of May 1533 Myconius expressed his distaste for the carelessness of the dress of the Swiss Brethren; though the clergy was now wearing civil garb, he did not wish it to be everyday clothing, lest something equally ordinary be expected of the sermon (Hagenbach, 347). In contrast to the Swiss Brethren, who required ethical conduct and faith as condition of membership in their brotherhood, Myconius advocated government intervention to preserve moral conduct and faith by means of strict laws; these laws were, however, constantly broken, so that even the sharpest measures against gluttony, intoxication, and profanity were ineffective. "Lack of respect for the services ordained by the state church, disregard of the Word and the sacrament were made criminal offenses and as such were severely prosecuted" (Hagenbach, 348).

Nevertheless Myconius left a little freedom of action to the Swiss Brethren at first, as is seen in his letter to Wolfgang Capito (q.v.) dated June 26, 1533, admitting that there were in Basel no sects that denied the deity of Christ or the regulation of civil uprightness among men (Cornelius, 264). But he was soon attacking in speech and in writing the Swiss Brethren doctrines that differed from those of the Reformed Church.

In his first church regulation, the Basler Konfession of Jan. 21, 1534, he took a position against Swiss Brethren doctrine. This creed had been outlined by Oecolampadius, but written by Myconius. Like the Augsburg Confession this creed also contained a section on "errors of the Anabaptists," which calls them mobsters and designates their teaching as malicious opinions when they say "that one should not baptize infants (which we baptize according to the custom of the apostles and the early church and because baptism takes the place of circumcision), and that one may under no circumstances swear an oath, and that Christians may not be a part of the government, together with all the others that are opposed to the sound, pure doctrine of Jesus Christ, and that we not only do not accept, but also reject as an abomination and blasphemy" (Hagenbach, 469 f.). The creed was presented to the guilds and sworn to by the members. For over three centuries it remained the official creed of the church in Basel. Until 1789 all citizens, and until 1780 all clergymen in Basel were bound by this creed (Theologischer Jahresbericht, 1911, 654). This same creed was also adopted in Mühlhausen in Alsace, and was known as the Mühlhauser Konfession (Hagenbach, 353).

Ten days after the release of the creed Myconius issued a pastoral letter, which presents a sad picture of the rudeness of the age and an accusation against the conduct of the Catholic clergy, with the entirely unfounded assertion that "Papists and Anabaptists make common cause, one group believing that by killing one's enemy they are doing a work pleasing to God, and the other group would have liked to destroy the Word and the uprightness of the Gospel; for when it came to battle, the Anabaptists turned their backs before they had seen the foe, and the others, having perceived the serious impression of the enemy, likewise sought their safety in flight. Neither party marched out to face the enemy, but only to look after itself" (Hagenbach, 409). Myconius completely ignored the fact that the Anabaptists were nowhere tolerated by the Catholics, and that they defended their teaching with the Word itself.

In his later years, racked by physical pain, he confessed to Bullinger in 1547 in a penitent mood that he too had been lacking in a true trust in God. "Our own sins stand in our way. When we clergymen urge repentance we are admitted nowhere, and we ourselves are occasionally guilty of serious missteps. Love has grown cold in all, even in those who commend love to others. All, learned and ignorant, great and small, are blinded by the prevalent ungodliness. We do not love God and are attached only to the world. Therefore the Gospel preached for many years has borne no greater fruit. Our passions, not the Word of God, govern us, who ought to lead others" (Hagenbach, 367).

Myconius died on Oct. 14, 1552, at Basel, almost at the same time as his colleague Johann Gast (q.v.), who had been deacon of the church of St. Martins since 1529 and in 1544 wrote a violent polemic against the Anabaptists.

Conrad Grebel and Oswald Myconius were intimate friends for some ten years prior to Grebel's break with the Zwinglian Reformation. Nine letters of Grebel to Myconius have been preserved covering the period from Jan. 30, 1519, to Nov. 4, 1521, all of which have been published in the original Latin and in English translation by Edward Yoder in the Mennonite Quarterly Review (1928). HEGE.

Fritz Blanke, reprint of Zwingli's In Catabaptistarum strophas elenchus (Corpus Ref. XCIII, Leipzig, 1936); C. A. Cornelius, Gesch. des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II (Leipzig, 1860); K. R. Hagenbach, Johann Oekolampad und Oswald Myconius, die Reformatoren Basels (Elberfeld, 1859); Edward Yoder, "Nine Letters of Conrad Grebel [to Myconius]," MQR II (1928) 229-59; ML III, 193 f.

N

Naaktlopers. On Feb. 10-11, 1535, a number of Anabaptists had a meeting in the Zoutsteeg at Amsterdam, Netherlands. Suddenly Henrick Henricxz Snyder, who was looked upon as a prophet, removed his clothing, threw it into the fire, and ordered those present to do the same. Infected by the mania of their leader they all obeyed and thereupon followed him, marching naked along the streets and crying, "Woe, woe, the wrath of God [is coming] over this city." They had no revolutionary intentions, because they had all thrown away their weapons. Soon the seven men and five women were apprehended. The women were executed on May 15, the men on Feb. 25, 1535, all by beheading. vdZ.

An account of this incident is found in C. A. Cornelius, Die Niederländischen Wiedertäufer während der Belagerung Münsters (Leipzig, 1869) 19 ff., and L. Hortensius, Het Boeck van den Oproeren der Weder-dooperen (Enkhuizen, 1660) 104 ff.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 68, 94 f., 193; Grosheide, Verhooren, 57 f.; DB 1917, 155 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 176 f.; Mellink, Wederdopers, 122-24.

Naaldeman, Heinrich: see Hendrik Naeldeman.

Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde schrijveren en schriften van 1539 tot aan 1745 is an anonymous bibliography of 136 pages, published at Amsterdam in 1745. The author of this valuable book is Marten Schagen (q.v.). The Amsterdam Mennonite Library has a copy of this book with a number of handwritten annotations, probably by Schagen himself. vdZ.

Naamlijst der tegenwoordig in dienst zijnde predikanten der Mennoniten in de Vereenigde Nederlanden is a register of names, reporting the Dutch Mennonite congregations with their elders and preachers and the years when they began to serve. From 1743 on, the congregations in Prussia were also included, and from 1765 on also those of South Germany and France, while occasionally some information was given about the Mennonite congregations of Switzerland and America. Beginning in 1782 some information was added concerning the congregations, called Kerknieuws. Though sometimes a little inaccurate, the Naamlijst is a valuable contribution to our knowledge of both the congregations and their ministers. A letter written on Aug. 30, 1764, by Jacob Hirschel (Hirschler, elder at Gerolsheim) to the editor in Amsterdam (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 2, No. 690) shows that the composers tried to obtain firsthand information. Under somewhat varying titles the following editions are still extant: 1731, 1743, 1755, 1757, 1759-76, 1787-94, 1796, 1798, 1800, 1802, 1804, 1806, 1808, 1810, 1815 (edited by A. H. van Gelder), and 1829 (by Samuel Muller), all published at Amsterdam and mostly together with a register of Remonstrant (q.v.) congregations in the Netherlands and their ministers. There was also a German edition of the Naamlijst 1759 and of 1802 (see Namensverzeichnis). The Naamlijst was followed by the Doopsgezind Jaarboekje (q.v.), first published in 1837.

Of the Naamlijst van de Leeraren bij de Doopsgezinden in Vriesland, Groningerland en de Vijf Eilanden there is only one issue (Leeuwarden, 1779), composed by F. van der Ploeg (q.v.) who was at that time the Mennonite minister at Dokkum. (ML III, 198.) vdZ.

Naarden-Bussum, a Dutch Mennonite congregation: see Bussum.

Nabels, Eduard, was a physician and an elder of the United Waterlander and High German congregation at Rotterdam, Holland, serving from before 1620 until after 1647. He served in a stirring period of the Rotterdam congregation, in which there was a quarrel between the Waterlander group and the former High Germans, which led to the departure of most High Germans in 1636. They took vigorous action against Nabels for laxity in maintaining the practice of banning and in the matter of mixed marriages, as well as for unorthodoxy in the doctrine of the Incarnation. Nabels was also active outside his Rotterdam congregation: in 1629 he secured a privilege of exemption from the office of sheriff for the Waterlander Mennonites in Holland. In 1626 he sided with Nittert Obbesz (q.v.), who was then involved in a quarrel with the Amsterdam Waterlander preachers and Hans de Ries. vdZ.

K. Vos, Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. Gemeente te Rotterdam (repr. 1907) 22, 43; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 447; II, No. 2196; II, 2, No. 332-67, passim; DB 1906, 140-44; Kühler, Geschiedenis II, 174.

Nachrichten aus der Heidenwelt, an 8-page, 7 x 10 in. missionary paper published monthly from January 1877 to December 1881 by the General Conference Mennonite Church in co-operation with Western Publication Co., Halstead, Kan., edited by C. J. van der Smissen, with a children's section edited by Christian Schowalter. The paper was discontinued when the Christlicher Bundesbote (q.v.) was started in January 1882, and resumed in January 1885 as a 4-page 9 x 12½ in. paper published at Berne, Ind. The last issue appeared in December 1887. Its purpose was to give information concerning G.C.M. Indian mission work. (ML III, 196.) C.K.

Nachrichten, Unschuldige, the first German theological journal, founded at Leipzig, Germany, in 1701 by Valentin Ernst Löscher. Löscher was succeeded as editor by Michael Heinrich Reinhard, Löscher again, Johann Erhard Kapp, and Johann Rudolf Kiesling. Its name was changed a number of times; in 1701 it was called Altes und Neues aus dem Schatz theologischer Wissenschaften; 1702-19 Unschuldige Nachrichten von alten und neuen theologischen Sachen; 1720-50 Fortgesetzte Sammlung von alten und neuen theologischen Sachen; 1751-61 Neue Beiträge von alten und neuen theologischen Sachen. It expired in 1761.

It was supplemented for the first 50 years by the Theologische Annales (1715-54), in five volumes, each for a period of ten years, the first volume of which went through a second edition, and 1735-42 by Frühaufgelesene Früchte der theologischen Sammlung von Alten und Neuen. Excerpts from the first 40 volumes were published by Johann Christian Ammon (Kernhafter Auszug . . . 1745-52) and Benedikt Born or rather Benjamin Bieler (Neueröffnete Schatzkammer . . . 1746-47). "Every month or at shorter intervals a periodical went out into the world, filled with discussions on old and new books, quotations from unprinted sources, articles on questions of scholarship, refutations, church news, and the like. . . . There is in existence no clearer mirror of the thought process of Lutheran orthodoxy in the first half of the 18th century than this paper, which is also an excellent collection of source material for church history" (Blanckmeister, 20). A complete index in five volumes for the years 1701-50 and individual indexes for the following years reveal a frequent mention of the Anabaptists, the Mennonites, and the writings by and about them. E.C.

F. Blanckmeister, Der Prophet von Kursachsen Valentin Ernst Löscher und seine Zeit (Dresden, 1920) 19-21, 167-75; ML III, 196.

Nachtigal (Nachtegaal), a Prussian Mennonite family name which probably originated in the Netherlands and may be related to the Nagtegaal family of Ameland. It was found in a number of Prussian families from the early 18th century, particularly at Jeziorka, Schönsee, and Montau. Among the Mennonites expelled from Dannenberg (q.v.) in Lithuania (q.v.) in 1732 there was a Jonas Nachtigal who settled in the Netherlands with the aid of the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs and farmed at Serooskerke on the island of Walcheren (q.v.) in the province of Zeeland. In 1739 he returned to West Prussia with the larger part of this group.

In the early 19th century some Nachtigals emigrated from West Prussia to Russia. Among them was David Nachtigal, of the Montau area, who settled in Rudnerweide on the Molotschna. Outstanding members of this family were Abraham Nachtigal (q.v.) and the missionary Peter Nachtigal (q.v.), who served in Sumatra. vdZ.

Reimer, Familiennanmen, 114; B. H. Unruh, Die niederlandisch-niederdeutschen Hintergründe der mennonitischen Ostwanderungen (n.p., n.d.-1955) 368; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1922 f. and 2183-99 passim.

Nachtigal, Abraham (1876-1950), a leading Mennonite Brethren minister, was born May 11, 1876, in Franzthal, South Russia, the son of Peter Nachtigal. He studied with Kornelius Unruh (q.v.) in Orloff, and supplemented his education by much reading. In Russia he was a member of the Allianz-Gemeinde (q.v.) in Lichtfelde and for 19 years its leading minister. He taught school a few years, and later served as manager of a Mennonite forestry (q.v.) service camp. As a gifted evangelist and youth worker he served both in Russia and Canada as an itinerant minister. In his home church he was valued as minister, Bible school teacher, and youth worker. Besides numerous articles in the church papers he published two booklets, Unter dem Kreuz and Gesegnete Spaziergänge eines Vaters mit seinem Vierzehnjährigen (Yarrow, 1947).

Nachtigal was married three times. His first wife was Mariechen Warkentin; this union was blessed with eight children. After her death he married Frida Noeg, with whom he had five children. Anna Dick became his third wife. The family came to Canada in 1924. After a year's stay in Ontario they lived in Arnaud, Man., for eleven years, where he was the leading minister of the M.B. Church. In 1935 the family moved to Yarrow, B.C., where Abraham Nachtigal died after a lengthy illness on Feb. 6, 1950. He was interred in the Yarrow cemetery. J.A.Ha.

Nachtigal, Peter (1881-1928), a Mennonite missionary, was born at Gnadenfeld in South Russia on May 13, 1881, received his training at the Johanneum at Barmen and in Rotterdam, was sent out by the Dutch Mennonite Missionary Society on Oct. 17, 1911. He took charge of the station at Pakantan in Sumatra (q.v.), serving with unusual success until his premature death on Jan. 5, 1928. His post was not filled after his death. His widow is living on the Lautenbacherhof, Württemberg, Germany. Neff.

De Zondagsbode XLII (1927-28) No. 11, p. 48; Brieven 1928, II; 80ste Jaarverslag (annual report of 1927 of the Dutch Missionary Association) 15-18; ML III, 196.

Nadler (Ritter), Hans, an Anabaptist preacher of Erlangen, whose trade was selling needles to shoemakers and tailors. He was baptized with his wife by Hans Hut (q.v.) in 1527, henceforth preaching wherever he went. He escaped imprisonment by flight to Moravia. In Nikolsburg he took part in a great Anabaptist meeting, at which 72 persons were baptized.

Nadler returned to Erlangen, was arrested there on Jan. 17, 1529, and cross-examined. In reply to the question why he was so bold as to keep returning to Erlangen he said God had given him the grace to return to his wife and children; he had never baptized, was not ordained to do so; his parents had indeed told him that he had been baptized, but he personally knew nothing of it; for he had been a child and had no understanding and knew nothing about faith; therefore he had himself baptized upon his faith. Concerning communion he said he did not believe that the body of Christ is in the bread, but one receives it in spirit. Concerning possessions he said that if they were used as Christ commanded, they could serve toward salvation. He would not act contrary to the government, for it is ordained of God. Concerning nonresistance he said, it is not the business of a Christian to fight. There were among them brethren who wanted all the brethren to lay down their arms, and he did so; but it was not a law of the brotherhood. He vigorously denied that they were instigating revolt; they should mutually show only love and faithfulness, offend no one, but do good to all. On Feb. 13, 1529, he was tried again, this time with torture. He remained true to his faith. Upon his request he was permitted to sell his property and move to Moravia with his wife and three children. Nothing more is known about him. Neff.

C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II (Leipzig, 1860) 281; TA Bayern I, 131-41; Wiswedel, Bilder II, 40-44; ML III, 196.

Naeldeman, leader of the "Franekeraars": see Hendrik (de) Naeldeman.

Naeldemansvolk were the followers of Hendrik Naeldeman (q.v.) at Franeker, Friesland. Here in 1556 a group of moderate Dutch Mennonites, who opposed the practice of strict marital avoidance (q.v.), disagreed with Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, Leenaert Bouwens, and other conservative leaders. They were also called "de nieuwe gemeente" (new congregation) or Franekeraars (Franickers). Soon they joined or merged with the Waterlanders (q.v.). At other places also mention is made of the "Hendrik-Naeldemansvolk," for example at Vlissingen (q.v.), where Cornelis de Compasmaker was said to be their leader. (BRN VII, 460, 464 f.; DB 1894, 36, 39.) vdZ.

Naeldenverkooper, Evert, an Anabaptist martyr: see Evert Hendricks.

Naenken (Naentgen, Adrienne) Bornaige, an Anabaptist martyr. Because of her Anabaptist conviction she had fled from Lier, Brabant, to Gent, Flanders, Belgium, where she soon was arrested and burned at the stake on April 11, 1551, with four other Anabaptists, all of Lier. On the way to the site of execution Naenken said, "This is the day for which I have so greatly longed." In the Offer des Heeren she is called simply Naenken. These martyrs from Lier are commemorated in the hymn, "Doemen vijftienhondert schreve, daertoe een en vijftich jaer," found in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. Neff, vdZ.

Offer, 517-21; Mart. Mir. D 106, E 503; Verheyden, Gent, 13, No. 23; Wolkan, Lieder, 61; ML III, 195.

Naentgen (Naenken) Leerverkoop(st)er, an Anabaptist martyr, listed by van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 244, E 618), who after trial on the rack was drowned with two sisters in a washtub at Antwerp on March 17 or 19, 1559. She is identical with Adriana Lambrechts (q.v.). Her name is found in the hymn, "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 in the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. (Offer, 566; ML II, 626.) vdZ.

Nafziger (Nafzger, Naffziger, Nafzinger, Naffzer, Naftziger, Nofziger, Noffsinger, Nofsker, Naftiger), a Mennonite name of Swiss origin, found in the 18th century in the Palatinate, where Johannes Nafziger (q.v.) was an elder of the Essingen congregation until about 1790, and in Alsace, where Christian Nafziger was an elder of the Froensberg congregation from 1765 until after 1810, while Christian Nafziger, Jr., was an elder of the Stroeter congregation from about 1765 until after 1810. In Hesse (q.v.) Hans Nafziger was a preacher in the district of Nassau-Weilburg 1786-*ca.*1815, and Peter Nafziger about the end of the 18th century on the Kammerhof in the principality of Darmstadt. A branch of the Nafzigers settled in Luxembourg early in the 19th century and furnished several preachers there, the last being Elder Christian Nafziger. Another branch settled in Bavaria about the same time, from which Christian Nafziger (q.v.) emigrated to Canada in 1826 to found the Amish Mennonite settlement in Wilmot Township, Waterloo County. Peter Nafziger (1789-1885) moved from here to Butler County, Ohio, in 1831, where he became a prominent bishop. John Naffziger (1802-56) immigrated from Lorraine in 1837 to the Metamora settlement in Woodford County, Ill., where he served as a bishop. Nafzigers have been numerous in the central Illinois Amish Mennonite settlement (especially Hopedale and Metamora), the Fulton County, Ohio, settlement, and in Butler County, Ohio. H.S.B.

Ernst Correll, "The Value of Family History for Mennonite History, with Illustrations from Nafziger Family Material," MQR II (1928) 66-79, 151-54, 198-205; Naamlijst.

Nafziger, Christian (1776-1836), a pioneer German Mennonite immigrant to Canada, stemmed from the Palatinate and settled for a time near Munich, Germany. He led the emigration of the Amish Mennonites to Canada, leaving in late 1821 to find a place of settlement in the New World. In January 1822 he landed in New Orleans and covered the 1,000 miles to Lancaster County on foot. The Lancaster Mennonites pointed out to him the settlement possibilities in Canada, where Pennsylvania Mennonites had already settled in 1796-1800 and after. In Waterloo County, Ont., he found a Mennonite settlement which impressed him favorably. In the summer of 1822 he made contact with the governor of Upper Canada, who put at his disposal for settlement a large tract of land west of Waterloo in Wilmot Township. Each family could acquire 150 acres, and in addition, free of charge, another 50 acres.

On his return trip to Germany Nafziger stopped in London to have the agreement with Governor Maitland ratified by George IV. In the next year the first Amish Mennonite families from Germany settled in Wilmot Township, including such names as Bechler, Brennemann, Gingerich, Burky, Goldschmidt, Kropf, and Moser. Nafziger himself did not emigrate to Canada until 1826, when some other Amish Mennonites of Bavaria came with him. In this group there were two ordained men, Bishop Peter Nafziger (1789-1885), who led the new congregation until 1831 and then moved to Butler County, Ohio, and Christian Steinmann (1792-1865). Christian Nafziger can be considered the pioneer of the many German emigrants to Canada in the following years. He died on May 5, 1836. Hege.

L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites in Ontario (Toronto, 1935); Heinz Lehmann, Das Deutschtum in Ostkanada (Stuttgart, 1931); ML III, 197.

Nafziger, Johannes (b. ca. 1706), an elder of the Amish congregation in Essingen near Landau in the Palatinate, Germany, supposedly spent his youth on the Mechtersheimerhof near Germersheim. The records in the archives in Karlsruhe mention him for the first time in 1738. He later moved to Essingen and leased an estate from the Baron of Dalsberg. He married Barbara Holly. In 1731 he was chosen preacher and then elder. He must have been a leader in the brotherhood. In 1765 he journeyed to the Netherlands with two other brethren, where some Swiss Amish had founded congregations. There were all kinds of disorder and strife to be regulated. They remained nine weeks to install new preachers and to make the observance of communion possible. These congregations needed help several times. In 1770 we find Johannes Nafziger again one of the delegates. Later a written directive for the regulation of congregational life was requested. On March 26, 1781, Nafziger complied with a long letter, in which he described the ceremonies of baptism, marriage, choice and ordination of preachers and deacons as he practiced them. This letter appears to have become a sort of ministers' manual for the Amish congregations in South Germany, for several copies made at a later time have been preserved in the Goshen College Library.

Nafziger was active in the publication of the Martyrs' Mirror (q.v.) in 1780 in Pirmasens. On Sept. 16, 1778, he wrote a letter to Peter Weber of Kindenheim which reports the details of the contract with the printer and the copper plates he obtained from Amsterdam for the illustrations. "We hope it will by the grace of God be a beautiful book," he says at the close of the letter, which gives evidence of his business acumen.

The closing years of Nafziger's life were clouded by a most noteworthy instance of intolerance on the part of the Catholic Church. He was the elder who baptized the two girls mentioned in the article Punishment. The girls were to be punished by death, and he with a fine of 500 florins and exile. Nothing further is known about the execution of the sentence, nor of the date or place of Nafziger's death. P.S.

Chr. Neff, "Eine Bekehrungsgeschichte," Gem.-Kal., 1906, 54-78; Ernst Correll, "The Value of Family History for Mennonite History: Illustrated from Nafziger Family History Material of the Eighteenth Century," MQR II (1928) Nos. 1, 2, and 3; "An Amish Church Discipline of 1781," op. cit. (1930) No. 2; ML III, 197 f.

Nafziger Old Order Amish Church, located in Mornington Twp., Perth Co., Ont. About 1903 some differences arose in the Mornington Old Order Amish Church at Poole, which resulted in some of the ministers and some of the lay members withdrawing under the leadership of Bishop Nicholas Nafziger (ordained 1896, d. 1944). In 1904 the group supporting Nafziger built a meetinghouse west of the corner at Poole. Services are held every Sunday in the German language with singing from the Ausbund. This congregation is not connected with any conference. They have no Sunday schools and no evening meetings. The membership in 1954 was 154, and the congregation consisted of 56 families and 234 worshipers. The first ministers besides Nafziger were Peter Spenler and John Albrecht. John Gerber (ord. 1909, d. 1929), from West Branch, Mich., joined this group in 1924. Samuel Nafziger, son of Bishop Nicholas, was ordained minister in 1933. Moses Nafziger, nephew of Nicholas, was ordained minister in 1933 and bishop in 1940. Valentine Gerber (d. 1928), ordained minister in Holt Co., Neb., was in his later life connected with this congregation. The present leadership consists of Moses Nafziger, bishop; Samuel Nafziger and Joseph Steckley, ministers; and Jonas Jantzi, deacon. An account of the Amish Mennonites in Canada was given in the John Baer German Almanac in 1903. J.C.F.

Nagar Kurnool, a Mennonite Brethren Mission station in India located near the large village Nagar Kurnool, 80 miles south of Hyderabad, Andhra Pradesh (formerly Hyderabad State). Sanction for possession of the site and permission to erect the buildings was procured by D. F. Bergthold in 1907. The buildings constructed include a missionary's dwelling house, a church and school building, hostels for school children, a hospital, and living quarters for indigenous workers.

Resident missionaries at this station have been Mr. and Mrs. D. F. Bergthold, Mr. and Mrs. F. A. Janzen, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Lohrenz, Mr. and Mrs. J. N. C. Hiebert, Dr. Katharina L. Schellenberg, Catherine Reimer, Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Kasper, and Mary Doerksen. The missionaries in 1951 were Mildred Enns and Rosella Toews.

The work at the station includes the regular worship services and other activities of the church; a school, which for some time was a middle school, but in recent years only a primary school; and a hospital. For some time the mission press and publication activities were centered here. In 1923-29 the Bible School of the Mission was located at Nagar Kurnool. The station field, comprising an area of 1400 square miles and having 200,000 inhabitants, has been a responsive field for evangelism. At present the indigenous church numbers over 1,000 members. (ML III, 198.) J.H.L.

Nagtegaal, a Mennonite family found since at least the 18th century on the Dutch island of Ameland (q.v.), where the descendants are still serving as deacons. The Nachtigal family found in Russia and America and formerly in Prussia may be related to this Dutch family. vdZ.

Nairn Amish Mennonite Church, located 3 miles south of Ailsa Craig, and about 20 miles northeast of London, Middlesex Co., Ont., a member of the Ontario A.M. Conference, was organized in 1949 with 20 members under the leadership of Wilfred Schlegel. In 1947 the congregation bought a well-built Presbyterian church, seating capacity 350. In 1955 the membership was 63, with Wilfred Schlegel still serving as pastor. W.Sc.

Nalgonda, a Baptist mission station in India, 60 miles from Hyderabad, was founded in 1890 by a Mennonite from Russia named Abraham Friesen (q.v.), who had been a student in the Baptist seminary in Hamburg, Germany, on behalf of the Baptist Missionary Union of Boston. For a considerable time it was maintained by the Mennonite Brethren in Russia. In 1897, when Friesen left on a furlough trip to Russia, the congregation among the Telegus numbered 700 members. Other Mennonite Brethren of Russia volunteered to serve as missionaries in this work of evangelization with Friesen. In 1898 Abraham Hübert came to the field, followed in 1899 by Heinrich Unruh, and in 1904 by Cornelius Unruh and Johann Wiens. About 1912 J. A. Penner went to India; in 1940 he was still in Mahbubnagar. An agreement was reached by which the Mennonite Brethren of Russia would be responsible for the total expenses of evangelization, and the Baptist Union for the expenses of youth work and the care of the sick.

The development of the Nalgonda Mission encouraged the Mennonite Brethren in America to open a mission station in India. As early as 1884 they had offered the Baptist mission a sum of money for the education of a native preacher. Since they had raised a larger sum than necessary for this purpose, they organized a Missions Committee in 1885 to take care of these surplus funds. As the missionary opportunities expanded, it was decided at a conference meeting in Reno County, Kan., to establish an independent mission in the same general area of Nalgonda in India, which was founded with the arrival of the first missionaries Oct. 27, 1899.

HEGE.

J. F. Harms, Geschichte der Mennoniten-Brüdergemeinde (Hillsboro, 1924); A. H. Unruh, Die Geschichte der Mennoniten-Brüdergemeinde 1860-1954 (Winnipeg, 1954); G. W. Peters, The Growth of Foreign Missions in the Mennonite Brethren Church (Hillsboro, 1952); ML III, 198.

Namaka Mennonite Brethren Church, located three miles south of Namaka, Alberta, formerly a member of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Conference, but since 1942 a member of the Canadian M.B. District Conference, was organized in 1927 with 30 members. The church was built in 1932. The presiding minister of this church 1927-47 was A. A. Toews. Other ministers were A. P. Willms, G. Dirks, A. G. Martens, Heinrich Klassen, and C. Penner. The presiding minister in 1955 was Gerhard Dirks, and the membership was 34. A.A.T.

Namenbüchlein: see A-B-C Books.

Namensverzeichnis der sämtlichen remonstrantischen Gemeinden in und ausserhalb der Batavischen Republik. Veränderte Ausgabe vom Jahre 1802 (Danzig) is the German edition of the Dutch Naamlijst (q.v.) of 1802. A corrected edition with the same title appeared in 1805. In spite of imperfections this book has value even today. The appendix has a brief biography of Menno Simons. It closes with an index of places.

In 1823 an entirely new list was published in Danzig, Namensverzeichnis der Aeltesten und Lehrer der mennonitischen Gemeinen in Süd-, Ost-, Westpreussen, Lithauen und Polen, nebst derjenigen in Russland und in den neu angesiedelten Kolonien (1823 Danzig), reprinted in 1835 with a changed title, by Agathon Wernich in Elbing. The preface states, "This edition contains, in accord with the decision adopted at Marienburg on Sept. 18, 1834, the names of the congregations found in East and West Prussia, Lithuania, Poland, and in the German settlements of the Russian Empire; and the names of the elders, preachers, and deacons, with the towns or districts where they reside, in order that this book may if necessary be used as an address book." It is a very valuable list.

A new edition of this list was issued in 1843; the fourth edition followed in 1857 in Danzig with the altered title, Namensverzeichniss der in Deutschland, Ost- und Westpreussen, Galizien, Polen und Russland befindlichen Mennoniten-Gemeinden sowie ihrer Aeltesten, Lehrer und Vorsteher (1857, Danzig). It contains a preface signed by J. Mannhardt (q.v.) in the name of the elders and preachers of the West Prussian congregations, which expresses regret for the incompleteness of the list; the congregations in Alsace and Crefeld had not sent the requested information. Hence blank spaces were left in the book for the insertion of entries. This register contains the names of the elders, preachers, and deacons of Prussia, Hesse, Bavaria, Baden, Galicia, Poland, and Russia. A fifth edition appeared in 1881.

The Jahrbuch der altevangelischen taufgesinnten Mennoniten-Gemeinden (q.v.) of 1883 and 1888, published by H. G. Mannhardt, does not contain a register of congregations in West Prussia nor those in Switzerland, France, and Poland. A list of preachers and congregations in Holland is contained in the Jaarboekje (q.v.). The Mennonitischer Gemeinde-Kalender (1892-) publishes a list of ministers in Germany, Switzerland, and France. A list of preachers and congregations in Russia appeared in 1905 with the title, Statistik der Mennonitengemeinden in Russland (Appendix to the Mennonitisches Jahrbuch 1904-5). The Mennonite Yearbook and Directory (q.v.) publishes an annual list of all the Mennonite ministers in North America, including Europe and South America in recent years. The Meeting Calendar of All the Mennonite Churches in Eastern Pennsylvania, appearing annually since at least 1880, contains a complete directory of all ordained men in the three easternmost conferences of the Mennonite Church (MC). All individual denominational or conference yearbooks contain a directory of ministers and congregations. (ML III, 198 f.) NEFF.

Names Given to the Anabaptists-Mennonites in the Netherlands. Besides the names used by the Dutch Mennonites themselves like Doopsgezinden (q.v.) and Mennisten (q.v.; also Menisten, Benisten), Mennonisten, Mennonieten, there were from the very beginning of Anabaptism in the Netherlands a large number of group names. The first Anabaptists called themselves Bondgenooten or Vrienden. By their opponents, both Catholic and Reformed even as late as the 17th century, they were usually called Wederdopers. After the various schisms there were the names Waterlanders, Vlamingen (Flemish), Oude Vlamingen, Groninger Oude Vlamingen, Dantziger Oude Vlamingen, Vriezen (Friezen), Oude or Harde Vriezen, Jonge or Zachte Vriezen, Hoogduitsers (High German Mennonites) or Overlanders, in the 17th century Lamisten and Zonisten, Grove and Fijne Mennisten. Often the names of the different branches or local groups were derived from a leading person: Melchiorieten (from Melchior Hofmann), Davidjoristen (after David Joris), Adamieten (after Adam Pastor), Obbiten (after Obbe Philipsz), Batenburgers (after Jan van Batenburg), Dirckisten (after Dirk Philipsz; the variant Dreckisten is an unkind corruption of the name Dirckisten), Naeldemansvolk (group), Thomas Bintgensvolk, Jacob Keestvolk, Jan Jacobszvolk, or Janjacobsgezinden, Pieter Jeltjesvolk, Vermeulensvolk (after Jacob Pieters van der Meulen), Robbert Robbertszvolk, Jan Evertsvolk, Twisken (after Pieter Jansz Twisck), Uckowallisten (after Uko Walles), Galenisten (after Galenus Abrahamsz), Apostoolsen (after Samuel Apostool), Foppe-Onesvolk, Lausomsgemeente, Jan Schellingwousvolk.

Stilstaanders, Zierikzeeërs, and Neutralisten are the names given to the Mennonites who refused to take sides in the Flemish-Frisian conflict in 1566. Huiskopers and Contra-Huiskopers are denominational designations given to some Flemish groups. Bekommerden and Heylsamen are found in Friesland and Danzig. Bevredigden and Afgedeelden are two groups of Mennonites in North Holland in the early 17th century. Meerlanders are Hutterites; Wevers mean the followers of Hans Busschaert de Wever; Franickers or Franekers were Waterlanders, as was also the Nieuwe Gemeente (BRN VII, 460, 464 f.); Blaauwe Schuur-Menisten are the Waterlanders at Harlingen and Nes, Ameland; Voetwassers were found in the province of Zeeland, Komejannen, being a branch of the Waterlanders, in North Holland; the meaning of the denominations Hamersch (DB 1897, 103, note) and Russchers (DB 1877, 34) is unknown. For Tibben, a denomination found in Groningen and Overijssel, see the article. The names Kleyn Hoopken and Allerkleinste Hoopken are names assumed by a few conservative separate congregations who did not want to have any connections with other congregations.

Formerly there circulated also a number of nicknames or contemptuous terms, given to the Mennonites by the non-Mennonite population, or by opposing Mennonite branches. The following are known: Swermers (Schwärmer, fanatics) or Rotgeesten (mobsters) (BRN VII, 238), Winkelpredikers (corner preachers), Dreckwagen (garbage cart), the name given by Leenaert Bouwens to the moderate Waterlanders; Bankroetiers, Borstentasters, Clerckschen (Clarichen), Sandtdooperen (BRN VII, 461, called thus after the tumultuous occurrences at 't Zandt), Maliapen (DB 1872, 32), Nieuwe Jeruzalemmers (after Münster, the new Jerusalem), Tibben, Eyckenplancken (DB 1897, 79), Reinen (clean ones), Stroopslikkers (syrup-lickers), Koekvreters (cake eaters), Sloddermenisten (BRN VII, 20, grubby Mennonites, meaning uncertain), Vuile Goten (DB 1877, 34, dirty gutters; this expression probably was derived from the old doctrine of Incarnation as taught by Melchior Hofmann and Menno Simons, that Christ had passed through Maria as water through a pipe), Olieblokken (DB 1877, 34, obviously after the meetinghouse Den Vlaemschen Oly-Block at Haarlem).

A. Montanus, Kerkelijke Historie van Nederland (1671), p. 197, enumerates the following names of the Dutch Mennonites: Mennisten, Huttieten, Hoogduitschen, Zwitserschen, Apostolischen, Separatisten, Oude en Jonge Friesen, Vlamingen, Voetwasschers, Borstentasters (or Borstenslagers), Haken-en-Oogen, Zwaardgeesten, Stilzwijgenden, Neutralisten, Huiskoopers, Contra-Huiskoopers, Franekers, Gooischen, Zuiveren, Libertisten, Hoterschen, Augustianen, Waterlanders, de Drekwagen, Leonard-Klokschen, Claes-Woltersensvolk, Harde and Slappe Friezen, Collegianten, Hollanders or Pieter-Jansvolk, Afvallige Vlamingen, Groningers or Jan-Lucasvolk, Jacob Pieters Vermolensvolk, Vincent de Hondtsvolk, Hendrik Dirks Apeldoornsvolk, Robbert Robertszvolk, Bevende Broeders. This list obviously is very uncritical; not all "collegianten" were Mennonites, and "Bevende Broeders" apparently were Quakers and not Mennonites. vdZ.

Names, Mennonite, of Persons and Places. Quite frequently one hears the remark, "That is a Mennonite name," or "That is not a Mennonite name." This indicates that there are specific names considered to be "Mennonite." This is one of the characteristics of Mennonites of various countries and areas. They have perpetuated not only certain family names and given names, but also names of settlements, villages, institutions, etc. Many names of European origin have been transplanted to North and South America.

Family Names. Because of their withdrawal from the world, enforced by persecution and their principle of nonconformity, Mennonites have in certain countries perpetuated their faith and traditions within the group into which very few "outsiders" found entrance. At times conversion to the Mennonite faith and intermarriage with outsiders were almost completely absent for generations. This was true among the Swiss, German, and Dutch Mennonites in the past and is true today among the Swiss, French, South German, Russian, and American Mennonites almost to the same degree, although intermarriage is more common in our day than it was heretofore. Among the Mennonites of the Netherlands and North Germany this isolation has been given up long ago. Scarcely any Mennonite family names of the 16th century are found among the Mennonites of the Netherlands today. One reason is that during the 16th and early 17th centuries there were hardly any family names in existence in Holland in general. Instead, in addition to the given name a person retained his father's given name. Thus "Menno" added to his name "Simonsz" which meant that he was Simons' son. Menno's son in turn would add "Mennosz" to his given name. Not until the second quarter of the 17th century were family names handed down from generation to generation. In many cases the father's given name became the family name. Thus Peter Claasz became Peter Claassen; Jakob Friesz became Jakob Friesen; Abraham Dirksz became Abraham Dirksen, etc. Of these original Dutch Mennonite family names, which really were "petrified" given names, very few have survived in the Netherlands. This is mostly due to the fact that the Dutch Mennonites gave up the principle of isolation and nonconformity nearly 200 years ago. In the process of adjustment, intermarriage with non-Mennonites was so frequent and common that few of the original "Mennonite" names survived within the Mennonite fold. Also in modern times many "liberal" elements have transferred from the Dutch Reformed Church to the Mennonite Church bringing new family names into the brotherhood. The same is true in such German congregations as Crefeld and Emden.

However, among the Mennonites of Prussia, Danzig, and Poland and their descendants in Russia and America, the 16th- and particularly the 17th-century Mennonite names have survived in large numbers. It is true that many new names were added in Prussia and Danzig which by now are also considered full-fledged "Mennonite" names. Many of the names ending in "ski" or "sky" are definitely of Polish origin (Sawatsky, Tillitzki, Schepansky, Koslowsky, etc.). In some instances the original name may have been changed by accepting the Polish ending. On the other hand, some of the older names died out and cannot be found either in Europe or America. A study made by Franz Crous reports a very interesting study on the frequency of the most common Mennonite family names among the Mennonites of Germany. He reports for East Germany 454 names in 15 congregations in the following order of frequency of baptized bearers of the name down to 100: Penner 469, Wiebe 388, Wiens 363, Dyck 281, Claassen 263, Klaassen 190, Pauls 190, Harder 188, Bartel 185, Janzen 180, Janz 178, Froese 170, Reimer 165, Franz 156, Neufeld 154, Enss 144, Thiessen 133, Friesen 121, Wiehler 120, Fieguth 112, Ewert 110, Fast 108, Regier 107, Driedger 105, Albrecht 104. In Northwest Germany he found 660 names in 9 congregations, of whom only 19 had more than 10 bearers, the first ten being: von Beckerath 45, van Delden 32, Fast 24, Brons 23, Penner 21, Claassen 21, Fieguth 20, Stroink 20, van der Smissen 17, Kruse 15. South Germany had 478 names in 40 congregations; following were the leading names in order of frequency: Schmutz 154, Hege 149, Krehbiel 121, Fellmann 119, Horsch 108, Stauffer 107, Schowalter 98, Landes 98, Eymann 87, Lichti 86, Hertzler 79, Musselmann 70, Dettweiler 69, Hirschler 68, Weber 67, Galle 60, Lehman 55, Bachmann 54, Guth 54, Blickensdorfer 53, Beutler 52, Funk 52.

From Prussia, Poland, and Russia these names were transplanted starting in 1874 to the Great Plains of North America and again after each of the world wars to North America as well as South America. The Swiss-South German names were in a similar way transplanted from Switzerland, France, South Germany, Volhynia, and Galicia to Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and other states during the many waves of migrations beginning in the 18th century. A statistical study of the frequency of the American Mennonite names has not been made. C. Henry Smith in The Story of the Mennonites lists names peculiar to certain settlements in America. The genealogies (q.v.) and family histories (q.v.) are a source information regarding family names. The more frequent Mennonite family names have all been treated in the MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA.

The total of different traditional family names among the Mennonites of Europe, exclusive of Holland and the newer families in Emden and Crefeld, has been determined to be about 600. Of these, 167 names of Swiss-South German origin, and 105 names of West Prussian and Northwest German origin are treated in this ENCYCLOPEDIA, in addition to most of the 15 Hutterite family names. The article Amish (ME I, 97) lists 100 Amish family names.

Given Names. Besides the patronymic system of names, the given names were primarily names taken from the Bible like those of the Puritans and other religious groups. Among the Russian Mennonites there were certain cycles and traditions according to which the same names would be repeated in the family. The oldest son would be named after the father or grandfather, and the oldest daughter after the mother or grandmother. The succeeding children would be named after uncles and aunts. The Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church record, started in Germany during the 17th century and continued in Russia and Kansas, is an interesting source of information on this practice. During 1695-1799 (Prussia), 921 given names were checked. This list contained only 40 different names, all the others being repeated. Heading the list of male members in frequency was Peter (90), followed by Jakob (74). Among the female names, Ancke (Anna) ranked highest (107) with Marike (Maria) following (79). The names still had a Dutch ending, indicating the cultural and linguistic adherence to their background. In 1860-75 (Russia), among the 1,328 Alexanderwohl names checked there were only 54 different given names, which indicates the unbroken tradition of repeating the same names in the family. The names had become Germanized. Peter still ranked highest (118), followed by Heinrich (116) and Jakob (98). Maria (143) was now more frequent than Anna (101), after which Helena (95) followed. After the Alexanderwohl congregation had moved to Kansas in 1874 great adjustments were made to the new environment. How rapidly they were made is indicated by the change in given names. In 1919-25, 175 names were checked, of which 109 were different. Entirely new German and English names had been added, very few of which are repeated. A complete adjustment was made by the time World War II ended. Of the 168 names checked of the children born 1945-53 there appear 122 different names, most of which are typically American names rather than Bible names. Hardly any are repeated more than two or three times and most of them appear only once. Most popular was "Clifford." At the end of the alphabet was "Zyleene."

Although no other American Mennonite church has a record of over 200 years it can safely be assumed that the changes which have taken place in given names are very much the same. The Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church has always been one of the more conservative Mennonite congregations. It can be assumed that some others have made this adjustment much more rapidly. On the other hand, such groups as the Amish, the Hutterites, and the Old Colony Mennonites still perpetuate the tradition of giving their children only the Biblical names commonly in use in their circle. In South America Spanish influences are beginning to be noticeable in the choice of given names, while in Russia it had already become a practice in some circles before World War I to add Russian endings to the given names. Since World Wars I and II Russian names have become very frequent. Another Russian practice accepted by the Mennonites of Russia was the adding of the father's given name to the bearer's given name somewhat similar to the original Dutch practice. P. M. Friesen would be called Peter Martinovitch Friesen, Martin being the given name of his father.

Settlement and Village Names. The Mennonite settlement (colony) names, particularly in Russia, were frequently the name of the river on which they were located (Chortitza, Molotchna, Kuban, etc.), or the owner from whom the settlement had been bought (Ignatyevo), the province in which they were located (Orenburg, Samara), or the name of the Russian town or village next to which they were located (Arkadak, etc.). In North and South America the selection of a name for a settlement was somewhat different. In Manitoba the name for the largest two settlements was derived from the fact that the government "reserved" the land for the Mennonites to the east and west of the Red River, and therefore the names "East Reserve" and "West Reserve" originated. In Saskatchewan the two large Mennonite settlements received their name from the nearest large places at which the Mennonites settled, "Hague settlement" and "Swift Current settlement." These in turn were transplanted by the migrants to Mexico next to the "Manitoba" settlers of Mexico. In the United States there are few Mennonite settlements consisting of a larger group of villages in existence since the immigrants settled on individual farms. The Alexanderwohl (q.v.) settlement with a number of villages was an exception. In Mexico, Paraguay, Uruguay, and Brazil the Mennonites have perpetuated the tradition of establishing themselves in a compact settlement. The major settlements of Paraguay are Menno (q.v.), Fernheim (q.v.), Friesland (q.v.), Volendam (q.v.), and Neuland (q.v.). In Brazil the name "Witmarsum" and in Paraguay "Friesland" indicate that the settlers wished to emphasize their Dutch background.

The Mennonites of Prusso-Russian background have been most loyal in perpetuating village names from Prussia to Russia and to the Great Plains of North America and Mexico and South America. Some of the names have been repeated in many of the settlements established by them. A complete study of this will appear under the article Village Names. C.K.

Reimer, Familiennamen; Franz Crous, "Mennonitenfamilien in Zahlen," Gesch.-Bl., August 1940; Herbert Wiebe, "Mennonitische Familiennamen in den Weichselniederungen von Graudenz bis Thorn," Gesch.-Bl., August 1939; Mel Voth, "Given Name Changes in the Alexanderwohl Community" (a research paper, BeCL, 1954).

Nampa, a city (pop. 17,500) located in Canyon Co., Idaho, in the southwestern part of the state, about 30 miles from the Oregon line. The average rainfall is only approximately 11 inches, but irrigation provides moisture for growing crops. About 140 Mennonites (MC) live in this area, 60 per cent of whom are farmers. David Garber was the first Mennonite to arrive here, coming in February 1899. Others soon followed and in the same year the Nampa Mennonite Church (q.v.) was organized by George R. Brunk, Sr. The present membership is made up of families from practically every state where Mennonites are found, with a few added from the community. The congregation operates two mission Sunday schools. A congregation of General Conference Mennonites lives around Caldwell, eight miles northwest of Nampa. The Nampa Mennonite Christian Day School is owned and controlled by the local Mennonite church (MC). The average enrollment is about 60, with a corps of three teachers. E.S.G.

Nampa Mennonite Children's Home. In the fall of 1939 the city welfare representative asked the Mennonite Church (MC) of Nampa to provide a home for a family of five girls. A member of the congregation agreed to furnish living quarters if the congregation would help support the project. This they agreed to do. This group of five children formed the nucleus from which the children's home grew, until at one time there were 19 children. In the winter of 1947 the Pacific Coast Conference Mission Board assumed responsibility for the home. It was discontinued in 1950. R.E.G.

Nancy, capital (pop. 121,000) of the former province of Lorraine, a city in the department of Meurthe-et-Moselle (q.v.), in northeastern France. In the second half of the 18th century some Mennonites located in the vicinity of the city. The Mennonites had been expelled from Alsace by Louis XIV in 1712; many of them turned to Lorraine, which was at that time not a part of France. Several families had also settled on farms in the bishopric of Metz, and lived there unmolested, since they were considered Swiss.

In 1766, when Lorraine became French, Louis XV inquired about the Mennonites. Since the reports were favorable, they were left in peace until the Revolution brought freedom of religion to all.

The families lived widely scattered on isolated farms and mills; they met as a congregation in the homes of the more prosperous members. As is often the case with small groups, they were subject to disintegrating influences and the congregation declined steadily. The union of part of the congregation with Lunéville-Dieuze (q.v.) in 1893 did not stem the decline. In World War I the congregation was in the zone of battle. Meetings were disrupted. The elders of the congregation died during or right after the war; the congregation was unable to organize again. Although there are still several families in the city and the vicinity, there have been no services there since the war. The MCC operated a children's home at Nancy in 1945-50. (ML III, 199.) P.So.

Nanlo, a county in southern Hopei province, China, with an area of 350 square miles and population estimated at 221,000. Mission work was begun in 1920 by the General Conference Mennonite Board of Missions. A primary school and an organized church established at Nanlo City, as well as ten or twelve regular preaching places in the country, were cared for by an evangelist, a schoolteacher, and a Bible woman, with the help of missionaries and itinerant workers. Mission buildings were occupied by the Japanese military forces in 1938 and the work badly disrupted and forced to discontinue in 1942, though the Chinese church continued active. S.F.P.

Napajedl (Napayerle, Napeürl), a market town (pop. 4,700) on the March River in Moravia, in the 16th century in the possession of the barons of Zierotin. The Hutterite chronicles state that "Sir Paul" in 1545 "gave the Hutterian Brethren two houses to try for a year." But conditions were not favorable, and they moved away at the end of the year. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 164; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 201; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 258; ML III, 199.

Napier Mennonite Church (GCM), located three miles east of Schellsburg, Pa., a member of the Eastern District Conference, was organized June 22, 1913, with Herman Snyder as the first pastor. The church originated as a home mission project and became a self-supporting church in May 1955. The membership in 1956 was 86. Leon Detweiler served as pastor for a number of years. Other pastors were Jacob Snyder, Stephen Yoder, Adam Wolfe, Jacob Yoder, Andrew R. Shelly, Willard Claassen, George Gregor, Walter M. Wolfe. Donald Janis was serving as interim pastor in 1956. P.R.S.

Napoleon I, Emperor of France 1804-15, rescinded the exemption of the Mennonites from military service in the lands under his dominion. He generally, though not always, permitted them to employ substitutes, but since it was very expensive to hire one very few could do it.

The Mennonites of the Palatinate and Rhenish Hesse tried in vain to maintain their principle of nonresistance. At the momentous conferences in Ibersheim (q.v.) in 1803 and 1805 this was expressly stated. The latter conference passed a resolution to observe a day of fasting, penitence, and prayer. Möllinger (q.v.), pastor of the Ruchheim (Palatinate) congregation, was sent to Paris to appeal to Napoleon in person, but he was not given audience. The Mennonites had to render military service.

On June 19, 1808, a conference of the elders and preachers of the Mennonites of Alsace-Lorraine meeting on the Bildhäuserhof near Schlettstadt decided to send two brethren to Paris on a similar mission (see Donnersberg and Alsace). They presented an interesting document requesting the privilege of serving in the transportation corps. If the statement of Elder Augsburger of the Salm congregation is correct, this petition was granted (see France).

In 1810, when the Netherlands were incorporated into the French empire, Napoleon interfered with the Dutch churches. They were compelled to subscribe to state loans, which caused the loss of large sums, since the loans soon became valueless. In consequence, most congregations were unable to pay the salaries of their ministers. An indirect result of this financial deterioration was the founding of the Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit (q.v.) in 1811, since the congregation of Amsterdam was no longer able to support the Seminary. A futile attempt was made by Napoleon to unite all the Protestant churches of the Netherlands, including the Mennonites, into one single Protestant church.

Another project, viz., to organize the Mennonite congregations into one body, which was to contact the government by six "corresponding congregations," i.e., Amsterdam, Haarlem, Harlingen, Leeuwarden, Groningen, and Zwolle, was only committed to paper, but never really came into being (see Naamlijst 1815, 58-61; Biogr. Wb. III, 783).

The Mennonite congregations were compelled to ask Napoleon's consent whenever they called a new minister, and in 1812, when Rinse Koopmans (q.v.) was chosen professor of the Amsterdam Seminary, his appointment had to be approved by Napoleon, but since the approval failed to come, he could not officially take up his office until June 8, 1814. The order that each minister had to have his sermon approved before it was preached was generally disregarded.

The order that Mennonites serve in the French armies was also usually evaded, though a number of young Mennonites were seized and compelled to go to Paris as imperial guards, and even to serve in the Grand Army on its march into Russia in 1812. A number of young Mennonites in the Palatinate were drafted into Napoleon's army and also served on the march into Russia in 1812. Neff, vdZ.

W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Danzig, 1863); Naamlijst 1815, 58, 59, 62, 64, 69 f.; Biogr. Wb. III, 783; DB 1872, 126; 1912, 112; ML III, 199 f.

Nappanee, a town (pop. 3,800) in the southwestern part of Elkhart Co., Ind., in a very fertile section of farming land. A collection center of the Brethren Service Relief and the E.V. Publishing House, the headquarters of the Brethren in Christ Church, are located here. Of the 13 churches within the city, three are Mennonite, namely, North Main St. (MC), First Mennonite (GCM), and United Missionary. The first Mennonites to settle in Locke and Union townships in which Nappanee is located came about 1857-60. There are also two churches of the Conservative Mennonites and nine districts of Old Order Amish in the territory surrounding Nappanee. H.F.N.

Nappanee First Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Nappanee, Ind., first known as the Amish Mennonite Church and later as the West Market Street Mennonite Church, is a member of the Middle District Conference. Before 1923 the congregation was a member of the Mennonite Church (MC). The congregation was organized in 1875 after groups of settlers had met for worship in homes and schoolhouses since 1853. The first meetinghouse was erected in 1878, rebuilt in 1910, and remodeled in 1926 and 1955, a frame structure with a seating capacity of about 250. In 1955 the membership was 164, with Earl L. Salzman as pastor. J.J.En.

Nappanee (Ind.) United Missionary Church was organized April 3, 1897, under the leadership of Daniel Brenneman. In 1957 the congregation had 74 members, with L. L. Rassi serving as pastor. R.McB.

Nassau, until 1866 an independent duchy of Germany, area 1,830 sq. mi., later a part of Hesse. As at the close of the Thirty Years' War Mennonites fleeing from Switzerland had been welcomed to rebuild the devastated land of the Palatinate (q.v.), so one hundred years later they were invited by Nassau to leave the Palatinate and settle in Nassau to raise the productivity of the few fertile sections. The Palatine Mennonites had been conspicuously successful in raising the agricultural level by means of new methods of farming and the use of fertilizers (Correll, 110, 115, 120 f.).

In 1710 the Duchess of Nassau still refused to receive Mennonite refugees from Switzerland, claiming that she was well provided with farmers (Müller, 289). But later regents welcomed farmers who understood the newer methods of agriculture and cattle raising. The Dutch Naamlijst of the years 1766-1802 names Bäntz Jungerich (Güngerich) as the elder of the Swiss Mennonites in Nassau-Siegen; the issue of 1793 names Peter Schanz as the elder of the congregation in Nassau-Weilburg. The great famine of 1770-72 became the occasion of the invitation given Palatine Mennonites to settle in Nassau. In the late 1770's several families from the region of Heidelberg and Mannheim rented estates in the vicinity of Wiesbaden and Usingen, where there was much wasteland. A leader among these Mennonites was Valentin Dahlem (q.v.), to whom Baron von Kruse, the head of the government, gave his estate near Wiesbaden in hereditary lease. After the increase in size of the country in 1803 and 1806 the Mennonites were assigned to the task of teaching the peasants. Very soon the ministers of state reported that the Mennonites were a good example to the people, that the cultivation of clover was improving the soil, that more land could be put under profitable cultivation, and that the cattle industry was thriving (Menn. Bl., 1895, 19).

The Mennonites in southern Nassau organized a congregation in 1790 with its seat in Wiesbaden. Valentin Dahlem was chosen preacher, who lived at first at Mosbach and later on the Koppensteinerhof near Wiesbaden. In 1830 the congregation was composed of fourteen families. Dahlem's influence extended beyond his immediate congregation. He is the author of the first formulary of the South German Mennonites, which was used in the congregations of the Palatinate and Hesse until 1852 and of Baden until 1876.

While the Wiesbaden congregation was coming into being, an Amish settlement was made in the northern and eastern parts of the country. Their members lived scattered over eight districts: Braubach, Dillenburg, Eltville, Idstein, Montabaur, Rennerod, Runkel, and St. Goarshausen. They held their services in the various homes of the members. About 1830 this congregation had a membership of 130 souls in 17 families (Menn. Bl., 1896, 36). The family names represented there were Bender, Ehrismann, Hochstätter, Nafziger, Quetsch, Schanz, Schlabach, Spring, Stähly, and Unzicker (Menn. Bl., 1896, 15 and 22). On May 21, 1867, the Amish preachers and elders in Hesse, the Palatinate, Rhenish Prussia, and Nassau met on the Offental estate to change their church regulations. They decided to let each member decide what position he would take on footwashing, nonresistance, and mixed marriages (Menn. Bl., 1867, 38-40). A part of this congregation emigrated to America, and the others lived so widely scattered that the congregation was dissolved. In 1881 its membership had declined to twenty-five. (See also Hesse-Nassau.) HEGE.

Ernst Correll, Das schweizerische Täufermennonitentum (Tübingen, 1925); Müller, Berner Täufer; C. Spielmann, "Die Mennoniten und ihre Bedeutung für die Kultur in Nassau," in Annalen des Vereins für nassauische Altertumskunde und Geschichtsforschung XXVI (1894), reprinted in Menn. Bl., 1895, 19-21, 27-29, 36 f.; W. Wittgen, "Die Mennoniten in Nassau, ihre Bedeutung für die Landwirtschaft," in "Die Landwirtschaft" Blätter für Landwirtschaft, Weinbau und Genossenschaftswesen (Wiesbaden, 1917) No. 17; J. Mannhardt, Verzeichnis (1881); ML III, 200 f.

Natalyevskaya, a volost in the Alexandrovsk district, Ekaterinoslav province, Ukraine, which had three Mennonite villages: Andreasfeld (Andrepol), Neuschönwiese (Dmitrovka), and Eugenfeld (Yakovlevo).

National Association of Evangelicals (N.A.E.), founded in 1944 as a conservative counterpart to the National Council of the Churches of Christ in America, representing some 3,000,000 American Christians belonging largely to the smaller, strictly orthodox evangelical denominations in the United States, the moderate wing of the Fundamentalist movement. From the beginning the Mennonite Brethren, the Evangelical Mennonites, and the Brethren in Christ have been denominational members. The N.A.E. has a series of subsidiary and affiliated organizations, to which its denominational members may or may not belong, as they individually decide. H.S.B.

J. D. Murch, Co-operation without Compromise, a History of the National Association of Evangelicals (Grand Rapids, 1956).

National Mental Health Foundation, Inc., established in May 1946, represented a layman's movement toward an improved, representative, and democratic mental health program, especially through stimulating research and providing information regarding the causes and prevention of mental afflictions and the needs and care of the mentally ill. The Mennonite Central Committee joined with the American Friends Service Committee and the Brethren Service Commission in helping to finance its operations. Orie O. Miller served on its Board of Directors until it dissolved, and various Mennonites filled key staff positions. On Sept. 13, 1950, it was merged with the National Committee for Mental Hygiene and the American Psychiatric Foundation into the National Association for Mental Health. It owed its origin largely to the stimulus provided by CPS men of Mennonite, Brethren, and Quaker connection, who had worked in mental hospitals and as a consequence got a vision of the need for a better type of care for the mentally ill. W.T.S.

National Service Board for Religious Objectors (NSBRO), a voluntary association of religious organizations, which acted and is still acting as spokesman for the churches and conscientious objectors to the Selective Service System in matters regarding the administration of the draft of conscientious objectors, was created on Nov. 26, 1940, as a merger of the short-lived National Council for Religious Objectors with the Civilian Service Board. The NCRO had been established on Oct. 11, 1940, by joint action of the Mennonite Central Committee, the American Friends Service Committee, and the Brethren Service Committee. The NSBRO Board of Directors was composed of seven members, representative of the above three groups and the Fellowship of Reconciliation, the Commission on World Peace of the Methodist Church, the Disciples of Christ, and—from 1942—Walter van Kirk of the Department of International Justice and Goodwill of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America. The Fellowship of Reconciliation in 1944 withdrew its membership to become only a consultative member, and in 1946 the Friends ceased to be active, ultimately withdrawing their membership. From 1946 on, the NSBRO was largely in the control of the Mennonites and Brethren. To enable other interested groups to share in the work of the NSBRO the Consultative Council was created by the Board of Directors on April 16, 1941. Ultimately 39 groups, largely denominational bodies, joined this council.

The function of the NSBRO was to serve as the liaison between the churches and other groups having conscientious objectors to military service among their members. Although it did not administer any Civilian Public Service (q.v.) projects or camps, it performed a very valuable service. It was not the sole channel to the National Selective Service office for those groups who administered CPS, since they could and did on occasion deal directly with Selective Service, but it nevertheless carried most of the liaison work. For this purpose it was organized into the following sections: Camp Section, Complaint Section, and Assignment Section. The Camp Section worked in connection with the selection of sites for CPS camps; the Complaint Section helped men who were not properly classified or were denied their claim to conscientious objector status; the Assignment Section was the channel for transmitting the assignment to the proper CPS camp for the CO's who were being drafted.

The NSBRO official publication is the Reporter, first issued as a monthly magazine in July 1942, then as a semimonthly from November 1942 to February 1946, and thereafter irregularly, usually as a 4-page journal 8½ x 11½ inches. Other mimeographed publications were the Camp Directors' Bulletin, which had reached issue No. 180 by June 1946, and the directors' General Letter to all CPS men, which was issued 164 times between December 1942 and August 1946. There were also numerous other bulletins and memoranda.

The first officers of the NSBRO Board of Directors were M. R. Zigler, chairman; Orie O. Miller, vice-chairman; Paul J. Furnas, treasurer; and Paul Comly French, executive secretary and director. French served until 1946. During most of this time J. N. Weaver, a Mennonite, was in charge of the Assignment Section. Additional members of the Board in the early days were Arthur L. Swift, Jr., Charles F. Boss, Jr., Walter W. van Kirk, and James A. Crain. With the transfer of M. R. Zigler to Geneva, Switzerland, in 1952, Orie O. Miller became the chairman and Harold Row, of the Brethren, vice-chairman. Ora M. Huston served for a time as executive director after Paul C. French's withdrawal in 1946. He was succeeded by A. Stauffer Curry, and he in turn by Leroy Doty, all of the Brethren. The headquarters of the NSBRO has always been in Washington, D.C.

The work of the NSBRO was much reduced after the discontinuance of the CPS camp system, but the resumption of the draft of CO's in 1950 made its continuance very desirable. It continues to play a vital role as the liaison with the National Selective Service headquarters in Washington.

The budget of the NSBRO was supplied by regular appropriations from the three Historic Peace Church service agencies, by contributions from members of the Consultative Council, and by general contributions solicited by the NSBRO office, which for some years had the valued service of Leroy Dakin for this purpose. H.S.B.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, 1949); Conscientious Objection, 2 vv. (Selective Service System, 1950).

Naubinway (Mich.) Mennonite Church (MC), located at the northern tip of Lake Michigan in the Upper Peninsula, is sponsored by the Indiana-Michigan District Mission Board. Work was begun there in 1943 by Clarence Troyer from a neighboring mission station. In 1946 Ora C. Wyse and family came from Midland, Mich., to carry on the work. Already some are in mission work in other fields and two are preparing for medical work. In 1947 an old Presbyterian church was bought, remodeled, and repaired with the help of a service unit and others. The membership in 1956 was 12, with O. C. Wyse as pastor. O.C.W.

Nauk, Martin (Marthin von Nockh, also Martin von Neck), of Deutschnofen in southern Tirol, Austria, an Anabaptist martyr, one of the Anabaptist leaders of Neumarkt (q.v.) in the Adige Valley. In November 1529 the authorities seized Wolfgang Stroel (Strölen) and his wife and Nauk's wife; Nauk escaped. This was reported to Ferdinand, who replied with two decrees, Nov. 27 and Dec. 9, 1529, that Stroel and his wife were to be taken to the criminal court, which would be held by the judge of Kaltern. Nauk's wife was to be spared until the birth of her child. Since the cross-examination of the Stroels revealed that they had been baptized by Michael Kneusser (Kürsner?), search should be made for him as the "principal" and also for the fugitive leaders Wolfgang of Moos and Martin Nauk of Deutschnofen. Nauk must have fallen into the hands of his pursuers in January 1530, for the Innsbruck authorities ordered that Martin Nauk and Benedikt Gamper (Campner, the former priest?) of Breitenberg should be examined further on some specified articles of faith. The report of the questioning stated that the two men were leaders and were said to have misled many people. They died as martyrs in Neumarkt. P.De.

Zieglschmid, Chronik, 74 f.; Mart. Mir. D does not list Nauk, E 435 f.; ML III, 201.

Naumenko Mennonite Brethren Church, a subsidiary of the Einlage M.B. Church (q.v.), in the Naumenko (Petrovka) Mennonite settlement, province of Kharkov, South Russia, was founded in 1889 by emigrants from the Molotschna and Chortitza settlements who had settled on private land at Petrovka, Vassilyevka, Elenovka, and Barvenkovo. Gerhard Siemens of Neplyuevo was the leading minister. Later the ministers Abraham Pätkau and Johann Schellenberg of Yazykovo also served here. In 1905 the settlement had a population of 700 Mennonites, most of whom were members of this church.

At first the Naumenko M.B. Church seemed to flourish, especially economically, but soon suffered a serious reverse. Wilhelm Dyck, who later moved to Canada, David Klassen, Abram Martens, and Jacob Thiessen served the church until 1910. At this time Abr. Unruh of the Orloff Zentralschule and Jacob Froese, both living at Barvenkovo, also ministering to the church after 1910, extended their ministry to the Russian people and were as a result arrested and imprisoned, but were released in about one month. The M.B. Conference that was to be held at Naumenko at this time was forbidden by Russian authorities, and when the permission finally came from St. Petersburg it was too late.

Nothing definite seems to be known about this church after World War II and little about its fate during and after the Revolution. Some members left the settlement during the great westward move in World War II. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 450; ML III, 201.) P.H.B.

Naville, van de (van den Navyle, Naevijle, van den Avyle, Aville), a Mennonite family of French Flemish descent, in the 17th and 18th centuries found in the Dutch congregations of Aardenburg (DB 1877, 11; Jan van den Navyle was a deacon here 1657-79), Cadzand, Vlissingen, and Middelburg. Most of them were farmers. This family is apparently not related to the French Flemish de Neufville (q.v.) family. vdZ.

F. K. van Lennep, Verzameling van Oorkonden betrekking hebbend op het geschlacht Van Eeghen in Nederland (Amsterdam, 1918) see Index.

Nazarene is the name of a Christian denomination founded about 1840 in Hungary, whose adherents also called themselves "Disciples of Christ" and "Believers in Christ." The origin of the name Nazarenes can no longer be ascertained. Although the first men of the group were John Denkel and John Kropatchek, who were converted and baptized by Fröhlich in Zürich in the summer of 1839, Louis Hencsey can be considered as the real founder of this religious movement. He was baptized May 8, 1840, at Hauptwyl, canton of Thurgau, Switzerland. What he received here by way of religious life he proclaimed with fiery zeal in his native Hungary, and soon won numerous adherents. When he died in 1844 his brother and other gifted men like Joseph Bela and Stephan Kalmar continued his work. Kalmar founded the most influential Nazarene congregation in Pacser. The Nazarene group is identical with the Apostolic Christian Church (q.v.). It has no connection with the Church of the Nazarene in the United States.

The Nazarene doctrine is simple. The Bible is their only and absolute norm of religious knowledge. The reading of the Scriptures is considered an unquestioned duty; fulfilling its commands is the way of salvation. The principal command is to bear the cross for Christ's sake, and to practice self-denial and love. Absolute nonresistance, patient bearing of all insults, rejection of military service and the oath, and abstention from cursing, are among their principles. They baptize by immersion after the age of 18 years. The offices of the church consist of bishops, who draw no salary but depend entirely on voluntary offerings, evangelists, presbyters, teachers, singers, managers whose duty is to take care of the material aspects of church life, secretaries, and deacons who have charge of the care of the poor. On all of these points they are very close to the Mennonites. Direct contacts can, however, not be shown.

In 1848-78 the Nazarenes suffered severe persecution in Hungary. Since 1895 they have been tolerated in principle, although they were never granted exemption from military service and their young men were constantly sent to prison. Strife within the brotherhood led to its decline. In 1935 they numbered about 25,000 members. Their chief location was formerly near Szegedin in South Hungary, but they were also found in Transylvania, Austria, Jugoslavia, and Rumania. A few came to the United States locating in Ohio. Bela himself came to America in 1850. Information concerning their status in 1956 was not available. Neff, H.S.B.

G. Schwalm, in Jahrbücher für protestantische Theologie (1890); DB 1891, 67; 1904, 160 ff.; Menn. Bl., 1903, 55, where interesting letters are mentioned; Hermann Ruegger, Sr., Apostolic Christian Church History I (Chicago, 1949), which is the English edition of his Die Evangelisch Taufgesinnten (Zürich, 1948); Nazarenes in Jugoslavia (Syracuse, 1928), which is the English edition of a booklet prepared by C. Stäubli of Pfäfflikon-Zürich in March 1928, telling of the persecution of the Nazarenes in Jugoslavia in 1924-28 because of their refusal to accept military service; ML III, 201.

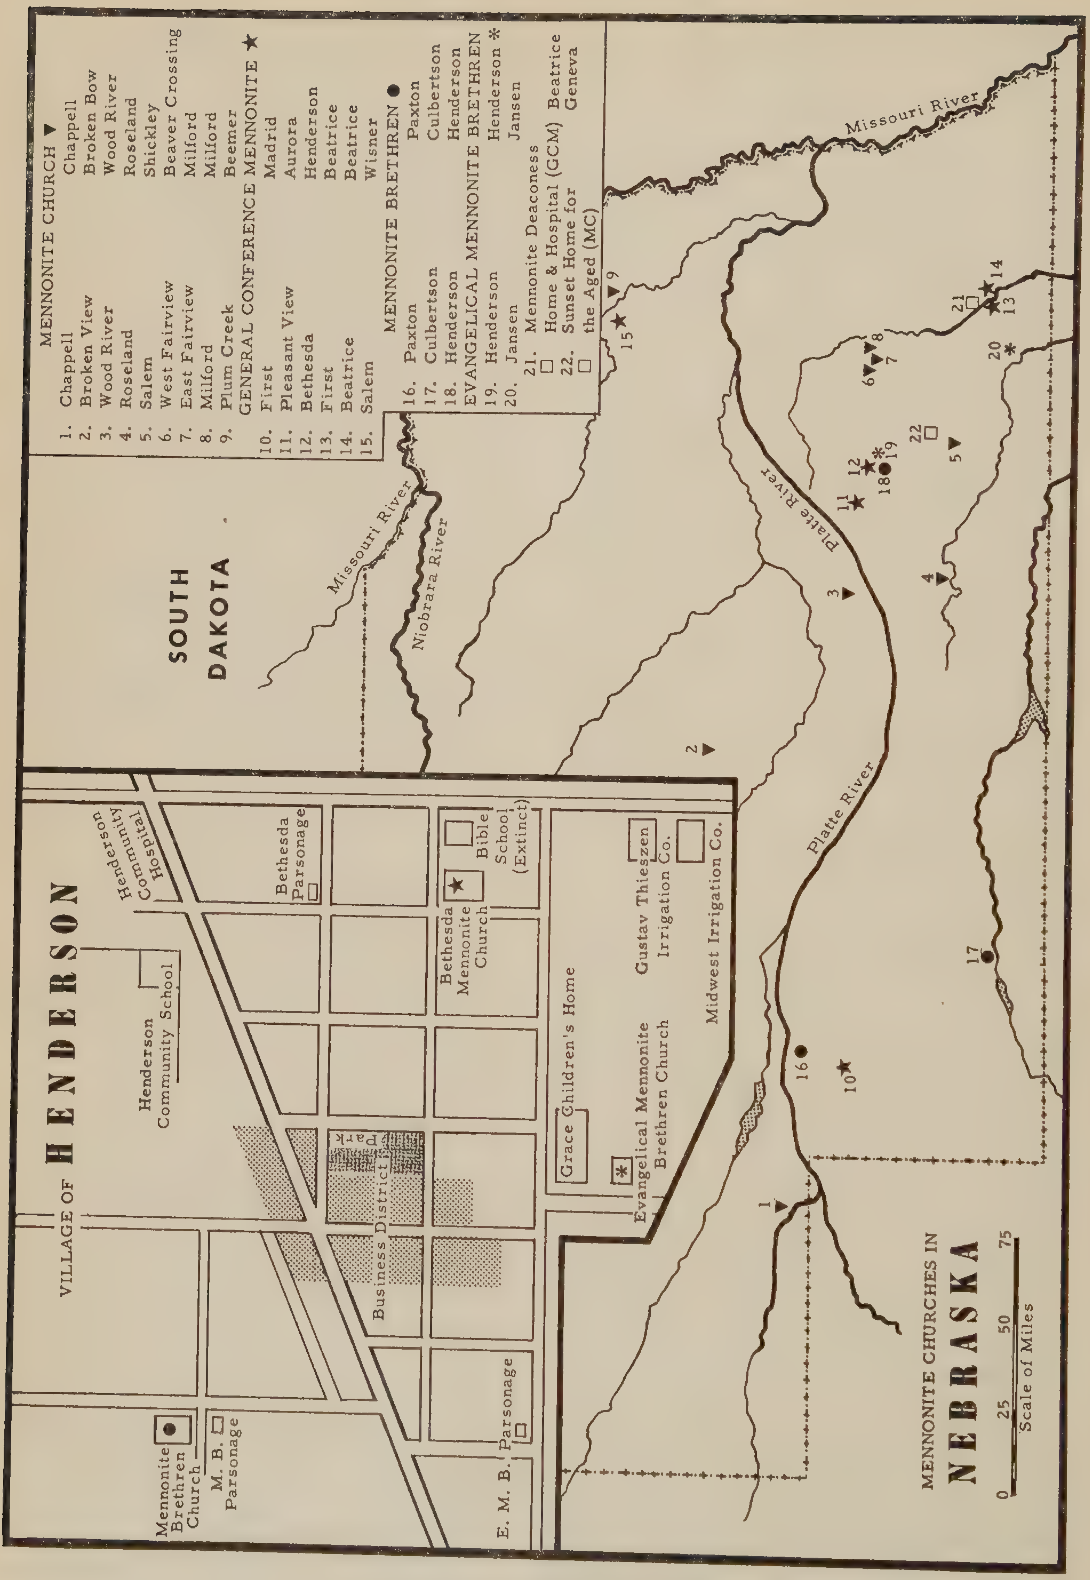
Nebraska, admitted to the Union as the 37th state in 1867. "Nebraska" is the Otoe Indian name for the Platte River, and means "flat water." It was first used by the French explorer Bourgmont in 1714. It was applied to the Platte watershed by John C. Freemont in 1841, and later to the state. It is near the center of the Great Plains region of North America, the eastern border formed by the Missouri River. Its dominant surface characteristic is its undulating prairie. The mean altitude is approximately 2,500 feet above sea level. The population of the state was 1,371,000 in 1952; its area is 77,227 sq. miles. It is predominantly a rural state; it has only 36 towns with more than 2,500. The chief natural resource is the rich soil of the loess region, a triangular area of approximately 42,000 square miles extending over the southeastern half of the state. The climate is characterized by rather light rainfall, low humidity, severe winters, hot summers, frequent changes in the weather, and considerable variation in rainfall and temperature from year to year. The average annual rainfall varies from 34 inches in the southeast to 16 inches in the west. Omaha (pop. 251,117) is Nebraska's principal trading center, with livestock market receipts from more than twenty states. Other important trading centers are Lincoln (state capital, pop. 100,000), Grand Island, Hastings, Scottsbluff, North Platte, Norfolk, Fremont, and Beatrice.

The first Mennonites to settle in Nebraska were a group of three Amish Mennonite families (MC) who came from the East and settled west of Milford in April 1873. In August 1874, 28 immigrant families from Russia under the leadership of Peter



MENNONITE CHURCH ▼
1. Chappell Chappell
2. Broken View Broken Bow
3. Wood River Wood River
4. Roseland Roseland
5. Salem Shickley
6. West Fairview Beaver Crossing
7. East Fairview Milford
8. Milford Milford
9. Plum Creek Beemer
GENERAL CONFERENCE MENNONITE ★
10. First Madrid
11. Pleasant View Aurora
12. Bethesda Henderson
13. First Beatrice
14. Beatrice Beatrice
15. Salem Wisner
MENNONITE BRETHREN ●
16. Paxton Paxton
17. Culbertson Culbertson
18. Henderson Henderson
EVANGELICAL MENNONITE BRETHREN *
19. Henderson Henderson
20. Jansen Jansen
21. □ Mennonite Deaconess Home & Hospital (GCM) Beatrice
22. □ Sunset Home for the Aged (MC) Geneva
SOUTH DAKOTA
Missouri River
Niobrara River
Missouri River
Platte River
Platte River
VILLAGE OF HENDERSON
Henderson Community Hospital
Henderson Community School
Bethesda Parsonage
Bethesda Mennonite Church
Bible School (Extinct)
Park
Business District
Grace Children's Home
Gustav Thiesszen Irrigation Co.
Midwest Irrigation Co.
Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church
Mennonite Brethren Church
M. B. Parsonage
E. M. B. Parsonage
MENNONITE CHURCHES IN NEBRASKA
0 25 50 75
Scale of Miles

Jansen arrived in Beatrice and in September, under the leadership of Elder Jacob Buller, another group of Russians arrived in Lincoln. From this group 37 families (206 persons) settled in York and Hamilton counties near Henderson. From these three early settlements the largest Mennonite settlements of the state, Milford, Beatrice, and Henderson, have developed. With the exception of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ and Grace Bible Institute, the other present Mennonite congregations over the state have been a part of the expansion programs of these three original settlements.

The United Missionary Church congregations in Nebraska resulted from an evangelistic movement occurring around the turn of the century. Seven congregations have been established, all of which are small or have become extinct. The Grace Bible Institute (q.v.) of Omaha was organized in 1943 and serves as an inter-Mennonite school.

The Kleine Gemeinde of Jansen (q.v.), founded by 36 families from Russia, became extinct with the removal of the group to Meade, Kan., in 1906-8.

The Mennonite congregations in Nebraska (in 1954 numbering 25 with 3,832 members) with their conference affiliation, location, and membership numbers in 1954 are as follows: E.M.B.—Ebenezer at Henderson (96), EMB Church at Jansen (70), total 166; G.C.M. Northern District Conference—Bethesda at Henderson (1,014), First at Madrid (44), Salem at Wisner (14); G.C.M. Central District Conference—Pleasant View at Aurora (180); G.C.M. Western District Conference—Beatrice at Beatrice (180), First (originally called Wehrlose Mennoniten-Gemeinde) at Beatrice (333), Kilpatrick at Beatrice (extinct); total G.C.M., 1,765; M.C.—Plum Creek at Beemer (137), West Fairview at Beaver Crossing (156), East Fairview at Milford (444), Chappell (63), Wood River (102), Salem at Shickley (257), Roseland (17), Broken View at Broken Bow (42), Milford (196), total M.C., 1,414; M.B.—Culbertson (14), Henderson (274), Paxton (74), total M.B., 362; U.M.C.—Bloomington (extinct), Cambridge (extinct), Franklin (15), Lewellen (30), Milford (30), Weeping Water (50), total U.M.C., 125.

Other Mennonite institutions in the state are (1) Abbott Mennonite Mission (MC), established at Abbott in 1951, sponsored by Wood River Mennonite (MC) Church; (2) Grace Bible Institute (q.v.), Omaha; (3) Grace Children's Home, Henderson, sponsored by the E.M.B. Church; (4) Mennonite Hospital at Beatrice, sponsored by the G.C.M. churches of Beatrice; and (5) Sunset Home for the Aged at Geneva, established in 1951, sponsored by the M.C. congregations of eastern Nebraska.

D.P.M.

Theodore Schmidt, The Mennonites of Nebraska (Lincoln, 1933); Gustav E. Reimer and G. R. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar. Cornelius Jansen and the Great Mennonite Migration, 1874 (Newton, 1956); W. C. Andreas, "Highlights and Sidelights of the Mennonites in Beatrice," Menn. Life I (July 1946) 21; J. J. Friesen, "Remaking a Community, Henderson, Nebraska," Menn. Life V (October 1950) 10; Jacob T. Friesen, "A Rural Church—Beatrice, Nebraska," Menn. Life VIII (April 1953) 80; D. Paul Miller, "The Story of Jansen, Nebraska," Menn. Life IX (October 1954) 173; idem, "The Story of the Jansen Churches," Menn. Life X (January 1955) 38; ML III, 201 f.

Nebraska Ansiedler, a four-page monthly, published at Lincoln, Neb., 1878-88, but printed at Elkhart, Ind., as a supplement to the Herald of Truth of Elkhart, Ind., particularly in the interests of the Russian Mennonite settlers in Nebraska, but also for circulation among the Mennonite immigrants from Russia to other states. With the stated purpose of giving a Christian interpretation to news, it contained articles on crops, animal husbandry, school affairs, domestic and foreign news, market prices, and other features. It began in June 1878, and ran until April 1880. It was replaced by the Mennonitische Rundschau. N.P.S.

Nebraska Conference of the United Missionary Church was organized in 1896 as the third conference of the church. It at first included all the territory west of Indiana, but the Pacific (Washington) Conference was organized from this conference in 1906. In 1955 the conference had 774 baptized members, with 16 ordained ministers and 8 probationers in 20 congregations, and one district superintendent, for an area roughly 2,500 by 900 miles. Congregations were located as follows by states: Nebraska seven, Iowa four, South Dakota three, California two, Kansas one, Colorado one, and Oklahoma one. H.S.B.

Neck, Martin von, an Anabaptist martyr: see Nauck, Martin.

Neckties. In reference to changes in the conventions of clothing Mennonites in general have been characterized by two tendencies: (1) resistance to cultural change, even to the point of adding a religious sanction to what was at one time a new form of clothing or a new convention of daily life; (2) the adoption in the long run of what has become generally accepted in society and is no longer regarded as in any sense a new fashion or style. This is illustrated by the history of the necktie in the Mennonite (MC) Church. In the 19th century when the old-style colonial cravat was displaced by more modern forms of the necktie, the Mennonites often clung to the bow tie as more conservative, as being less of a conformity to a worldly style than the four-in-hand or long tie. The tie, however, was universally worn by the Mennonites in the East. About 1890, as a result of the influence of some non-Mennonites in Kansas who advocated a certain type of "holiness," sentiment arose in certain parts of the Mennonite Church (MC) against the wearing of any form of necktie. The editor of the unofficial church organ of the group, John F. Funk, objected vigorously to the new view in the Herald of Truth (1891, p. 231), but it had considerable influence in the midwest nevertheless. In one of the largest conferences (Indiana-Michigan, MC) a prohibition of the necktie for ordained men was introduced in the 1920's. In the East, especially in the Lancaster Conference (MC), the tie has never been fully banished, even for ordained men. In the East the bow tie is to some extent the "approved" form of the tie in so far as ties are approved at all, and it is worn by some of the members. In the Amish Mennonite congregations founded in the first half of the 19th century from Alsace-Lorraine, the general practice was for the men to wear the standard lapel sack coat, but no neckties or white stiff collars, the shirt with attached soft collar being used instead. In the final synthesis of the "plain" attire for Mennonite (MC) ministers, which came in the first quarter of the 20th century, the costume became the "plain" or collarless coat with no necktie but a stiff white collar. In many cases in the second quarter of the 20th century the plain or clerical vest was added to this ministerial costume. Recently some preachers are adopting a costume which includes the clerical vest with stiff white collar, but a lapel coat instead of the "plain" or clerical coat. The final product appears much like the standard clerical attire worn by certain Lutheran, Anglican, and Catholic clergymen. Another trend is the dropping of any clerical garb altogether, which results in the wearing of the standard American male costume in the mid-20th century, which is lapel coat, shirt with soft attached collar, with or without necktie.

Many lay Mennonites are not recognizable by the kind of tie they wear, however, and the widespread practice is to wear a four-in-hand tie. In congregations with an Amish Mennonite background many of the older men wear no tie at all, but among the young men of the Old Order Amish in Lancaster County a small black bow tie is commonly worn as a part of the Sunday attire. As to color, among the conservative-minded black is preferred in any kind of tie. J.C.W.

Nederduytsche Concordantie ofte Harmonie is a Dutch Bible concordance compiled by an unknown Mennonite author, published at Haarlem in 1645. In this remarkable work a large number of "all most instructive and important statements of the Scriptures" are "gathered and placed in alphabetic order." vdZ.

M. Schagen, Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde schrijveren (Amsterdam, 1745) 24.

Nederlandsche Geloofsbelijdenis, official confession of the Dutch Reformed Church, was drawn up about 1561 by Guy de Brez (q.v.), following the confession of the French Calvinists, which had been approved by the Synod of Paris in 1559 and presented to Henry II, king of France. On the night of Nov. 1-2, 1561, a copy of the printed confession was thrown into the garden of the regent Margaret of Parma (q.v.) at Brussels to inform her about the doctrines of the Dutch Calvinists. This confession was approved by the Synod of Armentières in 1563. The approval given by the Dutch General Reformed Synod at Dordrecht in 1619 made it the official confession of the Reformed Church in the Netherlands.

In this confession de Brez tried to prove that the Calvinists were very different from the Anabaptists or Mennonites. Two articles of the confession deal with the Anabaptists (Wederdoopers): Article 34, concerning baptism, states: "We [the Calvinists] reject the error of the Anabaptists . . . who reject the baptism of the children of believers"; Article 36, dealing with the office of the magistrates, concludes, "For this reason [i.e., because the public authorities are of God] we reject the Anabaptists and all other revolutionary people, and in general all those who reject the authorities and magistracy, who wish to overthrow the administration of justice and to introduce community of property, who throw into disorder modesty, which God has established among men."

Though it is clear that this judgment on the Anabaptists-Mennonites is untrue, the confession has never been changed or corrected, still being generally accepted by the Reformed Church. vdZ.

Nederlandse Protestantenbond (Dutch Protestant Union), an association of liberal Christians founded in 1870, in which Mennonites, Lutherans, Reformed, and other Christians co-operate for the promotion of liberal Christianity. The Protestantenbond now has about 20,000 members and 108 local chapters. The chapters, spread all over the Netherlands, function as a kind of Christian community, often with a church and a pastor of their own. These churches are found particularly in towns where there is no Mennonite or Remonstrant congregation and where the Reformed Church is fundamentalist. Originally some leaders of the Protestantenbond hoped for a total union of all Dutch liberal Christians into one single church, but this has proved to be an unrealizable ideal, since the Remonstrants, Reformed, and Mennonites all wished to maintain their own organizations. Mennonites have from the beginning warmly supported the Bond. Among the founders was the Mennonite pastor Gerrit ten Cate (q.v.) of Drachten. Many Mennonites, particularly in the Diaspora, are members, and a number of Mennonite pastors also serve in Protestantenbond churches for preaching and catechetical instruction.

In 1882 the Protestantenbond edited a hymnal (5th ed. 1910), in 1919 followed by an appendix. This Protestantenbond-bundel was also used in many Mennonite congregations. The first of these to introduce it were Texel in 1885, Middelburg in 1889 and Deventer in 1890. In 1940 it was in use in 80 Mennonite congregations. In 1944 the Protestantenbond together with the Remonstrants and Mennonites published a new hymnal. This hymnbook, augmented with a supplement, is now used in all Mennonite congregations (see Doopsgezinde Bundel). vdZ.

Neef, Barbara, an Anabaptist martyr, died in the canton of Zürich, Switzerland, in 1643 after the birth of a child, in consequence of imprisonment in chains. (Mart. Mir. E 1121.)

Neel, Mypeis, an Anabaptist martyr of Rotterdam, Holland, was executed at The Hague on June 8, 1535. Particulars are lacking. vdZ.

K. Vos, Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinde gemeente Rotterdam (1907, reprint) 6.

Neelken, an Anabaptist martyr, No. 49 in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), which is hymn No. 16 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. In this hymn Neelken is called a "dochter" (daughter), which usually means an unmarried woman. She was executed at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1559. Van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 244, E 618) states that she suffered martyrdom with Betgen and Mariken

Fransse. It is not clear which martyr is meant here. Génard believes that she is identical with Neelken Jacobs (q.v.), the wife of Adriaen Pan, executed on June 28, 1559. But in this case the word "dochter" would be rather strange. vdZ.

Neelken, the wife of Adriaen Pan, an Anabaptist martyr: see Neelken Jacobs.

Neelken, the wife of Paulus van Druynen (q.v.), an Anabaptist martyr, was burned at the stake on Sept. 11, 1538, at Vught, Dutch province of North Brabant (DB 1917, 189). Van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 42, E 448) mentions her only incidentally. vdZ.

Neelken (Cornelia) Clercx, the wife of Henrick de Timmerman, an Anabaptist martyr, executed on March 16, 1535, at Antwerp, Belgium, by being tied into a sack and drowned. She was charged with the crime of having been rebaptized. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 319, 367; XIV, 14 f., No. 140.) vdZ.

Neelken Jacobs (Cornelia van Rommerswael), an Anabaptist martyr, drowned on June 28, 1559, at Antwerp, Belgium, after giving birth to a child. Neelken was married to Adriaen Pan (q.v.), who suffered martyrdom in Antwerp on June 18, 1559. They had formerly lived at Nijvele (Nivelles) in Flanders, but moved to Antwerp, where they were arrested. Their furniture was confiscated and publicly sold while they were in prison, even before they were sentenced. Neelken, who like her husband died steadfast, is commemorated in the hymn on Adriaen Pan, "Duysternis gaet van henen, wanneer dat licht coemt aen" (Darkness passes away when the light appears), found in Offer des Heeren. In Offer and following Dutch martyrs' books, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, this martyr is called simply Neelken (Neeltgen). vdZ.

Offer, 342, note, 346 f.; Mart. Mir. D 244, E 618; Bibliographie II, No. 573; Antw. Arch.-Blad. IX, 3, 9, 16, XIV, 26 f., No. 295; ML III, 204.

Neelken (Nelleken) Jaspers, an Anabaptist martyr, erroneously considered Reformed, a girl 17 or 18 years of age, was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on June 27, 1570 (not 1571, as in Mart. Mir.), after giving a valiant testimony to her faith. The death sentence states that she was rebaptized and was "persistent in her heresy." Her father Jasper Hermansz (q.v.) and her mother Maeyken Janssens (q.v.) had both been executed as martyrs at Antwerp in 1569, Jasper on June 22, and Maeyken on Nov. 22. While in prison Neelken wrote a letter, dated Dec. 12, 1569, which reveals her firm faith and joy in suffering. She said that she wanted to follow the example of her parents and two youths who had been executed, though they had not yet been baptized. She is commemorated in a hymn composed by an anonymous 16th-century author, entitled "Aen Neelken Jaspers" (n.p., n.d.). Neff, vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 407, E 762; DB 1899, 91, 108, 121, 139; Antw. Arch.-Blad XIII, 2, 61; XIV, 76 f., No. 853; Catalogus Amst., 100; ML II, 394.

Neeltgen, an Anabaptist martyr, a woman of 75 years, was burned at the stake on Jan. 24, 1570, at Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, together with her daughter Trijntgen. They had been arrested on Nov. 24, 1569, and were severely tortured. Neeltgen and Trijntgen belonged to the small Mennonite congregation of Maastricht, of which Arent van Essen (q.v.) and his wife Ursel (Ursula) had suffered martyrdom on Jan. 10, 1570. When Ursel was led to the execution place, Neeltgen had loudly called from the window of the prison, so that all the people gathered to observe the execution could hear: "Dear sister, contend manfully, for the crown of life is prepared for you." Neeltgen herself died also steadfast. The martyrdom of Neeltgen and Trijntgen, and of Arent van Essen and his wife is commemorated in the songs "Anhördt fründe Ersame," "Nun hört jhr Freundt ehrsamen," and "O Mensch, bedenck die kurtze Zeit," found in the old German hymnal, Ein schon gesangbüchlein, of about 1570. vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D 502, E 844; W. Bax, Het Protestantisme in het bisdom Luik II (The Hague, 1941) 306-10; Wolkan, Lieder, 92, 101, 136; Ausbund, 28; ML III, 204.

Neeltje Jans, an Anabaptist martyr, drowned at Leiden, Holland, on Nov. 13, 1554. In the sentence she is said to have associated with heretics, obviously Anabaptist groups; she did not believe in the Catholic doctrine of the Mass, and would have been (re)baptized if there had been an opportunity. Neeltje was sentenced to be burned at the stake if she should persist in her heresy. From the fact that she was drowned it may be inferred that she recanted. vdZ.

I. M. J. Hoog, "Onze Martelaren," in Kerkhistorisch Archief III (1898) 442 f.

Neff (Neef, Nef, Näff), a Mennonite family name found in Switzerland, South Germany, and North America. The name is of Swiss origin, occurring as early as 1529 (or 1533) in St. Gall, when the citizen Othmar Nef (called Bublerin) was named as an Anabaptist. The Martyrs' Mirror names Barbara Neff (Neef) (q.v.) in the canton of Zürich. The family probably emigrated to the Palatinate at the end of the 17th century, where in 1685 Hans Neff was living at Gundersheim and Heinrich Neff in Ibersheim. Other Mennonites in the Palatinate with this name were Johannes Neff at Mechtersheimerhof in 1738, Oswald Neff at Erbesbüdesheim in 1743, David Neff at Kleinkarlbach, and Michael and Johannes Neff at Kriegsheim, who came from Kleinkarlbach in 1768. The family was no longer named in Erbesbüdesheim after 1768. A Jacob Neff (1676-1743), the son of Oswald, settled in Dürkheim. His grandson Jakob Neff married a daughter of Peter Weber (q.v.) of Hardenburg and emigrated to America, as did in 1840 Johannes Neff (son of Abraham Neff) (1783-1855), married to Magdalena Krehbiel, and many other members of the Neff family in the 18th and 19th centuries. Jakob Neff was listed as a preacher in Conestoga Township in Pennsylvania in 1790.

The best known of the Neff families was the one located at Assenheim, which is very likely related to the above Neffs. The progenitor, Johann Peter Neff, was born at Erpolzheim in 1717 (the son of Nikolaus Neff?) and came to Assenheim in 1747 through his marriage with Veronica Resch. He served as minister of the Erpolzheim congregation 1755-69, and of the Ruchheim congregation 1769-90 (Naamlijst). Johann's son Johannes (1748-1829) was the founder of the Neff line in Baden, which settled at Hoffenheim near Sinsheim and from there spread to Württemberg and Bavaria. He was ordained in the Mauer-Meckesheim congregation in 1772. Dr. Hermann Neff (1891-1950), who practiced medicine in Grünheim, Saxony, was a member of this family. He published a number of articles in Mennonite periodicals on ethical and historical problems concerning medicine. Peter, the second son of the progenitor Johannes (1750-1813), a preacher of the Ruchheim-Assenheim congregation from 1777 and an elder 1786-ca. 96, continued the line in the Palatinate. As elder of the Assenheim congregation he signed the Ibersheim Resolutions (q.v.). A Jakob Neff was an elder of the Erpolzheim congregation in 1790. Of greatest importance for the Mennonite brotherhood was Peter's great-grandson Christian Neff (q.v., 1863-1946), pastor of the Weierhof congregation 1887-1945.

The name Neff is also found in the records of the Mennonite congregation at Danzig, Prussia, as early as 1693, but it is an open question whether this Neff family (the name is also written Newe or Neue) is related to the Swiss-South German Neff family. P.S., vdZ.

Mart. Mir. E. 1121; Paul Peachey, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer (Karlsruhe, 1954) 113, No. 101; Naamlijst 1776, 52; 1775, 46; 1780, 45; 1793, 46, 56; Fritz Braun, "Nineteenth Century Emigrants from . . . Friedelsheim," MQR XXX (April 1956) 146; Elizabeth Neff, A Chronicle Regarding Rudolf and Jacob Näf . . . and Their Descendants (Cincinnati, 1886); Reimer, Familiennamen, 114.

Neff, Christian (1863-1946), an outstanding leader of the Mennonites of Germany, long-time (1887-1939 and 1940-43) pastor of the Weierhof, Palatinate, Mennonite Church, and scholar and Mennonite historian, was born Feb. 18, 1863, on the Hemshof near Ludwigshafen, one of the six children of Peter and Barbara Schowalter Neff. He was married on Dec. 28, 1889, to Babette Lydia Krehbiel of the Weierhof. One son and three daughters survive the parents. He attended the elementary school in Ludwigshafen, then the Weierhof school 1874-75, the Latin School in Ludwigshafen 1875-79, and the Gymnasium at that place 1879-83. He studied theology at the universities of Erlangen, Berlin, Tübingen, and in the fourth year Erlangen again, being influenced more particularly by Professors Zahn and Frank at Erlangen, and Kaftan and Treitschke in Berlin. He was also influenced strongly by Prof. Tobias Beck.

On Dec. 11, 1887, Neff was ordained to the ministry in the Weierhof congregation, serving there as the beloved pastor for almost 55 years, and for much of this time also as a teacher in the Weierhof school where he taught religion for many years, but also for some years German and history. He soon became a widely influential Mennonite leader not only in South Germany but also in the entire country and beyond. He was the outstanding leader of the Conference of the South German Mennonites (q.v.) organized in 1887, of which he was for 40 years (1903-43) the chairman. He likewise was for many years an active leader in the Vereinigung der Mennoniten im Deutschen Reich (q.v.), from 1905 a member of its board of directors. He was also the initiator and leader of the Mennonite World Conference (q.v.), and planner of its sessions of 1925 (Basel, Switzerland), 1930 (Danzig, Germany), and 1936 (Amsterdam, Netherlands). From 1892 he was the secretary of the Palatinate-Hesse Mennonite Ministers' Conference; soon elected its chairman, he served in this office for decades. He was an active supporter of foreign missions and from 1913 on was for many years a member of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Board. He was the initiator of the Youth Commission of the South German Conference (1919) and frequent contributor to its monthly journal, the Mennonitische Jugendwarte (1920-39).

As an able writer, editor, and historian, Christian Neff was almost constantly in literary production throughout his active career. He was a member of the editorial board of the Christlicher Gemeindekalender (q.v.) from the beginning (1892) and in virtually every year of its issue contributed major articles, often of outstanding historical research and literary quality. He was an associate editor of the Mennonitische Blätter from 1891 to its end in 1941. An extraordinary contribution was his numerous articles in the Mennonitisches Lexikon, of which he was coeditor and publisher, with Christian Hege (q.v.), from 1913 until his death. He was the editor of the excellent hymnal of the South German Mennonites, Gesangbuch der Mennoniten (Ludwigshafen, 1910), and author of three pamphlets in the series Schriften der Konferenz der Süddeutschen Mennoniten; namely, (1) Was sind Mennoniten? (1913); (2) Die Mennoniten keine Wiedertäufer (1914); (3) Die Mennoniten keine Baptisten noch Methodisten (1914). He was the editor of the reports of the Mennonite World Conferences of 1925, 1930, and 1936, and of the book Gedenkschrift zum 400-jährigen Jubiläum der Mennoniten (Ludwigshafen, 1925), for which he wrote a substantial article on Conrad Grebel. He edited the Mennonitisches Adressbuch (Karlsruhe, 1936). In 1925 he was given the honorary degree of Doctor of Theology by the University of Zürich, Switzerland, in connection with the first Mennonite World Conference. In 1913 he spent several weeks on a visit to the North American Mennonite churches, attending the first All-Mennonite Convention. A complete bibliography of his writings is found in Beiträge zur Geschichte der Mennoniten (Weierhof, 1938) 89-96, with a supplement in Mennonitische Geschichtsblätter VI (April 1949) 11-13. He died Dec. 30, 1946, and was buried in the Weierhof Mennonite cemetery. H.S.B.

Paul Schowalter, "Zum Gedenken an Christian Neff," Gesch.-Bl., VI (April 1949) 2-11; idem, "Christian Neff, Ein Lebensbild," in Gem.-Kal. 1951, 17-39; Cornelius Krahn, "Christian Neff (1863-1946)," The Mennonite LXII (Jan. 14, 1947) 6 f.

Negri, Francesco (1500-64), of Bassano, Italy, humanist and reformer, by some erroneously called an Anabaptist because of his temporary support of the position of Camillo Renato (q.v.) on the sacraments at Chiavenna in the 1540's, entered a Benedictine cloister at Padua in 1521. Influenced by Lutheran writings, he fled the monastery in 1525, and in 1529 was in Strasbourg, where he attended the lectures of Capito and Bucer. He visited Venice, Padua, and Brescia in 1530, then returned to Strasbourg. In 1531 when he requested that he be permitted to work for the Reformation in the Italian-speaking parts of Switzerland, Capito recommended him to Zwingli as an able and learned man. He went to Tirano (then under the jurisdiction of the Rhaetian Leagues) as a teacher in 1531, and in 1538 moved to Chiavenna where he taught classical languages. He helped found the evangelical community there, and was on good terms with Bullinger and other Swiss leaders. During this time he wrote a Catechism and in 1546 published his Tragedia del libero arbitrio in which he bitterly attacked the Catholic Church. Although placed on the Index in 1548, this work was widely read by Italians and went into several later editions. Negri helped many Italian fugitives from the Roman Inquisition to make fresh starts in the Leagues. In 1547 when Camillo Renato became involved in a dispute with Agostino Mainardi, pastor of the church at Chiavenna, Negri sided with the former on the interpretation of the origin of the sacraments (although personalities were also in question) and thereby received the epithet "Anabaptist," which was likewise applied incorrectly to Renato. However, Negri accepted the verdict of a special synod which supported Mainardi's position and in the second edition of the Libero arbitrio (1550) included an orthodox confession which contained a specific disavowal of Anabaptism. He had no objection to infant baptism in principle (he had his child baptized in 1548, although there was some difficulty over the precise form to be used). The radical evangelical leader in north Italy, Pietro Manelfi (q.v.), reported Negri's presence at the council in Venice in September 1550 where Christological questions were discussed, but there is no other evidence for this. In 1550 Negri published the narratives of the martyrdom of some Italians and in the ensuing years was in contact with the ex-bishop Pierpaolo Vergerio who was wrongly accused of Anabaptism by some contemporaries. By 1556 Negri had settled once again in Tirano but he continued to maintain close contacts with Chiavenna, and in fact undertook a tutoring assignment there in 1560. He visited Poland in 1562 or 1563 and died of the plague at Cracow in 1564.

DeWind.

Bullingers Korrespondenz mit den Graubündnern, ed. T. Schiess, XXIII-XXV of Quellen zur Schweizer Geschichte (Basel, 1904-6); F. C. Church, The Italian Reformers, 1534-1564 (New York, 1932); G. Zonta, "Francesco Negri l'eretico e la sua tragedia 'Il Libero Arbitrio,' " Giornale storico della letteratura italiana LXVII (1916) 265-324; ML III, 203.

Negro Missions. The first mission among the Negroes in America was begun in 1898 by the Lancaster Mennonites (MC) when they established the Welsh Mountain Industrial Mission for Negroes living in the wooded area at the junction of Lancaster, Chester, and Berks counties called the Welsh Mountain. Noah Mack (q.v.) was the superintendent of the mission until 1910. The first convert was baptized in 1917, but a permanent congregation was not established until later. In 1924 the industrial phase of the work was discontinued, but the work has continued as a purely mission program. In 1899 the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren evangelistic mission was opened at Elk Park, N.C., which has been continued to the present. A small number of converts have been organized into several congregations with six Negro ministers. The work has always been in charge of one or more white K.M.B. couples. H. V. Wiebe was the first worker (1899-1907), assisted by J. M. Tschetter (1902-12). P. H. Siemens spent over 25 years (from 1925 on) as an outstanding worker there. In 1955 there was an attendance of 180 at the Sunday morning services.

Negro missions have had extensive development only in the Mennonite Church (MC), which now has at least 27 missions or congregations. In 1933 the Lancaster Colored Mission was established in Lancaster city. Additional missions among colored people have been established by the Lancaster Conference as follows (with date of establishment), all in Pennsylvania unless otherwise indicated: Philadelphia in 1935; Reading 1938; Andrew's Bridge 1938; Mt. Vernon in Oxford 1946; Newlinville near Coatesville 1946; Harrisburg 1951; Steelton 1952; Lincoln University 1954; York 1954; New York City, Harlem, 1954; Edgemont near Harrisburg 1955; West Chester 1955; Tampa, Fla., 1952; and Freemanville, Ala., 1956. These missions were opened to minister to the spiritual needs of a predominantly Negro population; a number of them are conducted on an interracial basis with membership of both races.

Additional missions have been established in other conference districts as follows: Harrisonburg, Va., 1935; Bethel in Chicago, Ill., 1945; Youngstown, Ohio, 1947; Gladstone in Cleveland, Ohio, 1948; Ninth Street in Saginaw, Mich., 1949; Buckeye near Phoenix, Ariz., 1951; Newport News, Va., 1952; St. Anne at Rehoboth, Ill., 1953; East Side in Saginaw, Mich., 1955; Madisonville, La., 1955; Fort Wayne, Ind., 1955. At least five additional Negro missions have been established in various places, which are no longer operated at least as Mennonite (MC) missions, among them Los Angeles, Cal., 1940, and Rocky Ridge near Souderton, Pa., 1931. The Rocky Ridge Mennonite (MC) Church has continued as an interracial church with a few Negroes among its 89 members in 1956. From this congregation came the first Negro minister in the Mennonite Church, James Lark, who was ordained at Chicago in 1946, and made bishop there in 1954 (discontinued his bishop office in 1956). He is at present the only ordained Negro minister in the Mennonite Church (MC); although there is an elected deacon at the Ninth Street Church in Saginaw. The four rapidly growing young churches at Saginaw, Cleveland, Chicago, and Youngstown have co-operated as a group in various ways with considerable sharing of ideas.

In 1951 there were 385 Negro members in 29 different predominantly Negro Mennonite (MC) congregations. In 1957 the number was more than 500. The first record of Negro members in the Mennonite Church (MC) was in 1896 when Bishop Jacob N. Brubacher baptized a few colored people in Juniata County, Pa., as the result of the revival movement in this area inaugurated by J. S. Coffman, M. S. Steiner, and A. D. Wenger. There is an earlier, as yet unverified, report of Negro members in the small Lancaster Conference congregation at Marietta, Pa., about 1800.

No regular missions among the Negroes have been established by any other Mennonite group in North America. However, the General Conference Board of Missions (GCM) on Jan. 1, 1957, took over Camp Landon at Gulfport, Miss., as a Voluntary Service community project, which had been established in 1946 as a CPS project and administered by the MCC until 1957. It works exclusively among Negroes. H.S.B.

Robert Stoltzfus, "Mennonite Mission Work Among the American Negro" (1953) and Vern L. Miller, "Negro Evangelism" (1951, seminar papers in GCL); Leroy Bechler, "Facts, Considerations, and Membership of Negroes in the Mennonite (MC) Church, 1955" (unpublished paper).

Neiss (Neuss), Andreas von, an Anabaptist martyr: see Andreas von Neiss.

NEK (Natuur en kunst; English, Nature and Art), a Dutch Mennonite student association, which was formed out of the student association E.T.E.B.O.N. (q.v.) at Amsterdam on Nov. 17, 1838, by A. Winkler Prins (q.v.) together with D. Harting, P. Leendertz Wzn, H. C. C. Dronrijp Uges, and J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, and continued until Aug. 8, 1849, having held about 100 meetings during this time. It admitted 17 members only, and had as its main purpose the writing of humorous or satirical verse. The members came from the universities of Amsterdam, Leiden, and Utrecht, among them the later noted authors J. J. L. ten Kate and J. Kerbert, also H. Kretzer and A. Winkler Prins. The literary periodical Braga was founded by members of the group (first number Dec. 1, 1842), but had only a short life in spite of its high quality. K.V.

A. Winkler Prins, Feestavonden van de Studentenvereeniging NEK; H. A. Lunshof, Leven zonder demon (Amsterdam, 1950) 50-63; ML III, 203.

Nelleken, an Anabaptist martyr: see Neelken Jaspers.

Nellis, Johannes, apparently from the Lower Rhine, Germany, author of an Anabaptist hymn that bears his name in acrostic form: "Ich weiss eine Jungfrau reine." (Wolkan, Lieder, 100; ML III, 204.)

Nembsche (Nemtschan, Niemtscha; Czech, Nemcany), a village near Austerlitz (q.v.). Under John, Baron of Kaunitz (q.v.), the Hutterian Brethren settled there in 1560. Not much is known of this Bruderhof. In 1570 the poet Christoph Hueter or Schiffmann died there. At Easter of 1600 the Bruderhof was abandoned by the Brethren "on account of the many taxes and burdens of the military men which they could not carry." (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 252.) P.De.

Nem(b)schitz (Niemtschitz; Czech, Nemcice), the name of eleven villages in different parts of Moravia, three of which are mentioned in the Hutterian chronicles:

(1) Gross-Niemtschitz, on the left bank of the Schwarza between Nikolsburg (q.v.) and Nusslau (q.v.). To this place the "Stäbler" (q.v.) came from Nikolsburg in 1529. From here they sent four messengers to the barons of Kaunitz at Austerlitz (q.v.) with a petition for admission, which was granted them. The trial of the miller Nikolaus Geyersbühler (q.v.) shows that there were Anabaptists there at a later period. "Although he could neither read nor write and was not a leader or preacher, he was sent by the brotherhood to his old home to bring Anabaptists to Moravia." He was beheaded at Innsbruck in 1566/7.

(2) Klein-Niemtschitz in the domain of Panowitz, in which Anabaptists had settled at Gurdau (q.v.), Rackvitz, and Seitz, had a Hutterite Bruderhof, date of founding unknown, which was abandoned in 1559; the chronicles say that the Brethren were driven out and moved to Pellerditz (q.v.); they opened a Bruderhof in that year under the Baron of Wickow.

(3) Klein-Nembschitz near Pralitz (in the chronicles usually called "Nembschitz bei Präles"; see Klein-Nembschitz), on the road from Brno to Znaim in the Kaunitz domain on the left bank of the Iglawa, noted for its fruit and vineyards. Baron Siegmund von Zastrizel gave the Brethren a Bruderhof here in 1562 with several gardens and a mill. This Bruderhof prospered and soon became one of the most important in the country. In 1564 three men were confirmed in the ministry: Klaus Braidl (q.v.), a shoemaker, later head of the entire brotherhood, Valentin Hörl, and Hans Langenbach; and Leonhard Dax (q.v.), who was well known on account of his long imprisonment in Alzey, was chosen to the ministry. Here Leonhard Lanzenstiel (q.v.), the head of the entire Moravian brotherhood, died in 1565.

An important institution of this Bruderhof (3) was Peter Walpot's school. Here he published on Nov. 15, 1568, his famous address to the teachers which shows evidence of pedagogical skill. To the "sisters in the cotton rooms" Paul Glock (q.v.) addressed his eighth letter written in prison in Württemberg in 1569. The skill of the craftsmen of the Bruderhof is proved by the order given in 1569 by the wealthy nobleman Albrecht von Boskowitz and Tchernahora for a fountain and water conduit to be connected with the city water system in the guilding of his new town house, at the price of sixty florins and five measures of wheat (copy of the letter in the private archives of the Prince of Liechtenstein in Vienna.) In 1606 Niemtschitz suffered severe arbitrary violence at the hands of armies on route to Hungary. Great offense was caused among the Brethren in 1610, when the bishop Georg Riedel had to be deposed because he neglected the duties of his office for experiments in alchemy.

This settlement was especially hard pressed in the Moravian uprising. After the inhuman treatment of the Pribitz Brethren at the hands of the Polish troops of the imperial army, the Brethren fled with their neighbors to Pausram. The terrible distress of the Brethren, who were subjected to all sorts of mistreatment, is related in the Geschicht-Buch. On Dec. 28, 1620, soldiers broke into the abandoned house and plundered it completely, "and burned the best buildings. What the soldiery did not find in the earth, the baron of Kaunitz, who should have protected the Brethren, had his men dig up and take away, so that they lost everything at once."

On Jan. 3, 1621, two men who had ventured back to the ravaged house were cut down by soldiers. Nevertheless the Brethren began again in March to live there and to build; then soldiers came again and robbed them, and raped two sisters. Again the Brethren began anew, and then some troops of the Brno garrison broke in on July 15, "plundered everything and took away thirty-five loads of booty, grain and all that they found."

After the suppression of the rebellion Niemtschitz fell to Cardinal Dietrichstein (q.v.), who had this Bruderhof as well as those in Nikolsburg (q.v.) and Tracht (q.v.) completely plundered even before the general expulsion of the Anabaptists. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Loserth, Communismus; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; ML III, 252 f.

Nen, a Mennonite family at Zaandam, Holland, of which a number of members have served the Mennonite congregation. Jacob Jansz Nen, a lumber merchant, was in the early 18th century a reader in the West Zaandam Nieuwe Huys congregation, while his son Klaas Jacobsz Nen (1701-55) was a preacher of this congregation from 1726 and an elder from 1730 until his death. His colleague Adriaen Loosjes preached his funeral sermon, De gezegende Naagedachtenis des Rechtvaardigen, published in 1755 at West Zaandam. Neeltje Jans Nen (d. 1796 at Zaandam) was a deaconess of the same congregation and contributed to the church its silver communion service. vdZ.

S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 57 f., 67, 80, 109, 186.

Nepluyevka (Nepluyevo), a Mennonite settlement located in the province of Ekaterinoslav, Ukraine, Russia, established in 1870, consisted of two villages, Steinau (Starozavodskaya), and Blumenfeld (Kisslitchevatoye), consisting of 10,800 acres. The land was owned by the nobleman Nepluyev and the settlers came from the Chortitza Mennonite settlement. The villages were located 10 miles from the city of Nikolaipol on the Dnieper River. (ML III, 204.) C.K.

Nepluyevka (Nepluyevo, Nikopol) Mennonite Brethren Church, about 8 miles from the city of Nikopol in the volost of Tchortomlek, Ekaterinoslav province, Russia, was first known as the Steinau Mennonite Brethren Church; the Russian name was adopted about 1897 by order of the Russian government. Peter Wiebe, Isaac Töws, Peter Löwen, Jacob Siemens, and Jacob Friesen were among the first settlers who came from the Chortitza settlement to this fertile area in 1870, and settled in two villages, Steinau and Blumenfeld. They organized the congregation about 1885, and in 1907 built their first meetinghouse of brick, with a seating capacity of over 500. The membership, which did not exceed 100, consisted mostly of farmers who used High German in their services, but Low German in the homes. The church functioned under the elder of the Einlage M.B. Church, Aron Lepp, and later was led by Heinrich Friesen, Isaak Töws, Gerhard Siemens, and Peter Wiebe, with Johann Löwen as the choir director. This church experienced a great revival in the winter of 1906-7, and also in the winter of 1911-12. In 1907 Heinrich Friesen, one of their leading men, began extension work among the Russians in the surrounding villages, and thus a Russian evangelical church came into being, which bought the M.B. church building in 1918 and used the material to build two churches for themselves. Much of the land under cultivation was only rented to the Mennonites and this weakened the stability of the settlement. A number had already moved away before World War I; and afer the Revolution of 1918, especially during the severe Bolshevist persecution, the membership scattered, some moving to Siberia, others to Steinfeld, Friedensfeld, and other places, and the church ceased to exist about 1932. (ML III, 204.) J.J.T.

Nepluyevka (Nepluyevo) Mennonite Church formed a unit with the neighboring Borozenko Mennonite Church (q.v.). In 1906 the two villages of the Nepluyevka settlement had a membership of 106, while together with Borozenko they had a membership of 442 and a total population of 1,036. Ministers who served the Borozenko-Nepluyevka Mennonite Church were Isaak Ens (ordained 1889), Cornelius Penner (1889), Peter Friesen (1893), Jacob Block (1895), Johann Funk (1900), Franz Penner (1900), Abr. Olfert (1902), Martin Hamm (1902), Heinrich Klassen (1902), Heinrich Sawatzky (1906). Worship services were conducted in various schools. There is no later information available. (Dirks, Statistik, 1905, 7, 61; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 701.) C.K.

Nerdaenus: see Antonides, Henricus.

Nes in East Friesland, Germany. In 1551-56 Leenaert Bouwens baptized five or eight persons here, who may have joined the Emderland (q.v.) congregation. vdZ.

Nes, one of the three Mennonite churches on Ameland (q.v.), a Dutch island in the North Sea; it is smaller than the Hollum (q.v.) congregation and larger than Ballum (q.v.), the other congregations on the island. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.), who visited Ameland eight times, baptized only three in Nes, and those on his first journey, between 1551 and 1554. The Nes congregation belonged to a more lenient wing than the other two, and was therefore less interested in the stern Bouwens. In the division of 1557 between the stricter Flemish and Frisians on one hand and the more lenient Waterlanders on the other, the Nes congregation sided with the Waterlanders. In the 18th century this Waterlander congregation belonged to the Humsterland Sociëteit (see Groninger Doopsgezinde Sociëteit). In 1599

Jan Jacobs (q.v.) of Harlingen, who favored a stricter application of the ban, won some adherents at Nes, most of whom belonged to the Flemish group, but now turned to the Jan Jacobs faction. For some unknown reason another division occurred in Nes probably about the middle of the 17th century, which led to the founding of the Foppe Ones or Laus Ooms (q.v.) congregation. In 1804 the Foppe Ones and Jan Jacobsz congregations united. In 1854 a union was formed with the Waterlanders, the resulting congregation being called the Ameland Mennonite Church. It included the Mennonites of Hollum and Ballum and was served by two preachers, one of whom had to live in Nes. In 1883 the Ameland congregation was divided into two independent congregations, viz., Hollum-Ballum and Nes. From that time until 1930 Nes had its own preacher, G. E. Frerichs, serving from 1878 in the Ameland congregation, and 1883-84 only in Nes. Then the pulpit was vacant until it was filled by J. B. du Bury 1895-1902, Menno Huizinga, Jr., 1902-8, W. Leendertz 1909-22, Miss M. T. Gerritsma 1923-26, and J. A. P. Bijl 1926-30. After a vacancy of three years Nes united with Hollum and Ballum for ministerial services. Nes had a membership of 84 in 1898, 40 in 1956. The church used is still the "Blue Barn" of the Waterlander group. An organ was installed in 1896. J.W.S.

K. S. Gorter, "Uit de vroegere geschiedenis der Doopsgezinde gemeenten op Ameland," in DB 1889, 1-50; 1890, 1-30; 1897, 250; ML III, 204.

Nespitzer (Nospitzer), Georg, a citizen of Passau, Bavaria, Germany, therefore also called Jörg of Passau, b. at Stadtlauringen near Schweinfurt, a weaver by trade, was baptized at Easter 1527 by Hans Hut (q.v.) and became like him a successful Anabaptist preacher. After he became acquainted with the large Anabaptist congregation at Nikolsburg (q.v.), he stayed briefly in Strasbourg, and then went to Augsburg (q.v.), where he participated in the Martyrs' Synod (q.v.) and was sent out as a missionary to Franconia. Upon the suggestion of Hans Hut and Hans Denk (q.v.) he was made leader of the Augsburg congregation. Under his brief but active leadership in the spring of 1528 the congregation, some of whose first leaders were languishing in prison, increased in strength. His work also took him out to the surrounding communities; he held services at Göggingen near St. Radegundis, in Wellenburg near St. Severin, in the valleys of the Lech and Wertach, and baptized a number of new members, most of whom were soon seized and imprisoned or expelled from the city.

Nespitzer again and again urged his hearers to repent. Great distress would come upon the Brethren, "which would begin at Easter." When news of executions came, he comforted the brotherhood. "Now you see that persecution is setting in against the house of God. Be of good cheer. Indeed, the Lord will not tarry long, He will come to our aid." After the time of tribulation the time of the establishment of the kingdom would begin.

The poverty that overtook the refugee Brethren in Augsburg Nespitzer sought to ease by appointing deacons; these were Georg Schachner of Munich, Augustin Bader (q.v.), and two who later died as martyrs, Hans Leupold (q.v.) and Bernhard Zurgkendorfer of Göppingen.

Persecution at other places became more severe. Nespitzer's brother-in-law Eucharius Binder (q.v.) was surprised at a meeting with 36 Brethren in Salzburg on Oct. 27, 1527, and was burned to death with them in the building. At the Easter service in Augsburg in 1528, which was led by Nespitzer and Hans Leupold, the city council had all those participating arrested (43 men and 45 women). Leupold was beheaded on April 25, 1528, and Nespitzer and the others from outside the city were expelled; he preached for a time in Franconia and then went to Strasbourg in 1529, where he was seized. In the face of the persecution before him he rendered the required recantation and lived in seclusion in Leutershausen near Ansbach (Wappler, 36), leading a God-fearing life, as the mayor and council of the city reported (TA, 196). When it was discovered that he had once belonged to the Anabaptists he was arrested but released upon public confession in the church and an oath of loyalty (TA, 197).

Two epistles from Nespitzer's hand have been preserved (TA, 168 f., and Wappler, 306 f.), in which he urged an earnest, penitent life. HEGE.

Fr. Roth, Augsburger Reformationsgeschichte (2d ed., 1904); idem, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Oberschwaben," Ztscht des Hist. Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg, 1901, 8; TA Bayern I; Wappler, Thüringen; Wiswedel, Bilder II, 48-51; ML III, 204 f.

Nesselbach Mennonite Church, a congregation in northern Württemberg, near Crailsheim, Germany, belonging to the Verband (q.v.). It was founded about 1890. It has always been small in size, having 20 baptized members in 1956. Its present elder-pastor is Jakob Glück. Services are held on the first Sunday of each month in rotation in Nesselbach, Klumpenhof, and Erkenbrechtshausen. H.S.B.

Nestler, Hermann (b. 1879), teacher at the Gymnasium in Regensburg, Bavaria, Germany, and superintendent of education in Passau, author of the meritorious book, Die Täuferbewegung in Regensburg; Ein Ausschnitt aus der Regensburger Reformationsgeschichte (Regensburg, 1926). This book relates in detail the rise of the Anabaptist movement in Regensburg (q.v.) and its suppression. The numerous court records of Anabaptist trials (82 in number) in the Regensburg city archives are especially valuable; they are given verbatim. (ML III, 205.) NEFF.

Netherlands. The term Netherlands is here used as it existed geographically and politically in 1957, i.e., without Belgium (q.v.), but including Limburg (q.v.), which in the 16th century belonged to Jülich (q.v.), and also including IJssel Lake and other coastal inlets. This area, covering 15,765 square miles in 1950, had a population of 9,625,499.

In the history and life of the Netherlands the Anabaptist-Mennonites have occupied an important place, in the first place by their numbers. Originally they comprised a large segment of the population of the provinces of North Holland, Friesland, and Groningen. In Friesland it has been estimated that

Mennonite congregations in the NETHERLANDS
● Congregations
★ Brotherhood Houses
☐ Children's Homes
○ Larger towns
† Old People's Homes
(See also maps of Provinces of Friesland, Groningen, and North Holland.)
0 10 20 30 40 50
Scale of miles
1 Giekerk
2 Veenwouden
3 Zwaagwesteinde
4 Warga
5 Poppingawier
6 Terhorne
7 Akkrum
8 Oldeboorn
9 Tjalleberd
10 Woudsend
11 Koog+Zaandyk
12 Wormer-Jisp
13 Middelie
14 Westzaan
15 Purmerend
16 Den Ilp
17 Landsmeer
18 Monnikendam
19 Knollendam
20 Krommenie
21 De Rijp
NORTH SEA
IJSSEL LAKE
JUIST
BORKUM
ROTTUM
SCHIERMONNIKOOG
AMELAND
TERSCHELLING
VLIELAND
TEXEL
Hollum
Nes
Ballum
Terschelling
Ternaard
Holwerd
Blija
Hallum
Oude Biltzijl
StAnnaparochie
Berlikum
Franeker
Leeuwarden
Harlingen
Baard
Ylens
Pingjum-Witmarsum
Makkum
Sneek
Bolsward
Workum
IJlst
Hindeloopen
Koudum
Stavoren
Warns
Balk
Heerenveen
Joure
Irnsum
Grouw
Witveen
Dantumawoude
Kollum
Noordhorn
Den horn
Grijpskerk (Pieterszijl)
Surhuisterveen
Rottevalle
Drachten
Ureterp
Lippenhuizen
Gorredijk
Bovenknijpe
Wolvega
FRIESLAND
Mensingeweer
Oldehove
Uithuizen
Bijldijk
Middelstum
Loppersum
Leermens
GRONINGEN
Groningen
Noordbroek
Winschoten
Roden
Sappemeer
Veendam
Oude Pekela
Nieuwe Pekela
Stadskanaal
Assen
Emden
DRENTE
Emmen
Fredeshiem
Samen Een
Steenwijk
Giethoorn
Kraggehuis
Blokzijl
Meppel
Hoogeveen
Zwartsluis
Noordoostpolder
Kampen
Zwolle
OVERIJSSEL
Almelo
Borne
Hengelo
Enschede
Gronau
Zutphen
Colmschate
Deventer
Elspeet
Apeldoorn
GELDERLAND
Arnhem
Winterswijk
Doetinchem (Kr.)
GERMANY
Oosterend
Waal
Den Burg
Den Horn
Den Helder
Hypolitushoef
Zijpe
Barsingerhorn
NORTH HOLLAND
Twisk
Medemblik
Schoorl
Nieuwe Niedorp
Enkhuizen
Broek op Langendijk
Alkmaar
Hoorn
Heilo
N. Einde v. Graft
Graftdijk
Castricum
Graft
Beemster
Wormerveer
Edam
Beverwijk
IJmuiden
Zaandam
Haarlem
Nieuwendam
Hoofddorp
AMSTERDAM (Seminary)
Aalsmeer
Naarden-Bussum
Hilversum
Baarn
Amersfoort
Leiden
THE HAGUE
Voorburg-Rijswijk
Bilthoven
Utrecht
Schaerweyde
Zeist
Heerewegen
Gouda
Oud-Wulven
UTRECHT
Delft
SOUTH HOLLAND
ROTTERDAM
Doorwerth
Wageningen
Tiel
Gorkum
Nijmegen
Rhine
Ouddorp
Dordrecht
'sHertogenbos
Vught
Breda
NORTH BRABANT
ZEELAND
Middelburg
Vlissingen
Goes
Eindhoven
Aardenburg
Antwerp
BELGIUM
LIMBURG
Krefeld
Cologne
Brussels
Heerlen
Maastricht
Aachen
Liége

they composed one fourth of the entire population. But their importance lay also in their participation in the culture of the Netherlands. Many of Holland's most famous poets and painters, e.g., Carel van Mander, Joost van den Vondel, van der Goes, Lambert Jacobsz, Ruysdael, Jacob and Adriaen Backer, van Mierevelt, father and son van Hoogstraten, were Mennonites. Distinguished scholars in all areas of knowledge, businessmen of note, and top bankers were produced by the Mennonites. After 1795 there were also Mennonites in high official positions. Some of these were cabinet ministers, one of whom was C. Lely, who laid the plans for the reclamation of the Zuiderzee, and others were governors of the Dutch East Indies or mayors of the large cities, as Amsterdam, The Hague, and Haarlem.

But there is still another reason for the importance of the Mennonites in the Netherlands. Whereas in other parts of Europe they were either completely wiped out or after severe persecution reduced to a small percentage of the population, in the Netherlands the Anabaptists, after the first half century of persecution, were permitted to develop in comparative peace and live in accord with their type of faith, their undogmatic Christianity, which was true to the Gospel but without binding formulations and was especially strong in its practical aspects.

I. The Rise of Anabaptism (1530-67)

1. The Early Leaders of Anabaptism. It was slightly later than in Switzerland, Germany, Tirol, and Moravia, that Anabaptism appeared in the Netherlands. In 1530 Jan Volkertsz Trypmaker (q.v.) brought baptism upon confession of faith from Emden to the Netherlands. He had there come in contact with Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), a chiliast and Anabaptist Reformer, who had shortly before united with the Anabaptists in Strasbourg. In Friesland as well as in Amsterdam Trypmaker's sermons enjoyed a large following, while elsewhere, as in South Limburg, baptism upon confession of faith found entry into a small circle of friends of the Reformation. The movement spread with great speed; for at that early date there was already evident a growing spirit "of unecclesiastical independence and Biblical renewal of life, which can be best characterized as the Anabaptist spirit" (Kühler).

The fruits could mature here so quickly because the soil was ready for the movement. Even before 1530 there were in the Netherlands many friends of the Reformation, which had developed especially from the circles of the Devotio Moderna and their acquaintance with the Bible. It was in these circles that the preaching of Trypmaker and others was to crystallize baptism upon confession of faith as an external symbol into an Anabaptist church or brotherhood. Many of these congregations must have reached a large membership within a few months. Men like Obbe Philips (q.v.), who was the leader of a large congregation at Leeuwarden (q.v.) in Friesland, and Jacob van Campen (q.v.), who died as a martyr at Amsterdam in 1535, were a strong support. An eager expectation of the imminent kingdom of God prevailed. Hofmann's visits in the Netherlands (1531, 1532) and his writings had further strengthened these expectations. Those who were converted were baptized (the ceremony was simply the expression of the personal connection with God), and then patiently awaited the coming of the kingdom, living true to the evangelical demands of nonvengeance, nonswearing of oaths, uprightness, and love of one's neighbor.

2. Persecutions. The imperial government at Brussels, and Charles V (q.v.) most of all, viewed the increasing decline of Catholicism and the growth of the Anabaptist movement with deep disfavor. Various proclamations were issued, beginning in 1521, against the spread of the Reformation. The proclamation of June 10, 1535, opposed the Anabaptists exclusively. It was of extreme severity and announced that anyone who refused to recant, who had rebaptized others, or who claimed to be a prophet, apostle, or bishop, would be sentenced to death by fire; any who were rebaptized but recanted, or who harbored Anabaptists, would be sentenced to death by beheading, or in case of women, by drowning. This threat was repeated through provincial and local authorities. The Frisian Stadholder in 1534 commanded by means of proclamations that "the damned sect of the Anabaptists" be exterminated. Thus the government insisted on severe persecution; nevertheless the authorities of the cities and provinces were reluctant to obey, and sabotaged the supreme commands, often because they were benevolently disposed to the Anabaptists as if they themselves had been members of the group.

But in the long run the Anabaptists met with severity, especially in the imperial crown lands, the provinces of Holland, Zeeland, and in the southern Netherlands. (During this time the emperor acquired all the provinces of the Netherlands: Friesland in 1524, Utrecht 1527, Overijssel 1528, Groningen 1536, Drenthe 1537, Gelderland 1543.) In the recently acquired areas the persecution was in general less severe; Groningen had only one Anabaptist martyr.

The severity reached its height, even the lesser authorities now co-operating, when the Münster episode of violence occurred and Jan van Leyden, who obtained the upper hand in the government of the "new Zion" in 1534, began to make himself felt in the Netherlands. On the whole, it may be said that the Dutch Anabaptists turned away from these horrors. A meeting of thirty-two Anabaptist leaders held at Spaarndam, near Haarlem, at the end of 1534 or early in 1535, for the most part repudiated all violence. Obbe Philips had broken completely with the violent element by 1533. But many Anabaptists, incited by interminable persecution, weary of passively waiting for the kingdom of God, lent an ear to the commands of the sly seducer to come to Münster, or fell into the trap of his criminal emissary Jan van Geelen (q.v.). Then when there were riots even in the Netherlands, i.e., the seizure of the Oldeklooster (q.v.) by a troop of revolutionary Anabaptists (March 30, 1535) and the attack on the city hall of Amsterdam (May 10, 1535), and other acts of violence here and there, the mania of persecution knew no bounds. Revolutionary and peaceful Anabaptists were lumped together into one class, although the authorities knew very well that there was a great difference between them, and that the latter had no other desire than to avoid all violence and in faithfulness to the Gospel to await the coming of the Lord. Men and women fared like Jan Pauw (q.v.), who said his heart did not testify to him to defend himself with a knife (beheaded March 6, 1535).

On June 25, 1535, Münster fell; Jan van Leyden's wicked role as king was finished, his unholy influence on the movement in the Netherlands ended. But for several years the revolutionary followers of Jan van Batenburg (q.v.) made the country unsafe and brought ill fame upon the peaceable Anabaptists, who would have nothing to do with him.

The persecutions continued to claim many martyrs. It has never been possible to determine their exact number. Kühler's estimate of about 1,500 is too low; 2,500 is probably more nearly correct. In the northern Netherlands Reytse Aysesz (q.v.) was the last to lay down his life for his faith. He was executed at Leeuwarden on April 23, 1574. In the South the last martyr was executed at Brussels in 1597.

3. Organization of the Congregations. At places Anabaptism was completely rooted out; e.g., at Maastricht and in the entire province of Limburg; elsewhere the movement persisted, and in these congregations a firm organization and church discipline arose concerning preaching, baptism, and the Lord's Supper. Of great importance was the fearlessness of the elders, who in almost complete disregard of danger—they were, of course, most sought after by the police—traveled about the country to preach and to serve with baptism and communion. Obbe Philips had been baptized by Bartel (Bartholomëus) Boeckbinder (q.v.). In 1534-36, the period of great difficulty, he had powerfully opposed all violence and ordained both his brother Dirk Philips (q.v.) and Menno Simons (q.v.) as elders. Although he grew discontented and withdrew from the brotherhood as early as 1540, his work must be remembered with gratitude. Other men took his place, especially Menno Simons, who had left the Catholic priesthood in January 1536, and after a period of quiet study of the Bible began in 1539, both by word of mouth and in writing, his task as the leader of the Dutch Anabaptists. In December 1542 a price was set on his head, in consequence of which he had to live outside the country. He stayed successively in East Friesland, the Rhineland, Wismar, and in his last years at Wüstenfelde, near Oldesloe. Dirk Philips also lived outside the Netherlands, at Danzig. But both of these elders made frequent journeys for longer or shorter periods to the Netherlands, and in addition strengthened the believers through writing. Menno died in 1561, Dirk in 1568.

Other elders continued their work. The most influential of these was Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.), elder from 1553, who with great zeal promoted the spread and strengthening of the brotherhood, and whose baptismal lists still bear witness of his indefatigable work; he baptized over 10,000 persons in 1551-82.

Thus the brotherhood seemed to be facing a promising and great future; the severe persecution did not prevent its spread; the Münsterite danger was past. David Joris (q.v.), ordained as elder by Obbe Philips in 1535, but motivated by ambition rather than love for the Gospel, arrived at the doctrine that it is possible to conform to the world. He was opposed by Menno (1539 ff.) by means of the principles of the Gospel and finally sought refuge in Basel (1544 ff.), but continued contacts with his followers in the Netherlands.

4. Differences Within the Congregations. Even though dangers from without had subsided, quarrels arose within the very circle of the brotherhood. In 1547 Adam Pastor (q.v.), an elder, was excommunicated on account of deviating views on the Trinity. On this occasion Dirk Philips and Menno Simons assumed the authority to ban, which properly belonged to the brotherhood. This was a basic alteration that became more and more incisive: Is the first authority the individual or the congregation? Finally the great conflict in Menno's life came, which had its basis in this question. Here a disparity of views among the Anabaptists became evident, which had actually existed from the very beginning and is still noticeable among the Dutch Mennonites. Whereas some experienced faith as a personal and inner relationship with God, considered baptism as a personal union between their conscience and God, knew nothing of dominant position either of the congregation or of the elders, wanted to make only a lenient use of the ban, and were disinclined to any formulating of the faith because they feared that the word of man might acquire more respect and power than the Word of God (in general the Spiritualist position), others held fast to the concept of the visible church as a church without spot or wrinkle, in which every individual subjected himself to the common brotherhood, recognized and desired the authority of the elders who would govern the congregation and apply the ban strictly against the unworthy and unbelieving, and demanded a firm system of doctrine expressed in a confession of faith, which to be sure never acquired complete authority as in other churches but was nevertheless of great authority and a means of separating the worthy from the unworthy. The latter party was in the majority.

II. The Period 1557-1664

5. Ban and Avoidance. In 1557 the strife flared up. Menno, who had at first taken a very moderate course in the application of the ban, now adopted a stricter course in compliance with the wishes of Dirk Philips and especially of Leenaert Bouwens. The section of the brotherhood that opposed them, the moderate wing, withdrew and were called Franekeraars (q.v.) or Scheedemakers (after their elder Jacob Jansz Scheedemaker, q.v.), but were most generally called Waterlanders (q.v.) because they had a large following in Waterland of North Holland. Fortunately the strife did not reach the point of banning one another, but the cleavage that had been revealed was not easy to bridge over.

6. Separation from the German Congregations. Division also arose between the Dutch and the German elders. Besides Menno's strict views of the ban (q.v.), his doctrine of the Incarnation (q.v.) of Christ was the cause of a division which was completed at a large conference of German Anabaptists at Strasbourg in 1557. This was the beginning of the divisions in the brotherhood, which was still suffering persecution, one such division following upon the other, so that an opponent could speak with a measure of correctness of a "Babel of Anabaptists." Menno banned all the "High Germans" and their followers.

7. Rise of the Waterlanders. The Waterlanders quietly built up their brotherhood, in which there was no place for dominating elders; they soon achieved a regulated, organized congregational life and an arrangement for mutual assistance in preaching. Excellent men served their congregations: Hans de Ries (q.v.), Reinier Anslo (q.v.), Anthony Roscius (q.v.), etc. Most of the Waterlander congregations were in the province of North Holland, but they had some congregations in other areas, some as far away as Belgium. They were the more progressive of the Anabaptists, but not liberal in the 19th-century sense of Modernism. They held to a strictly Biblical concept of preaching and faith, and among them was found a deep mystical conception of Christ. They were liberal in the sense that they were less conservative than the other wings, less firmly bound to tradition in clothing and church government. They were also peaceable toward the Frisians (q.v.) and Flemish (q.v.) as well as to the Remonstrants (q.v.), Collegiants (q.v.), and even the Catholics. Strange to say, it was these liberal Waterlanders who formulated the first confession of faith (1577), which was, however, by no means to be a binding rule of faith. The liberality in the lines drawn in this confession is significant. They recognized as true members of the church of Jesus Christ all men on earth who had achieved a renewal of the inner man through the power of God through faith. These Waterlanders called themselves Doopsgezinden, not Mennonites. They did not want to be named after a man.

8. Division Between Frisians and Flemish. Ten years after the first division a second one arose among the Dutch Mennonites (1567). Again Franeker was the scene of the conflict. Here as elsewhere a number of Flemish had settled to escape severe oppression in Flanders. The difference in their manner of life, customs, and habits led to conflicts between them and the Frisians. A number of minor personal differences of opinion and increasing opposition between the two most powerful elders, Dirk Philips and Leenaert Bouwens, the former on the side of the Flemish and the latter on the side of the Frisians, were factors in the impasse reached when Jan Willemsz (q.v.) and Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.), who had been called as outside mediators (buitenmannen, q.v.) to settle the dispute, could not achieve more than a compromise. No lasting results were achieved, and the rupture broke open again. The Frisians and the Flemish banned each other in 1567. Later attempts at reconciliation such as the Peace of Humsterland (q.v.) of 1574 were a complete failure.

But this was not the end of divisions. Twenty years later there was a third flare-up in Franeker. Among the Flemish were Thomas Byntgens and his followers (Huiskopers), opposed to Jacob Keest (Contra-Huiskopers). At the bottom of this dispute about the purchase of a house lay a deeper conflict between the more conservative and the more moderate elements. Attempts to preserve unity failed, and soon the Flemish were divided into two camps. Not only in Franeker, but everywhere, even among the Mennonites who were not of Flemish origin, there were the Huiskopers (q.v.), usually called Old Flemish, and Contra-Huiskopers (q.v.), usually called Flemish or "Soft" Flemish.

The Old Flemish, the more conservative, banned from their midst the Vermeulensvolk (q.v.) or Bankrottiers (q.v.) in 1593, and soon afterward the Borstentasters (q.v.), who, however, soon returned or dissolved. Here and there small groups split off from the Old Flemish, but these also soon reunited with the larger group or died out.

In 1628 and the following years the Groningen Old Flemish divided from the (Soft) Flemish (in 1637 there was another division among the Groningen Old Flemish) on the grounds that the latter permitted mixed marriages and were lax in their application of the ban and avoidance. The Groningen Old Flemish were extremely conservative in clothing and home furnishings. They long practiced footwashing. Most of their following was in the province of Groningen and they were a closely knit brotherhood. Men like Jan Luies (q.v.) and Uko Walles (q.v., who was banished by the government on account of his peculiar views on Judas, and upon his return banished again in 1644) had great influence among them. The Danzig Old Flemish (q.v.) were just as conservative as the Groningen Old Flemish, but differed from them in the practice of footwashing in that only elders and visitors from a distance took part.

Nor did the Frisians avoid divisions. In 1598 in Friesland Jan Jacobsz (q.v.) of Harlingen and Pieter Jeltjes (q.v.) of Kollum were involved in a dispute. Jan Jacobsz, who was very strict, had acquired a considerable following, and the Jan-Jacobsgezinden soon had a number of congregations in Friesland as well as elsewhere, e.g., at Hoorn and Amsterdam. Their last congregation, on Ameland, united with the other local congregations in 1855.

9. Attempts to Unify. The continuing separations were certainly not favorable to the welfare of the brotherhood. Some, who believed that the church of God could not exist where there were so many divisions, turned their backs to the brotherhood. Others, of all parties except the extreme Old Flemish and Old Frisians, insisted upon reunion. As early as 1591 the Young Frisians and the High Germans united. Before the merger an agreement was drawn up known as the Concept of Cologne (q.v.). Soon, especially upon the insistence of Hans de Ries, many Waterlanders joined the union, which became known as the Satisfied Brotherhood (see Bevredigde Broederschap). A new spirit arose among the Mennonites. To be sure a request of the Satisfied in 1603 to the Frisians and Flemish to merge had no success; on the contrary, about 1613 a large number of Young Frisians and High Germans separated from the Satisfied Brotherhood (see Afgedeelden) under the leadership of Leenaerdt Clock (q.v.); but the wish for unity had after all made itself felt.

About 1610 the Frisian and Flemish congregations in Harlingen united. Also in 1626 four preachers of the Flemish congregation in Amsterdam sent their confession, the Olijftacxken (Olive Branch), as an overture of peace to "the dear brethren, ministers, and elders of the congregations in Groningen, Friesland, Overijssel, Utrecht, Haarlem, and Zeeland." In 1630 an agreement was actually reached between the Flemish on one side and the United Frisians and High Germans on the other. The United Frisians and High Germans had also drawn up a confession for this purpose, named after Jan Cents. This beginning of an agreement led in 1639 to a complete unification of the two branches. The Olijftacxken was also very successful. In 1632 most of the Old Flemish united with the Flemish, on the basis of the Confession of Adriaen Cornelis (q.v.), also called the Dordrecht Confession because the conference had been held at Dordrecht. There were still remaining apart the group of the Old Frisians and several congregations of the Old Flemish; likewise the Groningen and Danzig Old Flemish pursued their former course; the others had now found their way to each other.

Only the Waterlanders were still standing to one side, for no fault of their own. Although their great leader Hans de Ries died in 1638 his spirit remained among them, which constantly worked in the direction of unification. In 1626 the Flemish had not offered their Olive Branch to the Waterlanders, perhaps because the differences were too great. There were indeed deep differences between them. The Flemish were more dogmatic and the Waterlanders not at all so; their confessions stressed faith much more than theology. The Waterlanders, who wanted to be bound only to the Holy Scriptures, viewed with concern the authoritarian position of the Olijftacxken. In addition there were differences in church regulations. The Waterlanders observed communion seated around a table, the Flemish while at their seats. Nevertheless the Waterlanders in their conference of 1647 decided to offer Christian peace to the others. The Flemish reply, which was not given until 1649, was negative: if the Waterlanders really wanted peace they would have to begin to adapt themselves in life and teaching to the other Mennonites. Thus the general unification remained a pious wish.

10. Lamists and Zonists. Soon a new division was to rock the brotherhood. It occurred in the same church, bij 't Lam, at Amsterdam where on April 26, 1639, the reunification of the Frisian and Flemish was so joyfully celebrated, and where two of the preachers in 1664 were Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan (q.v.) and Samuel Apostool (q.v.). The latter was a man of the old type in whom there was still something of the idea that the Mennonite Church was the only true church, and who devoted all his preaching activity to the strengthening of this idea and insisted on a fixed confession. Galenus, on the other hand, in consequence of his association with the Collegiants and his leading role in peace meetings, was more liberal and warned against attaching too much value to the visible church. Both had a following. After much conflict mockingly called the "Lammerenkrijgh" (War of the Lambs) a schism occurred in 1664. Apostool with 500 members moved into a new meetinghouse, called "de Zon" (the Sun); Galenus with his following stayed "bij 't Lam." And so the more liberal Lamists stood opposed to the more conservative Zonists. This opposition was not confined to Amsterdam; the schism reached all of the Netherlands. And even if the quarrel had lost the violence of the former days, nevertheless any opportunity to achieve unity was destroyed for two centuries. The old partisan designations "Frisian" and "Flemish" disappeared in this new quarrel. Several remnants of the Old Frisians or Old Flemish remained by themselves, but gradually either united with the Zonists or disappeared. But most of the Waterlanders soon united with the Lamists, in Amsterdam already in 1668, and in many places soon afterward. From now on two types of Mennonites were referred to, viz., the Fijne (Fine) Mennisten (Groningen and Danzig Old Flemish, Janjacobsgezinden, etc.) and the Groove (Coarse) Mennisten (Lamists, Zonists, and Waterlanders). Thus the period of 1557-1664 was a time of division, approach, and new division.

11. Attempts by the State Church to Suppress the Mennonites in Spite of General Toleration. Many changes took place in the mutual relationships between church and state and also in the internal organization of the Dutch Mennonite church. At the beginning of this period bloody persecution still dominated. This ended with the coming of the Eighty Years' War (the war of liberation from Spain 1568-1648) and the rise of Calvinism in the Netherlands. To be sure there were among the Calvinists some who wished to continue the previous proceedings against the Anabaptists; but William of Orange (q.v.), who was becoming a more and more powerful leader in the revolt against Spain, emphatically opposed them; he wanted toleration. When the Mennonites at Middelburg had difficulties with the authorities established by the Calvinistic preachers, he defended them and secured for them release from the oath and military service. The Union of Utrecht (1579) designated that no one was to be persecuted for his faith. But the Reformed, as the followers of Calvin's doctrine called themselves in the Netherlands, and especially their preachers, tried with all the means at their disposal to interfere with the liberty of the Mennonites to confess their faith freely. In the first place came a long series of violent polemics against the Mennonites, to which the Mennonites replied in writing. But also the synods, especially the provincial ones, sometimes demanded severe measures against the Anabaptists, for which however they usually found no hearing. Looking through their fingers the magistrates tolerated the Anabaptists and saw to it that Calvinistic intolerance would not oppress "our best citizens." On several occasions the building of a Mennonite church was temporarily prevented, as at Franeker in 1611, at Haarlem in 1626, and at Leeuwarden in 1631. The frequent interference of the Reformed preachers in the worship services of the Mennonites was odious, but their attempts to convert the Mennonites failed. Several times the Mennonites had religious disputations with the Reformed clergy, such as the debate by Peter van Coelen with Ruardus Acronius at Leeuwarden in 1596. But these debates were soon abandoned, since the authorities regarded them with disfavor and a number of times forbade them.

Difficulties with the government on the oath and military duty occurred repeatedly, even after the intervention of Prince William in Middelburg, whereas Prince Maurice followed his father's attitude. But these differences did not lead to oppression. The Anabaptists generally obtained the rights of citizenship, substituting a vow "by manly truth" for the oath.

The release from the bearing of arms was obtained by paying a fee or a poll tax and fulfilling their obligation to the government in special services, such as providing food, extinguishing fires, and digging trenches. There was also some difficulty with regard to marriage. Mennonite marriages were usually concluded before the secular authorities, after the bans had been published three times in a public church service. Here and there rules were passed excluding Mennonite children from inheritance, but very likely these severe rulings were only laxly enforced.

Gradually the attitude of the government to the Anabaptists changed. This change has been recorded in two resolutions: in 1583 the "Closer Union" of Utrecht states that the Reformed religion is to be maintained and perfected in the United provinces, "without permitting public instruction . . . for several other religions in the presently united provinces." On the basis of this regulation the Reformed preachers considered it their right to annoy the Mennonites and to prejudice the government against them. The regulation passed in 1651 even designated that "the sects and religious parties" which were excluded from the public protection and are merely tolerated were to hold their services in all quietness, and only in the places where they had previously held their meetings. Both of these resolutions were occasionally seized upon by the Reformed Church to annoy the Mennonite congregations, as happened at Sneek in 1601, but on the whole the Mennonites were able to live and worship relatively undisturbed.

Now the motive of the Reformed in interfering was a different one: the charge that many heresies were being taught among the Mennonites, such as "the horrible error of Socinus" (q.v.). Actually the Mennonites, never having been theologians, were not always immune to the Socinian opposition to the doctrine of the Trinity, the Satisfaction of the Atonement, and other questions.

12. Participation in the Civil Life of the State. Although the attitude of the government toward the Mennonites had changed (however, the stain of Münster still clung to them in the eyes of the state), the attitude of the Mennonites to the state also underwent a profound change. Good friends of the fatherland, thankful for the ground upon which they lived and for the protection they received—this they had always wanted to be, even when their principles forbade active participation in the conflict with national enemies. Already in 1574 a large sum of money was presented to Prince William in his military camp at Roermond in the name of the Mennonites. In 1666 and again in 1672 the Mennonites raised large loans which made it possible for the state to carry on its war with four foes. In Friesland in 1666, 50,000 guilders was raised, in 1672 again 400,000 guilders, and in 1673 again a significant sum was raised. This assistance more than anything else added to the appreciation for the Mennonites by the state and the public.

Much earlier than this the Mennonites of the Netherlands had been aware of a task in this world. When their expectation of the coming kingdom was not fulfilled, their attention gradually shifted more to this world. An appreciation of the national community, the state, culture, and art, arose, first among the Waterlanders. By 1581 the Waterlanders permitted their members to hold government offices, and after that time many of this branch held such offices. They did not shut their congregations off from the world; Joost van den Vondel (q.v.), a poet and dramatist, felt himself at home among them and served the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation as deacon. Hans de Ries (q.v.) was a friend of the humanist Dirk Volkertsz Coornhert (q.v.), whom Kühler called the Sebastian Franck of the Netherlands, and was strongly influenced by him. But the fact that a Carel van Mander (q.v.) could be a member of the Old Flemish group (1602) shows that a change was in progress here too. The fact that among the Mennonites, with the exception of the extreme groups, there was strong sympathy for the Remonstrants, who were likewise under persecution by the Reformed Church, speaks for itself. This sympathy was mutual; the Remonstrants at first used Hans de Ries' confession of faith. On the other hand, when the Remonstrants at Rotterdam proposed a union with the Waterlander Mennonites, objections arose. The Flemish now also began to be more open to the world and seemed to be receptive to Socinianism (q.v.), for which their Elder Jacques Outerman had to answer to the authorities in 1626. Finally during this time the Flemish as well as the Waterlanders took part in the Collegiant (q.v.) movement; their free-speaking meetings were frequently held in Mennonite meetinghouses.

13. The First Historical Writings. However great the changes had been, the bonds with the past remained. This is shown by the interest in the martyrs. In the very earliest time testimonies and songs about the martyrs were loyally gathered and by 1599 had been published at least eleven times (first in 1562) in the Offer des Heeren. In 1615 Hans de Ries published a new Historie der Martelaren (History of the Martyrs), which appeared in a second edition in 1631 under the title Martelaers-Spiegel (Martyrs' Mirror), the first use of this title in Mennonite literature. The Old Frisians, who considered themselves the true spiritual descendants of Menno Simons and were unable to accept such a work by the Waterlanders whom they did not regard as true Mennonites, published a new edition of this work in 1617 under the title Historie der Warachtige Getuygen (History of the Genuine Witnesses), with some additions, but without the important foreword by Hans de Ries, substituting for it a confession of faith. It also enjoyed a second edition in 1626 under the title Historie van de Vrome Getuygen (History of the Pious Witnesses), in which the "unorthodoxies" in the martyr book of 1617, which they had thoughtlessly accepted from the book of 1615, were now corrected. Then T. J. van Braght, preacher of the Dordrecht congregation, published in 1660 his Het Bloedig Tooneel der Doops-gesinde en Weerloose Christenen (The Bloody Theater of the Mennonite and Nonresistant Christians), which was reprinted in 1685 with Jan Luyken's etchings under the somewhat modified title Het Bloedig Tooneel of Martelaers Spiegel (The Bloody Theater or Martyrs' Mirror).

III. The Period of Decline 1665-1810

14. Differences Between the Lamists and the Zonists. Very soon after the division between the Lamists and the Zonists occurred, attempts were made to heal the breach (1672, 1684, 1685, 1691), but in vain. To be sure, the other small schismatic groups merged again into the larger streams, but the two main streams, Lamists and Zonists, remained separate throughout the 18th century, with opposite courses. The Lamists, often called the "Coarse," paid little attention to doctrinal confessions, were rather free in their attitude toward tradition, and had much association with the Collegiants and the Remonstrants. Even though some nuances were evident, they were mostly Spiritualists (q.v.) advocating an individual concept of faith, with the congregation occupying a secondary place. The Zonists, on the other hand, preferred to call themselves Mennists or Mennonites, as if they were still on the platform of Menno Simons. They had a very high regard for the authority of the congregation, held fast to the ban even though perhaps more in name than in actuality, and laid great stress on the extant confessions of faith; even not rarely leaning toward confessionalism. In 1665 they published De Algemeene Belijdenissen (q.v., General Confessions; i.e., Concept of Cologne, Outerman's Confession, Olyftack, Jan Cents' Confession, and Dordrecht Confession). Shortly after this a somewhat surprising trend to confessionalism is found among the Waterlanders; they forsook their former spiritualism, and now stressed the confession of Hans de Ries, and many of their congregations, particularly in the province of North Holland, joined the Zonist Conference. Again about 1750 there was among the Dutch Mennonites an unusual interest in confessions. The Danzig Old Flemish produced one in 1743, the Groningen Old Flemish Conference (Sociëteit) one in 1755. Neither group had ever before drawn up a confession. The Zonist Conference in 1766 approved a confession drawn up for them by Cornelis Ris (q.v.). This confession, however, never came into general use among the Dutch Mennonites. Many of the Zonists, except for adult baptism, felt themselves more closely related to the Reformed Church than with their brethren in the Lamist camp. In the final period of the 18th century not only did many of them transfer their membership to the Reformed Church, but in 1766 the preachers Cornelis Ris and Jan Beets (q.v.) at Hoorn actually promoted the idea of a union with the Reformed.

15. Readiness to Help the Needy. However different, even hostile, some of the Dutch Mennonites of this time were to one another, in one matter they always co-operated harmoniously, namely, when aid was asked for oppressed or suffering brethren. How frequently this aid was asked! In 1696 they helped their brethren in the Palatinate. The sum of 20,000 guilders was raised to support the refugees who came to Crefeld and Groningen. In 1711 one hundred Swiss families came to the Netherlands, followed by others in 1713, for whom land and homes had to be procured. For this purpose the sum of 30,000 guilders was raised in 1711, and another large sum in 1713. Likewise in 1713 they helped the Mennonites in Prussia and Poland. For this work a permanent committee was established, the Committee for Foreign Needs (see Fonds voor Buitenlandsche Nooden) which had a definite fund after 1725. In 1732 they were able to provide shelter for more than 100 persons who had come from the Danzig area to the island of Walcheren and to Wageningen. Until 1790 occasional collections were raised for the Mennonites of Poland and Lithuania, who suffered from floods and other calamities. The Committee was dissolved in 1804; but occasionally relief was still given, as in 1886 for the Mennonites in the Marienburg Werder in Prussia, who had suffered severe losses by floods, and especially after 1920 for the Russian Mennonites. Not only were those of the "household of faith," the Mennonites in various countries, financially supported by the Dutch Mennonites, but also others; e.g., Waldensians, the Salzburg refugees, Polish Unitarians, and also many Reformed.

16. Forming Conferences. Schisms and strife had caused many to leave the brotherhood. There was reason for concern for the future. Discipline grew visibly lax. In 1700 the United Flemish and Waterlander congregation at Rotterdam invited all Christians to communion, with no question as to whether they had been baptized as adults. Small congregations were no longer entirely self-supporting and threatened to die out. Mutual assistance was necessary. Out of this need various conferences (Sociëteit) arose. Among the stricter Mennonites these conferences at first served to provide supervision of the teaching doctrine and discipline.

The Waterlanders seem to have been the first to recognize the need of common consultations. As early as 1568 their delegates met, meeting again in 1581, 1618, and 1647. Also the Groningen Old Flemish (25 congregations in Groningen, 10 in Friesland, 4 in Holland, and 5 in East Friesland) had apparently met regularly in the first half of the 17th century. This developed into the Groningen Old Flemish Sociëteit. Although in the later period this conference no longer met regularly and many congregations outside the province dropped their membership in it, it existed until 1815. Beside this first sociëteit there was a second in the province of Groningen. the Humsterland Sociëteit, which originally embraced 10 congregations in Groningen and Friesland. It existed until 1829.

In North Holland the Frisian congregations had in all probability also united into a conference in the first half of the 17th century. This Frisian Sociëteit met regularly until 1818, but dissolved in 1841 into the Rijper Sociëteit. This latter (Waterlander) Sociëteit had been meeting since about 1640. A noticeable characteristic of this conference was the fact that whereas all the other conferences consisted of preachers and deacons, the Rijper Sociëteit held two meetings, one for the preachers and one for the deacons. The former was discontinued in the late 18th century; at present the deacons meet regularly in De Rijp.

In 1675 the delegates of the Lamist congregations of South Holland met (the Amsterdam and Haarlem congregations also belonged to this conference). This conference also gave the initiative for the founding of the Sociëteit of Friesland, which united a large number of Mennonite congregations in this province and until 1791 also included three congregations in the province of Groningen. The Sociëteit of Friesland met for the first time in 1695. It is still in existence, all the 47 congregations in the province of Friesland being members.

In addition a Zonist Sociëteit arose in 1674. The first objective of this conference was the application of the confession of faith. In 1674 it issued the Grondsteen van vreede en verdraegsaemheyt tot opbouwinge van den tempel Christi onder de Doopsgezinde (Foundation Stone of Peace and Tolerance for the Building of the Temple of Christ among the Mennonites). Some Waterlander congregations joined it. An attempted union with the Frisian Sociëteit in North Holland failed in 1723. Nor did a planned merger with the Groningen Old Flemish Sociëteit in 1766 succeed. The Zonist Sociëteit met until 1796 when the Amsterdam congregation dropped its membership. These conferences not only benefited the congregations by preventing their disintegration, using the means of mutual support, but they also brought together like-minded groups.

There were many changes in church life in the 18th century. The office of elder, as the one who alone could administer baptism and communion, gradually fell into decline. It was maintained longest among the Groningen Old Flemish (until 1749). Everywhere else local ministers also administered baptism and communion; their burdens were thereby increased. In many instances these brethren, chosen from the congregation, of whose piety there was no question but whose education was slight, did not feel equal to the task. There are reports that they were less competent than the Reformed and Remonstrant preachers and that therefore many members left the Mennonite congregations. In addition, the love for the office of preaching was decreasing, so that congregations that had formerly had four to six preachers now had none. A desire arose for more educated preachers. An early solution to the problem was to choose for the ministry men who had studied medicine and therefore had some scholarly training. Examples of such physician-preachers were Anthony Roscius, who died in 1616 at an early age; Jan Willemsz in De Rijp (b. 1587); Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan, who assumed the ministerial service in the Lamist congregation in Amsterdam (d. 1706); the Zonist preacher and historian Herman Schijn (d. 1727); and Gerardus Maatschoen (d. 1751). But the congregations wanted more. Especially in the conference of South Holland the question of theologically trained preachers arose a number of times. Galenus Abrahamsz offered to acquire special training, and the Lam en Toren congregation at Amsterdam paid the expenses. So Galenus began his activity in 1680, serving until 1703. The church board was unable to find a successor for him when he retired. Oncoming preachers now had to study under Remonstrant professors in order to follow the lectures at the Remonstrant seminary, which had existed at Amsterdam since 1639. But when this practice issued in Remonstrant graduates being called to Mennonite congregations, while there was a dearth of preachers among the Remonstrants and furthermore when difficulty arose between the Mennonites and the Remonstrants on the question of baptism, the Amsterdam Mennonite congregation decided to establish its own seminary. Attempts to interest the entire brotherhood in this project failed. The co-operation of other congregations was very slight, and the Zonists had doubts and objections. In 1735 Tjerk Nieuwenhuis (q.v.) became a professor of the seminary; he was succeeded by Heere Oosterbaan (q.v.) and Gerrit Hesselink (q.v.). The seminary soon thrived.

The Zonists also took steps to this end. Their conference in 1733 appointed their Amsterdam preacher Petrus Smidt as professor. Many oncoming preachers, however, continued to receive their training from other preachers, who made it one of their tasks to lead young people into the office of the ministry.

Still, all of these measures were not sufficient to halt the steady decline in membership. Whereas in the 17th century the small conservative groups sometimes disappeared unnoticed, now the main groups also declined in number, as the membership in almost all of the congregations decreased. In Haarlem the number of baptized Mennonites decreased from about 3,000 in 1708 to 488 in 1834; in Hoorn, where in 1695 there were about 450 Mennonites, the number decreased to 212 in 1747 and 119 in 1845. Vlissingen dropped from 230 members in 1660 to 99 in 1757 and 22 in 1834. In Friesland, where there had been some 20,000 members in 1666, the number fell below 13,000 in 1796; one third of the members had been lost since 1739. It was still worse in South Holland. Of the 27 congregations in existence there at the end of the 18th century only three remained—Leiden, Ouddorp, and Rotterdam. Whereas the number of Mennonites in the Netherlands in 1700 was still estimated at 160,000 souls, in 1808 there were only 26,953. From 1700 to 1800 exactly 100 Dutch Mennonite congregations disappeared. In 1837 there were only 15,326 baptized Mennonites in Holland.

What were the reasons for this decline? The general decline in interest that eventuated in indifference is striking. But specific causes of various kinds can also be given. The Mennonite congregations around the Zuiderzee, e.g., Hoorn, Makkum, Hindelopen, Molkwerum, were the victims of the economic decay of these towns when the thriving Baltic trade disappeared. Many Mennonites were no longer satisfied with the occasionally very simple sermons of the lay preachers, and sought edification with the Remonstrants and the Reformed. Others—and their number was not small—went over to the established church in order to procure for themselves and their descendants the right to accept honorable government positions. Increasing wealth and luxury, about which Galenus Abrahamsz had already complained, also led to indifference on the part of many. Some who were unhappy in the separation of church life from the general life of the country went to the free-speaking meetings of the Rijnsburger Collegiants; but these also declined from the middle of the 18th century. Led by the new spirit of the Enlightenment, and influenced by the current literature, Mennonites of this type finally turned their backs on the brotherhood altogether.

Finally, the Reformed clergy was still watchful against heresy, even though not with the same violence as in former times, attacking especially Socinianism, which they thought they saw—and sometimes not mistakenly—in the Mennonites. Real Socinianism, however, passed over into a wider liberalism. In 1722 a doctrinal formula was drawn up for Mennonite preachers in Friesland to sign, which was to determine their orthodoxy. All but one refused to comply, not primarily because they were sympathetic to liberalism, but because they considered the signing of such a formula as un-Mennonite. For the time being the matter remained quiescent, but finally the Reformed clergy managed to have the capable preacher Johannes Stinstra (q.v.) at Harlingen deposed from his office by the government of Friesland on the grounds of heresy, and required to remain inactive until 1757.

But aside from these and a few other instances, the Dutch government was benevolent in its attitude. As early as 1671 bequests could be made for the Mennonite poor in Amsterdam. In Friesland—here and in the province of Zeeland the Mennonites had most to suffer from the hostility of the Reformed clergy—a bequest to the Molkwerum congregation was still forbidden in 1705, and in Witmarsum until 1753. Even though full legal equality was not attained until 1796, in many respects the magistrate came to the defense of the Mennonites. Thus it was gradually found satisfactory to have Mennonite marriages solemnized before their own congregations, provided the government were notified beforehand or within a definite period afterward. Since the time of the Batavian Republic (1796) civil marriages have been obligatory for all persons in the Netherlands including Mennonites.

17. Relaxation of Church Regulations. The ancient landmarks of the brotherhood gradually fell into decay. Mixed marriages (with someone outside the brotherhood), which had in the previous period been the occasion for much strife, were, to be sure, still forbidden by the "Fine" Mennonites, but for the most part nothing happened if a Mennonite married a non-Mennonite. Also the ban, at least the "great ban," in which the church member was excommunicated from the congregation, hardly ever was used after the mid-18th century. But the small ban, which meant exclusion from communion until correction of the error, was still applied, e.g., when young men sailed on armed boats. About 1765 a woman was refused communion at Terhorne because she was wearing a gold cap. In 1701 (records of the Frisian Sociëteit in North Holland) there was some complaint that decline was taking place in the attitude on mixed marriage, the ban, footwashing, and the furnishing of or sailing on boats with arms. Especially in the principle against bearing arms was there laxity of application. The doctrine was defended in books, and now and then the ban was pronounced against an offender (in Texel as late as 1793), and the Zonist Sociëteit called the bearing of arms "a deviation from the Mennonite principles," but the doctrine was less and less regarded. After 1784 many Mennonites, especially in North Holland, enrolled in the militia, although this practice was by no means generally approved. In 1799, when the old Mennonite privilege of release from the bearing of arms was canceled, there was no general movement of protest. Only a few congregations complained. Upon a petition of the congregations of Haarlem and Rotterdam made to Louis Napoleon in 1806 this privilege was restored, but when the Netherlands was incorporated into France in 1810 it was again abrogated. The issue did not become acute until the introduction of compulsory military service in 1898.

Although the Waterlanders had early broken through the separation of the church from the world, in which the Lamists soon followed, in the 18th century the conservatives tried passionately to keep the church away from the world, but without success. They too had to surrender to the spirit of the time. It is noteworthy that the Zonist hymnal of Amsterdam of 1796 had more of a rationalistic spirit than the hymnal published by the Lamist congregation in 1792. The conservatives were turning about-face; the "liberals" remained true to their genius; the liberals had very early seen the untenability of isolation. Indeed, as noted above, by 1700 the Rotterdam congregation decided to invite all Christians to communion, without requiring adult baptism; the visible church had ceased to be considered a reflection of the kingdom of God. It is characteristic that in 1700 and a few times later some were baptized in the Waterlander congregation at Grouw and other congregations, and "were not received into our brotherhood, but were baptized into the general Christian church." In this, Collegiant influences are clearly discernible. The extent of friendly relations between the Mennonites and the Collegiants here and there is indicated by the fact that in 1715 the two groups in Groningen used the same meetinghouse, Mennonite services being held in the morning and Collegiant services in the afternoon. The Mennonite church council of Zwolle went still further, deciding in 1808 that henceforth baptism as an infant would be accepted as valid in the case of members of the Reformed Church who wished to transfer to the Mennonite congregation. This extreme position also prevailed at other places. In the early 18th century Remonstrant ministers preached at Mennonite services, e.g., in the Waterlander congregation at Leeuwarden. Nevertheless the Mennonites valued their independence; for in 1796 when the Remonstrants circulated among all the ministers of the Protestant churches in the Netherlands a proposal that all unite with them into a single Christian brotherhood all the Mennonite congregations except Dokkum (q.v.) rejected the idea; in Dokkum this union was formed in 1795.

18. Prayer and Singing. Within the congregational life there were also many changes. Silent prayer was gradually replaced by audible prayer, the Waterlanders and Lamists having completed the change by 1661. In 1770 silent prayer was still practiced in a number of congregations. Audible prayer was introduced in the Ameland congregations in 1789; the last congregation to hold fast to silent prayer was Aalsmeer, which gave it up in 1867.

In many congregations the singing was now accompanied by an organ. The first organ in a Dutch Mennonite church was installed in the Utrecht Church in 1765; it was followed by Haarlem in 1771, Rotterdam in 1775, Amsterdam bij 't Lam in 1777, and by Zaandam Nieuwe Huis in 1784.

The hymnal also underwent changes (see Hymnology). There had been singing in the Anabaptist-Mennonite churches from very early times, usually Biblical hymns and martyr hymns. Later, numerous collections of hymns were made: Hans de Ries's hymnal of 1582, the various Hoorn hymnals (issued as late as 1732 for the Groningen Old Flemish and the Balk—q.v.—congregation in 1814), Alle Derk's Lusthof des gemoeds with its supplement the Achterhofje, which were used here and there until the 19th century. In addition, some non-Mennonite hymnals were used; e.g., D. R. Camphuizen's Stichtelijcke Rijmen (Devotional Poems) or the much-used Lusthof der Zielen (Pleasure Garden of the Soul) by the Remonstrant notary Claes Stapel of Hoorn. The Psalms in various versions were also sung. Besides the mediocre versification of the Psalms by the Reformed minister Petrus Dathenus (q.v.), a new translation was introduced in the Lamist church in Amsterdam in 1684, which was replaced in 1770 by the versification by the poetic society Laus Deo, Salus populo (q.v.), which had been used by the Zonist congregation since 1762. Since 1713 Haarlem had had its own version of the Psalms, which was also used in other congregations. Later also the new Reformed version of 1773 was introduced here and there; and the evangelical Reformed hymns of 1807 and also its supplementary volume were used in many congregations.

Between 1792 and 1811 at least four new hymnals were produced, consisting for the most part of hymns taken from the previous books, viz., 1792 the Kleine Bundel (Lamist Amsterdam), 1796 the Groote Bundel (Zonist Amsterdam), 1805 the Old Haarlem Bundel, 1811 the Uitgezochte Liederen (Leiden and Zaandam-West). These collections were used in other congregations besides the ones they were published for. (See Hymnology.)

19. Church Architecture. In this period, in which the Mennonites became prosperous, not to say wealthy, new churches were built, even though the government did not permit building in the open. Besides the characteristic frame churches which were built in North Holland and of which a number of beautiful specimens are still standing, e.g., in Krommenie, West-Zaan Zuid, and Zaandam, there were also "barn" churches, like those still standing at Zijldijk and Nes in Ameland. But also larger churches were built in the 18th century, like the splendid church at Rotterdam, which was destroyed on May 13, 1940, during World War II. (See Architecture.

20. Benevolent Institutions. The economic well-being of the Dutch Mennonites was expressed not only in church architecture and equipment, but also in the provisions made for the care of the aged and orphans. By 1630 Gerrit Franken van Hoogmade established the Bethlehem hofje (old people's home) at Leiden, and bequeathed it to the Waterlander congregation. In 1624 Elisabeth van Blenckvliet, the widow of Jaques van Damme, contributed an orphanage to the Flemish congregation of Den Blok in Haarlem. About the same time some other hofjes were established at Amsterdam and Haarlem. The Waterlander congregation of Leuwarden acquired its Marcelis Goverts Gasthuis in 1669. In the course of the 17th and 18th centuries many congregations, even small ones, acquired hospitals and orphanages, sometimes given by individuals, sometimes built by the congregations. The Flemish congregation at Leiden in 1660 established the Hoeksteen hospital, and the United Flemish and Waterlander congregation at Zaandam built an orphanage. (See Homes for the Aged and Orphanages.) Also the care of the widows of ministers was taken in hand. In 1794 the Rijper Sociëteit established a fund for this purpose, and in 1804 the Frisian Sociëteit followed suit and others also followed later (see Pensioen Fonds).

But their benevolence was not limited to members of the Dutch Mennonite congregations. The contributions raised for fellow believers in other countries as well as for non-Mennonites, e.g., for the oppressed French Reformed under Louis XIV, have already been mentioned. The contribution of the Dutch Mennonites for the common national welfare has not been slight: the association for the rescue of shipwrecked persons, the fund for the widows of shipwrecked sailors, the seminar for navigation, the Maatschappij tot Nut van't Algemeen (q.v.) founded by Jan Nieuwenhuizen (q.v.), all were established principally on Mennonite initiative.

Among the many who might be named with honor for their contribution to the common welfare or to scholarship, an outstanding benefactor was Pieter Teyler van der Hulst (q.v.) of Haarlem, who at his death in 1778 bequeathed his property for the establishment of the Teyler Foundation (q.v.), which supports an excellent museum and has done much for the promotion of scholarship in Holland, especially theology.

21. Confessional Equality. The political changes in the Netherlands in the last fifteen years of the 18th century were extensive. The whole nation was divided into two parties, the Orangist (Monarchist) party and the Patriot party which was strongly influenced by ideas coming from France. Most of the Mennonites joined the Patriots (q.v.). Even though they did not forget the privileges and the protection which they had always enjoyed at the hands of the House of Orange, they were still only a tolerated sect in comparison with the Reformed Church, and whereas the Reformed clergy and the regents, their natural opponents, were fiery Orangists, it was to be expected that the Mennonites, who as individualists warmly accepted the new French ideas which fitted so well their religious ideal and their true position, should feel quite at home among those who stood for "liberty, equality, and brotherhood."

Actually the republic did away with the hated position of inferiority and brought them the desired equality with the Reformed Church. In the National Assembly of May 23, 1796, a resolution was unanimously adopted, "that since religion is now separated from the state there shall no longer be a preferred religion in the free Netherlands."

22. Founding of the General Mennonite Conference (A.D.S., i.e., Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit, q.v.). The difficult times which followed did not pass without affecting the life of the brotherhood. One result was the reuniting in 1801 of the two Amsterdam congregations, the Lamist and the Zonist. The general impoverishment of the people also affected the congregations. For instance, through a reduction of the fixed income of pensioners and other causes, the annual income of the Amsterdam congregation was reduced by 34,000 florins. It became impossible for the congregation to maintain the Seminary without outside help. And so in 1811 it finally became possible to accomplish what had been impossible in 1735, namely, the establishment of a general conference (A.D.S.). Almost all the Dutch congregations joined the new conference. The A.D.S. now took on the care of the Seminary and thus continued the work which the Amsterdam congregation had for three quarters of a century carried on alone for the welfare of the whole brotherhood and which had already become such a great blessing to the church. Furthermore the A.D.S. took upon itself the task of financial assistance for the salaries of ministers in the weak congregations. So in 1811 a new era dawned for the Mennonites in the Netherlands.

IV. The Modern Period 1811-1957

23. The Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. In the first years of the new era little was accomplished in the new direction. The Mennonite congregations also had to bear their share of the troubles of the French Empire, viz., the large reduction in financial income, and the loss of freedom. The year 1815 brought liberation. Now the new age could begin, which brought about the equalization of the Mennonites with all other denominations, which so many had longed for in the 18th century.

During this period practically all the congregations came to the place where they secured preachers who had received scholarly training in the Seminary, but there have always been laymen here and there who carried on the work of preaching without training. Only one congregation, that of the Old Frisians at Balk, refused to join the A.D.S.

The Seminary carried on a work of real blessing. Professor Hesseling died in 1811; Rinse Koopmans (q.v.) was his successor, although he could not begin his work until 1814. After his death two professors were chosen, and since then there have regularly been two. These have been Samuel Muller (q.v.) 1826-56, W. Cnoop Koopmans (q.v.) 1826-49, J. van Gilse (q.v.) 1849-60, S. Hoekstra Bzn (q.v.) 1857-92, and J. G. de Hoop Scheffer (q.v.) 1860-90. Hoekstra and de Hoop Scheffer were from 1877 also professors at the University of Amsterdam, which was opened in that year. In that year the instruction in the Seminary was reduced in amount, and the students were sent to the university to take their examinations. The later professors were all university professors also: Samuel Cramer (q.v.) 1890-1912, J. J. le Cosquino de Bussy (q.v.) 1892-1916, W. J. Kühler (q.v.) 1912-46, J. G. Appeldoorn 1916-33, W. Leendertz 1946-56, and J. A. Oosterbaan 1956- . Since the death of de Bussy there has been only one professor besides one or two lecturers.

Two of the professors in the Seminary require special mention. The first was Samuel Muller (q.v.), who was responsible for raising the Seminary to a high level and whose ideal it was to give the Mennonite preachers a scholarly education on a level with that of the older denominations. He brought a new spirit into the brotherhood and gave the impulse to an intensive study of Mennonite history. The second was Sytse Hoekstra (q.v.), who found (or created) a type of modernism (liberalism) which suited the Dutch Mennonites, and of whom Muller testified that he was "probably the keenest thinker which Holland produced in the 19th century in this field." Mennonite history was taught at the seminary by Muller, de Hoop Scheffer, Cramer, Kühler, and since 1946 by N. van der Zijpp. W. F. Golterman has since 1946 been lecturer in practical theology.

24. Theological Alignments. Following 1815 there was at first no spiritual revival in the brotherhood. A moderate supernaturalism was in general dominant, which gave due recognition to the Biblical events of salvation, but gave them a strong moralistic interpretation. Men liked to speak about the teachings of the good Jesus. A Christianity of virtue and enlightenment was preached. According to a tract of this time, the intention was to protect from decay the Mennonite body and its concern for a rational knowledge of God, for the general welfare, and for the consideration of virtue and piety. There was as much opposition to the Neology of the time which rejected everything, as there was toward a cheap sort of fanaticism. It was not until 1830 that a fresher spirit appeared; now there was a growing piety; Muller's influence was making itself felt; again preaching had Biblical theology for its content. But in opposition to this other persons arose, such as the Deventer minister J. H. Halbertsma (q.v.), who advocated a liberal rationalism. But the opposite extreme also affected the brotherhood; the Dutch revival movement known as the Réveil (q.v.) found supporters among the Mennonites. Never has a pietistic element been completely missing in the Dutch brotherhood. Among the supporters of the Réveil were Isaac Molenaar (q.v.), who was a minister in Leiden until 1818 and thereafter in Crefeld; Jan ter Borg (q.v.), who served in Amsterdam until 1828; Willem de Clercq (q.v.), who, like Willem Messchert (q.v.), left the brotherhood. Others were Jan de Liefde (q.v.), Johannes Molenaar's brother-in-law, who was a preacher in Zutphen until 1846, and Assuerus Doyer (q.v.), pastor at Zwolle. P. van der Goot (q.v.), preacher at Rotterdam and 1851-75 at Amsterdam, was a warm supporter of the Réveil in its later stages. Throughout the 19th century a noticeable pietistic tendency persisted in the Dutch brotherhood and likewise a more theological trend which rallied around Samuel Muller, especially in his later years.

At first, when the modernistic theology arose in the Dutch universities after 1842, the Mennonites were quite cool toward it, holding fast to supernaturalism. However, "under van Gilse the modernistic tendency approached the Seminary, and under Hoekstra and Scheffer in 1857 and 1860 it made its entry" (Cramer). This disturbed many. They wanted to hold fast to the Biblical, historical Christian note in the life of faith. D. S. Gorter (q.v.), a minister in several village congregations, who was known for his Doopsgezinde Lectuur (q.v.), wrote in 1856, "But this I know, I do not want to be either liberal or orthodox . . . but only Biblical." Pastor Sybrandy of Haarlem, who also feared a dangerous development, made a proposal in the meeting of the A.D.S. in 1866 that each candidate for ordination should be required to deliver an exposition of the Scripturalness of adult baptism, but the proposal was lost, with eleven of the seventeen votes against it. By no means all of those who voted against it were modernistic; among them there were certainly some who were moved by the fear of an un-Mennonite formalism.

By about 1871 modernism had won a general victory throughout the congregations, but there were still congregations and preachers, such as the ministers Taco Kuiper (q.v.) at Amsterdam and Jan Hartog (q.v.) of Utrecht, who rejected it. The change to modernism in the congregations had not produced many difficulties. Only in the Groningen congregation was there tension when, in 1867, the ministers J. W. Straatman (q.v.) and C. Corver (q.v.) proposed (1) that baptism be made optional, (2) to gradually do away with the communion service, (3) to permit the preachers to omit hymns, prayer, and Scripture from the service, and (4) to give them the privilege of choosing freely the content of their sermons on the major Christian holidays. When their proposals were rejected both pastors resigned. As a result of radical liberalism baptism was abolished in the Midwolda congregation; for a number of years no communion services were held in the Winterswijk (q.v.) and Franeker (q.v.) congregations.

The great majority of the Mennonites were modernistic, but because of Hoekstra's influence they did not usually belong to the radical left wing. Here and there were also quite a number who stood on the "right" as more evangelical. In Amsterdam there was an "Association for the Maintenance of God's Word in the Mennonite Congregations," which had a preacher of its own in 1892-1912 in the person of C. P. van Eeghen, Jr. (q.v.). The "leftists" and "rightists" both were able to find a place in the body of the brotherhood, and both bore with one another in a brotherly way. They not seldom even learned to appreciate each other.

25. The Activities in the District Conferences and Groups. It has been noted that at the beginning of this period the Mennonites were suffering heavy losses in membership. About 1830 the trend was halted. By 1855 a growth was reported, and although in the following years a number of Mennonites joined a schismatic Reformed group (known as the Doleerenden, i.e., "Troubled Ones") especially in the countryside in Groningen and Friesland, a growth in membership continued which was largely due to transfers from the Reformed Church of those who could not stand the increasingly (since 1875) confessional character of that church. Hence the period of 1880 to 1900 is characterized by growth.

Much credit is due to the A.D.S. for the manner in which it helped the brotherhood, both in the training of preachers and in strong financial support of the weak congregations. Various other organizations also made their contributions. The Mennonite conference in Friesland (Friesche Doopsgezinde Sociëteit) was still active. In 1826 a new conference (Sociëteit) was organized in Groningen, which also included the congregations of East Friesland in Germany. In North Holland the old Rijper Sociëteit continued its good work on behalf of the congregations. In 1840 the congregations in Overijssel, Gelderland, and Utrecht formed an association, which was joined in 1858 by the congregations in South Holland and Zeeland, and which in 1885 called itself the Zwolsche Vereniging.

In the 19th century a number of district organizations, called Rings, were established for the purpose of helping to maintain a good supply of preaching, particularly when a pulpit was vacant or the preacher ill. Each Ring served about 10-15 congregations. The oldest is Ring Akkrum (1837), followed by Ring Bolsward (1840), Ring North Holland with two chapters (1844), Ring Dantumawoude (1850), Ring Twenthe (1856), Ring Arnhem (1856), Ring Zwolle (18__), Ring South Holland-Zeeland (18__), and finally in the 20th century, split off from Ring Arnhem, Ring Utrecht-het Gooi (1947). The Groningen Sociëteit also acts as a Ring.

In 1861 the Haarlem Vereniging of Mennonite congregations was founded, which among other things furnished certifications and looked after scattered members living outside the regular congregations. From 1896 on visiting preachers were provided to minister to Mennonites living where there were no congregations. The Haarlem Association continued until 1925.

In 1794 the congregations in North Holland and in 1804 those in Friesland established a Fonds (foundation) for the support of the widows of Mennonite preachers, and in 1810 a similar fund, the Zwolsche Fonds, was established, which merged with the older North Holland Foundation in 1897. In 1835 the Groningen Sociëteit had also established a foundation for widows. At the same time foundations were established to pay pensions to retired and invalid ministers, such as the Zaansche Fonds (1848; see Algemeen Emeritaatsfonds), the Friesche Emeritaatsfonds, and the Groningen Fonds (1917). In 1929 the A.D.S. established a foundation for the increase of pensions. In 1865 the Foundation for the Increase of Salaries was established, and in 1917 the Menno Foundation was established for the same purpose, while in 1912 the Dienstjaren Fonds (q.v.) accomplished the same purpose by granting supplementary payments to preachers who had served ten years or more and had low salaries. The A.D.S. established a general Pensioenfonds in 1946.

26. New Congregations. Since 1811, 30 new congregations have arisen, some of them at places where there had been a Mennonite congregation in earlier times. The 25 are Mensingeweer 1816, Tjalleberd 1817, Beverwijk ca. 1825, Stadskanaal 1848, Pekela 1852, Arnhem 1852, Wolvega 1861, Koudum 1867, St. Anna-Parochie 1871, Huizen-Hilversum 1878, Meppel 1879, The Hague 1881, Apeldoorn 1896, Assen (as Kring or circle 1896, as a congregation 1898), Breda 1896, Dordrecht 1896, Wageningen 1896, Zwaagwesteinde (Kring 1904, congregation 1942), Amersfoort (Kring 1905, congregation 1923), IJmuiden 1909, Bussum (Kring 1909, congregation 1915), Baarn (Kring 1909, congregation 1921), Delft (Kring 1918, congregation 1923), South Limburg (Kring 1924, congregation 1931), Eindhoven (Kring 1929, congregation 1936), Zeist (Kring 1929, congregation 1931), Haarlemmermeer 1950, North East Polder 1953, Roden 1954, Emmen 1957, Buitenpost 1957.

There are now (1957) in the Netherlands 136 congregations, of which, however, a considerable number have joined with other neighboring congregations in a pastoral circuit with one common pastor. In addition there are 24 circles (Kring). The total baptized membership is 38,446. Detailed statistics of membership appear at the end of the article. In January 1957, 16 congregations had no pastors, but there were a total of 109 pastors serving in congregations, besides three in general work. Of the 112 preachers 25 were women. In most of the congregations new meetinghouses and parsonages have been built since 1811. Four meetinghouses, completely destroyed during World War II, i.e., at Rotterdam, Wageningen, Vlissingen, and Nijmegen, have been rebuilt by the support of the Noodfonds, a fund established by the A.D.S., to which congregations and private persons have liberally contributed, in addition to state aid.

Since 1811 only two Mennonite congregations have become extinct, the small one at Appelsga (q.v.), which was founded at the beginning of the 19th century, and Maastricht (q.v.). The property of the Maastricht congregation, which became extinct in 1815, was taken over by the state. The Dordrecht congregation also died out and lost its capital, but a new congregation arose in 1879. In 1853 most of the Old Frisian congregation at Balk, which had stood quite alone in maintaining its old customs and insisting on the wearing of outmoded clothing, emigrated to North America, settling near Goshen, Ind. A chief reason for the emigration was that it was no longer possible to secure exemption of the young men from military service.

A number of congregations which were located side by side in the same town merged during this period; e.g., Joure in 1816, IJlst 1817, Grouw 1827, Sneek 1838, Ameland 1855, Aalsmeer 1866, Oldeboorn 1886, Wormerveer 1899, Westzaan 1930, and Zaandam 1949. The Swiss congregations at Kampen (1822) and at Groningen (1824) also joined older Dutch congregations.

27. Congregational Life. The inner life of the brotherhood has also experienced changes. In the 1870's much attention was given to the question of baptism, and a number of articles on the subject appeared in the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen. As has been noted above, members of other denominations who had been baptized as infants could be admitted into the church at Zwolle and elsewhere in 1808 without baptism upon confession of faith. Although this was not universally approved it came to be a permanent practice in the brotherhood. In a meeting of the Ring South Holland-Zeeland in 1864 the general opinion was that such candidates should be rebaptized. But in 1871 the Midwolda congregation in Groningen decided that one could become a church member without being baptized. The congregation at Vlissingen actually voted to accept transfer members without baptism, action which stirred up trouble. In 1879 a conference was held in Amsterdam under the leadership of Jacobus Craandijk, pastor of Rotterdam, to discuss this matter. Here Jeronimo de Vries, pastor at Haarlem, proposed that baptism be made optional, and added that he had no objection to its complete elimination. On the opposite side were the Amsterdam leaders (Pastor T. Kuiper, H. S. van Eeghen, F. Muller, and others), who insisted that there must be adult baptism on confession of faith: "It is Christ's command." No agreement was reached.

In many congregations it became a custom to accept members of other creeds without adult baptism, which is now the general practice. Personal choice as to baptism or no baptism in admission to the church, as had been practiced at Midwolda, did not appeal to the churches, even though now and then an individual was admitted without baptism.

The Lord's Supper, although especially in Friesland it still enjoys a warm participation which is shown in faithful attendance, is no longer the heart of the congregational life as it formerly was, although in recent times a change to a higher evaluation has been noticeable. In Winterswijk, after it had not been observed for several years, the Lord's Supper has been observed again since 1910. In Franeker it was abandoned in 1915, but observed again regularly since 1934. The Lord's Supper is usually observed once a year; in some congregations the members are seated around the table, in others they remain at their places while the pastor(s) and deacons hand them the bread and wine. In Amsterdam both methods are used.

Now congregational singing in all the congregations is accompanied by an organ. About 1910 the last congregation decided to install one. After 1811 the content of the songbooks also changed somewhat. Amsterdam introduced Christelijke Gezangen (2 volumes) in 1848, in 1849 Rotterdam adopted the Remonstrant hymnal in a revised form. In 1851 Haarlem adopted a new hymnal, Christelijke Kerkgezangen. Amsterdam introduced its two new hymnals, Christelijke Liederen, in 1870. All these hymnals were also adopted in other places. In 1882 the Dutch Protestant Union adopted a hymnal; in 1920 a continuation of this hymnal appeared, which was also adopted in many Mennonite churches, first in Texel (1885). Haarlem received new hymnals once more in 1895 in two books, of which the first was a selection of Mennonite hymns, and the second the Protestant Lutheran one with some changes. In 1897 the ministers J. Sepp and H. Boetje issued the Leidsche Bundel (q.v.), which was widely used. In 1900 it was followed by a selection from the Psalms. Thus there were still in the congregations ten or more different hymnbooks in use. This diversity in hymnals remained until after World War II, when the new Doopsgezinde Bundel was introduced, which is now used in all but one or two congregations.

In 1911 at Bovenknijpe Miss Anna Zernike, the first woman preacher in the brotherhood, delivered her initial sermon (see Mankes-Zernike, Anna); the meeting of the A.D.S. of 1905 made this possible. Women also were made members of the church councils, the first ones shortly after 1900. Now nearly all the congregations have women on their church boards.

Since the beginning of the 20th century the usual worship service has no longer been the sole form of congregational life. Lectures and "devotional hours" are held. In addition Sunday schools and youth work, choirs, and sewing societies were founded everywhere, and later sisters' associations and occasionally also brothers' associations, while also youth associations are found nearly everywhere.

The relationship to the state has remained as it was regulated in 1796. The church is separated from the state. There is no longer any privilege granted to members of a particular church. By means of this equalization it became possible for Mennonites to occupy a relatively high percentage of state offices, even the highest. When the law of 1815 and again that of 1817 offered the Mennonites the use of some funds as state contributions for the pastors' pay for many congregations and a children's supplementary grant for the preachers, at first a few could not make up their mind to accept them. An important sum was actually raised for this support to prevent the acceptance of state funds, but gradually the doubt disappeared, and now the supplementary "Rijkstraktement" and "Kindergelden" are generally accepted. By the law of Sept. 10, 1853, each congregation is a church unit and has the legal rights of a person. When the government wants to reach the Mennonites as a whole it addresses itself to the A.D.S. In 1898 once more the old Mennonite privilege of release from military service was discussed. In that year a law was passed making it a personal obligation to serve, which did away with the hiring of a substitute which had been valid since 1799. This older regulation, according to which any one who had to become a soldier could employ a substitute, was often made use of by the Mennonites. No opposition to this new ruling came from the church. But there were difficulties. This was shown in World War I. Finally the law of alternative service was formulated (1925) in favor of the Mennonites and other antimilitary groups, giving those who had conscientious scruples the opportunity of service in a number of nonmilitary state tasks.

The work of the Mennonite Missionary Association (q.v.), which was founded in 1847, has been of great importance. Above all, thanks to the activity of P. van der Goot (q.v.), this mission work was also supported since 1855 by Mennonite congregations in Germany and Russia. In the Netherlands there was on the whole no great love for the mission work; in later years this noticeably changed; especially since the funds no more flowed in from foreign countries many Dutch Mennonites felt the support of the mission to be their obligation. The annual meeting of the A.D.S. (General Dutch Mennonite conference) of 1957 resolved that missions are henceforth not to be promoted by a special mission association; they are to be the concern of the whole Dutch Mennonite brotherhood.

The Mennonites of the Netherlands have felt themselves more drawn to works of mercy than of missions. Especially in the first half of the 19th century many devoted their strength and time to the Association for the General Welfare (Maatschappij tot Nut van't Algemeen), especially for the improvement of the school system and popular education, as well as the system of savings banks. The Amsterdam Mennonite Church established its own savings bank in 1844. The Mennonite congregations of Amsterdam, Haarlem, and several others, have their own system of care for their sick. Haarlem has a Mennonite school; Amsterdam and a number of other congregations conduct their own social service. In 1912 an association was formed for the care of neglected Mennonite children, but this was of short duration. The Mennonites preferably worked in the general organizations such as the Groene Kruis (q.v., Green Cross), an association instituted by the Mennonite minister F. C. Fleischer (q.v.), or in "Tot Steun" (q.v.), an association for the care of neglected children and also for the care of the sick and the fight against tuberculosis.

Many congregations have for a long time had their orphanages and old people's homes. Recently three such homes for the aged were founded for more general use: Spaar en Hout at Haarlem (1930), Mooiland at Heelsum near Arnhem (1936), and Avondzon at Velp near Arnhem (1939). Others were founded after World War II. The Groningen congregation has since 1929 had a rest home.

The Hollandsch Doopsgezind Emigranten Bureau (q.v., Mennonite Emigrant Committee), which supported Mennonites in their emigration from Russia and gave good support to the new Mennonite settlement in Brazil, began functioning in 1924. In 1938 the Commissie voor Buitenlandsche Noden (Commission for Foreign Needs, q.v.) awakened to new activity. In 1939 the Doopsgezinde Hulpfunds (Mennonite Relief Bureau) was established to aid Mennonites and others (Jews expelled from Germany).

In many respects the Mennonites have gone their own way, but there has always been some co-operation with others, especially with the liberal part of the people. There was opportunity for common work in the field of social service, but also in more spiritual fields. Together with the liberal Reformed, the Remonstrants, and the Evangelical Lutherans, the Protestant Union was established in 1870. In 1923 the Central Commission of Liberal Protestantism came into being, from which among other things the liberal Christian radio originated. The A.D.S. is a member of this Central Commission, but only as a representative of a majority of the Mennonite congregations, not of all. Several Mennonites are members of this Commission.

In 1917 the Gemeentedag-Beweging (q.v., Movement for Church Conferences), now called Gemeenschap voor Doopsgezind Broederschapswerk (q.v.), was organized for the purpose of strengthening the general, provincial, and personal religious life, and the congregational life of the Mennonites in the Netherlands. This movement, in which at first especially the more orthodox Mennonites felt at home, has been a blessing to many, and by creative initiative has refreshed spiritual life. The first Gemeentedag was held Aug. 2-4, 1917, at Utrecht. In 1918 Gemeentedagen were held at Utrecht, Wormerveer, and Heerenveen, in 1919 at eight places. The Algemeen Gemeentedag has been held regularly at Elspeet since 1928. Here in 1925, at first on a small scale, later more extensively, a conference site was created which has become the center of the movement, sometimes also called the Elspeetse Vereniging (Elspeet Association).

The "work groups" and the commissions within the Elspeetse Vereniging have developed into great significance. Among these groups were the Arbeidsgroep van Doopsgezinden tegen de Krijgsdienst (q.v., Work Group of Mennonites Against Military Service), which worked for a revival of the old principle of nonresistance, the Commission for Mennonite Catechism Camps, and above all the Commission for Mennonite Crisis Work (for unemployed).

The youth work has grown greatly. The beginning was a meeting for young members held at Lunteren in 1922, which soon developed into an annual Youth Conference held customarily in Elspeet. One fruit of this was the Doopsgezinde Jongeren-Bond (q.v.) or DJB (Mennonite Youth League). Out of a similar youth conference held in Friesland in 1922 developed in 1924 the Friesche Doopsgezinde Jongeren-Bond (q.v.) or FDJB, which remained in close association with the general Youth League. In 1941 this general Youth League, which included youth of 18-35 years of age, had 70 circles with a total of approximately 1,000 members. These circles had regular meetings locally, and in addition sent delegates to the provincial and general youth meetings. It should be noted in contrast to the plan in other Mennonite groups that the youth work in Holland is not a work for the benefit of youth, managed from above, but its leadership and work are actually in the hands of the young people.

The Gemeentedag-Beweging also sought and found new contacts with foreign Mennonites and other related groups. Foreign delegates have repeatedly taken part in the Elspeet meetings, and Dutch delegates and youth groups have attended meetings in foreign countries. Contacts were also made with the Quakers in England. In 1925 a brotherhood house was built at Elspeet, in 1929 a second called Fredeshiem (q.v.) near Steenwijk, and in 1932 a third was built at Schoorl (q.v.). These houses have a double purpose; they are not only to serve as convenient places to hold conferences, but also as retreat places for vacationers and those in need of relaxation. At Giethoorn (q.v.) there are two youth camp houses, Kraggehuis and Samen-Een. In 1937 the Amsterdam and Utrecht congregations jointly purchased the brotherhood house at Bilthoven (q.v.).

In 1923 the A.D.S. was reorganized in such a way as to become a general representative body of the Mennonite congregations in the Netherlands. Various kinds of work are now done by the A.D.S. which were formerly done by other organizations. For instance the ministry to the Mennonites in the diaspora was taken over by the A.D.S. New forms of work were also inaugurated, and since then the weekly journal, the Zondagsbode, has become its official organ. In 1940 an organic association was established between the A.D.S. on the one hand and the Elspeetsche Vereniging, the Mennonite Youth League, and other organizations on the other. In 1927 the General Mennonite Preachers' Association (ANDPV) was founded, which meets twice yearly.

The Dutch Mennonite press is quite extensive. In addition to the Zondagsbode, established in 1887, other journals have appeared, such as the Brieven (q.v.), published since 1918 by the Elspeetsche Vereniging (since 1925 as a monthly), and De Hoeksteen, published by the Youth League. Since about 1910 gradually some fifty circles and congregations have begun to publish a monthly periodical. Beginning in 1731 the directory (Naamlijst) of Mennonite ministers was published, though irregularly, which later was continued in a sense as Mullers Jaarboekje (1837, 1840, 1850), Gorters Doopsgezinde Lectuur (1854, 1856, 1858), the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen, and the Doopsgezinde Jaarboekje. The last has appeared annually since 1901, The Bijdragen were published 1860 to 1919 (not published in 1866, 1871, 1913-15). They are a treasure house of historical materials. The Amsterdam congregational library has a large collection of historical works which are of great value to the church as a whole and support the work of the Mennonite Theological Seminary.

27. During and After World War II. On May 10-14, 1940, the Netherlands were overrun by the German armies. On May 14, the Dutch government capitulated and the war in a strict sense came to an end, but the following German occupation, in the southern Dutch provinces lasting until September 1944 and in the northern until April-May 1945, often was for the Dutch population as grievous and unbearable as the war, not only because of the constant air raids, both by the Germans and also by the English and Americans, but also because of the harsh measures of the German occupation officials, who according to the godless and inhuman principles of Nazism did all they could to smother democratic as well as religious life. Particularly the Jews were mercilessly persecuted; only a small percentage of them survived the occupation; the others were murdered or transported to Germany to die a cruel death in the extermination camps.

The German occupation forces at first left the Christian churches rather undisturbed, but particularly from the fall of 1943, though church services in general remained unmolested and free, church life was much hindered by the occupation regime, and little by little all congregational activity except church services was made impossible. It was the apparent intention of the occupation to replace in every sector of life the Cross of the Redeemer by Hitler's heathen cross (Hakenkreuz). The press was censored, and religious periodicals, including the Mennonite ones, were nearly all discontinued from 1943 on. All Mennonite congregational publications, and also Brieven (q.v.) and De Hoeksteen (q.v.) were suppressed. The Doopsgezind Jaarboekje for 1943 (published in November 1942) was the last to be published. The Zondagsbode (q.v.) had earlier already been forbidden by the Germans (last issue: June 21, 1942). Not only was the press eliminated; church conferences were prohibited and the lectures at the Amsterdam Theological Seminary were forbidden, although for some time they were conducted secretly in private homes. Charity by the churches was restricted, by the order of the Reichskommissar in Holland that all property of the deacon's offices was to be placed at the disposal of the Nazi government, which order was followed by no Dutch church (the order was later rescinded).

In the course of time secret organizations were founded everywhere to fight the occupying enemies and to frustrate their noxious measures, both those destroying material welfare and those wrecking religious values; in this underground movement also many Mennonites, including a number of pastors, were active. Some of them, whose activities were found out, were executed or died in prisons and concentration camps. Among these modern martyrs were two Mennonite ministers, A. Keuter (q.v.) and A. de Croix (q.v.).

During the occupation period the A.D.S. co-operated with the other Dutch churches in drawing up messages to be read from the pulpits in which strong protests were made against the intolerable orders and practices of the Nazis, as for example the persecution of the Jews. Repeatedly delegates were sent to the High Commissioner to point out the will of the churches not to tolerate the Nazi assault on Christian faith and morals.

The Arbeidsgroep van Doopsgezinden tegen de Krijgsdienst (q.v., i.e., Mennonite Work Group Against Military Service), doomed to inactivity and silence, together with the Dutch Quakers, found a Christian task in taking starving children to the country from the large cities like Amsterdam. Others organized an exodus of children from the heavily bombed city of Rotterdam to the northern provinces of Friesland and Groningen, where life was comparatively safe and food less scarce.

After liberation from the Germans in 1945 national and church life had to be reorganized. Gradually the wounds of the war and occupation were healed. In the Mennonite brotherhood, through the leadership of the A.D.S., a relief fund (Noodfonds) was founded for the rebuilding of destroyed and damaged churches. Besides the meetinghouses which had been completely destroyed, such as Rotterdam, Wageningen, Vlissingen, and Nijmegen, some others (Aardenburg, Goes, Zutphen, IJmuiden, Arnhem, and the parsonages of Hengelo and Hollum on the island of Ameland) had been damaged. The brotherhood houses of Elspeet and Schoorl also sustained considerable damage. All have now been restored; the new church of Vlissingen was dedicated on Feb. 20, 1949, Wageningen April 29, 1951, Rotterdam Dec. 21, 1951, and Nijmegen May 25, 1952.

Immediately after the war was over, in the southern provinces as early as the fall of 1944, representatives of the American MCC came to the Netherlands with their extensive relief program "in the Name of Christ," distributing food and clothing. They gave highly appreciated help to the pillaged and famishing Dutch people both Mennonites and non-Mennonites. It was then that Dutch Mennonites thankfully became aware of their coreligionists across the ocean. These incidental contacts, strengthened particularly after the MCC had moved to its center at Koningslann 58 in Amsterdam, where contacts could be more regular and thorough, have been—as it seems to the writer—stimulating and fruitful both for the Dutch and the American Mennonites. In this process light was thrown not only on the differences, which are large, but also on the common background and the unity of their Christian endeavors. At present the Dutch A.D.S., the Dutch Peace Group (Vredesgroep), and the MCC are co-operating in the management of the Mennonite conference and peace center at Heerewegen.

As a result of events, continuing the trend of its reorganization in 1923, the A.D.S. after the war became more influential in local church life, though each congregation retained in principle its autonomy as before. In 1949 the constitution of the A.D.S. was significantly amended: since then representation is no longer based on the financial contributions made to the A.D.S. by the congregations, but on the membership of the congregations. Besides the regular representation, delegates of the Mission Association, the Peace Group, and certain other associations are now admitted to the meetings of the A.D.S. as advisory members. Since 1946 the A.D.S. has had a full-time secretary (now R. de Zeeuw). In 1946 by creating a general Pension Fund (Pensioenfonds) the A.D.S. took over the responsibility for the pensions of retired ministers and widows; in 1955 the Dienstjarenfonds (q.v.) was taken over, and in 1956 a strong financial action was launched to raise the salaries of the ministers.

After the war (1948) a new foundation was established, called the Stichting voor Bizondere Noden (for special needs), which attempts to cope with the financial and material needs, both in the several sectors of the Mennonite brotherhood and beyond it. Each year at Pentecost an offering is taken in all Mennonite churches of Holland to enable this foundation to carry out its tasks, among which have been relief work in Vienna (together with the Peace-Group), the sending of Red Cross packages to the Mennonite congregations in East Friesland (Germany), aid to Mennonite refugees in Western Germany, relief action after the Dutch flood of Feb. 1, 1953, which had severely afflicted large areas of the South Holland and Zeeland islands, and founding the Van de Water House (q.v.) at Schoorl in 1951, where a number of DP's from East Europe found shelter. The foundation is still sending clothes and food to Berlin, and operating the Mennonite children's home at Houten (q.v.).

After the war the Work Group Against Military Service was changed into the Vredesgroep (Peace group); it started with renewed devotion and new activities. Only a small number of members have joined this group (600 out of 38,000 Mennonites), but about 40 per cent of the active pastors have done so.

The Youth associations of the Dutch Mennonites, Jongerenbond (q.v.), Elfregi (q.v.), and Menniste Bouwers (q.v.), were co-ordinated in the Doopsgezinde Jeugdraad (q.v., Mennonite Youth Council), since 1957 called the Doopsgezinde Jeugd Centrale. The several women's circles were organized into the Landelijke Federatie van Doopsgezinde Zusterkringen General Federation of Mennonite Women's Circles), 3,000 members, holding yearly delegate meetings in the Brotherhood house at Elspeet.

The Gemeentedagbeweging, also called the Elspeetse Vereniging, received a new name: Gemeenschap voor Doopsgezind Broederschapswerk (q.v., Fellowship for Mennonite Brotherhood Work) and resumed its activities. It now holds regularly an annual conference of members of Mennonite congregational boards at Elspeet.

The Dutch Mennonite Mission Association (q.v.) had much difficulty in resuming its work after the war. During the war contacts with the missionaries and the mission fields in Java became impossible; moreover because of the Japanese invasion in the Dutch East Indies (during which inflamed Mohammedans seriously damaged churches and hospitals, and some of the missionaries lost their lives), and finally after the declaration of independence of the Republic of Indonesia in December 1948, the fields were closed for Dutch missionaries. Fortunately the mission churches had organized as independent Mennonite congregations in 1940. Now only two Dutch Mennonite missionaries, viz., Jan Matthijssen and R. Kuitse, are in Java, the former as a general worker and the latter as an instructor in the school for the training of native ministers at Malang. In 1952 a new mission field was opened on Dutch New Guinea (q.v.).

The Dutch brotherhood introduced a new hymnal in 1945 called Doopsgezinde Bundel, which was to replace several older hymnals, and which now is used in all the congregations except one or two.

Great changes took place in the Dutch Mennonite press. The former Zondagsbode did not reappear; in 1945-46 a temporary periodical, De Noodbrug, was published by the A.D.S., and since October 1946 the Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad (q.v.), a weekly, has been the official paper of the A.D.S. The Doopsgezind Jaarboekje too made its reappearance for the first time after the war in 1949. The Brieven (q.v.) were resumed in 1946, but have been discontinued. As compensation for the dicontinuance of Brieuen, a monthly supplement, called Fundamenten en Bouwstenen (Foundations and Buildingstones) has been added to the Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad since 1956. De Hoeksteen (q.v.), edited by the Youth League, has been continued, and some new periodicals are being published by the Mennonite Youth Council. The Peace Group continues to publish its printed letter (Brief).

In 1954 a group of eleven young Mennonite ministers organized an Ecclesiologische Werkgroep (Ecclesiological Work Group) and published Doopsgezind Belijden Nu. In this booklet they criticize the Dutch Mennonite brotherhood for its liberal and individualistic views and its lack of a concept of objective truth. They stress the importance of a confession of faith, and offer a specimen of such a confession. This confession has not had much of an echo among the Dutch Mennonites, who, notwithstanding the fact that faith was deepened by the experiences of the war, with a turning away from too much moralism to more evangelical ideas, still do not in general place a high value on strict definitions in an objective creed, and who, even at present, are mostly individuals and spiritualists and are still predominantly liberal. However, there is a noticeable increase in ministers who hold an evangelical position as compared to prewar times.

New congregations founded after World War II are Haarlemmermeer in 1950, Noord-Oost-Polder (an area reclaimed from the former Zuiderzee) in 1953, Roden in 1954, and Emmen and Buitenpost in 1957. Moreover a large number of Mennonite circles (Kring) have been organized. New meetinghouses, apart from those destroyed during the war and since rebuilt, were built at Heerlen for the congregation of South Limburg (dedicated in November 1939) and at Zutphen (dedicated on Dec. 9, 1949). In 1940 new churches were dedicated at Gorredijk (on April 7, just before the outbreak of the war) and Hilversum (on Oct. 27, 1940, a few months after the war had broken out). After the war five new meetinghouses were erected: in Roden (1955), in the north section of Haarlem (1955), De Koog on the island of Texel (1955), in the west section of Amsterdam, formerly called Slootermeer (1956), in Warga (1956), and Buitenpost (1957). The latter two were erected by international Mennonite Voluntary Service units. A new home for the aged was opened at Heemstede near Haarlem in 1956. There are plans for more such homes. A new Brotherhood House was founded at Paterswolde near Groningen in 1956.

The Dutch Mennonites, though eager to preserve their own type of undogmatic Christendom and their own pattern of church life, co-operate with the ecumenical movement and take part in its activities. They are represented in the Dutch Ecumenical Council, and sent official delegates to the world assemblies at Amsterdam (1948) and Evanston (1954). vdZ.

N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952); W. J. Kühler, Geschiedenis I, II, and III; S. Blaupot ten Cate, Friesland; idem, Groningen I and II; idem, Holland I and II; Anna Brons, Ursprung, Entwickelung und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten (3rd ed., Amsterdam, 1912); Mellink, Wederdopers; Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis I, II, and III (Amsterdam, 1743-45); S. F. Rues, Tegenwoordige Staet (Amsterdam, 1745); I.H.V.P.N., Beginsel em Voortganck der Geschillen (Amsterdam, 1658; reprinted in BRN VII, 489-564); H. Bullinger and G. Nicolai, Teghens de Wederdopers (reprinted in BRN VII, 267-487); V. P. Successio Anabaptistica (reprinted in BRN VII, 1-87); J. H. Ottius, Annales Anabaptistici (Basel, 1672); S. Cramer, "Mennoniten" in HRE (1903) 594-616; C. Henry Smith, The Story of the Mennonites (Newton, 1950); P. van der Meulen, "Dutch Mennonites Unite During Crisis," Menn. Life III (July 1948); Pieter Langendijk, "Simplicity Laments Corrupted Manners," op. cit., X (July 1955); H. W. Meihuizen, "Basic Beliefs of the Dutch Mennonites," op. cit., XI (October 1956); Henk van Bilderbeek, "A Confession for Our Day," op. cit., XI (October 1956); ML III, 225-41.

Membership Statistics

(The statistics are taken from three sources; the first column from S. Blaupot ten Cate, the second from the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen for 1900, the third and fourth columns from the Doopsgezind Jaarboekje of 1940 and 1957; the figures indicate the baptized membership in the 138 congregations.)

Province of Friesland

	1837	1900	1940	1956
Akkrum	321	424	256	181
Ameland (the "Fine")	270	300	211
Ameland (the "Coarse")	50
Ballum				41
Hollum				105
Nes				40
St. Anna-Parochie	....	57	127	129
Appelsga	—	7	—	....
Baard	86	94	70	54
Balk	35	83	90	85
Berlikum	12	56	86	142
Bolsward	157	235	171	125
Bovenknijpe	123	178	119	94
Dantumawoude	207	278	270	244
Drachten and Ureterp	183	220	227	214
Franeker	95	128	183	120
Gorredijk and Lippenhuizen	118	166	156	150
Grouw	275	419	310	205
Hallum	20	56	152	155
Harlingen	272	556	404	367
Heerenveen	144	235	224	209
Hindeloopen	57	48	57	48
Holwerd and Blija	165	260	100	92
IJlst	135	101	86	81
Irnsum	60	154	108	96
Joure	200	360	277	240
Koudum	.	39	31	28
Leeuwarden	270	1,000	1,250	1,011
Makkum	90	89	57	48
Molkwerum	20	42	26	...
Noordoostpolder				60
Oldeboorn (Oude Huis)	142	493	274	182
Oldeboorn (Nieuwe Huis)	146
Oudebildtzijl	34	98	161	140
Poppingawier	27	91	52	45
Rottevalle and Witveen	72	101	124	145
Sneek	310	434	427	465
Staveren	25	89	59	56
Surhuisterveen	68	80	100	131
Terhorne	119	138	87	83
Ternaard	....	69	89	113
Tjalleberd	104	92	121	100
Veenwouden	36	136	173	200
Warga	159	180	86	80
Warns	108	149	105	101
Witmarsum and Pingjum	50	80	71	50
Wolvega		92	85	107
Workum	74	97	108	89
Woudsend	34	50	41	31
Ytens (formerly Kromwal)	65	122	90	95
Zwaagwesteinde	3	—	85	100
Total	4,941	8,176	7,386	6,672

Province of North Holland

	1841	1900	1940	1956
Aalsmeer (Uitweg)	64	654	721	648
Aalsmeer (Zijdweg)	105
Aalsmeer (Nieuwe vermaning)	120
Alkmaar	116	440	867	656
Amsterdam	1,641	5,010	7,781	5,500
Nieuwendam	23
Baarn	—	—	139	160
Barsingerhorn	240	435	284	210
Beemster	166	267	206	180
Beverwijk	15	141	467	467
Broek op Langendijk	26	100	177	116
Burg, Waal, and Oosterend op Texel	400	695	670	572
Bussum	—	—	305	429
Edam	26	80	139	104
Enkhuizen	43	86	115	89
Graft, Noordeinde	(1836) 50	70	60	45
Oost Graftdijk	50	38	67	65
West Graftdijk	24	40
Haarlem	593	2,250	4,608	3,458
Haarlemmermeer	—	—	—	150
Helder and Huisduinen	132	349	170	233
Hoorn	121	142	190	115
Den Hoorn op Texel	45	42	43	—
Hilversum—Huizen	—	291	600	780
Den Ilp—Landsmeer	47	72	119	80
Knollendam	60	130	85	35
Koog-Zaandijk	499	531	488	390
Krommenie	116	180	215	170
Medemblik	31	37	66	39
Middelie-Axwijk	135	185	163	109
Monnikendam	33	103	76	75
Nieuwe and Oude Niedorp	32	161	141	109
Pumerend	84	246	185	180
De Rijp	160	184	90	68
Terschelling	132	140	170	144
Twisk-Abbekerk	127	156	128	72
Westzaan-Noord	83	146	144	170
Westzaan-Zuid	105	116	81
Wieringen	140	275	403	330
Wormer and Jisp	58	96	121	80
Wormerveer Noord	78	460	458	369
Wormerveer Zuid	167
IJmuiden	—	—	170	225
Zaandam Oost	268	503	454	1,014
Zaandam West	483	753	763
Noord Zijpe	100	76	108	40
Zuid Zijpe	88	81		46
Total	7,026	15,761	22,237	17,722

Province of Groningen

	1840	1900	1940	1956
Groningen	370	1,017	1,142	1,163
Den Horn	100	67	85	44
Leermens-Loppersum	48	98	98	92
Mensingeweer	48	100	80	75
Middelstum	65	74	36	37
Midwolda c.a. (now Winschoten)	65	120	129	104
Noordbroek and Nieuw Scheemda	85	82	45	28
Noordhorn	60	89	69	70
Oude and Nieuwe Pekela	—	40	42	52
Pieterzijl (now Grijpskerk)	48	87	82	49
Sappemeer	350	494	265	270
Stadskanaal	—	106	73	85
Uithuizen	30	98	89	95
Veendam	160	240	160	127
Zijldijk	65	83	68	69
Total	1,494	2,795	2,463	2,360

Province of Drente

	1840	1900	1940	1956
Assen	—	45	71	86
Meppel	—	89	90	145
Emmen	—	—	30	43
Roden	—	—	—	39
Total	—	134	191	313

Province of Overijssel

	1840	1900	1940	1956
Almelo	73	125	162	192
Blokzijl	150	151	70	75
Borne	30	64	60	60
Deventer	80	255	427	325
Enschedé	65	180	560	625
Giethoorn Noord	60	490	436	389
Giethoorn Zuid	314
Hengelo	85	154	429	353
Kampen	97	172	150	127
Steenwijk (formerly Zuidveen)	135	190	185	167
Zwartsluis	40	31	21	21
Zwolle	85	219	203	240
Total	1,214	2,031	2,703	2,574

Province of Gelderland

	1847	1900	1940	1956
Apeldoorn	—	82	410	325
Arnhem	—	390	912	840
Nijmegen	28	244	325	135
Wageningen	—	65	146	240
Winterswijk	13	45	76	140
Zutphen	63	117	92	150
Total	104	943	1,961	1,830

Province of Utrecht

	1847	1900	1940	1956
Amersfoort	—	—	242	275
Utrecht	100	553	1,030	752
Zeist	—	—	333	313
Total	100	553	1,605	1,340

Province of South Holland

	1847	1900	1940	1956
Delft	—	—	116	134
Dordrecht	—	65	131	150
's Gravenhage	—	(1898)860	3,020	2,926
Leiden	43	460	429	500
Ouddorp	35	9	21	31
Rotterdam	195	(1898)500	1,252	989
Total	273	1,894	4,969	4,730

Province of Zeeland

	1847	1900	1940	1956
Aardenburg	50	71	100	100
Goes	14	51	37	50
Middelburg	92	194	138	107
Vlissingen	18	60	172	180
Total	174	376	447	437

Province of North Brabant

	1847	1900	1940	1956
Breda	—	41	61	103
Eindhoven	—	—	110	205
Total	—	41	171	308

Province of Limburg

	1847	1900	1940	1956
Zuid Limburg	—	—	101	160
Total	—	—	101	160

Summary by Provinces

	1840	1900	1940	1956
Friesland	4,941	8,176	7,386	6,672
Groningen	1,494	2,795	2,463	2,360
Drente	—	134	191	313
Overijssel	1,214	2,031	2,703	2,574
Gelderland	104	943	1,961	1,830
Utrecht	100	553	1,605	1,340
North Holland	7,026	15,761	22,237	17,722
South Holland	273	1,894	4,969	4,730
Zeeland	174	376	447	437
North Brabant	—	41	171	308
Limburg	—	—	101	160
Total	15,326	32,704	44,234	38,446

Total Mennonites According to the National Census
(including children)

	Dec. 31 1859	Dec. 31 1899	Dec. 31 1930	May31 1947
Friesland	5,762	14,943	12,371	13,442
Groningen	4,743	4,550	3,797	4,275
Drente	286	641	655	923
Overijssel	2,877	3,460	3,561	3,940
Gelderland	465	1,701	2,695	3,403
Utrecht	340	1,088	2,199	2,912
North Holland	15,713	26,508	28,124	28,492
South Holland	963	3,883	7,284	8,237
Zeeland	335	645	634	642
North Brabant	55	275	452	758
Limburg	14	92	240	396
Total	41,813	57,786	62,012	67,420

Netherlands States-General, the highest legislative and executive power in the Netherlands in the 16th-18th centuries, repeatedly acted in behalf of the oppressed and persecuted Mennonites abroad.

On Feb. 19, 1660, the States-General addressed the magistrates of Zürich, Switzerland, to demand for the Mennonites in this canton free departure with their property. At the same date a letter was sent to the magistrates of Bern, Switzerland, with an urgent request to release the arrested Mennonites. In 1687 the States-General sent Adolf de Vreede, a Dutch Mennonite, as an ambassador to Bern, to inquire into the conditions of the Mennonites, many of whom were then imprisoned in Bern. On March 24, 1695, the States sent a message to John William, Palatine Elector, in behalf of the oppressed Mennonites in this territory, asking compensation for the property confiscated from the Mennonites, and on June 24 of that year passed a resolution to intervene with John William in behalf of the Mennonites in the duchy of Jülich, Germany.

On March 10, 1710, a letter was sent to the government of Bern, interceding for the persecuted Bernese Anabaptists. Upon a petition by the Dutch Mennonites, the States resolved to instruct Louis Runckel (q.v.), their delegate in Switzerland, at Schaffhausen, to compile a complete list of the Mennonites then in prison for their faith, and to be concerned for the interests of the Swiss Mennonites. The expenses of this work by Runckel were defrayed by the States. Again and again the secretary of the States corresponded with Runckel, and the Mennonite archives of Amsterdam contain a large number of copies of letters by Runckel on the situation of the Bernese Anabaptists. When the government of Bern finally decided to deport a number of Mennonites to America, these were released by order of the States when the boats on which they were transported down the Rhine arrived at Nijmegen (q.v.) in the Netherlands. Again on Jan. 22, 1715, the States interceded by letter with the Bernese magistrates in favor of the Mennonites, still oppressed.

In 1732 the Dutch Mennonites drew the attention of the States-General to the situation of the East Prussian (Lithuanian) Mennonites, who were persecuted by Frederick William II of Prussia. On April 22, 1732, the States contacted Reinier van Reede tot Ginckel, their ambassador in Berlin, instructing him to present to the king a request which emphatically demanded that the privilege of religious freedom for the Mennonites be maintained and persecution cease. An extended correspondence between Ginckel and the Dutch States during the years 1732-38 shows what was done and how seriously the States were concerned with the interests of the East Prussian Mennonites.

Finally on Dec. 23, 1749, a resolution was passed in the States to intervene with the king of Poland in behalf of the Mennonites in West Prussia, especially of those in Danzig, who were in serious difficulty with the Polish officials. On this matter there are also many letters in the Amsterdam Mennonite archives showing how C. van Gemert, representative of the Dutch States at Danzig, and C. Calkoen, their ambassador at Dresden, defended the interests of the Mennonites in this area. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1746-1865; Mart. Mir. D 832-36, E 1131 ff.; Müller, Berner Täufer, 167, 184, 185-87, 193 f., 259-70, 280, 283.

Nette Lipkes (Lupkes, Lypkens) (d. 1567), a Dutch Anabaptist preacher at the time of Menno Simons. The two met in 1557 at Dokkum, Friesland, where Nette apparently was a preacher, and went together via Franeker to Harlingen, where the discussion on the ban took place. Afterwards, about 1562, Nette seems to have been an elder in 't Oversticht, Dutch province of Overijssel. In 1566, when the strife between the Frisians and Flemish (q.v.) broke out, he was one of the elders called in to mediate. Finally he sided with the Flemish group. He died at Dokkum in 1567. vdZ.

Menno Simons, Opera Omnia (1681) 486b, 487a; Writings, 1010; BRN VII, 63, 258 f.; DB 1893, 12-76, passim; 1894, 39.

Nettes, Johannes, b. 1707 at Alkmaar, d. 1777 at Leiden, was a physician at Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, and an elder of the local Mennonite congregation 1729-72. In 1742 he obtained his medical degree at the University of Leiden. He was renowned as an oculist and eye surgeon, operated on the eye of a princess of Orange. In 1742 he retired from the ministry, moved to Leiden, and devoted himself to the practice of medicine. vdZ.

F. Nagtglas, Levensberichten von Zeeuwen II (Middelburg, 1893) 268; DB 1868, 92.

Netzebruch, former Polish territory, acquired by Prussia in 1772, whereas the lower Netze had come into Prussian hands earlier. Netzebruch is now Polish again (since 1945). Large areas of this region between the Vistula and the Warthe were marshy, others wooded. As early as 1738 Mennonite families from Poland had tried to make this land arable, but were interrupted by the first Silesian War. When oppression at the hands of a landlord in the region of Schwetz became more and more marked, three Mennonites from the village of Jeziorka on the Tuchel Heath made a successful personal appeal to Frederick the Great to have this region admitted into eastern Ostmark; they also received permission for 32 Mennonite families to settle in this desolate region, which they turned into fertile land for grain and meadow by industry and perseverance. A Privilegium of Feb. 7, 1765, granted them free exercise of their religion, recognition of their word in place of the oath, freedom from military service for themselves and their posterity, and the erection of their own schools. For their buildings they were permitted to use the necessary wood free of charge. Each family received at least 40 "Magdeburg Morgen" of land, and several families received more.

In May and June 1765, 35 families with 194 persons arrived in Driesen, a town on the border of East Prussia, and founded the settlements between Driesen and Friedeberg: Brenkenhoffswalde, Franzthal, and Neu-Dessau. The Mennonites in Neu-Dessau soon moved into the other two villages; by 1787 there were 266 Mennonites living in Brenkenhoffswalde and Franzthal. Of all the settlers, according to one report, "the Mennonites proved themselves most industrious and most useful." And the Department of Foreign Affairs declared them to be "excellent, useful citizens of the state, even though they do not bear arms."

In a few years all the land in the Netzebruch had been bought up and settled, so that there were no possibilities for Mennonite sons to settle there. In 1785 a Mennonite family emigrated to Vishenka in Little Russia, and joined the congregation organized on the estate of Count Romanzov. Several other families were about to follow, but the Department of Foreign Affairs decided that the Mennonites should be kept in the country and ordered that they should be permitted to buy land in other parts of the Netzebruch (Menn. Bl., 1928, 91).

The Brenkenhoffswalde congregation met in the homes of the members until the available rooms were too small. The government then gave them a building site for a church free of charge, and the funds for the building were donated by the Dutch Mennonites; on Nov. 8, 1778, the congregation met for the first time in their own church. In 1787 Franzthal also acquired a small church, funds having been raised among the Mennonites of Hamburg and Holland by the preachers Jan de Jager (q.v.) and Johannes Deknatel (q.v.).

In the period of the Enlightenment at the beginning of the 19th century many groups hostile to the government were formed, and in consequence all meetings of private groups were prohibited, including the Mennonites. The only exception made to this ruling concerned meetings held under the auspices of the Bohemian Brethren (Herrnhuter). The Mennonites at once formed connections with the Brethren and continued to meet unmolested. This fraternal association between the two brotherhoods, furthered by the Brethren traveling evangelists, Gottlieb Jahr and Niederschuh, had a stimulating effect on the Mennonites and led to a number of beneficial practices in the Brenkenhoffswalde congregation, such as the consecration of infants (q.v.), which was not yet observed by the West Prussian Mennonites, mission work, and the employment of their own teachers in their schools.

At the end of 1831 the church board of the Brenkenhoffswalde congregation was informed by the government that all privileges were to be withdrawn. The Mennonites were given their choice between accepting full military service, paying 5 per cent more in taxes, or emigrating. A petition to Frederick William III brought this reply: "My dear children, no matter how much I would like to help you, I am unable to do so." Thereupon they decided to emigrate to Russia. Since Nicholas I had prohibited such immigration, the Mennonites sent him a petition in the summer of 1832 for permission for 40 families to join their brethren in the Molotschna settlement (q.v.); the petition was not granted until the fall of 1833. Meanwhile some families had moved to other places. In July 1834, 28 Mennonite families and 10 Lutheran families who had now become Mennonites (Johann Lange and his son-in-law Johann Preuss, Gottfried Rabe, Johann Rabsch, Hermann Lenzmann, Johann Glöckler, Michael Kant, Christian Dosso, Christian Herfort, Gottlieb Strauss), besides two unmarried Lutherans (Karl Brüsso and Karl Klatt), emigrated to the Molotschna, arriving on Oct. 8, 1834, and remained for the winter in the villages of Alexanderwohl, Friedensdorf, Rudnerweide, Grossweide, Pastva, and Steinbach. In the following spring the immigrants built the village of Gnadenfeld (q.v.), which later became the center for the eastern Molotschna settlement (Jahrbuch 1909, 107), and had much influence on the rise of the Mennonite Brethren. (See Brenkenhoffswalde.) Hege.

"Aus der Gnadenfelder Gemeindechronik," in Heinrich Dirks' Mennonitisches Jahrbuch (Berdyansk, 1909) 33-46; (1910) 106-16; A. Hänseler, "Mennoniten im Netzebruch," in Brandenburg. Ztscht für Heimatkunde und Heimatpflege IV (Eberswalde, 1926) 205 ff. (reprinted in Menn. Bl., 1928, 90-92); B. H. Unruh, "Die Mennoniten in der Neumark," Gem.-Kal. 1941, 58-76; Herbert Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten (Marburg, 1952) 45 f.; ML III, 206 f.

Neuanlage, a Mennonite village name found in the West and East reserves of Manitoba; Hague, Sask.; Jansen, Neb.; twice in the Cuauhtemoc Old Colony Mennonite settlements, and Durango, Mexico; and in the Menno and other Chaco colonies of Paraguay. (ML III, 207.) C.K.

Neubergthal Rudnerweide Mennonite Church, having some 150 members in and around the village of Neubergthal, five miles southeast of Altona, Man., is one of the ten congregations of the Rudnerweide (q.v.) Mennonite Church, all of which are organized as sections of a single congregation, rotating ministers every Sunday. H.H.H.

Neuburg on the Danube, the former capital of the duchy of Pfalz-Neuburg, in which Anabaptist teachings were spread very early. Otto Heinrich, Count Palatine, on Jan. 28, 1528, issued an order against the "new Christians." According to the chronicles of the Hutterian Brethren three Anabaptists were executed for their faith in Neuburg in the 16th century, among them the successful preacher Andreas (q.v.) of Neiss. Southwest of Neuburg the Maxweiler (q.v.) Mennonite settlement was made in 1802; its inhabitants emigrated to America about the middle of the 19th century. Hege.

K. Schottenloher, Pfalzgraf Ottheinrich und das Buch (Münster, 1927) 83; Wolkan, Lieder; idem, Geschicht-Buch, 182; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 233; ML III, 207.

Neuchâtel (German, Neuenburg), a canton in northwestern Switzerland, area 305 sq. miles, consists of the former districts of Valagin and Neuchâtel. Neuchâtel was open to the influence of the Reformation at an early date. Under the protection of Bern, with which Neuchâtel had been associated since 1406, William Farel (q.v.) brought the Reformation to the canton about 1530. It was a decisive victory for the Reformation that the princes and nobility all adopted the Protestant faith. It became the policy to tolerate only Protestantism, especially when Neuchâtel came under the rule of Frederick William I (q.v.) of Prussia in 1707 (until 1848).

Closely allied to the Swiss Confederation by old treaties and common interests, Neuchâtel was admitted into the Confederation in 1814 as the twenty-first canton. A revolution freed it from Prussian domination in 1848, when the republic was declared. Since then freedom of religion and conscience has been assured and compulsory civil marriage introduced, and the registration of births made independent of the baptismal record.

The Anabaptist movement never reached the significance in Neuchâtel that it had in the cantons of Zürich and Bern, in part because of the difference in language, but it was for the Swiss Brethren a place of refuge when persecution reached its height in Bern. The date of the first immigration can no longer be ascertained, but by the middle of the 17th century many had escaped to the mountains of the canton. A few families wandered into the Val de Ruz and into the region of La Chaux de Fonds and Le Locle.

As in the Jura, the Anabaptists became pioneers in agriculture and cattle raising in Neuchâtel. Their success soon stirred up the envy of the native population; the competition led to an economic struggle against them. Ernst Müller wrote, "We find in the Neuchâtel Jura exactly the same social and political movement of the populace against the immigrants with their economic superiority as in the Bernese Jura."

The early 18th century brought a new influx of Mennonites, but also a renewed opposition to them. The complaints of the populace produced an order that the Mennonites then in the canton should be tolerated, but no others should be admitted.

The mayor of Valagin is indeed said to have registered the complaint in Bern that church unity in the canton was threatened by the settlement of Mennonites, since a law of 1707 stipulated that the Protestant faith should be the only one tolerated. Negotiations between the government of Bern and Frederick William (q.v.) of Prussia resulted in the order on April 21, 1734, "that these Mennonites, Pietists, and Anabaptists shall be tolerated in view of the testimonial given them by the council that these people live as good citizens." Thereupon the Bernese government wrote to the governor on Dec. 21, 1734, and to the Prussian council in Neuchâtel, that Valagin complained about the settlement of sectarians on its territory, and besought the governor to take the necessary steps to "get rid of these encumbering people." The king replied that the Mennonites were to be tolerated, both because of the good repute of their conduct and because it was wrong to persecute for their religion persons who live as good citizens. After further negotiations the king wrote, "Any spirit of persecution is obnoxious to me and I cannot understand why one wants to drive these poor people out of the country, since they do no harm to anyone and do nothing that could jeopardize the welfare of the state. They seem to me to be deserving of sympathy and it would always be more worth while to draw them to you with kindness and Christian love with a good example, than to deprive them of the refuge they have sought with you. It is therefore my wish that they be tolerated until I find it advisable and necessary to order otherwise." Finally the mayor of Valagin had to admit that there was no good reason for disturbing the Mennonites, and that they rather deserved gratitude for their industry and their general character.

But the noble intentions of the great king were not nobly accepted. Agitation against the Mennonites continued. The people of Valagin assembled, ostensibly to preserve their old rights and liberties, and the mayors of the villages and the council of Bern challenged the king. Thereupon the king replied on June 4, 1735, that those sectarians who had settled in Neuchâtel and Valagin since 1724 should be sent out in 1736, but very few families were hit by this arrangement.

In spite of all difficulties the Mennonites were able to maintain themselves in Neuchâtel, though in some instances they changed their location. They came on Sunday from great distances to the spacious room of some farmer for mutual edification. For a long time the central point for such meetings was the hamlet Bressels near Locle (see Locle-Bressels). In 1894 a suitable church was built under the direction of Elder Henri Ummel in Les Bulles near Chaux de Fonds, in which the Mennonites of the canton meet, with about 150 members. From the 18th century on, the Mennonites of Neuchâtel adhered to the Amish wing. S.G.

Fallet-Scheurer, "Geschichtsbilder aus dem Bauernleben des 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts," in Schweizer Bauer, 1929; Müller, Berner Täufer; S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953); ML III, 208 f.

Neu-Chortitza (Novo-Chortitza), one of the major villages of the Baratov Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in the province of Ekaterinoslav, Ukraine, Russia, established in 1872. Neu-Chortitza and Gnadenthal comprised 10,000 acres of land and had a population of 550 in 1914. In 1874 the villages Grünfeld, Steinfeld, and Hochfeld were added, which formed the Schlachtin Mennonite settlement (q.v.). The church serving these settlements was the Neu-Chortitza Mennonite Church (q.v.).

During the Revolution and under Stalin's regime the settlements suffered very severely. Many of the inhabitants were sent into exile. During the German occupation (1941-43) the former life was somewhat revived. Some 600 inhabitants of the Neu-Chortitza village alone left for Germany in October 1943, of whom approximately 550 were forcibly returned to Russia after the collapse of Germany. Thus relatively only a few of the settlers reached Canada and South America. (ML III, 207.) C.K.

Neuer Haus- und Landwirtschaftskalender (Odessa, 1913) 50, 75; ML III, 207, 278.

Neu-Chortitza (Novo-Chortitza) Mennonite Church was organized in 1872 in the Baratov Mennonite settlement (q.v.), as a subsidiary of the Chortitza Mennonite Church (q.v.). When the Schlachtin settlement was established in the neighborhood in 1874, its villages also became a part of the Neu-Chortitza Mennonite Church. In 1905 the membership was 1,045, with a total population of 2,569. Jacob Päthkau (q.v.) served as elder of the congregation in 1910-18. He was succeeded as elder by J. A. Rempel 1920-29, who was the last elder of the congregation. Other ministers, with dates of ordination, were Peter Klassen (ordained 1890), Jacob Epp (1852), Gerhard Dyck (1856), Gerhard Ens I (1860), Anton Sudermann (1870), Gerhard Ens II (1870), Dietrich Epp (1872), Cornelius Rempel (1879), Jacob Klassen (1900), Abr. Penner (1880), Heinrich Dyck (1884), Klaas Wiebe (1884), Aaron Warkentin (1890), Peter Penner (1890), Jacob Bärg (1892), Abraham Kröger (1897), Dietrich Görzen (1898), Wilhelm Sawatzky (1905). The congregation had places of worship at Neu-Chortitza and Grünfeld. During the Revolution and under Stalin the congregation suffered severely. In 1923, 500 persons from this congregation emigrated to Canada.

Elder J. A. Rempel was very active in his congregation and also in representing the Mennonites to the government. He served many congregations all over Russia. In 1925 he was delegated to attend the first Mennonite World Conference at Basel. In 1929 he was sent into exile, where he perished in 1941. Peter Funk, a co-minister, was also exiled in 1930. Worship services were discontinued. During the German occupation (1941-43), religious life was revived. The leading minister then was Jacob Friesen, who later emigrated to Drake, Sask. The church records of the congregation (according to a niece of Elder Jacob Päthkau) were burned under the Soviet government. The majority of the members of the Neu-Chortitza Mennonite Church were taken to Germany with the retreating German army in 1943. However, only a fraction of them reached Canada and South America, the majority having been sent back by the Russian army. C.K.

H. Dirks, Statistik (1905) 6, 61; A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer I (Abbotsford, 1949) 34-46.

Neu-Dessau: see Netzebruch.

Neudorf (Czech, Nová Ves Ostrozská, also Waltersdorf), a village near Lundenburg in Moravia, in the former domain of the Zierotin family. Under the protection of the wealthy John of Zierotin the Hutterian Brethren opened a Bruderhof here in 1570. In 1605 the Bruderhof, located on the border, suffered severely in the Hungarian war; imperial troops plundered the Bruderhof and killed four Brethren, including the householder Jakob Köppel, and led three away captive. In December 1620 most of the inmates fled before the inhuman cruelties of the imperial troops to Sobotiste in Hungary; many succumbed to illness and the rigors of the journey on the way. On Jan. 23, 1621, troops burned down the house in Neudorf with all the property and goods in it. That was the end of the settlement. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 207.) P.De.

Neudorferhof, an estate farmed by five Mennonite families near Obermoschel in the Palatinate, which has since 1816 been the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Its members live scattered through a number of villages. Formerly the Mennonites on these farms belonged to the Rheingrafenstein (q.v.) congregation, and held their services in the hall of the castle and on the Dimrotherhof. Since 1816 services are held only on the Neudorferhof. For five years the members met in a living room and 1821-86 in a room in the house of the leader Johann Zerger, which was furnished for the purpose. In 1885 the congregation built a meetinghouse of its own, and dedicated it in 1886 (Gbl., 1886, 55 f.).

After the death of the first preacher, Abraham

Hertzler of the Antoniushof (1817), the congregation was served by Jakob Galle (q.v.), preacher of the Uffhofen congregation. On Nov. 7, 1819, Johannes Weber of the Neudorferhof was ordained to the ministry. In 1841 Jakob Schowalter of the Bangerterhof took his place. In 1862 the vote fell on two brothers, Jakob Weber and Johann Weber.

In 1878 the congregation joined with Ernstweiler (q.v.) and Kühbörncheshof (q.v.) to employ the first salaried preacher, Samuel Blickensdörfer of the Kohlhof. In 1879 he accepted the pulpit in Sembach, leaving the one in Neudorferhof vacant. Then in 1880 Abraham Hirschler took the position, and gave it his untiring devotion for 50 years. He lived in Kaiserslautern. In 1930 he retired. In 1931 Abraham Harder of Thiergart, West Prussia, was installed as preacher in Ernstweiler. Four years later (1935) he moved to Paraguay. Hugo Scheffler, previously the pastor of the congregation in Sembach, took his place in 1935; Scheffler emigrated to America and was succeeded by Gerhard Hein, who is still (1957) serving. The affiliated congregations took the name Kaiserslautern (q.v.).

On July 16, 1890, the congregation was incorporated. Baptismal services are held every other year in the fall. Communion is observed four times a year. In 1941 the congregation had 110 baptized members, and 96 in 1956. In 1951 the congregation detached itself from Kaiserslautern and joined the Sembach congregation.

In 1923 the inhabitants of the estate organized a co-operative with a specific division of labor, the individual holdings of each family, however, remaining intact. The work in the fields and in the vineyards is done in common. The cattle are housed in commonly owned barns. The proceeds of the entire establishment flow into a common treasury, from which the needs of all the families are met. At the end of the year the net gain is divided according to the individual holdings. NEFF.

Frankfurter Illustrierte Zeitung, No. 5, Feb. 9, 1933, p. 117, with photographs; ML III, 207 f.

Neue amerikanische Calender, Der, a 32-44 page almanac, published in the German language by Johan Räber, an Amish layman at Baltic, Ohio, from 1930 to the present. In addition to usual features of almanacs, it contains the "Schriften und Lieder" used in Old Order Amish church services, inspirational articles and poems, articles on church history, and a list of Amish ministers arranged according to bishop districts within states. Since 1951 the Calender has also carried lists of ministers among the Old Colony Mennonites in Mexico and the Hutterian Brethren in Canada and the United States. (GCL has a complete file.) N.P.S.

Neue Zeytung von den Wiedertaufern und ihrer Sekt. This is the title of a pamphlet published in 1528 against the Anabaptists. The appendix contains thirteen articles added by Urban Rhegius, "which they consider true," which he refuted item by item in his booklet Nothwendige Warnung. Ranke considered these thirteen points the actual teaching of the Salzburg Anabaptists, and made several citations from them; he thereby does this group of Anabaptists grave injustice, for this is a polemic against the Anabaptists, and the excerpts from it which are known lead to the conclusion that the Anabaptists were not capable of much good. Nevertheless we learn a few things which may approximate historical truth. With all necessary reservations, the following may be stated:

In the pamphlet Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.) is named; he is known to have been one of Denk's disciples. It is said that he denied predestination, for God cannot be made responsible for sin. A native inborn way of doing good is really possible, and there are sinless human beings. Christ he accepted as an exemplary teacher, but not as the fulfillment of the law or as the Son of God. The denial of the Sonship of Christ, which was first preached by Haetzer, is now also to be found among the simple Anabaptists in Salzburg and with Langenmantel. Christ they believed to be only a prophet, who by word and example brought the natural moral law closer to human consciousness and strengthened the desire of the heart for God.

We shall not examine how nearly these statements correspond with fact, although many certainly are not true. It is certain that the influence of Denk is shown here, even though in a somewhat exaggerated and distorted form. He was by no means an isolated thinker. He had his circle of followers, and as is shown in the polemic of Rhegius, even congregations that were attached to him. H.Q.

U. Heberle, "Johannes Denk und die Ausbreitung seiner Lehre," Theologische Studien und Kritiken (1855); Leopold Ranke, Deutsche Geschichte im Zeitalter der Ref. III, 407 ff.; ML III, 210.

Neuenburg: see Neuchâtel.

Neuenburg (Malashovka), a Mennonite village name of the Chortitza settlement, Ukraine, transplanted to West Reserve of Manitoba, and Cuauhtemoc, Mexico.

Neuendorf (Neudorf), a village name found in the Chortitza settlement, Ukraine; East and West reserves of Manitoba; Swift Current, Sask.; Cuauhtemoc and Durango, Mexico; and Neuland, Paraguay. C.K.

Neuendorf Mennonite Church was a subsidiary of the Chortitza Mennonite Church (q.v.) in the Ukraine. In 1905 the total population was 1,620, of whom 732 were baptized members. Neuendorf had a meetinghouse, but was otherwise an integral part of the mother church. (Dirks, Statistik, 1905, 60.) C.K.

Neuenschwander (Niswander, Neiswander, Nicewander, Neuschwanger, Neuen, Nisewander, Newswanger), meaning a man from Neuenschwand, near Langnau, canton of Bern, Switzerland. The word Neuenschwand means a place where the forest was recently cleared. The first person of this family known to have been an Anabaptist was Uli Neuenschwander from Eggiwil, who appeared at the Bern disputation March 11-18, 1538. In 1551 Mathis Neuenschwander fled from his Emmental home because of his Anabaptist faith. Peter Neuenschwander and family left their home in Langnau in 1729 and settled at Cortébert in the Jura. A son Michael lived on the Münsterberg. The latter's son Michael moved to the Normanvillars settlement in France and in 1823 migrated to Wayne Co., Ohio, becoming one of the first settlers in the Chippewa settlement. In 1833 the family moved to Putnam Co., Ohio, to become the first Mennonite settlers there. A son, John B. Neuenschwander, founded the Mennonite settlement in Polk Co., Iowa, by settling there in 1849. This family moved to Moniteau Co., Mo., in 1868, becoming one of the pioneer families in that settlement. Peter M. Neuenschwander (q.v.) was a bishop at Berne, Ind. The Dutch Naamlijst of 1802 lists Ulrich Neuenschwander as an elder of the congregation at Boliou (?) in the county of Limousin, France, ordained in 1782.

Another family that some claim were originally Neuenschwanders are the Newschwangers who first appear in Lancaster Co., Pa., in the 18th century. Of this family Emmanual Newschwanger (1758-1846) ministered to the Diller (MC) congregation near Newville, Pa., for many years. In Virginia, Abraham Nisewander (1774-1846) served a number of years in the Rockingham County Mennonite ministry. In later generations the name became common in the Church of the Brethren. Other families of this name have been located in Ontario, Kansas, and Oregon.

A Neuschwander family emigrated to Oregon from Switzerland in the 1880's settling eventually near Silverton. D.L.G.

Daniel Kauffman, Mennonite Cyclopedic Dictionary (Scottdale, 1937) 264; D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) passim.

Neuenschwander Mennonite Church (now extinct) was located at Berne, Ind. Peter M. Neuenschwander (1854-1946) was ordained to the ministry at the age of 17 at Moron in the Bernese Jura. In 1876 he came with his parents and other families to America, settling near Berne, and became an assistant minister in the church there. In 1879, when a large meetinghouse was built, he and several other families withdrew from this church and formed a congregation which was allied throughout its existence with the loosely organized Conference of Swiss Congregations. The reason for Neuenschwander's withdrawal from the larger church was the liberal practice of the other ministers in dress and church policy. In 1883 Peter M. Neuenschwander was ordained a bishop of the Neuenschwander Church by Bishop Christian Sommer of the Sonnenberg Mennonite Church. The group met in a small church located about one-half mile west of Berne, and for many years resisted modern innovations such as automobiles and electricity. The aged bishop preached every other Sunday to his small flock until 1944. The group was served occasionally by ministers from Sonnenberg until about 1950, when the remaining few members joined other Mennonite churches in the vicinity. D.L.G.

Eva F. Sprunger, The First Hundred Years (Berne, 1938) 222-23; D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 155.

Neues Buchstabir- und Lesebuch, Besonders bearbeitet und eingerichtet zum Gebrauch Deutscher Schulen. Enthaltend das ABC, und vielerley Buchstabir- und Leseuebungen, compiled by Benjamin Eby (q.v.), was published by Heinrich Wilhelm Peterson at Berlin (now Kitchener), Ont., in 1839. A second edition, entitled A B C-Buchstabir- und Lesebuch, was printed by Heinrich Eby at Berlin in 1842, "for the use of German schools in Canada." This small booklet of 144 pages became very popular. It was reprinted again in 1847 at Berlin, and by J. F. Funk at Elkhart, Ind., 1869, 1871, 1882, 1896, 1909. It was used in German schools in the churches in Canada, and in Sunday schools for the teaching of German. It contains the alphabet, 81 exercises in orthography, the words graded from one to six syllables, a dictionary, rules of syntax, a list of the Old Testament books including the Apocrypha, some Bible history, a short history of printing, the Ten Commandments, the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, some sample letters, wise sayings, the multiplication tables, and two addresses to children. S.F.C.

Neu-Falkenstein in Galicia (q.v.), a village, formerly Austrian, now Polish, about 20 miles from Lemberg, where a number of Mennonite families from the Palatinate, Germany, settled in 1784-85. They formed a small congregation which held its first communion service on Christmas Day of 1785. Neu-Falkenstein was the center of the Mennonites in Galicia until about 1800, when Einsiedel (q.v.) became the center. (DB 1865, 101 ff.) Neu-Falkenstein is probably identical with Falkenstein (q.v.). vdZ.

Neuf-Brisach (German, Neubreisach), a village (pop. 1,400) in departément Haut-Rhin, Alsace, situated 10 miles east of Colmar (q.v.), on the bank of the Rhine, opposite the German town of Breisach, is the seat of a Mennonite congregation, which in 1950 numbered 65 baptized members and 43 children. The congregation was formed by a group of members of the Colmar congregation which at first met at Wolfganzen. Benjamin Peterschmitt, an elder at Colmar from 1891, was their first elder, serving until 1932. The present elder is Jean Peterschmitt, of Rheinfelderhof (q.v.), where most members of the congregation, nearly all of whom are farmers, are living, and where the school of the congregation is located. In 1924 the congregation acquired a house just outside Neuf-Brisach, called "Bethel," which has been equipped as a meetinghouse. vdZ.

P. Sommer, "Assemblée de Neuf-Brisach," in Christ Seul (October 1932) 6 f.

Neufeld (Neufeldt, Nifeld, Nyfelt, Neuenfeld, Nieufelt, Newfield), a Mennonite family name, appeared for the first time in the Danzig Mennonite church records in 1694. Reimer lists the origin as referring to land reclaimed from the sea. The name was common among the Mennonite congregations of Danzig, Prussia, and Russia, from where it spread to the United States, Canada, and South America. The Universal Biography lists two teachers of philosophy at Danzig, George H. Neufeld (d. 1673) and Konrad N. Neufeld (d. 1656), both sons of George N. Neufeld. C. Henry Smith refers to a study of Mennonite names in Prussia made in 1912, which lists 161 Neufelds.

Among the Mennonites of Russia the name Neufeld was very common. A. A. Neufeld (q.v.) was an outstanding educator. Peter Neufeld (q.v.) was elder of the Chortitza Mennonite Church. Isaak Neufeld of Waldheim, Molotschna, was a manufacturer of agricultural machinery. David P. Neufeld, son of Peter Neufeld, minister of the Ohrloff Mennonite Church, was an educator. Gerhard J. Neufeld was a physician at Davlekanovo, Ufa. Wilhelm P. Neufeld was minister of the Schönsee Mennonite Church and perished in exile. Heinrich D. Neufeld, founder of the secondary school at Ohrloff, Zagradovka, was murdered by the Machno bandits. Cornelius G. Neufeld, educator, died in Shafter, Cal.

The name is found quite frequently in central Kansas, where Mennonites from Russia settled in 1874 ff. Of 330 members of the Bethel Mennonite Church of Inman, Kan., 61 are Neufelds. The name appears more frequently than any other in the Inman telephone directory, 29 times in all. But the name is found at other places also. In the General Conference Handbook of Information of 1954 there are fifteen ministers by that name listed for Canada and six in the United States. In the Civilian Public Service Directory the name occurs twelve times, nine from Kansas, two from California, and one from Oklahoma. G. B. Neufeld is a missionary in the Congo, and Jacob H. Neufeld a missionary in the Chaco, Paraguay.

Who's Who Among the Mennonites (1943) lists the following: Harry Neufeld, missionary, Los Ebanos, Texas; Herman H. Neufeld, former editor and publisher of Mennonitische Rundschau; N. J. Neufeld, physician, Winnipeg; Peter T. Neufeld, pastor of Bethel Mennonite Church, Inman, Kan. Peter T. Neufeld's grandfather, Peter Neufeld, came to Kansas in 1875, whose grandfather, Hermann Neufeld, had immigrated to Russia from Prussia in 1803. In addition, Cornelius K. Neufeld, a musician, should be mentioned. J. G. Rempel lists the following General Conference ministers of Canada: A. Neufeld, New Westminster, B.C.; A. J. Neufeld, Lena, Man.; B. G. Neufeld, Manitou, Man.; Gerhard Neufeld, Oliver, B.C.; H. H. Neufeld, Abbotsford, B.C.; J. G. Neufeld, Didsbury, Alta.; J. H. Neufeld, Gem, Alta.; Johann Neufeld, Tofield, Alta.; Abram G. Neufeld, Whitewater, Man.; Cornelius G. Neufeld (elder); David P. Neufeld; Gerhard G. Neufeld (elder). P.T.N., C.K.

A. A. Töws, Mennonitische Märtyrer I and II (N. Clearbrook, 1949 and 1954); J. G. Rempel, Fünfzig Jahre Konferenzbestrebungen, 1902-1952 I and II.

Neufeld, Abraham A. (1862-1909), a Mennonite teacher in a secondary school in South Russia, was born March 15, 1862, at Fürstenau in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, the child of simple Mennonite farmers. His industry and gifts moved his father to send him to the Zentralschule in Ohrloff, where he completed the three-year course in two years. Then he entered the Gymnasium in Berdyansk, and refusing the scholarship offered him in favor of needier students, he supported himself by giving private lessons and later, when he was married, by journalistic work. In 1883 he took a philological course at the University of Odessa. During all his school years he showed an unusual capacity for and love of work. He was not satisfied merely to follow the lectures of the professors, but was inspired to independent study. After three years at Odessa he attended the University of Berlin for two years, where one of his professors was Theodor Mommsen, and then returned to Russia.

Now Abraham Neufeld's public work began. He devoted all his energy to Mennonite education. For a few years he served as a secondary school teacher in Berdyansk and Bachmut, and from 1890 for 15 years as principal of the Chortitza Zentralschule. His influence on the Chortitza school constituency was profound. The church conference and the teachers' association entrusted to him the supervision of the elementary and secondary school system. The higher school authorities also held him in high esteem. To provide educational facilities for his children Neufeld moved to Berdyansk and founded there a secondary school with the rights of a government school. At the same time he was considerate of the rights of other Mennonite sons, and tried to build for them a school characterized by honor and thoroughness. After a short period of successful work he died at Berdyansk on Jan. 9, 1909. Neufeld had many offers of high positions outside the Mennonite constituency but he remained faithful to his people. Neufeld's lecture, Die Chortitza Centralschule 1842-1892, given at the time of the 50th anniversary, was published by H. Ediger (Berdyansk, 1893). A.B.

H. Goerz, "A. A. Neufeld, Erinnerungen," Menn. Warte II (1944) 49-55 (interesting and informative personal reminiscences concerning Neufeld); Friesen, Brüderschaft; H. Epp, Menn. Jahrbuch 1909, 128-31; ML III, 210 f.

Neufeld, Heinrich August (1826-1900), a Mennonite preacher, born at Danzig, Oct. 30, 1826. He was educated at the universities of Halle and Leipzig, Germany, lived a while in Danzig, working on the new hymnal, was ordained by Jakob Mannhardt on April 17, 1856, as pastor of the Ibersheim (q.v.) Mennonite church, serving there until 1869, and at Friedrichstadt (q.v.) 1869-99. In 1899 he retired and moved to Danzig to live with his sister, and died there on Oct. 19, 1900. His sermons, which he had published in various Mennonite collections of sermons, as well as his numerous devotional articles in the Mennonitische Blätter, bear eloquent witness of his childlike faith and depth of spirit (Menn. Bl., 1894, 14).

Worthy of note is Neufeld's appeal to all the Mennonite congregations in the Old World and the New (Menn. Bl., 1859, 23; 1860, 34), to raise an endowment in commemoration of the third centennial of the death of Menno Simons. He also wrote articles in appreciation of his colleagues Johann Risser, Jakob Ellenberger I, Johannes van der Smissen, and Jakob Mannhardt in the Mennonitische Blätter. (ML III, 211.) NEFF.

Neufeld, Hermann Abram (1860-1931), an itinerating minister and elder of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born at Yarkivka, Ekaterinoslav province, South Russia, June 24, 1860, the seventh of the twelve children of Abraham and Helena Unrau

Neufeld. On Feb. 6, 1883, he married Katharina Klassen and established his home at Sergeyevka, Taurida province, South Russia, working in an iron foundry for a living. They had thirteen children. In 1892-1923 they lived at Nikolayevka, Ekaterinoslav province.

In 1884 Neufeld joined the M.B. Church. The following year he began to preach in his local church and in 1886 was ordained to the ministry. In 1890 he began a very active service as an itinerating minister (Reiseprediger) in the M.B. Conference, which lasted twenty-five years. During this time he conducted many meetings in all the M.B. churches of Russia, visiting Turkestan twice and Siberia four times. He also made two trips to Germany, where he took part in Bible conferences. In 1905 he was ordained elder and became one of the outstanding leaders of the M.B. Conference in Russia, and served on various important boards and committees.

In 1923 Neufeld emigrated with his family to Canada, establishing his home at Winkler, Man. Here, too, he immediately became active in the ministry, his particular service being that of Bible expositor in the Canadian M.B. churches. He also wrote many valuable articles for periodicals in Russia as well as in Canada. He wrote and published a booklet entitled Handbuch für Prediger. He died at Winkler, on Sept. 28, 1931, and was buried in the local M.B. cemetery. H. H. Neufeld, a former editor of the Mennonitische Rundschau, and K. G. Neufeld, a musician, are sons of Hermann A. Neufeld.
J.H.L.

Friesen, Brüderschaft; Dirks, Statistik, 1905; J. H. Lohrenz, The Mennonite Brethren Church (Hillsboro, 1950).

Neufeld, Peter J. (1823-1909), an educator and printer of the Mennonites of Russia, was born at Ladekopp, Molotschna, on Dec. 23, 1823. From the age of eleven or twelve to eighteen he attended the Zentralschule of Halbstadt, after which he succeeded his teacher, Johann Voth. In 1843 he succeeded Heinrich Franz in the Gnadenfeld school. In 1841 Neufeld was baptized. In 1847 he married Laura Lange, the daughter of the Elder Wilhelm Lange of Gnadenfeld. He was greatly influenced by the spiritual and cultural life of the Gnadenfeld community. In 1851 Neufeld resigned his position at Gnadenfeld and spent six years as a teacher in Odessa to perfect himself in the Russian language and to obtain a Russian teacher's certificate. In 1857 he became the teacher of the Steinbach school sponsored by Peter Schmidt. After nine years of teaching he studied photography in Kharkov. In 1866 he returned to Halbstadt, gave private instruction, and functioned as a photographer until 1870, when he returned to Steinbach for one year of teaching. In 1871-74 and 1878-86 he taught at the Halbstadt Zentralschule and in 1876-77 at the Gnadenfeld Zentralschule. In 1886 Neufeld retired from teaching and established a print shop in Halbstadt, which he sold in 1897 to H. J. Braun and Company, which later became the Raduga (q.v.) Publishing Company. His wife died in 1900. They had thirteen children. His son Wilhelm P. Neufeld was educated in Germany, and was a minister and teacher in the Gnadenfeld and Halbstadt Zentralschulen. Peter J. Neufeld died at Halbstadt on Nov. 22, 1909.
C.K.

H. Dirks, "Peter Neufeld," Menn. Jahrbuch, 1910 (Berdyansk, 1911) 78-91; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 597-99; ML III, 211.

Neufeld, Peter P. (1875-1927), a Mennonite teacher and elder, was born Dec. 4, 1875 (1876), at Neplueyevka, Ukraine. He attended the Chortitza Zentralschule 1892-96. After passing the teacher's examination at Alexandrovsk, he became teacher in the Rosental village school. In 1898 Neufeld married Helena Krahn. One daughter was born to them who now resides in Winnipeg. His wife died as a refugee, fleeing from Russia to Germany during World War II.

After teaching seven years at Rosental, Neufeld taught seven years at Schönwiese. In 1914 he was called to teach German at the Chortitza Mädchenschule (q.v.). During the Russian Revolution he taught for two years in the Chortitza elementary school. On June 26, 1921, he observed his twenty-fifth anniversary as a teacher. On Nov. 2, 1914, Neufeld was ordained as minister. On April 17 (18), 1922, he was ordained elder of the Chortitza Mennonite Church, after which he devoted his full time to his work in the church. Neufeld attended the last Bundeskonferenz at Moscow in 1925, at which time he was elected a member of the KfK (q.v.). He was an unusually successful teacher, and an effective preacher and elder, who had acquired a very good education. He died at Chortitza on Jan. 21, 1927. (Unser Blatt II, 1927, 214, 245, 279.)
C.K.

Neufville, de, an old French family. Robert de Neufville became a Protestant and left his native country, lived in Antwerp in 1545, and in England from 1550 on. During the reign of Mary, when the Protestants were no longer safe in England, a large number of the brethren found refuge in Holland; but another group, led by John á Lasco (q.v.), of which Robert de Neufville was a member, vainly sought admission to Copenhagen, Lübeck, Wismar, and Hamburg. In 1554 this company came to Emden and in 1555 to Frankfurt, where Robert de Neufville became elder of the French church in 1573, and where the family became resident and acquired wealth.

One of Robert's 19 children was Daniel de Neufville (b. 1554 at Emden), who went to Holland in 1600, and settled first in Haarlem and then in Amsterdam, where he founded the great mercantile house of the family. At Haarlem he was married to Maeyken Koppens (Coppens) of the Flemish Mennonite congregation. It is not certain, though it is probable, that Daniel became a Mennonite; his many descendants were Mennonites. Most of them lived at Amsterdam, where they were members of the Flemish congregation and after the schism of 1664, of the Lamist congregation. By marriage they were related to a large number of Amsterdam Mennonite patrician families such as van Halmael, Block, van Beeck, Rutgers, van Gelder, Verhamme, de Wolff, van Lennep, Blaupot, de Clerck, Bierens; a small branch of this family lived at Haarlem in the 17th and 18th centuries.

The de Neufville family became very wealthy. Its first members in Holland were engaged in the textile trade, particularly silk. But in the early 18th century most of them were also bankers. Daniel de Neufville (Amsterdam 1643-78) founded a bank at Amsterdam, which in the 18th century developed into one of the largest banking houses of western Europe. In 1763, when political circumstances caused its bankruptcy, more than 40 banks in Holland, Hamburg, and Berlin were also bankrupt. Other banking houses owned and carried on by members of this family in the 18th century were the world-known banking company of M. and J. de Neufville in London and that of Jean de Neufville at Amsterdam, with whom the newly independent United States of America in 1778 negotiated for a considerable loan. This loan was however, never made and both Jean de Neufville and his son Leendert emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1785, where they lived in rather poor circumstances (N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 1211). The de Neufville family were loyal Mennonites. Many of its members served as deacons in Amsterdam and Haarlem.

To this family also belonged Christina Leonora de Neufville (1713-81), a daughter of Leendert de Neufville (1677-1755), of Amsterdam, and Aleyda Oosterling (1683-1730), for her time a learned woman, deeply interested in philosophical, theological, and ethical questions. She cannot be called a poet, although she wrote her moralizing Bespiegelingen, voorgestelt in dichtkundige brieven (1741) in verse form. She was a member of the Mennonite congregation in Amsterdam, and made a generous contribution for the organ installed in the Lamist Singel church (DB 1863, 24).

Of somewhat greater significance, though not outstanding, are Margaretha Jacoba de Neufville (1775-1856), a daughter of David Matheus van Gelder de Neufville (1751-1814) and Elisabeth Barnaart (1747-94). The father and the entire family were members of the Mennonite Church in Amsterdam, but nevertheless he was also a city councillor, bailiff, and (during the Napoleonic domination of the Netherlands) assistant mayor of Amsterdam. His daughter was crippled, and remained unmarried, preferring to live in seclusion on her parents' country estate near Haarlem, reading and writing. Her best work, De kleine Pligten (2 vv., 1824), is a sequel to the novel by Elisabeth Wolff and A. Deken, and in moralizing letters depicts domestic and social life in Amsterdam in the French period. Besides several translations of stories, including some for children, she wrote two novels, De Schildknaap (1829) and Elisabeth Basmooth (2 vv., 1836). The first of these is important because it is the first attempt in modern Dutch literature to write a historical novel. H.F.W.J., vdZ.

A. C. de Neufville, Histoire généalogique de la maison de Neufville (Amsterdam, 1869); Heinrich von Nathusius-Neinstedt and Alfred von Neufville. Beiträge zur Geschichte des Hauses Neufville (Frankfurt, 1897); Nederl. Patriciaat VI (1915) 275-78; N.N.B.Wb. III, 910; Jaarboek Amstelodamum XXXIX (1942) 53 ff.; P. A. A. Boeser, Leven en Werken van Margaretha Jacoba de Neufville (Leiden, 1889); G. Kalff, Geschiedenis der Nederlandsche Letterkunde VII (Groningen, 1910) 132 f.; ML III, 211 f.

Neu-Halbstadt, a village in the northwest of the Molotschna (q.v.) Mennonite settlement in South Russia, at the eastern end of the Halbstadt (q.v.) district, was founded in 1843 by Johann Cornies (q.v.), and admitted only craftsmen at that time. It covered 550 acres of land, whereas the village of Halbstadt, founded in 1804, owned 5,500 acres. Both villages prospered. Shortly before World War I "splendid buildings arose, especially in Neu-Halbstadt, built by retired farm owners and village residents, which would be an ornament to any city" (Blank, 106).

Thus Neu-Halbstadt developed into the intellectual and economic center of the Mennonite villages of the Molotschna territory. Here the volost management had its seat, which was responsible for fire protection and the orphanage; here were several educational institutions and industrial establishments. The oldest school is the Zentralschule in Halbstadt, founded in 1835, which transferred its headquarters to Neu-Halbstadt and added a two-year normal course, where Mennonite teachers received their training. The course was later enlarged and in 1914 the school was attended by 150 students. A small private experiment in Neu-Halbstadt resulted in the Girls' School in Halbstadt, the oldest secondary school for girls among the Russian Mennonites. It developed into a Gymnasium for girls. Also the deaconess house Morija (q.v.) was founded here in 1909, which gave the deaconesses their training and cared for them in their old age.

Two industrial concerns that should be mentioned were the Franz and Schröder farm machinery manufacturing company and the Raduga (q.v.) Publishing Company. A.B.

E. Blank, "Die Halbstädter Wolost," in Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender für deutsche Ansiedler im südlichen Russland XLIII (Odessa, 1910) 104; Menn. Jahrbuch, No. 10 (Berdyansk, 1914) 91; ML III, 212.

Neuhof, once a Mennonite village near Lemberg in Galicia (q.v.). Led by Elder Johann Müller of Einsiedel several Mennonites bought about 540 acres of land in 1830, about eight miles west of Grodek, and founded on it the village of Neuhof with six Mennonite families. Jakob Müller, one of the first settlers, was chosen preacher there in 1839. In 1862 a church was built, which also contained a schoolroom. The number of Mennonite families had in the meantime increased to twelve. Then the Mennonites sold their land in Neuhof and moved to larger farms. In 1933 only four farms were still owned by Mennonites; on three others some aged Mennonites were receiving their living.

Maintaining the church and school life became increasingly difficult as Neuhof declined, especially since Roman Catholic Poles and Greek Catholic Ruthenians settled in Neuhof. But the Mennonites successfully preserved their German school and culture. In 1938 the group numbered fourteen. In 1939, when German troops marched into Neuhof, the inhabitants decided suddenly to emigrate. With a neighboring congregation they were settled in Greifenort near Buk in Warthegau. H.Pa.

Peter Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen 1784-1934 (Lemberg, 1934) 208-20; Menn. Bl., 1940; ML III, 212.

Neuhof, a village near Wertheim in Baden, Germany, was the seat of a Mennonite congregation in 1908-ca. 44. The membership was very small, never exceeding twenty. Heinrich Fellmann was the preacher from the beginning and the elder from 1924 until the end. (Gem.-Kal. 1941, 151.)

vdZ.

Neuhoffnung (Nadezhdino), a common Mennonite village name which was found in the following settlements: Alexandertal, Samara, Russia; West Reserve, Man.; Cuauhtemoc and Durango, Mexico; and Menno, Chaco, and Sommerfeld, Villarrica, Paraguay. C.K.

Neuhorst, a common Mennonite village name which was found in the following settlements: Chortitza, Ukraine, Russia; West and East Reserves, Man.; Hague, Sask.; Cuauhtemoc and Durango, Mexico; and Neuland, Paraguay. C.K.

Neu-Hutterthal Mennonite Church: see New Huttertal Mennonite Church.

Neukirch, a village in the south of the Molotschna Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in South Russia, which was settled in 1820 by 21 Mennonite families from Marienburg, Elbing, and Tiegenhof in (former) West Prussia, Germany. By 1910 there were 168 Mennonite families with 526 persons living on 52 farms in the village, which embraced 4,400 acres of land. A church was built in the village in 1865. (See Neukirch Mennonite Church.) HEGE.

Neuer Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender für deutsche Ansiedler im südlichen Russland, 1911, 111-12; Mannhardt, Jahrbuch 1888, 68; ML III, 212.

Neukirch Mennonite Church in the Molotschna (q.v.) Mennonite settlement, South Russia, was organized in 1863. A church building was erected in 1865. Heinrich Harder was the first leader of the congregation. Originally the church was associated with the Orloff Mennonite Church (q.v.) and was under the spiritual guidance of Elder Abraham Görz. When and to what an extent this congregation became independent is not quite definite. In 1905, in addition to the two leading ministers, the congregation was served by Cornelius Fast, Abraham Harder, Jacob Thiessen, Gerhard Epp, Jacob Wiens, and Abraham Dück. At that time the congregation had a membership of 402 and a total population of 890. Little is known about the later development of the congregation. C.K.

Dirks, Statistik, 1905, 16, 62; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 703 f.; Neuer Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender (1911) 111.

Neu-Kronsweide: see Kronsweide.

Neuland Agricultural Co-operative (Cooperativa Agricola de Neuland), located in Colony Neuland of the Paraguayan Chaco, was officially organized on June 1, 1949, but had been functioning since August 1947 as a branch office of the Fernheim Co-operative. Its membership is 596 and it is based upon Paraguayan law No. 13,635 of 1942. Founded upon the advice of the colony and MCC leaders, its objectives were to facilitate adequate distribution of funds made available by the MCC; to handle all buying of colony necessities and all sale of produce; and to establish small industries which would meet the needs of the immigrants. Its only capital during the first year was maintenance and loan funds made available by MCC. Its shares are currently valued at 25 guaranies payable in cash upon purchase. The turnover of the first seven months in 1949 (June-December) was 381,458 guaranies, and profits are used to expand the co-operative facilities or are paid to the members in the form of shares. The president of the co-operative is responsible to the colony administration (Amt) in all matters and acts as the financial arm of the colony. A shortage of capital, lack of proper markets and transportation facilities, and the instability of the Paraguayan currency have been the chief difficulties for the colony. Nevertheless, the co-operative has done much to help the immigrants over the first difficult years of pioneering and guarded them against exploitation by outsiders.
C.J.D.

Neuland Colony, located in the Paraguayan Chaco, was organized on June 4, 1947, under the leadership of Peter Derksen, by 299 Mennonites who had fled from Russia during World War II to Germany and Poland. There the MCC made contact with them and was instrumental in arranging for their emigration to Paraguay in 1947-48. They arrived at station Fred Engen on March 1, 1947, and were the advance group of the many transports that were to follow later. A second group of 150 came a week later, the others all being delayed in Asuncion and Buenos Aires because of the Paraguayan Revolution which was raging in full force at that time. With communications to Asuncion broken, these two groups waited three months for the rest of their party and for MCC representatives, then finally decided to begin settlement on their own and accordingly left Fernheim and Menno Colony, which had given them temporary shelter, and established the first seven Neuland villages: Neu-Halbstadt, Neuendorf, Einlage, Lichtenau, Heimstätte, Rosental, and Alt-Chortitza. The first months on the new land were especially trying because all heavy baggage of the immigrants had been held up in Buenos Aires by the revolution, leaving the settlers without tools or equipment of any kind. Much credit is due the Fernheim and Menno settlements for their liberal help to the new immigrants in those days, through lending or giving tools, building houses and wells for them, and in general helping them over the first difficult period. Fernheim built two wells in every village and a house for every widow. In September those delayed in Buenos Aires by the revolution joined the rest in the Chaco and were received largely by the Menno Colony, which assumed the same responsibilities as Fernheim had earlier. In April 1948 the transport Stuart Heinzelmann brought an additional 803 immigrants, in July 1948 the Charlton Monarch brought 667, and in November 1948 an additional 133 of the second Volendam transport came to Neuland. Twenty-eight family members came in July 1950 to join their families, making a total colony population of 2,314 in August 1950, or 641 family units, of which 253 families were without a father or husband. The names of the additional villages established are Kronsfeld, Schönhorst, Sandhorst, Neu-Chortitza, Altenau, Grossweide, Gronau, Neuhorst, Steinfeld, Schöntal, Nikolaifeld, Neuhof, Waldhof, Waldrode, and Tiege.

The average annual birth rate in 1947-50 was 53.7, and the average number of deaths 11.3. Total landholdings are 276,670 acres (110,625 hectares), of which a large percentage is typical Chaco jungle growth. This land was purchased by and still is the property of MCC. By Jan. 1, 1950, 6,340 acres (2,536 ha.) had been placed under cultivation. In addition the colonists had by that time built 473 houses, 174 wells, and had acquired 515 horses, 740 draft oxen, 1,209 cows, 1,619 cattle, and 278 wagons. The difficulties of pioneering are accentuated by the absence of many family heads, by severe insect plagues as grasshoppers, ants, and cotton worms, by poor transportation facilities and long distances from markets, and by an inadequate well-water supply. However, the settlers are largely courageous and reasonably optimistic. Churches have been organized, schools built, and industry established to saw lumber and manufacture furniture, an oil press for extraction of edible oils, a stone-burr mill, and other essential services. A 20-bed hospital is in operation. All colony affairs and administration are the responsibility of a five-man committee elected by all colony members for a three-year term. The chairman (1950) of this committee—now Peter Dürksen —is the colony administrator (Oberschultze). P.Du.

Neuland Mennonite Brethren Church: see Gnadental M.B. Church.

Neuland Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Neuland Colony in the Paraguayan Chaco, was organized on Nov. 12, 1947, under the leadership of Hans Rempel of Einlage, Neuland. Its members are largely of the immigrant groups from Russia that came to Paraguay via Germany through the help of the MCC in 1947-48. It has been a member of the General Conference Mennonite Church since August 1950, and consisted of 670 members in 1956. Worship services were held regularly every Sunday morning in the village schools, but a meetinghouse has been erected in Neu-Halbstadt. Sunday school, youth programs, Bible study, prayer meetings, and other church activities are being sponsored. The church has several choirs. For congregational singing the Gesangbuch der Mennoniten is used. Communion services are held several times each year depending on the desire of the members. Its leader (1954) is still Hans Rempel, assisted by 20 ministers and deacons, many of whom have been recently elected. Five ministers receive financial support from the G.C.M. churches in North America. H.Re.

Neumair, Hans, a confectioner, an Anabaptist martyr, who was executed with Leonhard Haslinger (q.v.) and a number of others at Wels, Austria, on June 8, 1528.

A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin von Linz (Berlin, 1893) 187; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 280; ML III, 213.

Neumann, Caspar (1648-1715), a Catholic divine, son of a tax collector of Breslau, Germany. He studied theology at the University of Jena, became court chaplain in Altenburg and professor of theology in two Gymnasiums in Breslau. As a convinced Catholic he wrote several books on the Bible, the Catholic Church, and also a compendium of religions in his Trutina Religionum. In it he discussed all the religions he knew, including the branches of the Christian faith. A special chapter, "Pantheon Fanaticum," treats the Anabaptists. The sources he cited show that he wrote in the customary vein of church polemics.

Neumann put the Mennonites into a group with Müntzer and Münster. Nevertheless he attributed gentler teachings to them, remarking that it was difficult to learn their teaching. He was apparently not acquainted with a Mennonite confession of faith. In an alphabetical list of famous Anabaptists he named Blaurock, Rink, Manz, and Menno, and also Jan Matthys and Müntzer. As an expression of his age the book is of interest, but it offers nothing new to Anabaptist literature. H.Q.

C. Neumann, Trutina Religionum quae hodie sunt, ubi singularum Aetas Fontes Dogmata (Leipzig, 1731); ML III, 213.

Neumannovka (Neumanufka) and Kutuzovka (Kotozufka), two villages in eastern Volhynia, Russia, located 25 miles northwest of Zhitomir, were the seat of a Swiss-Volhynian Mennonite congregation 1861 to 1874. The group moved from Eduardsdorf (Poutchy) in western Volhynia, 14 miles west of Dubno, to Kutuzovka in 1861 because of new land made available by the abolition of serfdom by Czar Alexander II. Initially the group settled not only in Kutuzovka but also in the neighboring village of Neumannovka, three miles farther northeast. A church was erected between the two villages and the entire Mennonite settlement was called Kutuzovka. The land was owned by the Mennonites and considerable economic progress was made in the short time they lived there. Surplus products were sold in Zhitomir and Kiev. The church was served by Elder Jacob Stucky and ministers Jakob D. Goering and Johann Goering. The names of Dirks and Ortman were added to the church here. The village of Lindenthal was located between Kutuzovka and Zhitomir and was populated by West Prussian Mennonites. Virtually the entire Kutuzovka settlement emigrated to the United States in 1874. Seventy-three families under the leadership of Elder Stucky left Kutuzovka on Aug. 6, 1874, most of these settling in McPherson County, Kan. They organized the Hoffnungsfeld (q.v.) Mennonite Church near Moundridge. The Eden Mennonite Church (q.v.) was later formed by members of the Hoffnungsfeld church. M.H.S.

P. P. Wedel, Kurze Geschichte der aus Wolhynien, Russland, nach Kansas ausgewanderten Schweizer-Mennoniten (n.p., 1929); P. R. Kaufman, Unser Volk und seine Geschichte (n.p., n.d.—ca. 1931); Martin H. Schrag, "European History of the Swiss-Volhynian Mennonite Ancestors of Mennonites Now Living in Communities in Kansas and South Dakota" (unpublished master's dissertation, 1956).

Neumark, an area of West Prussia: see Netzebruch.

Neumarkt, a market town in the Adige Valley, Tirol, Austria (now belonging to Italy), formerly in the domain of Enn and Caldif. Here the Anabaptist movement found early entry, for the records show that property of fugitive Anabaptists was confiscated as early as 1527. In May 1528 two citizens of Neumarkt were called to Bozen to sit in on the trial of the imprisoned Anabaptists. In the early summer of 1529 Georg Blaurock (q.v.) apparently came as far as Neumarkt in his work in southern Tirol; for from this time on the movement spread rapidly. In September the authorities became aware of the situation, and in November the Innsbruck government ordered energetic preventive measures.

After the imprisonment of Georg Blaurock and Hans Langecker (q.v.) in August 1529 their work was carried on by Benedikt Gamper of Gamperhof near Leifers. He was especially hunted by the authorities, for he had been a people's priest in Bruneck. He preached and baptized in the vicinity of Neumarkt, in the villages of Vill and Tramin. On Nov. 16, 1529, four brethren and three sisters were seized in Vill and taken to the Vill castle. The judge, Jörg Tschander, was given directions by the Innsbruck government to have competent and pious priests convert them, and to report the names of those who recanted and deliver the obstinate ones to the criminal court. They were to be thoroughly interrogated concerning their preachers and leaders in the region. If the prisoners gave the names of persons in other districts, the pertinent authorities should be notified. Tschander was physically unable to conduct the trial, and was replaced by Hans Plattner of Salurn. On Dec. 3, 1529, the jury was called, and the judge was warned to carry out the mandates strictly.

The supervisor of the parish of Enn and Caldif was accused on December 3 of permitting Anabaptists to go about in his territory. He reported that of the eight prisoners only one had repented. The government ordered that the others be executed. This was done on Dec. 22. Very soon the leaders Martin Nauk (q.v.) and Benedikt Gamper were captured, and put to death as martyrs. Thus it is clear that the nine executions listed in the Hutterian chronicles in Neumarkt all occurred at the turn of the year 1529-30.

On June 11, 1531, the government warned all the neighboring authorities that 40 Anabaptists were reported to have built a hut in Brantental, in the jurisdiction of Deutschnofen. The judges of these regions, including Neumarkt, should co-operate in catching them. A hunt, very secretly carried out, resulted in the seizure of four men and three women, in Kaltern, Karneid, and Bozen. On June 27 Innsbruck ordered that all backsliders, leaders, and impenitent ones should be executed. The "principal" had, however, escaped. The others were executed on or before July 19. On August 1 Innsbruck reported that the escaped prisoner and the leader were living in a mountain hut in the district of Bozen, and two weeks later added that they were in a cave near Leifers.

A tabulation of property confiscated from Anabaptists of 1532 states that in the region of Enn and Caldif many Anabaptists had been executed and many had fled.

Although Neumarkt is hardly mentioned after this, it can be assumed that the Anabaptist movement was indeed suppressed, as in the rest of the country, but by no means extirpated. On Aug. 20, 1539, Innsbruck again ordered the authorities in the Adige to seize an active Anabaptist preacher. The trouble was, as the Innsbruck authorities reported to the king, that the parishes were filled with ignorant priests. Among the populace the Anabaptists found many friends. On Nov. 12, 1560, the government ordered that vigorous steps be taken against those who aided them. And in November 1592 the secondary authorities were accused of negligence in the matter. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Loserth, Anabaptismus; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Loesche, Tirolensia; ML III, 213 f.

Neumeister, Erdmann (1671-1756), a Lutheran clergyman at the church of St. Jakob in Hamburg, Germany, a noted author of church hymns and violent opponent of Mennonites and Pietists, author of a booklet against Jakob Denner (q.v.): Anmerckungen über Jacob Denners Postille, betitult Einfältige und christliche Betrachtungen über die Jährlichen und Heiligen Evangelia . . . nebst treumeynender Warnung für derselben (Hamburg, 1731). Two of his hymns have been adopted into the South German Mennonite hymnal: "Jesus nimmt die Sünder an" and "Jesu grosser Wunderstern."

His polemic against Denner is one of the worst of the writings of the 18th century. He disposes of his opponent with a tone of superiority; he denies Denner, a dyer without scholarly training, any right to preach and teach the Word of God. In 73 paragraphs he refutes the supposed errors in Denner's book, setting up the Lutheran Church as the true church and treating the Mennonites and Calvinists as ruinous sects. In all of Denner's words he scents self-contradiction, which he triumphantly exposes by manipulating the words. The entire presentation reveals his annoyance at the great audiences Denner's sermons attracted. He expressly warns the readers and his own congregation for the sake of their souls not to attend Denner's meetings, on the basis of II Pet. 3:16, 17. (Menn. Bl., 1880, 71; 1881, 23, 29, and 37; ML III, 214.) NEFF.

Neumühl, Moravia, in the 16th century a large mill on the Eisgrub estate belonging to the Liechtenstein family, located on the left bank of the Thaya River; it is today a village with a population of 400 with a new mill, which is on the same site as the above. Here and in Tracht the Hutterian Brethren built a Bruderhof in 1558. The settlement around this mill became one of the most important Anabaptist settlements of Moravia, the residence of the "bishop" and leader of the entire brotherhood.

On Jan. 25, 1570, the delegates of the Polish anti-Trinitarians (q.v.) arrived at Neumühl to confer with the Brethren on the subject of unification with them, whose leader was Peter Walpot (q.v.), whereupon a correspondence followed, but which did not lead to a union. After Walpot's death on Feb. 5, 1578, Hänsel Kräl (q.v.) of Kitzbühel was chosen as leader of the entire brotherhood. He died here on Nov. 14, 1583, at the age of 63. Again the ordained men of the brotherhood met at Neumühl and chose as bishop Klaus Braidl (q.v.) of Hesse, who had been a Hutterite preacher for 20 years.

On May 14, 1590, Klaus Braidl called all the elders of all the Bruderhofs together at Neumühl for an important conference. The refusal of the Brethren to pay war taxes, which had in recent years led to the confiscation of cattle and produce, was used as an accusation against them with the charge that they enjoyed the benefits of the land, but would do nothing for its welfare. Since in 1585-87 in the general increase in the Moravian population there was also an increase in the number of craftsmen who were in competition with the Hutterite craftsmen, there was also increased agitation against the Brethren. Therefore the elders addressed a petition to Frederick of Zierotin, rejecting the charges, but insisted upon their belief that for conscience' sake they could not contribute anything for purposes of war; the general taxes they were willing to pay. They also requested permission, in view of their large population, to purchase more grain, also permission to brew beer as formerly. In conclusion they suggested a tax on their houses which had kitchens; this tax of 12 florins was imposed upon them by the Landtag. The amount of beer they brewed in Neumühl is shown in an account of Eisgrub: in 1593 they brewed no less than 217 barrels of beer, which they sold at a gain of 225 florins.

Klaus Braidl may be considered the originator of most of the later craftsmen's regulations. Concerning these there are occasional references in the chronicles; e.g., that of Jan. 8, 1591, passed at a meeting of all the leaders and managers assembled at Neumühl, where "the points were discussed, what the shoemakers, the cutters, menders, and buyers should not permit."

The Turkish war brought troublous times in 1595; confiscations injured the Bruderhofs, including that of Neumühl, where a certain brother Heinrich was shot to death through the open door. In 1596, however, Neumühl became the scene of violence, introducing a chain of similar events and hardships. On August 26 about six o'clock in the evening, a mob of about 30 men attacked the Neumühl Bruderhof to gain possession of the wealth the Brethren were reported to have stored here. The bandits mistreated the inhabitants and ruined furniture, without finding the treasure. After two hours of plundering they left with 16 horses. They were seized in the neighborhood of Vösendorf and Vienna, where they confessed. The horses were returned to the Brethren through the mediation of Zierotin.

On Sept. 20, 1596, the imperial commissaries reported an empty treasury; thereupon the treasurers suggested obtaining a loan from the "wealthy" Hutterites. A committee of three officials was appointed to negotiate with the Brethren for a loan of several thousand florins. On October 25 Klaus Braidl was summoned to the castle of Selowitz with six elders; the discussion was continued through six days. With the exception of Zierotin, the commissioners were unfavorable to the Brethren and tried by all possible means to extort the money from them, using the threat that if the Brethren were unwilling to do the emperor this favor, they could not count on his protection in future attacks. After the elders had repeatedly asserted that these reputed treasures were nonexistent, the committee demanded a written statement, which was sent to Prague with a letter from Zierotin, assuring the treasurer that he had previously tried in vain to obtain a loan from the Brethren; for with their large number of children, sick and aged persons, and the heavy taxes, their expenses were very heavy; there could therefore be no great capital in reserve. In 1597, while the Neumühl Brethren were greatly occupied with the offensive conduct of Hans Zuckenhammer (q.v.) and in addition had to suffer the quartering of four squadrons of horsemen for five days, the government continued its efforts to obtain the loan. On the suggestion that the reason for the Hutterite refusal of the loan was the fear that the money would be used for war purposes, a letter was written by Prague on Feb. 4, 1597, requesting 10,000 Talers for the repayment of an urgent debt, and accusing the Brethren of a lack of good will. A year later a certain Jew of Nikolsburg, Pisker Löw, claimed to have a letter from the emperor demanding the loan of 10,000 florins. The Brethren, suspecting that this request was not genuine, refused to pay the sum; Pisker was finally ordered to apologize to the Brethren. Zierotin had meanwhile died. It was thereupon decided to have the Landtag meeting on Jan. 2, 1601, impose upon the Hutterian Brethren a poll tax, "under the pretext that this tax would be used nowhere but for the payment of internal taxes." Meanwhile the Bruderhof suffered further depredations through the quartering of military troops, who took away much material and many horses. In July 1600 it was the cavalry of Count Thurn; in the autumn of 1601 the cavalry of a certain Hodicky stayed three weeks; in 1602 the infantry of Schönberger stayed five weeks; finally the Thurn Cavalry came again.

At the court it was decided that since the Brethren were suffering so much confiscation of cattle, horses, and other goods in lieu of the war taxes which they refused to pay, this would be a favorable time to renew the request for a loan. The letter on the subject called attention to the great sacrifices all classes in Moravia had made in the defense of the country, while the Jews and the Anabaptists, who had more provisions than anyone else in Moravia, had hitherto paid very little. On July 28, 1604, an imperial order was sent to the provincial governor, Karl von Liechtenstein, calling for both groups to deliver either a large loan or wagons and horses for the artillery with the necessary drivers. The negotiations with the Brethren, which included an official delegation to Neumühl on August 26, were futile, since Braidl could show how impoverished the brotherhood was. In the course of the negotiations the governor secured a list of all the Bruderhofs: there were at that time 37, with an average of 200 adults each (with children this might mean a total populace of at least 15,000). The governor advised the imperial office that little could be expected from new tax levies, since the brotherhood was so poor that many members were forsaking the brotherhood and there were few new converts. So the attempt was dropped.

On April 1, 1610, three major buildings at Neumühl were accidentally burned. The war in the fall of 1619 brought new and severe losses to Neumühl, when 12,800 Moravian troops and 10,000 Hungarian troops lay two months in the vicinity. The constant plundering practically ruined the Bruderhof. In December 1620 the entire population of Neumühl fled to Göding and Wesseli in view of the imminent danger of attack, returning sometime later. In 1621 the brotherhood was twice put under heavy pressure to deliver war loans, wagons, and men for military service, which they steadfastly refused. The third attempt in May-July, which included charges of treason and threats of complete extermination of the brotherhood and delivering of the women and children into serfdom, resulted in the betrayal by several weak brethren (the bishop and several other leaders had been in prison for several months) of most of the hidden money of the brotherhood, which was in turn followed by the excommunication of the bishop (Hirzel) and several other leaders. Cardinal Dietrichstein (q.v.) reported on June 29, 1622, that he was (on request) preparing an edict calling for the expulsion of the entire brotherhood from Moravia, which soon followed. Neumühl, however, was apparently the last of the Bruderhofs to be expelled. It was still in existence in November 1623, but must have been lost soon thereafter. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Loserth, Communismus; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Fr. Hruby, Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren (Leipzig, 1935); M. Witzany, Die Markgrafschaft Mähren und die Marktgemeinde Eisgrub; P. Dedic, Die religiösen und kirchlichen Verhältnisse in Mähren (1922); A. Riep, Der Markt Tracht (Brno, 1930); ML III, 214-18.

Neuneich, an Amish Mennonite congregation in the Sundgau in southern Alsace on the Swiss border, named after a farm by this name near Ligsdorf in the Glaserberg area (now reverted to forest) a few miles from Lucelle (Lützel), about 12 miles from Basel. The congregation was in existence in 1779 when its elder, Peter Kaufmann, represented it at the Amish conference at Essingen (q.v.), Palatinate. It is probable that the later congregations of Lucelle (q.v.) and Basel-Binningen (q.v.), now called Holée, formed at the end of the 18th century, are descendants of this congregation, and that Birkenhof (q.v.) is the direct descendant. Pierre Sommer believes that the Neuneich area, which lies in the remote northern part of the Jura Mountain chain, where the summits reach 2,000-2,500 ft., was a place of refuge for Anabaptists in the mid-16th century, but there is no documentary evidence for this. Where the families of this area came from is also not known, possibly in part from the Jura area further south and east, possibly from the Markirch, Alsace, area whence the Mennonites were expelled in 1710. It is also possible that they came from the Montbéliard area after 1740, when the Mennonites were again tolerated in French territory about the time when the Florimont (Normanvillars) settlement was made. Two Peter Kaufmanns living in the latter area in 1791 (Gratz, 91) may have been relatives of the Peter Kaufmann, elder of Neuneich in 1779, who died at Hirtzbach in 1797. Since the Amish of these areas moved frequently as necessary to find farms to rent, and since they had no meetinghouses in the 18th century, it is difficult to determine congregational identities or boundaries. Neuneich was, however, for a time a main meeting place of the Amish families in this general area. H.S.B.

Pierre Sommer, "Assemblée de Birkenhof (Neuneich)," Christ Seul, February 1933, 4 f., and "Assemblée de Bâle (Holée)" April 1933, 4-6; Delbert Gratz, "Normanvillars," in Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 89-95.

Neunhuben, a village in the Polish district of Schwetz, west of the Vistula River, was in 1659 ff. settled by Dutch colonists who may have been Mennonites. In the course of time they all left this area on account of repeated floods. Then in 1745 the village was bought by a number of Mennonite farmers from the neighboring villages of Montau (q.v.), Schönsee (q.v.), and others. In the land leases of Neunhuben the following Mennonite names are found: Kopper, Rosenfeldt, Goerz, Klieuwer, Bartel, and Geddert. The Mennonites of Neunhuben belonged to the Montau congregation. vdZ.

H. Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk der niederländischen Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg a.d.Lahn, 1952) 25 f., 59 note 23, 100-4; ML III, 219.

Neunhuben, a congregation southeast of Danzig, originated in 1659 (Menn. Gesch.-Bl., 1940, 4) and united with the Mennonite congregation in Danzig, but acquired a degree of independence in 1791. In 1826, when the city congregation in Danzig employed a salaried preacher, the rural congregation of Neunhuben joined the Fürstenwerder (q.v.) congregation as a subsidiary and built a small church at Quaderndorf (q.v.) in 1845, where the members met twice a month. At the close of the 19th century 30 families belonged to this congregation; then it began to decline through emigration. In 1941 it had a membership of 67, including children, living in four villages. With Fürstenwerder it belonged to the Conference of the East and West Prussian Mennonite Congregations (q.v.). It ceased to exist with the extinction of West Prussian Mennonitism in 1945 as a result of the Russian invasion. (ML III, 219.) Hege.

Neu-Osterwiek, a branch congregation of the Chortitza (q.v.) Mennonite Church in the Ukraine, South Russia; one of the meetinghouses of the Chortitza congregation was located here.

Neurecht, a village in Mexico in the northeast of the settlement made by Mennonites of Canada in Chihuahua in 1922.

Neureinland, a village in Mexico in the south of the settlement made by Mennonites of Canada in Chihuahua in 1922.

Neu-Samara (Pleshanovo), a Mennonite settlement in the northern part of the fertile section of Samara, South Russia, about 125 miles east of the city by the same name. It was founded in 1890 as a daughter settlement of Molotschna (q.v.) and embraced 59,400 acres of land. In 1926 it numbered 3,071 Mennonite and 66 non-Mennonite inhabitants, who lived in twelve villages and five single farms. The settlement was completely destroyed by the measures of the Soviet authorities before World War II. (ML III, 219; see also Pleshanovo.)

Neu-Schönwiese (Russian, Dmitrovka), a Mennonite settlement near Alexandrovka in South Russia. In the church organization it was a subsidiary of the Schönwiese Mennonite Church, and was founded in 1868. The land, 3,788 acres, was bought of Russian estate owners, and was of such quality that the settlement soon achieved prosperity. But here too the civil war of 1918 had a devastating effect. On Nov. 15, 1918, the inhabitants fled to Schönwiese, but returned in 1919; they suffered the loss of all their property. (ML III, 219.) D.H.E.

Neuss, a town on the Rhine, formerly belonging to the bishop and elector of Cologne, Germany. A letter written by Hans Busschaert (q.v.) in 1570 (found in Antw. Arch.-Bl. XII, 26 f.) indicates that a Mennonite congregation existed at Neuss, of which there is, however, no further information. Andreas of Neuss (see Andreas von Neiss) was a Hutterite elder who baptized at Paurbach in Moravia about 1535. (Wolkan, Lieder, 29 f.)

A Mennonite family by the name of Neuss (or Neiss), the ancestors of the American Nice (q.v.) family, is found in the 17th century in the German Rhineland, particularly at Crefeld. vdZ.

Neustadt, a village in Mexico, in the southern part of the Chihuahua settlement made by Canadian Mennonites in 1922.

Neustadt a.d.W. (an der Weinstrasse, earlier an der Haardt), an old city (pop. 26,674) in the Palatinate, Germany, the center of the Palatine wine industry, 16 miles southwest of Ludwigshafen (q.v.). There is evidence of an Anabaptist congregation here in the 16th century, but little specific information. An elder of this area, named Farwendel (q.v.), joined the Hutterites in Moravia in 1565. The Hutterite Chronicle (Chronik, 415) calls him "ein alter diener oder leerer der Schweizer Brüder Gemain bei der Newstat an der Haart," and tells how he was in prison at Oggersheim near Worms when he decided to go to Moravia. The Branchweilerhof (q.v.), which lies about one mile east of the city, has been a Mennonite settlement and congregation since 1683. The Mennonite Central Committee maintained here its relief headquarters for the French Zone of Germany (December 1946 to the fall of 1950) and for a time for all Germany. It carried on a relief food and clothing program here, and beginning in 1948 a special religious program for children by Elizabeth Wiebe. When the MCC left, Miss Wiebe continued her work, and ultimately a general evangelistic program was started in 1957, leading toward establishment of a Mennonite Brethren congregation. On Oct. 15, 1949, an MCC children's home was established at Bad Dürkheim about 10 miles north of Neustadt. H.S.B.

Neustadt-Goedens, a town in East Friesland, Germany, 5 miles southeast of Jever and 20 miles east of Aurich, once the seat of a Mennonite congregation. This is the place of origin of the Dutch van Geuns (q.v.) family, which has been Mennonite since the time of the Reformation, and whose progenitor Steven Jansz van Geuns (Goedens) came to Groningen about 1720. Another well-known family of Neustadt-Goedens was the Cremer (Kremer, Cramer, Kramer) family, many of whom were deacons and preachers in the local congregation. Neustadt-Goedens was the home of Hinrich Krechting (q.v.), who escaped from Münster in 1535.

In Goedens Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 20 persons in 1551-65; hence a congregation came into being here soon after 1550. They were at once given protection by the van Freydag family, from whom they received favors in subsequent periods as well. In the 17th century the congregation belonged to the Old Flemish Mennonite branch, and until 1790 remained a member of the Groningen Sociëteit. Its Golden Age it experienced in the 17th century concurrently with the city, which at that time had a considerable linen industry and trade with Oldenburg. The highest membership, 67, was reached in 1736. In 1710 it was about 60, 56 in 1754, and 66 in 1767. Preachers who served here were Lubbert Alberts (1626-91), Albert Tobias Cramer 1679-92, Jan Jacobs 1693-1726, Pieter Alberts Zwart 1728-50, Lubbert Jansz Cremer 1738-87, Hinrick Pieters Swart (Zwart) 1756-d.75, Jan van Kalker 1782-88, Jan W. van Douwen 1789-98, and Taco Kuiper 1799-1804. In 1741 Pieter Zwart received from the counts van Freydag permission to build a church. In the 19th century the decline began. In 1804-36 the congregation had no preacher; in 1820 it had 20 members, in 1840 only 11. In 1836-42 Jakob van der Smissen, the retired preacher of Friedrichstadt and Danzig, came to fill the pulpit for several years. In 1895 there was only one member left, who lived in Wilhelmshaven. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2800-10; Naamlijst 1810, 83; DJ 1837, 35; 1840, 45 and list facing page 52; DB 1879, 8; 1885, 6; 1895, 184; 1898, 222 f.; 1906, 192; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I and II, see Index; ML III, 219.

Neutäufer, a name sometimes given in Switzerland and South Germany to the Apostolic Christian Church (q.v.) called properly "Gemeinschaft Evangelisch Taufgesinnter" or "Fröhlichianer." The Neutäufer are a rather widely disseminated denomination in Switzerland. Since some of its adherents were originally Mennonites they were called "Neutäufer" to distinguish them from the older "Alttäufer." The group owes its origin to Samuel Heinrich Fröhlich (q.v.), born in Brugg in the Swiss canton of Aargau July 4, 1803, who stemmed from an old French Huguenot family with the name De Joyeux. When the family fled from France in the period of persecution it settled in German-speaking Switzerland and changed its name to Fröhlich. Samuel Fröhlich studied theology at the universities of Zürich and Basel, but was not in sympathy with the spirit of rationalism found in the universities at that time. After severe inner struggles, in October 1825, "finally a view of faith on Jesus Christ, the Crucified" came to him which brought him "rest and peace and light and created room in me for a new creation." He served as a pastor of the Reformed Church at Leutwil in the canton of Aargau for a short time. Since he taught a rebirth through repentance and faith, and baptism upon confession of faith, he was opposed by the church consistory. On Oct. 22, 1830, he was hastily summoned and told that he had been eliminated from the list of Aargau clergy, and that he was strictly forbidden to perform any church function such as preaching and baptizing.

Fröhlich then had himself baptized in Geneva by Pastor Bost, who had likewise been expelled from the church. From now on he preached the Gospel in private meetings, began to baptize, and "to help to gather the children of God." In August 1832 he made connections with Christian Gerber near Langnau (q.v.), the leader (Vorsteher) of the Emmental Mennonite congregation. When it developed that there was some agreement in the matter of baptism Fröhlich himself traveled to Langnau and visited Gerber (1763-1849), who was at that time nearly seventy years old. At a meeting of all the ministers and deacons Fröhlich presented his beliefs. Gerber and several others, like Christian Baumgartner, a Mennonite preacher living in Labach near Langnau, agreed with him. Fröhlich's "earnest pure teaching of the Gospel, which aroused the sleepy," soon found entry, especially since Gerber and Baumgartner complained about the lethargy and laxity of the preachers. Thus Fröhlich found favorable soil in Langnau and from now on held regular meetings here, which were well attended. The court record reports that "at a public meeting he gave the admonition like a preacher and in the evening often taught, so that the old simple doctrines now seem to some as foolishness." He won several members of the Langnau Mennonite congregation, who now began to separate from the others. They demanded that communion be held almost every Sunday according to Acts 2:46, hoping thereby to lead the congregation back to the apostolic position. These innovations attracted many. By Sept. 2, 1832, Fröhlich's audience was estimated at 400-500 persons. Fröhlich was therefore summoned before the government and banished. He then went to East Switzerland.

This move, however, caused severe divisions in the Mennonite congregations in the Emmental. In spite of negotiations, unity could not be achieved and discord increased. Gerber and Baumgartner began at Christmas time 1834 to observe communion separately with several of their companions. This matter then came before the brotherhood in the Jura. In January 1835 four preachers, David Baumgartner, Hans Zingg, Jakob Nussbaumer, and Ulrich Lehmann, came to Langnau to settle the trouble, but accomplished little. The elders and ministers of the Langnau congregation continued to hope for improvement, but the meetings remained separate. In East Switzerland and in the vicinity of his home in Aargau many Mennonites grouped themselves around Fröhlich. The movement spread also in the cantons of St. Gall, Appenzell, Thurgau, and Zürich. In the Emmental the division became even greater when Fröhlich sent to the Emmental George Steiger from Toggenburg, one of his followers, a young man of 21 years. Steiger declared that the adherents of the old order were all spiritually dead as long as they were not baptized by immersion. Just as Jakob Ammann had done in his time (1694-97) Steiger insisted that the Langnau church discipline was too lax. He succeeded in drawing about 64 persons out of the Mennonite congregations and a similar number from the Reformed Church in Langnau and uniting them into a separate congregation by rebaptism. But they first had to confess that they had until then been children of the devil. This baptism by Steiger destroyed all hope of healing the schism in the Mennonite congregation. The Swiss conference meeting in March 1835 decided to expel Gerber and Baumgartner with their following from the Mennonite brotherhood; this was done on the first Sunday of May by the elders of the Jura churches. Thus complete separation had come. Fröhlich's followers were now called "Fröhlichianer" or "Neutäufer."

Soon after the division Ulrich Steiner (q.v.) was installed as elder of the Langnau Mennonite Church. In his booklet Angenehme Stunden in Zion he describes how seriously he was grieved by this course of events, which caused him severe trials until God gave him light. The light of the rising sun with its golden glow seemed to him a symbol of the old church, since through all the storms of persecutions it had shone as a bright light. As a symbol of the new brotherhood he believed he saw the light of the full moon as a reflection of the former.

In February 1836 Fröhlich made an attempt to make contact with the Reformation Committee of the Baptist Association in London, with the view of bringing about a unification of his group with the Baptists. He also negotiated with Johann Gerhard Oncken (q.v.) in 1846 for the purpose of union. All these attempts failed; Fröhlich was alone with the congregations which had originated through him and which called themselves "Taufgesinnte Gemeinschaft." On Oct. 30, 1836, Fröhlich again visited Langnau, staying at Käregg for several days until the police began to pursue him. In 1844 Fröhlich was finally expelled from Switzerland and found refuge in Strasbourg with a Johann Diebold. Here too he tried to find his way to the Mennonite congregations, but the Mennonites explained to him that only those ministers who were ordained for the proclamation of the Word by the laying on of hands of their elders were admitted as preachers. Since the "Alttäufer seemed to regard the letter more than the Spirit" no agreement was reached. From Strasbourg Fröhlich tried to serve his congregations by means of pastoral letters, some of which are still extant. In late July 1852 he once more visited the Langnau congregation, holding a meeting in a barn. Again on his last trip in Switzerland in 1856 he passed through Langnau. He died on Jan. 15, 1857.

In the canton of Bern the Neutäufer have considerable congregations, not only in the Emmental but also in other parts. In Bern they built an old people's home called the Mattenhof in 1903. In 1908 a part of the congregation under Elder Fritz Zehnder separated and built a meetinghouse of its own in Bärau near Langnau.

On the whole the Neutäufer are rather hostile to the state church, for which reason there were serious difficulties with the clergy of the church in the first decades of their existence. A clergyman of Bern whose name is not given published a pamphlet in 1864 with the title Gemeinfassliche Belehrung über die Sekte der Neutäufer und ihre Lehre, "to preserve the members of the Evangelical Reformed State Church from error and seduction."

For the nurture of the Neutäufer congregations in Alsace, Strasbourg, and elsewhere, Fröhlich on Jan. 1, 1847, ordained G. Martin Mangold in addition to Johann Diebold. Mangold is credited with the publication in 1853 of the Zionsharfe, the Neutäufer hymnal, using songs out of the former Harmonika. But this cannot be true, since the first edition is dated 1844. But he is the author of the book Blicke in die Vergangenheit, Gegenwart und Zukunft, oder Enthüllungen wichtiger prophetischer Weissagungen und Anmerkungen über die Offenbarung Jesu Christi an seinen Knecht Johannes (Zürich, 1862). Mangold here presents himself as a prophet illuminated by God, who has the task of explaining the Revelation of John. At the very beginning he calls infant baptism the basic error, which has set the whole ecclesiastical building on a false foundation. The rejection of infant baptism is, to be sure, understandable, but what follows is particularly striking, and is actually nothing more than unwholesome presumption. The fallen star of Rev. 8:10-11, he says was the Church Father Augustine, who must be regarded as the "destroyer of divine fundamental truth." The Reformation and the whole Protestant church he saw as the second beast out of the abyss, which like the first beast, the papacy, killed the two witnesses of God, the Law and the Gospel, and is therefore called the false prophet. The beast with seven heads was, in his interpretation, the combination of traditional church doctrine with the seven sacraments, through which the body of the orthodox world church is held together. The new church constitution of the Reformation had "like the Lamb in the church of God only two sacraments." Both branches (Lutheran and Reformed) he interprets as the two horns of the beast which have extended their might over lands and kingdoms. At the end Mangold also discusses the Mennonites and Baptists, "who to be sure, at first stood in the truth but gradually fell into externalities," which had lost "the divine anointment and the power," and had turned into a "saltless salt."

After Fröhlich's death Mangold emigrated to America and established several congregations there, which spread to the states of New York, Illinois, and Ohio. (See Apostolic Christian Church.) In Austria, where there are a few Neutäufer, and in Hungary, Jugoslavia, and Rumania, where there are more, they are called Nazarenes (q.v.). During World War I many of them had to undergo long imprisonment in Hungary because they refused military service. On the whole the Neutäufer are rather narrow, rejecting communion with other believers, even those who maintain the same principles, and holding strictly to tradition. S.G.

Die Umtriebe der Neutäufer (Bern, 1841); Die Sekte der Neutäufer (Bern, 1864); S. Geiser, Die Taufgesinnten-Gemeinden (Karlsruhe, 1931); G. Martin Mangold, Blicke in die Vergangenheit, Gegenwart und Zukunft (Zürich, 1862); Herrmann Ruegger, Aufzeichnungen über Entstehung und Bekenntnis der Gemeinschaft Evangelisch-Taufgesinnter (Zürich, 1948); English translation, Apostolic Christian Church History I (Chicago, 1949); Delbert L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953).

Neutralists. After the Frisian-Flemish schism of 1567, by which the stricter Mennonites in the Netherlands were divided into two branches, a few congregations did not wish to side with either group. In Zierikzee (q.v.) they were called "Stilstaanders" (q.v.), elsewhere "Neutralists." (The name is found in A. Montanus, Kerkelijke Historie van Nederland, 197.) The Neutralists were numerous in the district of Baarderadeel in Friesland, where the name was used as late as the 18th century. (ML III, 219.) vdZ.

Neuwerk Hutterite "Bruderhof" near Fulda, Germany: see Rhönbruderhof.

Neuwied, a town (pop. 20,670) in the former Prussian Rhine Province of Germany, since 1945 in Rhineland-Palatinate, seven miles northwest of Coblenz. In 1574 the Anabaptists were expelled from the gravure of Wied (Fahr and Irlich). An influx of Mennonites and the organization of a congregation was not possible until Count Frederick of Wied founded Neuwied as a residential town in 1652, and offered freedom of worship to all creeds. The Mennonites who came to Neuwied at that time stemmed from Jülich and Monschau, the Palatinate, and Switzerland. They were peasants and craftsmen (weavers and clockmakers). After they had been living here in peace for about twenty years the counts tried in 1678 to compel them to attend the Reformed Church now and then; when they refused to comply they were given a guarantee of religious liberty on Dec. 16, 1680, "in consideration of their persistent plea and their quiet life and conduct." This document names the families of Linschet, Krey, Rupp, and Sintzenich. In 1614 a number of oppressed Mennonites from the Palatinate settled near Neuwied. In 1710 the Count of Neuwied was disposed to grant citizenship to the Mennonite refugees from Switzerland. In 1767 a number of Mennonites from Württemberg settled at Neuwied.

After Count Frederick's death some difficulties arose on the questions of reception into the guilds and guard duty; but on the whole the Mennonites of Neuwied could live according to their beliefs. Indeed, the count even encouraged the building up of the congregation. Lorentz Friedenreich (q.v.), the elder of the congregation, wrote in 1769 that they were not only given protection and toleration like all other churches, but were encouraged to invite more Mennonites to come from the Palatinate; they would have invited more if economic conditions had permitted. But for weavers and peasants these were not too favorable; hence the membership remained small, never exceeding eighty.

Until 1768 services were held in homes as required by the government. In 1768 Count Alexander ordered the Mennonites to erect a suitable church near the castle grounds. With generous assistance from their brethren in Holland a small church could be built, with an adjoining residence for the needy, and on Nov. 6, 1768, the church was dedicated in the presence of the count's family. In 1826 an organ was put into the church, and in 1861, as a gift from the count, a small tower with a bell.

The intellectual life and manner of living were no different here from other Mennonite communities of the time. Simplicity, tolerance, and quietness were characteristic of them. When Lavater, together with Basedow and Goethe, visited the Neuwied congregation on July 19, 1774, he noted in his diary, "Visited the Mennonites Friedenreich and Kintzing, splendid faces full of simplicity and honesty, and around them—many boys and daughters and mothers' faces equally noble, innocent, affectionate, went into their church without tower or bell, spoke of their services, looked into their orthodox catechism —Basedow asked whether they would receive one who did not believe in the Trinity—received the reply—not to communion—looked over their artistic clocks—microscopes." In the 18th century the following ministers served at Neuwied: Thielmann Rupp ca. 1760, Lorentz Friedenreich, elder 1758-ca. 95; Jakob Jutzy (?), elder 1758-ca. 98; Heinrich Friedenreich 1788, Peter Weber 1793. In the 17th century the following served the congregation: Heinrich Rupp (d. 1637), a Vorsteher, in whose home the meetings were held for a time; Tillmann Rupp (d. 1649), a Vorsteher for 26 years, and his son Leonhard (d. 1683) for 18 years.

Concerning their legal status Fischer wrote in 1777: "The Mennonite brotherhood has its own distinctive organization, which differs from the three tolerated churches; it has no particular organization, but rather stresses quietness and inner piety, where no superior gives orders, but all regulations depend on the consent of all members. Thus a church inspection would not be of practical use, because they are allowed freedom of religion, and the rulers of the land have so little prescribed their doctrine or even sanctioned it, that one is not concerned with their doctrine but only considers whether their toleration is harmful to the state."

In the 19th century a deep change took place in the life of the congregation. Economic conditions induced many to emigrate to America. Furthermore, several families died out, and others joined the Reformed Church. (In 1817 there were including the children 76 members; in 1850, 40; in 1900, 88; in 1940 hardly 25.) The old spirit was dying. There was no one who would take charge of the preaching. And so it was decided to employ a salaried minister. With financial support from Holland and a fund raised by the members, trained preachers served the congregation in 1829-1909. Of these preachers, Karl Harder (q.v.) was outstanding; he preached at Neuwied 1858-69 and was given honorable mention by the royal poet Carmen Sylva in her autobiography, Mein Penatenwinkel. In 1867 the Neuwied congregation joined the A.D.S. (Dutch General Conference). Pastor Harder was followed by August Billau 1871-92, Adolf Siebert 1893-98, and Gerhard Haake 1898-1910. After this the ministers of the Crefeld Mennonite Church took over the pastoral care of the congregation, with regular preaching appointments.

After World War II a number of Mennonite refugees from West Prussia settled in the neighborhood of Neuwied. With the help of the MCC the congregation was built up. In 1948 Gerhard Fast became preacher, and in 1952 Otto Wiebe, formerly of Marienburg, West Prussia, elder. The baptized membership numbered about 360 in 1956.

An MCC unit of Pax men (Mennonite CO's from the United States doing their two years of I-W service in Europe) built a series of 14 one-family houses and 8 two-family houses in Torney near Niederbiber a few miles from Neuwied in 1950-54. A chapel was built in Niederbiber in 1955, and certain services are now held here. One of the houses was occupied for almost a year by a group of Pax men who had set up a cement block factory and made blocks (bimsblocks) for the houses they were building in Espelkamp (q.v.).

The traveler going from Andernach to Laach Lake is acquainted with the Mennonite farms and small Mennonite cemetery near Eich. They are the remains of a small Swiss ("Schwitzer") congregation, but which, reduced in number, later reunited with Neuwied.

A small Mennonite Brethren congregation was established in Neuwied about 1950, which acquired a meetinghouse in 1956, and had about 15 members. D.C., H.S.B.

D. Cattepoel, "Die Neuwieder Mennoniten-Gemeinde," in Beiträge zur Geschichte rheinischer Mennoniten (1939) 144-53; E. Crous, "Lavater, Basedow und Goethe bei den Mennoniten in Neuwied," in Menn. Bl., 1930, 107 f.; Christian Neff, "Peter Weber, ein mennonitischer Pietist," Gem.-Kal. 1930, 61-102; Der Mennonit VI (February 1953); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1146, 1257, 1259, 1431 f., 1543; II, 2811-17; DB 1868, 172; 1885, 10 f.; B. C. Roosen, Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg-Altona II (Hamburg, 1887) 58; ML III, 219-21.

Neuwied (Germany) Mennonite Brethren Church was founded in 1951 by refugees from Russia and Poland. Most of these have now emigrated to Canada, but the congregation has been continued as a mission under the leadership of J. W. Vogt, supported by the M.B. Foreign Mission Board. In 1956 the congregation had acquired a meetinghouse and had 60 members, with J. W. Vogt as pastor. Only 9 of the original 25 members are still members, the rest having emigrated to Canada. H.S.B.

New Amish, a name sometimes given to the Apostolic Christian Church (q.v.) in the United States because several of its major congregations (e.g., Morton, Ill., and Croghan, N.Y.) were located in Amish Mennonite communities and won a considerable number of adherents from them. (See Neutäufer.)

New Bremen (N.Y.) First Mennonite Church (MC) was established on Nov. 11, 1941, with 76 charter members, most of whom had been members of the Amish Mennonite Church of Croghan, N.Y. The congregation is not affiliated with any Mennonite conference. D. A. Yoder, Goshen, Ind.; S. C. Yoder, Goshen, Ind.; and Simon Gingerich, Wayland, Ia., have served as bishops of the congregation. J. Lawrence Burkholder, Goshen, Ind., was the first pastor (1942-44). The 1955 membership was 190; Gordon Schrag was the pastor 1945-56. A new meetinghouse was built one mile north of town. B.F.Z.

New Carlisle (Ohio) United Missionary Church was organized in 1898. In 1954 the congregation had 140 members with R. P. Ditmer serving as pastor. A.Ta.

New Conestoga Mennonite Church (OOM) is located on the east bank of the Conestoga River, two miles west of the village of St. Jacobs, Ont. In 1894 land was purchased and a frame building erected to serve the Old Order (Wisler) Mennonites of this vicinity, known as the South Woolwich community. The ministers have been Daniel M. Brubacher, Ezra L. Martin, Tobias Martin, Israel Weber, and Irvin W. Shantz. The membership has been small.

J.C.F.

New Danville Mennonite Church (MC), in Lancaster Co., Pa., a member of the Lancaster Conference, was built on land of Bishop Hans Burkholder and Melchior Brenneman, pioneers of 1717. The cemetery is still there. In the overflow from the Lampeter-Strasburg settlement of 1710 many of the new arrivals in 1717 came into this area. The first meetinghouse, built in 1755 in this stump land, was called Stumptown. It was replaced in 1855 and 1878 by stone churches, and therefore became known as the Stone Church. The new one of brick built in 1907 gradually took on the present name of the near-by town. This was the home district of Bishop Martin Boehm, organizer of the United Brethren Church. The membership in 1956 was 260, with David N. Thomas as bishop and James H. Hess as the minister. A three-room Christian day school near by is sponsored by the district. I.D.L.

New Danville Reformed Mennonite Church is located five miles south of Lancaster, Pa. The meetinghouse was built in 1837, and was known as the Stumptown church. It was organized under the leadership of Bishop Abram Snavely, one of the first ministers in that district. This frame building has been used ever since, with a small addition about 60 years ago. Other ministers who served the congregation were John Kohr, Sr., Elias H. Hershey, John Kohr, Jr., Henry Fisher, Levi Weaver, and Christian Howry. The ministers of this group are not assigned to one particular meetinghouse, but alternate in the churches in the county. Likewise the members attend the meetings wherever they are; it is therefore hard to give exact membership figures. The present alternating ministers are Jacob L. Kreider, J. Henry Fisher, Clyde Weaver, Ray Eshleman, Willis Weaver, and Earl M. Basinger. The total Reformed Mennonite membership in Lancaster County was about 300 in 1948. J.L.K.

New Elm Springs Hutterite Bruderhof, near Magrath, Alberta, was founded in 1918 by the New Elm Spring Bruderhof near Ethan, S.D., who sold all their land and bought the New Elm site. Their preachers are Johann P. Entz, chosen here in 1923, and Jakob J. Waldner, chosen a few years later. In 1947 the Bruderhof numbered 107, with 40 baptized members. D.D.

New Elm Springs Hutterite Bruderhof at Valier, Mont., was founded in 1947 by several families and preacher Jakob Waldner of the New Elm Springs Bruderhof in Alberta. In 1947 the Bruderhof numbered 85, with 40 baptized members. D.D.

New Elm Springs Hutterite Bruderhof, near Ethan, S.D., was founded in 1911. In 1918 the Brethren sold the property and founded the New Elm Springs Bruderhof near Magrath, Alberta. In 1936 the Maxwell Bruderhof near Pigeon Lake, Man., bought this site and settled on it. Their preacher Joseph Hofer was chosen to the ministry in 1919 by the Maxwell colony in Manitoba. In 1939 Samuel Wollman was also chosen. In 1947 the Bruderhof numbered 146, with 56 baptized members. D.D.

New Guinea. The western part of this island, administered by the Dutch government, is populated by a hundred Papua tribes, most of whom are ancestor worshipers. In 1855 some Dutch Reformed missionaries started mission work in New Guinea, which was, however, not very successful until 1907. Since 1907 complete clans have been converted and batpized, and a number of Christian congregations have been established. The method of conducting missions has been that of a comprehensive approach, proclaiming the Gospel, establishing schools and hospitals, and social work.

In 1950 the region of Inanwatan (q.v.) was transferred to the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association (q.v.). R. E. H. Marcus was sent to this field in 1950, and P. Messie in 1953, as well as a number of teachers, physicians, and nurses. P. Messie returned to Holland in 1956. The center of the Dutch Mennonite activity at present is no longer Inanwatan but Teminabuan.

In 1956 the churches of New Guinea constituted the autonomous Evangelical Christian Church, governed by one general and several regional synods composed of native ministers, with the Dutch missionaries as advisers. In this Evangelical Church Mennonites co-operate with the Reformed, but are free to preach the Gospel in Mennonite manner and to administer adult baptism. The design of the foundation of this Evangelical Church is to renovate the old Papuan society into a Christian community from which pagan traditions and the practice of magic and ancestor worship are eliminated.
W.F.G.

New Hamburg, Ont., a town (pop. ca. 2,000) situated in Waterloo County, 12 miles west of Kitchener. It is a trading center for the Wilmot Township Mennonites of the Baden, Biehn, Geiger, and Shantz Mennonite (MC) congregations, and for the Amish Mennonites of the Steinman and East Zorra congregations. A small Reformed Mennonite church stands close to the town on the bank of the Nith River. The chief industries are textiles and brass working.
J.C.F.

New Hamburg Mennonite Brethren Church, a former congregation located in New Hamburg, Waterloo Co., Ont., a member of the Canadian M.B. Conference, was organized Nov. 20, 1932, under the leadership of Peter Goertzen. The membership in 1948 was 17, most of whom lived in town. The congregation met with the members of the United Mennonite Church in a rented hall. The ministers who served the church were D. Derksen, P. Goertzen, A. Block, and P. Friesen. The group, already small, suffered greatly when some of its members moved to areas where they could enjoy the fellowship of larger churches. On June 10, 1950, it chose to join the M.B. Church of Kitchener as an affiliate. While I. T. Ewert supplied the pulpit, G. Wiebe served as their local leader, with David Dick succeeding him. The pulpit supply became difficult, and so the group dissolved and its members joined the M.B. Church of Kitchener on Sept. 29, 1952.

J.J.T.

New Holland, a town (pop. 3,000) located 13 miles northeast of Lancaster, Pa., on Highway 23. With Hans Groff settling to the northwest, the Weaver brothers and David Martin to the east, the Rancks to the southeast, and Dorus Eby to the southwest, this area was left for John Diffenderfer, the 1728 immigrant. David Martin brought him, his family, and all his worldly possessions from the port of entry to this area. With the aid of Swiss Mennonite neighbors he soon had a shelter and a cow. His son Michael laid out the town in 1760, on 268 acres patented to him, first called Säue-Schwamm (Hog Wallow) for very apparent reasons, later Earltown after Hans Groff, then New Design until the 1760's. Then New Holland was adopted, honoring the country that so graciously made possible the journey of many to this country. The town became a trading center for the Mennonites on the fertile acres around. The silk mill, the concrete works, and more recently the overshadowing New Holland Machine Company, are industries here. A Mennonite (MC) meetinghouse is also found in the town.
I.D.L.

M. G. Weaver, A History of New Holland, Pennsylvania . . . 1728-1928 (New Holland, 1928).

New Holland Mennonite Church (MC), located in eastern Lancaster Co., Pa., was organized for a number of retired farmers and near-by farmers from the Weaverland, Groffdale, and Hershey congregations. In 1910-22 services were held in the Methodist church, with Noah H. Mack as minister. In 1922 the present large meetinghouse was built in the town. Noah Sauder was the first local minister, ordained Dec. 20, 1923. Six ordinations have been held here to date. Mahlon Witmer as bishop, and Noah N. Sauder and James H. Martin as ministers serve a congregation of 258 members (1956).
I.D.L.

New Hopedale Mennonite Church (GCM), located at the northeast corner of Meno, Major Co., Okla., a member of the Western District, was organized June 13, 1895, in the basement of the Benjamin P. Jantz home with 25 charter members. Johann Ratzlaff was called to be their elder and pastor. In 1914 Ratzlaff retired for reasons of health and was followed by J. B. Epp, who served for five years, and was replaced by J. J. Ratzlaff. The following ministers assisted at the two meetinghouses: J. J. Ratzlaff, David H. Schmidt, Tobias P. Wedel, Tobias P. Unruh, Karl Schartner, Heinrich T. Neufeld, and Albert J. Unruh. Mr. and Mrs. Harold Ratzlaff are missionaries in India from New Hopedale. A group that had worshiped separately from the beginning later organized a congregation called West New Hopedale, taking over 50 members from New Hopedale.

H. U. Schmidt was pastor 1921-48; the pulpit was supplied until 1955 by various temporary ministers. In 1955 Arnold A. Epp was regularly appointed to this church and served several months. Ben J. Nickel then served until June 1957. A new meetinghouse has recently been built. The membership in 1956 was 308.
H.U.S.

New Huttertal Mennonite Church (GCM), located near Bridgewater, S.D., a member of the Northern District Conference but not of the General Conference, was organized in Russia and transplanted to America in 1874. It is of Hutterite background. Paul Tschetter served as its first leader in America. Previous to 1888, when the first meetinghouse was constructed, services were held in homes and schools. The meetinghouse was remodeled in 1952. The 1956 membership was 150, largely rural. Other ministers who have served this congregation are Joseph Wipf, John D. Hofer, David J. Wipf, Paul J. Tschetter, Jacob I. Walter, Albert Ewert, and Abe M. Wiebe.
J.D.U.

New Jersey State Hospital CPS Unit No. 63, located at Marlboro, had a maximum of 103 men. It was approved by Selective Service in November 1942 and closed in December 1946. Most of the men served as attendants to the mental patients in the institution. The Unit published an 82-page history and report of its work under the title p. r. n. (See Marlboro.)
M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 221 f.

New Market (Iowa) United Missionary Church was organized in 1893. In 1948 the congregation had 50 members, with J. B. Starkey serving as pastor.
J.B.St.

New Mennonites, a colloquial name given locally to several schismatic groups separating from older established Mennonite bodies, both by the older group and the general public. Its counterpart designation, "Old Mennonite" (q.v.), has likewise been used to designate the original group from which the new had broken off. Three instances of this usage have occurred: (1) the Reformed Mennonites (q.v.), who separated from the Lancaster (MC) Conference in Eastern Pennsylvania in 1812; (2) the Oberholtzer (q.v.) group (Eastern District Conference, GCM), which broke off from the Franconia Conference (MC) in Eastern Pennsylvania in 1847-48; (3) the Mennonite Brethren in Christ (q.v., now United Missionary Church), who broke off from the Mennonite Church (MC) in Indiana and Ontario in 1874-75. While the term "New Mennonite" was earlier fairly common in Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Ontario, it has gradually almost died out.

The term "New Maneest" has sometimes been used to refer to the Apostolic Christian (q.v.) Church in Illinois, New York, and Ohio, but the more common term in these districts has been "New Amish," although the Apostolic group has had no connection with the Amish either in Europe or America and was not a schismatic group in North America. In Switzerland the Apostolic group has commonly been called "Neutäufer," a term which historically has some justification since about half of the original group in 1832 was drawn from the Emmental

(Switzerland) Mennonite (Täufer) congregation. (See also Nieuwe Zwitsers; ML III, 214.) H.S.B.

New Mexico, admitted to the union in 1912 as the 47th state, population 681,187. There is in the state one Mennonite (MC) congregation, located at Albuquerque, founded in 1950, having 13 members in 1956; it is a member of the South Pacific Conference. H.S.B.

New Miami Hutterite Bruderhof, near Conrad, Mont., was founded in 1947 by several families and preacher Johann Wipf of the Miami Bruderhof at New Dayton, Alberta. The Bruderhof has a population of 108, with 45 baptized members. D.D.

New Milford Hutterite Bruderhof, near Augusta, Mont., was founded in 1946 by several families and preacher Joseph Kleinsasser from the Bruderhof in Milford, Alberta. In 1947 it had a population of 108, with 45 baptized members. D.D.

New Pittsburg Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, now extinct, located in Chester Twp., Wayne Co., Ohio, was organized in 1859 with John Holdeman as minister and a membership of 20. During the first 19 years services were conducted in homes of the members. In 1878 a modest meetinghouse was built. This congregation became extinct in 1883, when nearly all its members moved to Missouri or other congregations. P.G.H.

New Providence Mennonite Church (MC), located in a small town of that name in Lancaster County, Pa. By 1766 it had a log meetinghouse for the Groff, Eshleman, Herr, Funk, Brubaker, and Gochenauer families who had settled there. Johannes Bowman served them early as preacher. The Strasburg ministers helped them at first. In 1882 they built the Mechanic Grove meetinghouse for their southern constituency. Jacob T. Harnish as bishop, Abram D. Metzler and A. Clyde Hostetter as ministers served this congregation of 137 members in 1956. I.D.L.

New Raymer (Col.) was the address of a permanent side camp under the administration of the Fort Collins (q.v.) Civilian Public Service Camp No. 33 during World War II. It was known as Buckingham Side Camp, and was located on an abandoned farm site in an arid region about 70 miles east of Fort Collins. The campers, under Mennonite direction, built fences, reseeded grasslands, drilled wells, and built stock water tanks. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 122, 158, et passim.

New Rosebud Hutterite Bruderhof near Crossfield, Alberta, was founded in 1939 by several families from the Beiseker Bruderhof with their preacher, who was chosen in Beiseker in 1933. In 1944 Darius Tschetter was chosen minister. In 1947 this Bruderhof numbered 70, with 28 baptized members. D.D.

New Rosedale Hutterite Bruderhof was founded in 1944, 15 miles southwest of Portage La Prairie, Man., by Andreas Hofer and eleven families from the Rosedale Bruderhof near Elie, Man. In 1947 the population of the colony was 87, of whom 32 were baptized members. D.D.

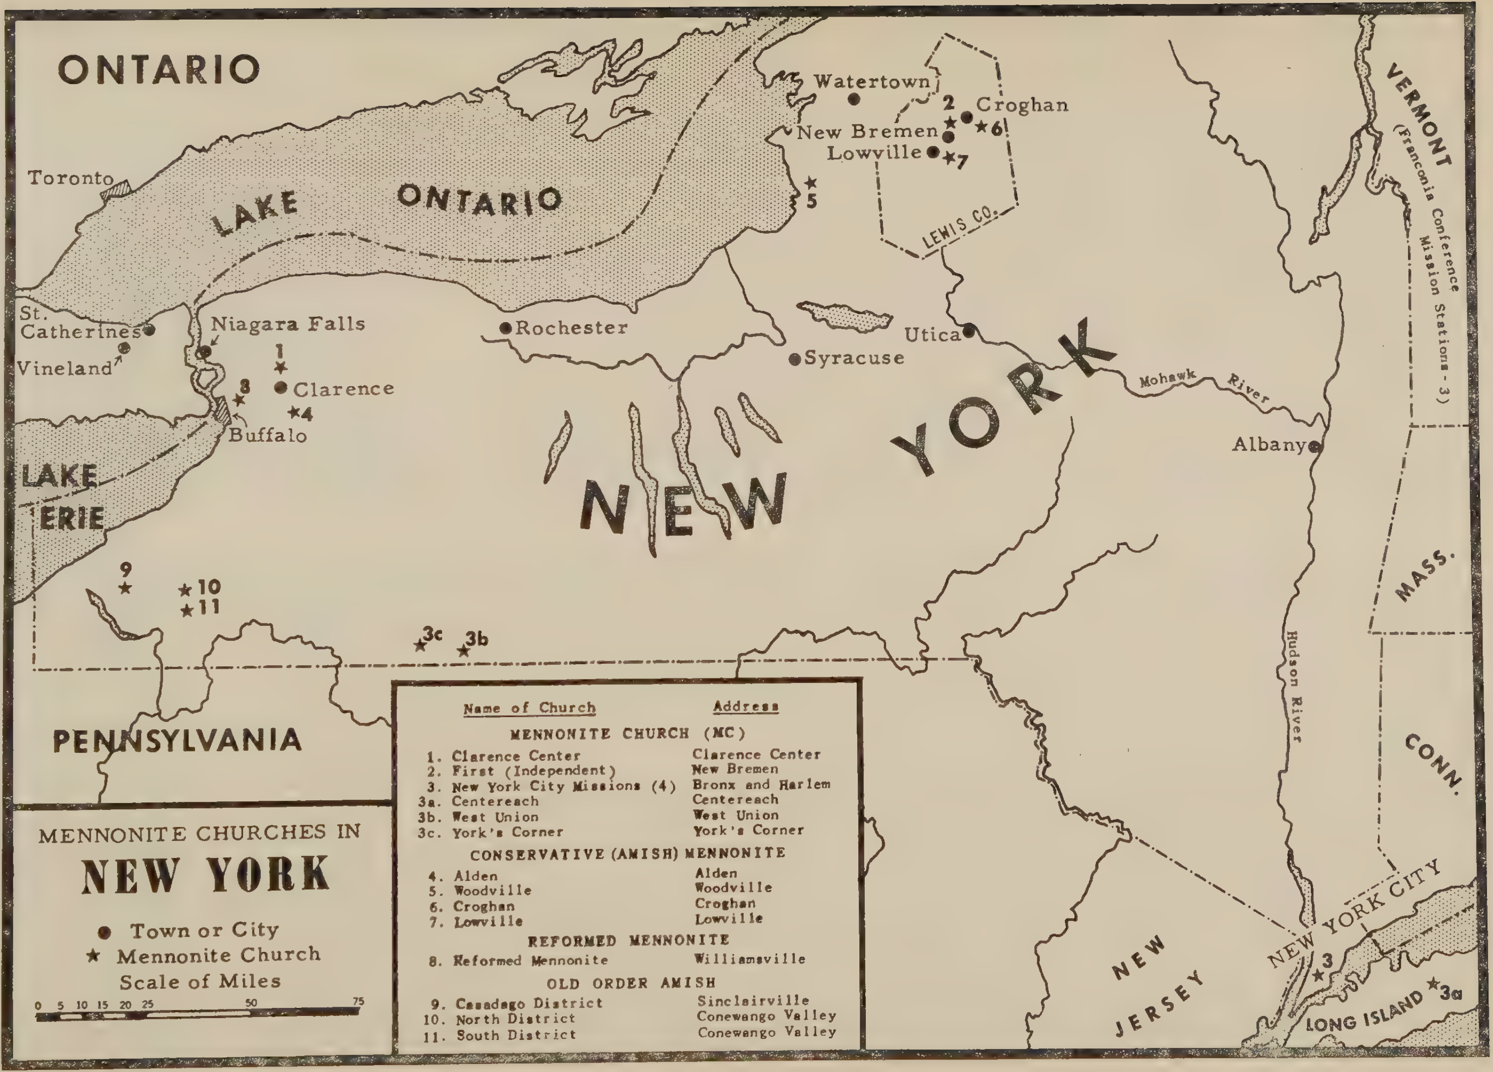
New Springvale Hutterite Bruderhof near Beiseker, Alberta, was founded in 1935 by several families from the Springvale commune near Rocky Ford, Alberta, with their preacher Jakob Wurz, chosen to the ministry in 1913. Franz A. Wollmann was chosen preacher here. In 1947 the colony numbered 165, with 70 baptized members. D.D.

New Stark Mennonite Church is the more commonly used name for Menno Chapel (q.v.), erected west of New Stark, Ohio, in 1878, and abandoned several years ago. J.S.U.

New York (State). As early as 1643 Mennonites are known to have been living on Manhattan Island, now New York City. A French Jesuit traveler, Father Jaques, in a letter of 1643 from Manhattan mentions "Anabaptists here called Menists" as one of the religious groups found on the island. Mennonites were reported in another document of 1657 at Gravesend on Long Island. The term Anabaptist appears frequently in early colonial New York records. However, no record of an organized congregation from this early time has been found, and no permanent settlement was made by them.

The only Mennonites to settle in the state of New York were settlers from Eastern Pennsylvania, largely from Lancaster County, who located in Niagara County (Falls Church) in 1810 ff. and in Erie County (Clarence Center or Good's Church) in 1824 ff. The former congregation was very small and soon died out. The latter was more substantial but had practically died out by the beginning of the 20th century. Several families of Krehbiels from the Palatinate located at Clarence Center in 1831 ff., and a small fraction of this congregation followed a Krehbiel preacher in 1875 into the General Conference Mennonite fellowship, but the group was small and ultimately died out. The Clarence Center congregation was revived by new arrivals beginning in 1920 and is now a flourishing congregation with 187 members. A Conservative Amish Mennonite congregation was started in the same community at Alden about the same time and now has 188 members. An Old Order Amish settlement was founded recently at Conewango Valley, N.Y., which now has two congregations with a total of 113 members, with a small neighboring congregation near Sinclairville. An independent Conservative congregation existed at Clarence 1921-48.

In 1833 ff. a large Conservative Amish Mennonite settlement was established near Croghan and Lowville in Lewis County, in the northeastern part of the state, by immigrants direct from Alsace and Lorraine, increased by settlers coming from the Amish community west of Kitchener (see Ontario), Ont. In 1955 this settlement had three congregations with a total of 631 members, one of which was at Woodville, some 50 miles nearer the St. Lawrence River. In 1941 a group withdrew from the Conservative church to form the New Bremen Mennonite Church, an independent congregation which in 1955



ONTARIO
Toronto
LAKE ONTARIO
St. Catherines
Vineland
Niagara Falls
1
8
Clarence
4
Buffalo
LAKE ERIE
Rochester
Syracuse
Utica
Watertown
2
Croghan
6
New Bremen
Lowville
7
5
LEWIS CO.
NEW YORK
Mohawk River
Albany
Hudson River
VERMONT
(Franconia Conference Mission Stations - 3)
MASS.
CONN.
NEW YORK CITY
3
LONG ISLAND
3a
NEW JERSEY
PENNSYLVANIA
9
10
11
3c
3b
Town or City
Mennonite Church
Scale of Miles
0 5 10 15 20 25 50 75

MENNONITE CHURCHES IN

NEW YORK

Name of Church	Address
MENNONITE CHURCH (MC)
1. Clarence Center	Clarence Center
2. First (Independent)	New Bremen
3. New York City Missions (4)	Bronx and Harlem
3a. Centereach	Centereach
3b. West Union	West Union
3c. York's Corner	York's Corner
CONSERVATIVE (AMISH) MENNONITE
4. Alden	Alden
5. Woodville	Woodville
6. Croghan	Croghan
7. Lowville	Lowville
REFORMED MENNONITE
8. Reformed Mennonite	Williamsville
OLD ORDER AMISH
9. Casadago District	Sinclairville
10. North District	Conewango Valley
11. South District	Conewango Valley

had 194 members. A large block of the Conservative members withdrew in 1849 to form an Apostolic Christian congregation.

Thus the total of Mennonites and Old Order Amish in the state in 1955 was 1,119, distributed as follows: Conservative Mennonite 819, Mennonite (MC) 187, Old Order Amish 113. A Reformed Mennonite congregation was established at Williamsville, N.Y., near Clarence, about 1834, which had 34 members in 1948. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ have a congregation of 48 members on Staten Island, a borough of New York City, and a mission in Binghamton on the south-central border of the state.

New York City and Long Island have become a locus of mission work for the Lancaster and Franconia Mennonite (MC) conferences in recent years. The Lancaster Conference has four stations, with a total of 52 members, three in the Bronx (1949, 1951, and 1954), and one a colored mission in Harlem (1954). The Franconia Conference has a work at Centereach, Long Island, with 10 members, started in 1953. The House of Friendship, a mission to Jews, was established as an outpost of the Maple Grove congregation (Ohio and Eastern Conference) near Atglen in Lancaster County, Pa., in 1956. Further mission stations have been established in the western part of the state as follows: by the Lancaster Conference at York's Corners in Allegany County in 1952, and at West Union in Steuben County in 1954, by the Conservative Mennonites at Williamsville in 1936, and by the Clarence Center Mennonite Church (MC) at Arcade in Allegany County in 1956. H.S.B.

New York, a village in the Ignatyevka Mennonite settlement in the province of Ekaterinoslav, in South Russia. The Chortitza settlement bought an estate here in 1888 for its landless members and founded six villages in the following year. Of these villages New York, with a population (1913) of 926, and Nikolayevka became the centers of the settlement. Each of the two villages had a Zentralschule, a Mennonite Brethren meetinghouse, and a Mennonite meetinghouse. With its subsidiaries Borissovo and Grigoryevka (q.v.) and with the forestry service unit at Azov, the New York Mennonite congregation had a membership of (in 1905) 2,275. For the M.B. congregation in this settlement see Nikolayevka Mennonite Brethren Church. (ML III, 223.) C.K.

New York Hutterite Bruderhof (Dariusleut), located near Maybutt, Alberta, was founded in 1924; the population in 1950 was 110, with Jacob Hofer as head minister. (ME II, 15.) D.D.

New York Mädchenschule (secondary school for girls) was established in the Bachmut Mennonite settlement (q.v.), South Russia, in 1907 after the New York Zentralschule had been established. The next year a second class was added. The sponsor of the school was J. J. Thiessen of Ekaterinoslav (q.v.). The leading teacher was Viktoria Klein. Other teachers were Miss L. P. Ediger, Miss H. A. Leonhard, Miss A. D. Rempel, Johann Bärg, and Dietrich Dyck. A supporting Mädchenschul-Verein aided the school. In 1913-14 there were 40 members in the fourth class. Little is known about the later development of the school. (Dirks, Jahrbuch 1913 107.) C.K.

New York Mennonite Church, Bachmut (q.v.; Ignatyevka) Mennonite settlement, Ukraine, Russia, was established in 1892 by settlers who had come from the Chortitza settlement. The first elder was Abraham Unrau, who was assisted by the ministers Isaak Hildebrand, Johann Nickel, Jakob Lehn, Franz Bückert I and II, and Jakob Wiebe I and II. In 1905 the congregation had a total membership of 1,834, with 606 baptized members. The Grigoryevka (q.v.) and the Borissovo (q.v.) Mennonite churches were branches of the New York Mennonite Church. The Azov Forestry Service Camp (q.v.) received its spiritual guidance from this congregation. The total membership of the New York church, and the two branches, including the camp, was 2,275 in 1905. Little is known about the fate of the congregation since World War II. C.K.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 701; Dirks, Statistik, 34, 64; ML III, 223.

New York Zentralschule was established in the Bachmut Mennonite settlement (q.v.), South Russia, in 1905. In 1910 the school consisted of four classes with five teachers. It was supported by the local Mennonite population. C.K.

Newark Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located two miles west and four miles south of Ithaca, Mich., originated in the 1880's when the Brown, Diller, Peters, Eicher, Gable, and other families settled here and held services in their homes. Jacob Litwiller, F. C. Fricke, and Peter Litwiller of an adjoining congregation were ordained to the ministry in the early 1890's. F. C. Fricke served as elder for many years. In 1902 a church was built, replaced by a larger church in 1920, which was remodeled and enlarged in 1947 and again in 1954. The membership in 1957 was 265. Nine other ministers and five deacons have been ordained in the history of the church; Glenn Litwiller was the presiding minister in 1957. The ministry is unsalaried. C.M.

Newark (N.J.) Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church was organized Dec. 21, 1941. In 1956 the congregation had 46 members with LeRoy S. Heller serving as pastor. R.H.G.

Newaygo County (Mich.) Amish settlement, now extinct. A group of Old Order Amish began to settle about seven miles north of White Cloud, Mich., on the banks of Diamond Loch Lake in 1895, including Manasses D. Schmucker and Samuel Yoder, who purchased an old sawmill and produced lumber from which many of the dwellings of the oncoming settlers were built. Other early Amish settlers were Daniel Miller, a minister from Lagrange Co., Ind., Dave Yoder of Elkhart Co., Ind., John Fry and Samuel Miller from Ohio. Newcomers purchased land northeast of White Cloud. Names characteristic of the settlement were Kauffman, Hochstetler, Stutzman, Troyer, Chupp, and Schrock. Gradually all the ministers and many others left.

A number of Amish families joined the Union Mennonite Church at White Cloud. T.U.N.

Newcomer, Christian (1744-1830), one of the founders of the United Brethren in Christ, was born of Mennonite parents in Lancaster County, Pa., the son of Wolfgang Newcomer. He was married to Elizabeth Baer in 1770. Baptized a Mennonite at about the age of 17, he felt a call to the ministry and withdrew from the Mennonite Church when he was living in Washington County, Md., about 1777, to associate himself with Philip Otterbein, a Reformed minister, who was active as a revival preacher. Martin Boehm (q.v.), a former Mennonite bishop in the Lancaster Mennonite Conference, was with Otterbein a co-founder of the United Brethren Church, which was fully organized and named in 1800. Otterbein and Boehm were the first two bishops elected, Newcomer the third, elected in 1813 and serving in that office until his death. His valuable diary, The Life and Journal of the Rev'd Christian Newcomer, published in 1834, gives information about his early years as a Mennonite. H.S.B.

Newkirk Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located in farming community in Kay County, Okla., about 25 miles southeast of Arkansas City, Kan. Mennonite settlers coming to this locality from Sterling, Ill., were the David Ebersole, Dan Ebersole, John Frey, Abe Frey, and Dan Frey families. In 1907 Christian Reiff and his family came from Newton, Kan., to serve this congregation as minister. The membership at the time of organization was 13, and increased to 22. Because of drought the families gradually moved away; by 1911 the congregation was discontinued. V.E.R.

Newman, Albert Henry (1852-1933), an American church historian, is the most important of the few Baptist scholars who have made a contribution to the history of Anabaptism in the Reformation time. Besides Newman there were only Henry S. Burrage (q.v.), H. C. Vedder, and William J. McGlothlin (q.v.). Besides these and the Mennonites there are no other American historians who have made any significant contribution to Anabaptist historiography.

Newman was born in Edgefield Co., S.C., on Aug. 25, 1852, the son of John Blackston and Harriet Whitaker Newman. After graduating from the Mercer University in Macon, Ga., in 1871, he acquired his theological education at the Baptist Rochester Theological Seminary at Rochester, N.Y., receiving his degree in 1875. Having chosen Semitic languages as his field of teaching he studied for one year at Southern Baptist Theological Seminary and in January 1877 was asked to succeed Whittemore as professor of church history at this seminary. In 1881 he joined the group which at that time founded McMaster University in Toronto, Ont., at which place he taught for 20 years as professor of church history. In 1901 he was called to the new Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary in connection with Baylor University in Waco, Tex. In 1921 he was given the lectureship in church history in a newly founded theological school of Mercer University. Here in January 1927 he celebrated the 50th anniversary of his professorship of church history.

Of Newman's writings the best known is the book published at Philadelphia in 1897, A History of Antipedobaptism from the Rise of Pedobaptism to A.D. 1609. Other publications were The Baptist Churches in the United States (2 vv., 1894) and A Manual of Church History (2 vv., 1899 and 1903); "The Reformation from a Baptist Point of View," in the Baptist Theological Quarterly, 1880; "The Significance of the Anabaptist Movement in the History of the Christian Church," in Review Supplement to the Goshen College Record, January 1926; Adam Pastor, Antitrinitarian Antipaedobaptist (a reprint from Papers of the American Society of Church History, Second Series V, 1914).

In the first of his books Newman gives a short survey of the struggle against infant baptism in the old church and a history of the struggle of the Middle Ages carried on by the Petrobrusians, Arnoldists, Waldenses, Taborites, and Bohemian Brethren and describes the Anabaptist movement from its beginning in Zürich, Switzerland, with Grebel, Manz, and Hubmaier in Austria, Moravia, and Bohemia, and finally with Melchior Hofmann down the Rhine. The kingdom of Münster he sees in its true light as an aberration, not as a result of the movement. After a chapter on Menno Simons in the northern group of the Mennonites he turns his attention to the Anabaptists in Italy and Poland. Finally in three chapters the history of the Anabaptist movement in England and the rise of the Baptist Church in 1609 is described.

The presentation is characterized by thoroughness, impartiality, and a benevolent understanding. Newman is the first historian writing in the English language who assigned to the Anabaptist movement its proper position, free of doctrinaire distortion. It is not saying too much to assert that Newman's work is the only satisfactory and complete scholarly history of the Anabaptist movement in the English language, unless Smithson's briefer discussion should be named. Of great value is the extensive bibliography at the end of the volume, which gives 400 titles of nothing but Anabaptist sources. H.S.B.

Frederick Eby, Newman, The Church Historian (Nashville, 1946); Monatshefte der Comenius-Gesellschaft, 1897, 342-43; ML III, 221 f.

Newport News, Va., a city (pop. 55,000) in the southeastern part of the state, has a large port on Hampton Roads as well as large shipyards. From this port many loads of cattle and horses were sent abroad by UNRRA (q.v.). Many of the Mennonite young men who served as attendants on UNRRA ships in 1946 and later, generally spent a number of days in the city before embarking. Two Mennonite (MC) churches are located in the city. Calvary Mennonite Church on Wickham Avenue, with a membership of 12, is a church for Negroes. The other is Huntington Avenue Mennonite Church (q.v.), with a membership of 50. Twelve miles north of Newport News is the Providence Mennonite Church (q.v.), located near Oyster Point, with a membership of 35. Fourteen miles northwest of the city is Denbigh and the nearby Warwick River Mennonite (MC) Church (q.v.), which has 300 members. All of these congregations belong to the Virginia Conference except Providence, which belongs to the Ohio and Eastern Conference.

E.W.C.

Newport News (Va.) Mennonite Mission (MC): see Huntington Avenue Mennonite Church.

Newton, the county seat (1956 pop. 13,603) of Harvey County (q.v.), Kan., is located southeast of the state's geographical center, about 23 miles north of Wichita on the Santa Fe Railroad. The area within an approximate 50-mile radius around the city contains the largest Mennonite concentration west of the Mississippi River, with many churches of the General Conference Mennonite Church, the Mennonite Church (MC), the Church of God in Christ Mennonites, and some Mennonite Brethren. In Newton are the General Conference Mennonite Headquarters and Publication Office, First Mennonite Church of Newton (GCM, q.v.), Bethel Deaconess Hospital and Home for Aged (GCM, q.v.), and Mennonite Central Committee regional office. North Newton (q.v.), incorporated as a separate municipality about one-half mile north of the city proper and almost entirely populated by Mennonites, is the seat of Bethel College (q.v.), Bethel College Mennonite Church (q.v.), the Mennonite Press (q.v., all GCM), and the MCC Relief Clothing Center. Prairie View Hospital (q.v.), an MCC mental hospital, is one and one-half miles east of Newton. In 1956 a third Mennonite church, the Newton Mennonite Fellowship (q.v.), was founded.

Founded as the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad built its tracks westward to the town site in July 1871, the town was named after Newton, Mass., the home of many Santa Fe stockholders. Completion of the railroad to Newton made it the northern end of the Chisholm Trail, over which Texas cattle ranchers drove great herds of Texas longhorns to Kansas railroads for shipment to eastern markets. Intercepting the bulk of the cattle trade, previously controlled by the Kansas Pacific R.R. (now Union Pacific) at Abilene some 60 miles to the north, Newton was the principal eastward shipping point for Texas cattle. The town's turbulent cowboy era, from August 1871 to January 1873, ended as the rails advanced south and west and the cattle trade transferred to other points.

In 1874 and the years immediately following, Mennonites bought large blocks of land from the Santa Fe, settling east, north, and west of Newton, in Harvey and the adjoining counties of Butler, Marion, McPherson, and Reno. Newton thus became the business and trading center of the Mennonites living within a radius of some 25 miles. Large purchases of tools and machinery were made by Mennonites whose financial resources were sometimes limited to promises.

In 1877 a few Mennonite families from South Russia, coming to Newton via Summerfield, Ill., settled just east of the town. These were followed by more Mennonite immigrants from West Prussia and Russia who bought land in the same area. First worship services were held in their homes two and one-half miles east of Newton at "Goldschar." In September 1878 they organized themselves as a congregation, later called First Mennonite Church of Newton. The congregation began to worship at the present church site on East First Street after completion of a frame building there in 1881.

Among the pioneer Mennonite businessmen of Newton was Bernhard Warkentin (q.v.), who built Harvey County's first flour mill at Halstead (q.v.) in 1873 and organized the Newton Milling and Elevator Co. about 1886. His mills were some of the first to be equipped for milling the hard Red Turkey wheat (q.v.), which he helped introduce to Kansas farmers on a large scale. The extensive milling industry in Newton is largely a monument to his pioneer efforts in that field. Other Mennonite names associated with the milling industry were Rudolph Goerz, son of David Goerz and founder and president of Goerz Flour Mills Co., now American Flours Inc., and Peter M. Claassen, founder and operator of the Claassen Flour Mills.

Mennonites were instrumental in founding and developing some of the city's early financial institutions. Cornelius F. Claassen founded a finance company (now Regier Loan and Abstract Co.) in 1888 and sold the business to J. G. Regier in 1904. When the Kansas State Bank was incorporated in 1902 with Bernhard Warkentin as president, C. F. Claassen became vice-president, then president in 1908. Herman E. Suderman came to the Midland National Bank (founded 1893) as vice-president in 1902, becoming president in 1919. Mennonite Mutual Fire Insurance Company (q.v.), now Midland Mutual Fire Insurance Co., was incorporated by Mennonites of central Kansas in 1880, and in 1893 was moved from Halstead to offices in Newton. First directors were David Goerz, Herman Suderman, Peter Harms, John Siemens, and Jacob W. Regier.

Mennonite publication work began in Newton in 1897 with Das Kansas Volksblatt, published by William J. Krehbiel and David Goerz. The Volksblatt was sold to the Kansan Printing Co. in 1899 and subsequently in 1900 to the Western Book and Printing Co., founded that year by H. P. Krehbiel. The name of the paper was changed to Post- und Volksblatt in 1903 and to Der Herold (q.v.) in 1909, this name being retained until publication ended in 1941. The company name also changed to Herold Book and Publishing Co. in 1909, and in 1920 to the present name, Herald Publishing Co. (q.v.). In 1923 the company began publication of Mennonite Weekly Review (q.v.), its present main concern. Other periodicals published in Newton as of 1956 were The Mennonite (q.v.) and Mennonite Life (q.v.).

Newton has numerous Mennonite business proprietors and tradespeople who play a large part in community life. The city has a large Mennonite population which has always been on the increase.

R.M.S.

W. E. Connelley, A Standard History of Kansas and Kansans (New York, 1918) 2292; L. L. Waters, Steel Rails to Santa Fe (Lawrence, 1950) 146; R. W. P. Muse, "History of Harvey County—1871-1881," in Atlas of Harvey County, Kansas—1882 (Philadelphia, 1882); J. E. Entz, "First Mennonite Church—Newton (1878-1953)," Menn. Life VIII (October 1953) 153-55; The Newton Kansan, Fiftieth Anniversary Number, LI (Aug. 22, 1922); ML III, 222 f.

Newton Bible Church had its beginning when on April 4, 1955, the following request with 28 signatures came to the board of deacons of the First Mennonite Church of Newton: "Having felt a definite need for an interdenominational church in Newton, . . . we the undersigned now would like to ask for our church letters so that we might unite as the Newton Bible Church. . . ." This request was granted. The newly organized church worships on Old Main Street and has Lawrence Friesen as pastor (1957). A.Ep.

Newton (Kan.) First Mennonite Church (GCM) had its beginnings in 1877, when a few Mennonite families immigrating from South Russia settled east of Newton. Among them were Herman Sudermann, Sr., Herman Sudermann, Jr., and William Quiring. In 1878 with the coming of Peter Claassen, a minister from Prussia, the church secured its charter and joined the Western District Conference (GCM). Services were held in a rented Baptist church until their new building was dedicated in 1881 on East First Street. In 1897 and 1902 the church was enlarged, and in 1932 replaced by a new brick church seating 700.

Its first Sunday school was organized in 1881, its first choir in 1888 or 1889, Christian Endeavor in 1898, Junior Endeavor in 1920, Mission Sewing Society in 1887, and Mission Study Circle in 1933. From this church have come thirteen ministers, eighteen missionaries, and five deaconesses. Ministers who have served the congregation include Peter Claassen, B. Regier, Sr., Abr. Suderman, Jacob Toews, J. R. Toews, B. Regier, J. E. Entz, Abram Warkentin, and D. J. Unruh. The present membership (1956) is 811, served by Arnold Epp as pastor. In 1955 a group withdrew to form the Newton Bible Church (q.v.). J.E.E.

Newton Mennonite Fellowship is the beginning of a third Mennonite congregation in the city of Newton, Kan., which is being formed to minister to the growing Mennonite population in Newton. On Sept. 17, 1956, the board of deacons of the First Mennonite Church, which took the lead in forming the new congregation, met in joint session with the board of deacons of the Bethel College Mennonite Church, when action was taken to invite the Western District Home Missions Committee to assist in guiding further developments. The Home Missions Committee called a meeting of the pastors and church board members of all the Western District Conference churches located within an approximate radius of 30 to 35 miles of Newton. During this meeting, at which 23 congregations were represented, the following motion was adopted: "Moved that the Home Mission Committee take necessary steps toward the establishment and organization of a third Mennonite Church in Newton, Kansas." A survey revealed interest and a fertile field for another Mennonite church. After several meetings with interested individuals, the first public worship service was called for the evening of Feb. 24, 1957, which took place in the Sister Frieda Memorial Chapel. Since that time regular weekly worship services take place in the chapel for which a Planning Committee is responsible (1957). A.Ep.

Newton-Jasper County (Ind.) Old Order Amish settlement was begun about 1872, when several Amish families from Ohio settled near Rensselaer in Jasper County but soon moved some 15 miles west into Newton County near the small town of Mount Ayr. Others joined them from near Goshen, Ind. Until 1914 this group constituted one congregation, but in that year another group of Amish from Daviess County, Ind., settled about 15 miles further east in Jasper County, near the small town of Parr, creating a second congregation. In 1914-23 the two groups were served by one ministerial body, with services alternating. At the peak the number of families was about sixty.

About 1910 a large group, possibly half, left for Mississippi to found a new colony on cheap land, but the experiment was a failure. Meanwhile the group left behind gradually dwindled, and when in 1947 their last bishop left, only 10 families remained, which in 1957 had declined to three families without a minister. The four successive bishops of the Newton-Jasper settlement were David Hochstettler, his son Wallie Hochstettler, David Miller, and Albert Anderson. About one third of the present Burr Oak Mennonite (MC) congregation (53 members) descends from the Old Order Amish group. H.J.St.

Newton Siding Mennonite Brethren Church, located in the Municipality of Portage la Prairie, Man., a member of the Manitoba Provincial and the Canadian District M.B. conferences, was organized on Nov. 25, 1928. Its new church building burned down in 1940 after being used for only 10 months. The basement was used for the services until 1946, when the superstructure was rebuilt. The 1954 baptized membership was 139. A. A. Loewen was the leading minister, and D. A. Dyck assistant. H.Ne.

Newtown Community Chapel (MC) of Sarasota, Fla., is a mission outpost among the Negroes of Sarasota. Bible classes followed by Sunday school were conducted for a period of about eight months in this community by the Tuttle Avenue Mennonite Church. In the winter of 1952-53 a block building was constructed to seat 200. Since then an addition for Sunday-school classes has been built. Workers were supplied by the home congregation. In the fall of 1953 Michael Shenk, of Denbigh, Va., was called to serve as pastor. He was replaced in 1956 by Mervin Sherk, of Lebanon, Pa. The attendance averages 75 (1956). There are twelve baptized members and several more under instruction. The program is making progress among the colored people and has overcome many barriers. Newtown Community Chapel is under the Virginia Conference. M.S.A.

Niagara Falls Mennonite settlement was located near the village of Sanborn about 12 miles east of Niagara Falls, N.Y. The first families to locate here were Hans Witmer in 1810 and his brother Abraham Witmer in 1811, who came from Lancaster County, Pa. David Habecker (1791-1889), the first and only resident minister in this church, came with his family to this settlement from Pennsylvania in 1832 and was ordained to the ministry two years later. The meetinghouse was erected on the Habecker farm soon after 1830. The Ontario Calendar of Appointments lists no meetings at this place in 1854, but in 1862 it lists them every two weeks, alternating with Clarence. The membership was never large.

After Habecker had become unable to minister because of age and Jacob Krehbiel had left the Mennonite Church (MC), the latter had charge of the remaining members at the Falls. The congregation was represented in the triennial meetings of the General Conference (GCM) 1884 to 1908, at which time only five members were listed. The meetinghouse, located on the Shank farm, fell into disuse and was torn down. J.C.F.

D. K. Cassel, History of the Mennonites (Philadelphia, 1888) 170.

Niagara Mennonite Brethren Church: see Virgil.

Niagara United Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ont., had its beginning in 1934, when Mennonite settlers came to the Niagara district as fruit farmers. In the fall of 1937 they built a church two miles from Niagara-on-the-Lake. On Feb. 1, 1938, at a meeting in the new church under the leadership of Peter Kroeker, the Niagara United Mennonite Church was organized. Because of the rapid growth in membership it became necessary to build a larger church in 1949. In 1956 the membership of the congregation was 540. Most of the members are fruit farmers. Since 1947 J. A. Dyck has been the minister in charge of this congregation. J.A.D.

Nicasen (van) Aelmeers (Nicasius Aelmare), an Anabaptist martyr burned at the stake at Brugge on Dec. 10, 1561, the brother of Martijntgen van Aelmeers (q.v.), was named twice by van Braght (Mart. Mir. D 297, E 663, where the date of execution is given as 1562; and D 288, E 655, where the correct date is given, but his name is given as Nikasen Amare). Verheyden (Brugge, 49) lists him (No. 35) as Nicasius Aelmaere, born at Steenwercke in Flanders. On Nov. 10, 1561, a meeting of the Brugge congregation held just outside the city was surprised by the police and a number of the members were seized, bound two by two, and taken to the prison. They remained steadfast and on Dec. 10 four other martyrs died with Nicasen: Marijn Eewouts, Andries de Molenaar, Adriaen Brael, and Lucas Hendricx; they were followed on the next day by Jan Christiaens, Maeyken Frans, Jelis Outerman, Anthonis Keute, Francijntgen, the wife of Andries de Molenaar, Hans Lisz, and Hansken Parmentier. Later research has shown that his name was Nicasen van Alcmaers. (ML I, 49; III, 254.) vdZ.

Nice (Nyce, Neiss, Neuss), a Mennonite family name found widely in Montgomery County, Pa., most of the descendants, if not all, springing from two brothers, Jan and Hans Neuss of Crefeld, Germany, who arrived in Germantown (q.v.) about 1684 and 1702 respectively. Jan was ordained Mennonite deacon at Germantown in 1690, and Hans preacher in 1702. Hans soon left the Mennonite Church, moving to Montgomery County in 1720, and died in 1736. Among the prominent representatives of this name may be mentioned Henry Nice (1804-83), ordained preacher in the Franconia congregation (MC) of Montgomery County in 1839; and Bishop Henry Nice (1822-92), born in Montgomery County, who served in Sterling, Ill., for most of his ministry. Henry Nice had four ordained (MC) sons: Bishop John Nice of Morrison, Ill.; Philip Nice, a preacher in Illinois, and Jonas Nice, a preacher in Nebraska, Louisiana, and Virginia; and Henry Nice, a deacon. Howard G. Nice (b. 1899) has served as a minister in the Eastern District and Western District conferences of the General Conference Mennonite Church. J.C.W.

Nice, Henry (1822-1902), a prominent bishop in the Illinois Mennonite (MC) Conference, was born in Montgomery County, Pa., on April 17, 1822. He married Levina Tyson in 1842. One of their eight children was Bishop John Nice of Morrison, Ill. Henry Nice lived near Wadsworth, Ohio, in 185?-65, where he was ordained to the ministry in the General Conference Mennonite Church in 1853. In 1865 he moved to Sterling, Ill., where he was ordained bishop in the Science Ridge (MC) congregation in 1868. In the same year he moved to Morrison, serving there as bishop and pastor until his death in 1902. He was one of the organizers of the Illinois Mennonite Conference in 1872 and its outstanding early leader. H.S.B.

Nicholas I, Emperor of Russia 1825-55, was benevolent to the Mennonites. In 1835 he gave the immigrant Prussian Mennonites under Wilhelm Lange (q.v.) permission to settle 40 families from Brenkenhoffswalde (q.v.), although he had previously forbidden any new immigration, and on Dec. 31, 1854, he gave an interesting document of praise to the Molotschna Mennonites for their part in the Crimean War in gifts of money and the care of the wounded and sick. To Johann Cornies (q.v.), the great promoter of agriculture, he showed appreciation. He was therefore held in high esteem by the Mennonites of Russia. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 80, 488; ML III, 255.) NEFF.

Nickel (Nikkel, Neckel), a Prussian Mennonite family name which was first recorded in the Danzig Mennonite church in 1669. It also appeared in Thiensdorf, Orlofferfelde, Tragheimerweide, Montau-Gruppe, and Schönsee. Heinrich Nickel and Gabriel Frantz, who was the preacher of the Waterlander (Frisian) congregation of Schönsee (q.v.) in the Culm Lowland in 1732-33 had some troubles with the Catholic bishop of Culm, who threatened to expel the Mennonites from the Schönsee territory. Finally a permit to stay was obtained from the bishop upon payment of 10,000 guilders, which amount, besides several hundred guilders as tips for the officials, was procured by the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs at Amsterdam. The Dutch Naamlijst names the following ministers of this family: Peter Nickel, ca. 1740-d.59, a preacher of the Waterlander congregation at Schönsee; Jacob Nickel 1755-*ca.*65 and Geert (Gerit) Nickel 1782-*ca.*95, preachers in the Stuhmsche Lowland (Schweingrube, q.v.). Hans Nickel served at Nieschewski near Thorn about 1750-85, and Abraham Nikkel (q.v.) was an elder of the Schönsee congregation, and later at Nieschewski. Franz Nickel was a preacher at Deutsch-Kazun (q.v.) 1780-*ca.*1800. Members of this family emigrated from Prussia and Danzig to Russia, and from there to the United States, Paraguay, and Uruguay. Abraham Nickel (q.v.) of Jamerau played a significant role in Prussia. Gerhard Nikkel (q.v.) of Russia was a Mennonite missionary in Java (q.v.). In Canada Jacob D. Nickel (b. 1898), an elder and evangelist in Rosemary, Alberta; Johann J. Nickel, an elder from Arkadak, Russia, now of Herbert, Sask.; and Valentine E. Nickel, the minister of the Swift Current (Sask.) Mennonite Church, should be mentioned. In the United States Peter E. Nickel, the former minister of the Hillsboro Mennonite Brethren Church, and P. E. Nikkel of Merced, Cal., are listed in Who's Who Among the Mennonites. J. W. Nickel of Canada has served a number of churches (GCM) in Canada and the United States and among the Mennonites of Paraguay. Arnold Nickel of Mountain Lake, Minn., served the Bethesda Mennonite Church, Henderson, Neb., and is now (1957) pastor of Eden Mennonite Church. Helen Nickel, of Mountain Lake, was a missionary in India (GCM). David Nickel was an elder of the Rudnerweide Mennonite Church from 1891 to 1924. He was succeeded by his son Abraham Nickel.

C.K., vdZ.

Reimer Familiennamen, 114; J. G. Rempel, Fünfzig Jahre Konferenzbestrebungen 1902-1952 (Steinbach, 1952); B. H. Unruh, Die niederländisch-niederdeutschen Hintergründe der mennonitischen Ostwanderungen (n.p., n.d., Karlsruhe, 1955) passim; Unser Blatt, 1927, 302; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1088, 1597, 1600 f., 1604 f., 1611, 1614.

Nickel, Abraham (1743-1820), a Mennonite minister of Jamerau (q.v.) in (former) West Prussia, Germany, was born June 4, 1743, and died Feb. 23, 1820. He was a preacher in the Waterlander (Frisian) congregation at Schönsee in the Culm Lowlands (Niederung) from 1766, and elder from 1779. He is known for his audience with the Prussian king, Fredrick William III, and his consort in Graudenz in 1806, when he represented the Mennonites in presenting a contribution of 30,000 Talers, while his wife presented to the queen a basket of fresh butter. The queen, deeply moved by the loyal and simple manner of the donors, gave the woman the shawl she was wearing with the words, "In memory of this moment." In commemoration of this incident a monument of black granite in the form of a rounded obelisk was erected in the churchyard of the Schönsee Mennonite Church, with an account of the incident inscribed on it. (Menn. Bl., 1892, 146; 1907, 18-20; 1911, 50-53 and 68 f.; ML III, 223.) Neff.

Nickel, Abraham D. (1887-1935), an elder of the Mennonites of Russia, was born Oct. 29, 1887, in Steinfeld, a village in the Gnadenfeld district of Taurida, South Russia, the fifth child of David D. Nickel and Margaretha Dück of Grossweide. His father was the teacher of the village school in Steinfeld, and was later the elder of the Rudnerweide Mennonite Church. He was educated in the Zentralschule in Gnadenfeld, and the teacher-training courses at Halbstadt (q.v.), and in his eighteenth year became a teacher, an office he held for fourteen years. On May 22, 1906, he was baptized by his father upon the confession of his faith. In 1912 he married Katherina Käthler of Ebenfeld in South Russia. They had seven children. During World War I he was drafted to serve the state as bookkeeper of a medical corps.

In 1922 Nickel was chosen by his congregation to the ministry and in 1927 to the eldership, and was ordained by his father, whom he succeeded. In 1924 he moved to Grossweide, the neighbor village to Rudnerweide, where the church was located, and from here he served the congregation as its last elder. In 1934 the church was closed and taken over as a clubhouse by the Soviet government. Then all religious services were forbidden and he in consequence had to leave his church work in January 1935. Since that time the Rudnerweide congregation has ceased to exist. The shepherd was overpowered and the flock scattered.

In 1923 Nickel became ill with inflammatory rheumatism, which crippled both feet. At first he was able to move about with crutches, but later he had to be carried to church in a chair. In this way he served his church until the end. Deprived of all rights and means of subsistence by the Soviet government, he and his family suffered severe hunger. In 1935 he escaped to the Caucasus with the aid of some friends and found a place of refuge in the village of Sablya near Dolinovka. There he developed an intestinal cancer and died on June 3, 1935.

J.D.N.

Nickel, David D. (1853-1940), a Mennonite teacher and elder of Russia, was born in Rudnerweide, a village in the Gnadenfeld district of the Molotschna settlement in South Russia, on Aug. 30, 1853, the eighth child of David A. Nickel and Helena Janzen. His father had come to Russia as a child from the Stuhm area of West Prussia in 1819. His parents and all his brothers and sisters emigrated to Mountain Lake, Minn., in 1878; David remained in Russia. He was baptized on June 5, 1872. On June 19, 1875, he married Margareta Dück of Pordenau. Ten children grew to maturity. Three of their sons became elders and another a minister in the Mennonite Church. One son, three daughters, and three sons-in-law were exiled by the Soviets; some died there and some are missing.

David D. Nickel was trained as a teacher and worked at this vocation for eighteen years in Orechov, Neu-Halbstadt, and Steinfeld in the Molotschna settlement. In 1881 he was chosen as preacher and in 1891 as elder of the Rudnerweide Mennonite Church. In 1891 he moved to Grossweide. In 1927 he retired from his duties as elder, but continued to work for the kingdom of God as his strength permitted. In these 46 years of service for the church he also worked outside its borders. In 1896 he and Elder H. Unruh of Muntau were given an audience with the newly crowned Czar Nicholas II and as symbols of true submission presented him with bread and salt. In 1898, 1899, and 1900 he visited and served the Mennonite settlements of Samara in Orenburg; in 1902 those in Terek and Suvorovka; in 1909-11 in Siberia the settlements at Omsk, Pavlodar, and Barnaul; in 1913 those in the Caucasus. He also served for many years on the Molotschna Mennonite school board.

In 1931 under pressure from the government he was compelled to leave his house and property at night and flee. In Chortitza in the home of his youngest married daughter he spent the rest of his life in wretched outward circumstances. The general destruction of the congregations and churches grieved him deeply. His mind and body, however, kept their vigor until he was struck by a cerebral hemorrhage. Ten days later, on Aug. 31, 1940, he died, and was buried in Chortitza. A deacon of the Mennonite Brethren congregation, Wiens, conducted the simple graveside service. J.D.N.

Nikkel (Nickel), Gerhard (1862-1932), a Russian Mennonite missionary in Sumatra, was born at Gnadenfeld in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, South Russia, on Dec. 6, 1862. He received a secondary education and was a teacher for a number of years. He attended the Missionshaus at Barmen, Germany, for about six years. After some study in Holland he married Anna C. Kuipers of Haarlem, and went to Sumatra in 1888 under the Dutch Mennonite Mission Society. He worked in the mission station of Pakantan (q.v.). After the death of his wife he returned to Russia with his six children in 1900. At first he served as evangelist and later as minister and manager of the Razien Forestry Camp near Voznesensk. After this he returned to Gnadenfeld, bought a farm, and was elected elder of the church. Under the Soviets he was exiled to the Don Basin area in the Bachmut region, where he died in 1932. C.K.

A. A. Toews, Mennonitische Märtyrer I (Clearbrook, 1949) 281; ML III, 254.

Nickel Mines Mennonite Church (MC), located in a former mining community in Paradise Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa. The ministers of the Paradise District of Lancaster Conference bought and repaired an abandoned Episcopal meetinghouse, and services were started on Sept. 29, 1935. In 1952 Paul C. Mast (now at Lansing, N.C.) was ordained as local pastor. The missionaries Edgar Denlinger and Irene Stauffer were from this congregation. The membership in 1956 was 40, with C. Marvin Eshleman as pastor. I.D.L.

Nicknames of the Mennonites: see Names given to the Anabaptists-Mennonites in the Netherlands.

Niclaes, Hendrik (Heinrich) (1502-80), founder of the Familists (q.v.) or the "House of Love," also called Nicolaites, was a native of Münster, Westphalia, Germany, had visions as a boy, entered a Latin school at the age of nine, but three years later worked in his father's business until he married and took over a business of his own. At the age of twenty-seven he was arrested on a suspicion of Lutheran beliefs, and then moved to Amsterdam. Here he was arrested on a suspicion of being a "Münsterite." After his release he stayed nine years longer in Amsterdam. At the age of thirty-nine while he was living in Emden, East Friesland, where he owned a thriving business, he had prophetic visions and gathered a following. In his fifty-ninth year he was again imprisoned and tried on the rack. He escaped to Kampen, Dutch province of Overijssel, and from there to London and Cologne. He was a prolific writer. Nippold names fifty-one titles from his pen, which deal with a mystical pantheism. The disloyalty of some friends embittered the last years of his life. With David Joris (q.v.) he carried on a brief literary dispute. Other Anabaptist connections cannot be claimed, as some older histories erroneously assert. In Holland he had few adherents. Only in Dordrecht was there a group of followers until about 1614. Among his most influential followers was Christoffel Plantijn (1520-89), noted printer at Antwerp. NEFF.

F. Nippold, "Heinrich Niclaes und das Haus der Liebe," in Ztscht für die historische Theologie III and IV (1862); BRN VII, passim, see Index; J. Lindeboom, Stiefkinderen van het Christendom (The Hague, 1929) 201-9; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 387-94; ML III, 224.

Nicodemus, Gospel of (Acts of Pilate), is an apocryphal Gospel which contains a supposedly official report of the procurator concerning Jesus. Both Justin Martyr (ca. 150) and Tertullian refer to a report supposedly made by Pilate to Emperor Tiberius. In these references and in the Gospel of Nicodemus is seen the tendency to use Pilate as a witness to the history of the death and resurrection of Christ. This Gospel in the first sixteen chapters contains an elaborate account of the trial, crucifixion, and burial of Jesus. Part II, which has thirteen chapters of varying length, is an elaboration of the sentence, "He descended into hell," from the Apostles' Creed. This book cannot be older than the fourth century, although the central idea, the delivery of the righteous Fathers (Patriarchs) from Hades, is exceedingly ancient and was common in the second century (James, 95). Quasten states, "During the Middle Ages, the influence of the Acts (of Pilate) in the field of literature and art was tremendous" (118).

During Reformation times a German translation was published by Philip Ulhart in Augsburg in 1525. Schottenloher conjectures that Viet Bild translated it, and that he also was the author of a book which appeared in the same year which set out to prove the descent of Christ into hell and to convince those who were in doubt about this article in the creed (Philip Ulhart, 120).

The descensus ad inferos idea occurs in Pilgram Marpeck's Verantwortung (317), and has a crucial significance for him, for it is through Christ's death, resurrection and ascension that the believers of the Old Covenant were forgiven and put on a par with those of the New. In this way Marpeck was able to vouchsafe salvation to the patriarchs and yet retain a basic distinction between the Old and New Covenants. The descent into Hades was an issue between Marpeck and Schwenckfeld, as well as between the former and Bucer. For Schwenckfeld the descent must be interpreted spiritually, which meant it should be removed from the realm of history (Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum V, 421). Marpeck's view of the descent into hell is Biblically derived and maintains the same simplicity and lack of detail found in the New Testament. He insists on it for theological reasons, and the closest affinities to the Gospel of Nicodemus occur in his confession (MQR XII, 1938, 176, 180), and it is at this point that Bucer strongly criticizes Marpeck's interpretation of Ephesians 4:8 and I Peter 3:19 (compare the report of this in the Strassburger Täuferakten (unpublished) under Nos. 55, 56, and 75 of the report on Marpeck's views by Bucer). If he had read the Gospel of Nicodemus he does not quote it as Scripture, not even in the same way as he uses the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs.

In more recent times the book has found some popularity among Mennonites. The two Ephrata editions of 1748 and 1764 were read and one nineteenth century edition of Philadelphia was used among the Mennonites. According to Friedmann, a Canadian Mennonite proposed its translation into English in 1941 in order that it might be accessible to a generation not able to read German. The preface to that work begins: "Everybody who has read this book must admit that it is very close to the truth, and it rightly can be said that Nicodemus is its author since it is drawn up with such beautiful and true details" (Friedmann, 222). As in the second century, so among the Mennonites this type of literature was used as Sunday afternoon reading and was a major source of entertainment. W.Kl.

M. R. James The Apocryphal New Testament (Oxford, 1954); Johannes Quasten, Patrology I (Westminster, Md., 1950) 115-18; Robert Friedmann, Mennonite Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949); K. Schottenloher, Philip Ulhart (Munich and Freising, 1921).

Nicodemus Letterknecht van Wtgheest, pseudonym of Jan Theunisz (q.v.), under which he published a manuscript by Nittert Obbesz (q.v.) and gave it the title Raegh-besem (Amsterdam, 1625). vdZ.

Nicolaas Geyers, an Anabaptist martyr: see Geyersbühler.

Nicolaes de Penty, an Anabaptist martyr, born at Douai, France, and secretly drowned in the Steen castle prison at Antwerp, Belgium, on April 4, 1562, because he "persisted in his rebaptism." His furniture, clothing, and tools were confiscated and publicly sold on Jan. 30, 1562; this indicates that he was then already in prison. Further particulars are lacking, and his trade is not mentioned. He must have been an artisan. (Antw. Arch.-Bl. IX, 131, 140, 161; XIV, 30 f., No. 352.) vdZ.

Nicolaes de Stevele, an Anabaptist martyr of Armentières, France, executed on Oct. 7, 1575, at Antwerp, Belgium, because of rebaptism, is identical with Claes of Armentières (q.v.). vdZ.

Nicolai, Antonius (Anthonys Claesz), of Wasenaar, was a Reformed minister of Workum, Leeuwarden, and Stiens in Friesland, Netherlands. He retired in 1599. Nicolai was an opponent of the Mennonites; in 1583 he wrote a book, De magistratu of van den Overheyt, which was repeatedly discussed in the Reformed synods of Friesland. (DB 1911, 42.) vdZ.

Nicolai, Friedrich Christoph (1733-1811), a friend of Lessing, a literary critic and bookdealer of Berlin, in 1781 published the following tract: Geistlicher Diskurs und Betrachtung, was für eine Gottseligkeit und Art der Liebe erfordert wird by Dr. Gratianus Amandus de Stellis. This is a reprint of a booklet published in 1618 in Appenheim; it contains two tracts, one of which is a revision of Hans Denk's (q.v.) Von der wahren Liebe (1527) and the other Christian Entfelder's (q.v.) Von wahrer Gottseligkeit (1530). (Comeniushefte 1901, 194; ML III, 224.) Neff.

Nicolai, Gerhard, became a Lutheran clergyman of Norden, East Friesland, Germany, in 1567 and died soon after. He published a Dutch translation of Bullinger's (q.v.) book, Der Widertöufferen ursprung (Zürich, 1560), to which he added a number of articles that he thought might be of interest to his Dutch readers. These insertions, though often incorrect and always unkind, are important to the understanding of Mennonite history. They were published by Samuel Cramer with an introduction (BRN VII, 267-487). Nicolai's book was published in Emden in 1569 by Johann Malet, who in his foreword dedicated it to Amalia, Countess of Neuenahr, wife of Elector Palatine Frederick III. The title is Teghens de Wederdoopers, ses boecken Henrici Bullingeri, nu eerst vvt de Latijnsche Tale in Nederduytsch overgestelt, door Gerardum Nicolaj, in zijnen leven Kerckendienaer tot Norden in Oostvrieslandt. Die daer by ghevoecht heeft de Wederlegginghe der leeringen van Menno Symons, Dierick Philips, Adam Pastor, Hendrick Niclaes, ende meer andere. vdZ.

B. Becker, "Nicolai's inlassching over de Franckisten," in Ned. Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis XVIII (1925) 286 ff.; ML III, 224.

Nicolai, Idzardus (Idzerd Klases), b. at Franeker ca. 1560, d. 1611, a Reformed minister at Tjummarum in Friesland ca. 1590-92, Franeker 1592-99, Hallum 1599-1603, and Minnertsga 1603-11, wrote an extensive book against the Mennonites under the title Grontlicke onderwijsinghe teghen allerleye dwalinghen der Wederdooperen deses tijts in de Nederlanden (Franeker-Amsterdam, 1609, two vv., 800 pages). An abbreviated version was printed in Franeker with the title, Leere der Waerheyt, van eenighe Leerstvcken die door de Drijvers der nieuwicheden berispt ende ghelastert worden. (N.N.B.Wb. V, 371; ML III, 224.) vdZ.

Nicolai, Melchior (1578-1659), a rather quarrelsome Württemberg theologian of the Lutheran orthodox wing, and a staunch fighter against Anabaptism in his home country. In 1604 he was made deacon in Waiblingen, and in 1608 minister in Stetten in the Rems Valley, in Württemberg. At both places he had many contacts with local Anabaptists and fought aggressively against their further spread. In 1619 he became professor at the University of Tübingen. In 1627 he was general superintendent and member of the consistory of the state church of Württemberg, the highest office possible. Later he became provost (Probst) of the Stiftskirche in Stuttgart.

The trend of the time and his own bent of mind made him a polemical writer. "Against all calumniators and heretics," writes his biographer F. Wagner in 1685, "against Papists and Calvinists and Anabaptists he defended the true religion" [i.e., Lutheranism]. He was known for his battle against the Jesuits in Dillingen. The book of greatest interest to us is his Gründliche, mit Gottes Wort und der Antiquität bevestigte Widerlegung eines wiedertäufferischen Büchleins handelnd I. Von der Kindertauff, II. Von dem heiligen Abendmahl, III. Von der Gemeinschaft der Güter, IV. Von dem Ampt der Obrigkeit, V. Von dem Eydschwur . . . (Stuttgart, bey Johann Weyrich Rösslin, 1659) (286 pages quarto).

Nicolai's book is the most elaborate answer of Lutheranism to one of the basic doctrinal documents of the Hutterites, namely, the Article Book (q.v.), which was originally drawn up in 1547, much enlarged in 1577, and condensed again in the time of the Vorsteher Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.) around 1648-55. This book in its present extant form contains five articles, but strangely enough all known manuscripts have as Number Five an article "Concerning Divorce," while an article "Concerning the Oath" (as Nicolai claims) has thus far not been found among the extant manuscripts. In this regard Nicolai's book is of some value for research in Anabaptist doctrinal writings. It is surprising that Nicolai should battle Hutterites (who had long since ceased mission work in his country) and not the Swiss Brethren (remnants of whom were still around). The latter, however, had no doctrinal writings as comprehensive as the "big" book of Hutterite origin. It is not known whether Nicolai used the Ehrenpreis condensation (as Bossert claims) or the original "Article book" (comprising some 250 leaves) as is suggested by a reference in the book to the Anabaptists in Markt Gröningen (see Dietrich, Sebastian).

Nicolai is not very familiar with the Anabaptists, referring time and again to Thomas Müntzer and Jan van Leyden as his main witnesses, never to the evangelical Brethren whom he should have known better from personal contacts in the Rems Valley. However, what arouses this churchman is the Anabaptist principle of nonconformity and separation from the world. Their critique of the authorities (Obrigkeit) seems to provoke him above all, and as he has no pertinent argument from a theological standpoint he indulges in slanderous conjectures: if these brethren should gain power in the state they would certainly behave like the Münsterites and would use brute force (loc. cit., 251 ff.). It is obvious that an argument like this was much out of date in 1659, a century and a quarter after the unfortunate Münster episode, and proves only the propagandistic intentions of this book.

That Nicolai devotes much space to a defense of infant baptism and the demonstration of the Anabaptist error on this point is understandable from his position as orthodox state churchman. There is hardly any new argument in the material he has to present. R.F.

R. Friedmann, "Eine dogmatische Hauptschrift der Hutterischen Täufergemeinschaften," Archiv für Ref.-Gesch. XXIX (1932) 1-8; F. Fritz, "Die Württembergischen Pfarrer im dreissigjährigen Krieg," Blätter für Württembergische Kirchengeschichte (1926) 55 f.; see also ibid. (1928) 64; G. Bossert, Jr., "Aus der nebenkirchlichen religiösen Bewegung der Reformationszeit in Württemberg," Blätter für Württembg. Kirchen-Geschichte (1929) 39; ML III, 224 f.

Nicolaites, followers of Hendrik Niclaes (q.v.): see Familists.

Nicolschütz: see Nikoltschitz.

Niebuhr, Hermann Abramovitch (1830-1906) a Mennonite industrialist in Russia, was born July 24, 1830, in the village of Kronstal of the Chortitza Mennonite settlement in South Russia. His grandparents had immigrated from West Prussia in 1789 and were as poor as all the rest of the Mennonite settlers at that time. Hermann Niebuhr was the oldest of 14 brothers and sisters. His parents were well-to-do, owning two full farms, each of 175 acres, and two windmills. When he was only eight years old he was taught by his father the milling process with a windmill; but this type of milling did not satisfy the alert boy, and so at the age of 19 years he left his father's business to become a miller on a treadmill. He remained here in service for four years and then with his father's help bought a treadmill of his own in Chortitza. This date is considered the date of the founding of what became the great firm of H. A. Niebuhr and Company. In 1853-72 Niebuhr owned alternately wind- and treadmills, or sometimes both at the same time. Not until 1872 did he build a large steam-driven mill, and in 1882 the second one. In 1879 his only son Jacob entered the father's business. Hermann Niebuhr died at Chortitza Aug. 20, 1906.

When Hermann Niebuhr died he left 10 windmills and motor-driven mills, of which the largest, in the city of Alexandrovsk, ground 7,000 pood (ca. 125 tons) of wheat and the smallest 1,000 pood (18 tons) daily. After Niebuhr's death the milling business of eleven mills passed to the heirs as a corporation and continued to work with great success. Thirteen years after the death of the founder in the autumn of 1919, when the entire business became nationalized, the heirs owned besides this milling business (valued at 5 million rubles and the largest in all Russia) about 46,000 acres of land, on which there were eight farms and six additional mills of various sizes; they also owned a banking house which during World War II was enlarged into the Chortitzaer Kommerzbank with a capital of 5 million rubles, a stone quarry with 451 acres of land near the station of Yanzezo, which contained valuable granite (also with a capital of 5 million rubles), and a sanatorium "Alexanderbad" near Kitchkas on the Dnieper with 432 acres of land which was furnished with a capital of 1 million rubles. The sanatorium, with three Berlin physicians at the head, was modernly equipped and could take care of 250 patients. During World War I the income of the Kommerzbank and of the stone quarry was withheld by the czarist government in consequence of the general hatred against the Germans. In 1919 the entire work was nationalized. (ML III, 225.) D.H.E.

Niebuhr, Jakob G. (1847-1913), a Russian Mennonite industrialist, born Oct. 20, 1847, at Kronstal, Chortitza, South Russia, who built up and owned the J. G. Niebuhr factory at Olgafeld, Fürstenland settlement, and New York, Bachmut, which employed 350 people and had an annual production of 450,000 rubles. This industry was one of the largest among the Mennonites of Russia.

Jakob G. Niebuhr lost his father, Jakob Niebuhr, early. After two years of school he worked for his uncle Abraham Niebuhr of Chortitza, who had a small mill. For a while he worked for the pioneer industrialist A. J. Koop of Chortitza, serving as foreman for eleven years. In 1881 he started his own factory at Olgafeld, Fürstenland settlement, manufacturing parts for fanning mills. Soon he produced plows, among them the "Bugger" plow, very common among the Mennonites of Russia. Before World War I, he produced 4,500 of these plows annually. In 1898 Niebuhr started another factory at New York. He made inventions in the realm of improving reapers and drills. Of the latter he produced 4,500 annually. He also manufactured numerous other machines, including those for the growing milling industry (see Agriculture among the Mennonites of Russia).

During the later years his sons, Jakob J., Peter J., and Gerhard J. Niebuhr, were his assistants. Annually they produced 20,000 larger agricultural machines. In addition to three factories, they owned two mills, one at Olgafeld and the other at Yelenovka. In 1912 their property was estimated at 1,500,000 gold rubles. Because of the anti-German feeling during World War I, the business declined rapidly, and was sold for a token price on Oct. 15, 1915. In 1929 Gerhard Niebuhr escaped via China and went to Paraguay. Peter Niebuhr, who served under the Soviets as engineer of the Niebuhr factory, was exiled in 1933 and died. Jakob J. Niebuhr escaped to Canada in 1942. C.K.

Jakob J. Niebuhr, "Jakob G. Niebuhr Fabriken," Menn. Life X (January 1955) 25-30.

Niederausmass and Oberausmass, two villages in West Prussia, Germany (Polish before 1772 and after 1919), belonging to the territory of the city of Culm (q.v.), were largely inhabited by Dutch families who settled there shortly after 1600. Most of them may have been Mennonites: Niederausmass was a Mennonite village belonging to the Schönsee (q.v.) congregation and had a Mennonite school. vdZ.

H. Wiebe, Das Siedlungswerk niederländischer Mennoniten im Weichseltal (Marburg a.d.Lahn, 1952) 13, 33, 97; Menn. Life X (April 1955) 76, 78.

Nieder-Chortitza (Russian, Nizhnaya-Chortitza), a village of the Chortitza Mennonite settlement, province of Ekaterinoslav, Russia, volost Marianovka, founded in 1803 by Mennonites coming from the Danzig region. In 1912 the village had 5,192 acres of land and a population of 742. During World War I the Mennonite population consisted of 185 families or 835 persons. The 175 farms consisted of 6,712 acres.

During the Russian Revolution and the early Soviet regime the Mennonites of this village suffered severely. In 1919 twenty-one persons were murdered, during the famine of 1921-22, twenty-four died of starvation, and during 1933-34 thirty-five perished. During 1929-41 eighty-three persons were exiled. Before the Germans arrived to occupy the Ukraine in 1941, 289 persons were evacuated, of whom only 13 returned. This indicates that almost half of the population either perished or was exiled or evacuated under the Soviets. When the German army returned to Germany, the remaining population was taken along; some were repatriated by the Russian army from Poland and East Germany, and the remainder reached Canada and South America after World War II. C.K.

K. Stumpp, Bericht über das Gebiet Chortitza (Berlin, 1943); Neuer Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender (Odessa, 1913) 49 and 74; ML III, 264.

Niederflörsheim, a village near Monsheim, Rhenish Hesse, Germany, where a number of Swiss Mennonites settled at the close of the Thirty Years' War. In a decision of Feb. 16, 1652, the church council in Heidelberg issued a warning to the Palatine government regarding the Mennonites, since "it is known what a dangerous and stubborn sect they are." The list of Mennonites of 1664 (in the state archives in Karlsruhe) named three Mennonite families, which had grown to five by 1680; among them are the names of Christian Borckholder, Christian Clementz, and Julius Schmidt. In 1685 Osthofen issued an exact list, in which only three families were named: Johann Clemens, a decrepit old man with his wife, who was supported by his son-in-law; Christian Borckholder, the son-in-law mentioned above, with a wife and child, a farmer; and Peter Clemens, sixty-four years old, unmarried, supports himself from his vineyard; they are neighborly and give no one cause to complain. Later a Christoffel married into the community. In 1773 twelve Mennonites were counted in the village. At present there are five Mennonites living in Niederflörsheim; they belong to the Monsheim congregation. (ML III, 225.) NEFF.

Niedermaier, Hans: see Mittermaier.

Niederrödern, a village in Alsace, seven miles east of Wissembourg, was one of the oldest meeting places for the present Mennonite Deutschhof-Geisberg (q.v.) congregation. The castle there, belonging to the Deutschhof estate, was leased by Baron Hatzel to Christian Gingerich, a Mennonite, on April 22, 1711, according to the records in Strasbourg. The church records (1724) of Niederrödern show that the estate was "given in lease to the Anabaptists Jakob Bassler and Hans Krayenbühl [Krehbiel]." Another tradition says that Krehbiel occupied the farm in 1716, coming from the Pfrimmerhof near Sippersfeld in the Palatinate. In 1755 he took on his son-in-law Christian Lehmann (from the Geisberg or the Zweibrücken congregation) as a partner. He is the progenitor of the Lehmann (q.v.) family living on the Kaplaneihof and Deutschhof. After Hatzel's death (1762) the estate fell to the Elector Palatine and then to Prince Maximilian of the Palatinate and Zweibrücken, who later became the king of Bavaria. But in the course of the French Revolution it was confiscated and in 1794 sold to the two sons of Lehmann and the widow of Daniel Hirschler on very favorable terms. After these families died out, David Schmitt of the Deutschhof (1870) and then his nephew Friedrich Schmitt of the Haftelhof came into the possession of the castle estate.

The Mennonites who had settled in other places near by met for worship in rotation at Schafbusch, Geisberg, and the Haftelhof, and for a long time in the Niederrödern castle. In 1875 a neat little meetinghouse was built, for which the community and the state put 2,000 franks at their disposal. It was dedicated on June 6. In the following decades it was used less and less, and by 1942 was used only once a year.

Hans Krehbiel is named as the first preacher of the Deutschhof-Geisberg congregation. The Dutch Naamlijst, which calls the congregation Schaafbusch and Rödern, names the following ministers: Daniel Hirschler, elder 1736-*ca.*70; Jakob Lehmann, preacher *ca.*1740-*ca.*86; Johannes Grebeil (Krehbiel), preacher before 1775; Ulrich Schowalter, preacher 1771-*ca.*80; Elias Thätweiler (Dettweiler), preacher from 1775, elder 1778 until after 1802; Johannes Müller, preacher 1780 until after 1802; Heinrich Schmidt, preacher 1790 until after 1802; Christian Heinrich Hirschler (from 1827) and Friedrich Schmitt (from 1921) lived at Niederrödern.

In 1792 a register of births, marriages, and deaths was begun, apparently by order of the authorities, in duplicate. It extended only to 1798, however. The church record of the Deutschhof congregation, opened in 1855, and dated back as far as memory could recall contains data about the Mennonites in Niederrödern. P.S.

Naamlijst 1766-1802; Menn. Bl., 1855, 41; 1875, 63; Gbl., 1875, 53; "Dettweiler Family History" (ms); ML III, 251.

Niedorp (formerly commonly called Nierop), two Dutch villages, Nieuwe Niedorp and Oude Niedorp, in the province of North Holland (q.v.). Soon after 1530 the Anabaptists were numerous here. On March 6, 1535, the attorney-general of the Court of Holland, Reinier Brunt (q.v.), made a raid on Nieuwe Niedorp and arrested eight Anabaptists; he had them executed in Monnikendam (q.v.), where he had set up his headquarters. Several days later he seized three more, and had them hanged on the spot; the house of Jan Walichs, where they had worshiped, was torn down; and in June 1535 others were apprehended. Still others escaped, for example, Jan Gijsbrecht, who in 1542 fled from Niedorp to Emden, East Friesland.

Afterward a Mennonite congregation developed in each village, though probably neither was large. The Oude Niedorp group belonged to the Frisian branch and was a member of the Frisian Sociëteit in North Holland. The group in Nieuwe Niedorp called itself the United Waterlander and Flemish congregation, and later belonged to the Zonist Sociëteit.

The two Mennonite congregations united in 1803 under the name Oude en Nieuwe Niedorp. In 1857, both church buildings being in a state of collapse, it was decided to build a new one in Nieuwe Niedorp. It was dedicated Oct. 25, 1857, by Inne Thyssen Taconis. The old church of Oude Niedorp was demolished in 1860. The 1857 meetinghouse of Nieuwe Niedorp was replaced by a new one in 1879. The baptized membership was 32 in 1847, 64 in 1861, 164 in 1900, and 109 in 1957. During most of the 18th century the pulpits of both Oude and Nieuwe Niedorp were vacant. In 1813-31 Johannes Michiels Bakker served here, and in 1841-65 Inne Thyssen Taconis, the last untrained preacher; he had been appointed as ministerial candidate by the Conference of Friesland. Taconis was followed by K. S. van der Meulen 1865-1904, D. Haars 1905-35, Miss T. Rothfusz 1942-46, and Mrs. E. Franken-Liefrinck 1949- . From August 1940 until March 1941 P. J. Smidts, pastor of Den Helder, who was forced to leave this town because of the war, lived in Nieuwe Niedorp, taking care of the congregation. There is a Sunday school for children, and a ladies' circle. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 99, 101, 131, 137, 226, 240, 249, 896; II, Nos. 2144 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 174; Blaupot t. C., Holland I and II, see Index; Naamlijst 1810, 69; DB 1861, 162 f.; 1860, 165; 1909, 15, 22; ML III, 251.

Niehove, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, where Leenaert Bouwens in 1568-82 baptized 25 persons. A separate congregation of Niehove is not known. The Mennonites baptized by Bouwens may have joined the Humsterland (q.v.) congregation. At Gaaikemaweer, a hamlet near Niehove, meetings were held in the 16th and 17th centuries. vdZ.

S. K. de Waard, Aanteekeningen uit de Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. in't Westerkwartier (Groningen, 1901) 9.

Nieland, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized some eight persons in 1551-56, is a hamlet in the Dutch province of Groningen. Whether it was Wester- or Oosternieland could not be ascertained. (See also Nieuwland.) vdZ.

Niellius, Carolus (Charles de Nielles), a Reformed preacher in Antwerp in 1560, and at Wesel 1569-98, and then in the Reformed congregations at Frankfurt and Hanau (to which congregation he dedicated his Consolation de la conscience troublée). He translated the confession of faith written by Obbe Philips (q.v.) into French and published it with a treatise on Jan Willems of Roermond (q.v.). The book has the title Recognoissance d'Obbe Philippe, par laquelle luy et ceux qui ont enseigné et enseignent entre les anabaptistes . . . n'ont nulle vocation légitime. Avec un Discours des faicts exécrables du nouveau roy des Anabaptistes Jan Wilhems et de ses complices, executez à Cleves, Wesel et autres lieux, l'an 1550 (Leiden, 1595). vdZ.

N.N.B.Wb. I, 1372; BRN VII, 101 f.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 209; ML III, 251 f.

Niembschitz: see Nembschitz.

Nierop, Derk Pietersz van: see Pieters, Dirk.

Nierop, Dirk Rembrandtsz van: see Rembrandtsz, Dirk.

Nieschewski, a village near Thorn (Torun), Poland, the seat of a Mennonite congregation from the early 17th century until 1945, usually known as the Obernessau (q.v.) congregation. It may have been founded by Dutch colonists, since family names here were all pure Dutch. About the time of its founding there is no exact information, because all land leases have been lost. vdZ.

Niesert, J., was the author of the important work, Münsterische Urkunden-sammlung (2 vv., Coesfeld, 1826-27).

Nieu Geestelijck Liet-boeck, ghenaemt den Bloempot, a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook: see Volkertsz, Jan.

Nieu Geestelyck Liedboecxken, getoghen uyt den Ouden en Nieuwen Testament, a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook compiled by Claes Ganglofs (q.v.), which consisted of eleven hymns without notes. There are four editions: 1593, 1606, 1615, and 1633, all at Groningen. vdZ.

Nieu Gheestelijck Liedtboecxken, Een, a Dutch Mennonite hymnal: see Soetken Gerrits.

Nieu Kleyn Trompetjen, Een (inhoudende al nieuwe Gheestelijcke Liedekens, die noyt voor desen in druck gheweest en zijn), is a small collection of Dutch Mennonite hymns, of which L. P. is the author. It contains 55 hymns without notes on 219 pages. Only one edition is known, published at Kampen in 1611. vdZ.

Nieu Liedenboeck, Een, van alle nieuwe ghedichte Liedekens, die noyt in druck en zijn gheweest, ghemaect wt den Ouden ende Nieuwen Testament, nv eerst by den anderen vergadert, ende nieus in Druck ghebracht (n.p., 1562) was one of the first hymnals of the Dutch Mennonites. It contains 257 songs in alphabetical order without notes. It was appparently printed by Nicolaes Biestkens (q.v.). Only one copy, found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library, has been preserved. It was called the new hymnal, because there had been an earlier (first) hymnal, entitled Veelderhande Liedekens (q.v.), which had also been published by Nicolaes Biestkens, and of which there were two editions, both lost, in 1560 and 1562. A second (enlarged) edition of this Nieu Liedenboeck appeared in 1583, with the title Het Tweede Liedeboeck (q.v.). Many hymns of the Nieu Liedenboeck were included in the 1569 edition of Veelderhande Liedekens and in a large number of 17th-century hymnals. vdZ.

F. C. Wieder, De schriftuurlijke Liedekens (The Hague, 1900) 149 f.

Nieu Medemblicker Liet-boeck, met schriftuerlike liedekens, mentioned by Blaupot ten Cate (Holland II, 213), is the same Dutch Mennonite hymnal as Medemblikker (q.v.) Nieu Liedtboeck. vdZ.

Nieu Sangh-boec, Een (A New Songbook), inhoudende eenighe Psalmen, Lof-sanghen ende Geestelijcke Liedekens seer stichtelijcken om te singhen voor ende nae de Predicatie. This Dutch Mennonite hymnal was printed in 1628 at Dokkum (all copies apparently lost). A third edition of Een Nieuw Sangh-boeck appeared at Dokkum in 1650 in one volume containing two parts of 210 and 550 pages in a small size. This edition, of which a copy is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library, contains (a) 22 Psalms in the rhymed version of Dathenus (q.v.); (b) Part I of the hymns being a collection of 41 Geestelijcke Liedekens (spiritual hymns); (c) Part II of the hymns with a separate title page and a new pagination, entitled Sommighe Nieuwe Schriftuerlijcke Liedekens, containing 107 hymns obviously mostly taken from other hymnals; fourteen of these hymns are signed with the device "Hier nae beter" (Later better) and the letters J. S. (Jan Sents). After hymn No. 30 there is found an address "Tot den Leser" (to the reader); probably the following 77 hymns had not been included in the first and second editions of this hymnal. The whole, both psalms and hymns, is without notes.

There is a reprint, published at Leeuwarden in 1679, with the title Een Nieuw Sangh-boeck, ofte anders genaemt, Jan Sents Liedtboeck. This reprint is quite similar to the 1650 edition, except for a few accidental alterations. It is also without notes. The preface to this 1679 edition states that this hymnbook was used in the congregations of Friesland. vdZ.

Nieu Schriftuerlijck Liedtboecxken, Een, a Dutch Mennonite hymnal: see Alckmaer, J. C. van.

Nieukerck, Joost Willemsz, b. 1587 at Nijkerk, Dutch province of Gelderland, d. 1645 at Amsterdam, was a wealthy grain dealer at Amsterdam, who became bankrupt in 1627. Because he was known as a strictly honest man the Amsterdam city government exempted him from the usual bail. Nieukerck was a member of the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation, and a deacon until he resigned because of his bankruptcy. He was married to Sara van den Vondel, a sister of the poet Joost van den Vondel (q.v.). His sister Adriaantje Willems was married to the Amsterdam Waterlander preacher Pieter Andriesz Hesseling (q.v.). His other sister, Hester Willems, was married to the deacon Reyer Claesz Anslo, a brother of the Elder Cornelis Claesz Anslo (q.v.). (N.N.B.Wb. VIII, 1219-21.) vdZ.

Nieuw Geestelijck Kruyt-Hof, Het, is a Dutch Mennonite hymnal, the second part of the hymnbook Syons Wijn-bergh (q.v.). vdZ.

Nieuw Sangh-boeck, ofte anders genaemt, Jan Sents Liedt-boeck, a Dutch Mennonite hymnal: see Nieu Sangh-boec.

Nieuw-Brongerga: see Knijpe.

Nieuwe Gemeente (New Congregation), a name given to the Mennonites at Franeker, Friesland, whose leaders were Joriaen Heynsz and Hendrik Naeldeman (q.v.). (BRN VII, 460, 464 f.) vdZ.

Nieuwe Niedorp: see Niedorp.

Nieuwe Pekela: see Pekela.

Nieuwe Zijpe: see Barsingerhorn and Wieringerwaard.

Nieuwe Zwitsers: see Swiss Mennonites in the Netherlands.

Nieuwendam, once an independent village northeast of Amsterdam, now incorporated into the city. A Mennonite church was built in the village in 1843 with the support of Mennonites living here, and especially of the Cleyndert family. It was dedicated on July 9, by Jan Boeke, minister of the Amsterdam congregation. Its care was the responsibility of the Cleyndert family for decades. The church is now property of the Amsterdam congregation.

In 1842 the membership of the Nieuwendam congregation was 23, 52 in 1918, 35 in 1940, and 450 in 1955. It was originally served by preachers of Amsterdam, Haarlem, De Zaanstreek, and the students of the Mennonite seminary, then by the Amsterdam preachers and by the Ring of North Holland, now by the Amsterdam pastors. Miss C. W. Brugman served here 1947-55 and W. Veen since 1955; the latter is at the same time the pastor of Den Ilp-Landsmeer (q.v.). The church now serves Mennonites who live in the suburb of North Amsterdam. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 256-64; II, 2, Nos. 297; Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 200 f.; DJ 1954, 53; ML III, 253.

Nieuwenhuis, a common Dutch family name, which also occurs among the Mennonites. There are at least four Mennonite branches, apparently unrelated.

(1) Nieuwenhuis (Nienhaus, Nyenhuis) family found at Enschedé and Winterswijk. The origin of this family probably was Neuenhaus (Nienhuis) in the gravure of Bentheim, Germany, not far from the Dutch border. From the early 17th century the name is found in the town of Steinfurt (Burgsteinfurt, q.v.), not far from Neuenhaus. Here members of the Nieuwenhuis family were still found in the 18th century. In the meantime some of them had moved to Enschedé in the Dutch province of Overijssel. They are found here from the early 18th century, and perhaps already in the 17th century, usually being engaged in textile business and manufacturing; some of them were deacons of the church. By marriage the Nieuwenhuis family in Enschedé was related to other well-known Mennonite families, such as Hoedemaker, Naber, Stenvers, van Lochum, Warnaers, and ter Mors. In the 19th century this Enschedé branch died out. In the Mennonite congregation of Winterswijk, Dutch province of Gelderland, there were in the 18th century also a number of Nieuwenhuises. They had moved in from Enschedé.

(2) Nieuwenhuis family of Amsterdam. This family, found here in the 16th-18th centuries, seems to have moved in from Steinfurt and probably belonged to the same branch as the Enschedé-Winterswijk family. In the 18th century they spelled their names in different ways: Nieuwenhuis, Nieuwenhuys, Nieuwenhuizen, Nieuwenhuysen. A relationship of the Amsterdam Zonist deacon Maarten Nieuwenhuizen, and Maarten Nieuwenhuizen of Haarlem, father of pastor Jan Nieuwenhuizen (q.v.), with them could not be ascertained.

(3) Nieuwenhuis family of Harlingen, Friesland. The first of this family we find here is Feddrik Tjerks about 1740, who was married to Geertje Everts Oosterbaan, and father of Tjerk Nieuwenhuis (q.v.), the first professor of the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary. With the latter this family died out in the male line.

(4) Nieuwenhuis family of Westzaan, province of North Holland. Willem Nieuwenhuis, b. ca. 1760 at Westzaan, d. 1806 at Groningen, was trained for the ministry by H. van Gelder and P. Beets, both preachers of Zaandam, and examined and appointed ministerial candidate by the church board of West Zaandam. He served as pastor at Norden, East Friesland, 1796-98 and at Groningen (Pelsterstraat congregation) 1798-1806.

Benjamin Nieuwenhuis (Nieuwenhuizen), of Westzaan, b. there about 1712, d. 1780 at Kampen, was a Mennonite minister at Kampen 1737-80; his grandson Benjamin Nieuwenhuis, b. ca. 1810 at Kampen, d. Feb. 7, 1847, at Medemblik, was educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary and served the congregation of Medemblik 1835-47. vdZ.

Nieuwenhuis, Tjerk, a Mennonite theologian, b. Nov. 5, 1708, at Harlingen, the son of Feddrik Tjerks and Geertje Everts Oosterbaan, d. Aug. 9, 1759, at Amsterdam, married Eva van Maurik, was the first professor at the seminary founded by the Lam en Toren Mennonite congregation in Amsterdam. Having specialized in philology and philosophy at the University of Franeker, he went to Amsterdam in 1731 to attend the lectures of Professor Cattenburgh at the Remonstrant seminary. During an illness of Professor Clericus he was asked to lecture on logic.

The Mennonite church council saw in Nieuwenhuis the man they needed to fill the position of professor at the seminary. Nieuwenhuis accepted and completed his doctorate at Franeker. Then he made a journey to England and France to meet men of learning and visit libraries, and on Nov. 28, 1735, he assumed his duties and delivered his first lecture on the subject, "The Benefits of Philosophy and the Excellence of Revealed Religion." This address and all his lectures were given in Latin. He lectured on both theology and philosophy. His position is revealed by the title of his initial address, namely, that philosophy—he means especially that of John Locke—is of great importance but is inadequate compared with revealed religion, viz., Christianity. Nieuwenhuis left no writings. Pastor K. de Vries of Amsterdam published a funeral sermon in his honor, Lijkrede over het afsterven van T. Nieuwenhuis (Amsterdam, 1759). vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2481, 2483; DJ 1850, 99-111; Chr. Sepp, Johannes Stinstra en zijn tijd I and II (Amsterdam, 1865 and 1866) passim, see Indexes; DB 1918, 74-77, 81-84; ML III, 253.

Nieuwenhuizen (Nieuwenhuyzen), a Dutch Mennonite family found in Amsterdam and Haarlem. Maerten Nieuwenhuyzen was from 1729 a preacher of the Flemish and Frisian Kruisstraat congregation at Haarlem, and after 1747, when this congregation merged with the Flemish Klein-Heiligland congregation, until 1760 of the United congregation. His son was Jan Nieuwenhuizen (q.v.). In Amsterdam a Maerten Nieuwenhuizen was a deacon of the Zonist congregation in 1791. vdZ.

Nieuwenhuizen (Nieuwenhuyzen), Jan, a Mennonite preacher, b. Sept. 4, 1724, at Haarlem, d. Feb.

24, 1806, at Monnikendam, the son of Maarten Nieuwenhuyzen, was trained to be a bookseller, then studied theology and became a minister, serving at Middelharnis 1758-63, Aardenburg 1763-71, and Monnikendam 1771-1806. He left a number of sermons and a treatise Over de voortreffelijkheid der wijsheid.

Nieuwenhuizen is known as the founder of the Maatschappij tot Nut van 't Algemeen (q.v.). This society, which he founded on Oct. 16, 1784, had its seat in Edam until 1787 and in Amsterdam since then; it is based on Christian kindness and was planned and intended to promote the welfare of the public.

For a long time Nieuwenhuizen had been concerned with the sad state of the populace; he reflected on what measures might help the people out of their moral decline and improve their material lot. He came to the conclusion that earnest leadership and better instruction was the first essential. "In order to achieve what I considered necessary for my fatherland, nothing seemed more necessary than to form a society of true and upright friends of mankind, who would be willing to support my efforts through their co-operation and modest contribution." He talked his idea over with his son Martinus (q.v.) and found it favorably received by others, especially by his Mennonite colleague J. A. J. Hoekstra at Edam and the Lutheran pastor J. C. Loggers.

The society, usually known as "Het Nut," covers a wide scope. Although in some local sections the educational work degenerated into a sort of entertaining play (this happened in the early 19th century), the society has been of benefit, especially in creating libraries, savings banks, nursery schools, and vocational schools. There were in 1955 more than 300 local units, with about 40,000 members; their 2602 libraries contain over 250,000 books; there are 133 savings banks, 90 nursery schools, and more than 100 other schools and courses. Thus the work of Jan Nieuwenhuizen has borne rich fruit.

Jan Nieuwenhuizen was married to Gezina (Geesje) Wynalda (1722-87) of Haarlem. A collection of her poems, entitled Verzaameling van Zeede- en Stichtelijke Haarlemmerhout en Tuin Gezangen, was published at Haarlem in 1756 by her husband, who was still a bookseller at Haarlem. vdZ.

Naamlijst 1806, 70 f.; N. C. Wertz, Jan Nieuwenhuizen (address delivered at the general meeting of the Het Nut on Aug. 13, 1806); N.N.B.Wb. II, 993; DB 1884, 45; 1887, 126; 1889, 115 f.; DJ 1907, 21-31 with portrait); ML III, 253 f.

Nieuwenhuizen, Martinus (Maarten), the son of Jan Nieuwenhuizen, b. Dec. 9, 1759, at Middelharnis, d. March 6, 1793, at Haarlem. He studied medicine at the University of Franeker and settled in Edam as a physician. He supported his father in organizing the Maatschappij tot Nut van 't Algemeen, serving as its secretary until his death. When the office of the society was transferred to Amsterdam in 1787, he moved with it. In 1791 he was appointed to the committee of the Mennonite Zonist congregation at Amsterdam to publish a new hymnal, the Groote Bundel (q.v., 1796). Nieuwenhuizen offered to write some hymns himself, and received offers of hymns from noted poets. The Doopsgezinde Bijdragen (1890, 74) has a poem from his pen on Menno Simons, written for the portrait by L. Garreau (1788). G. Brender à Brandis and M. C. van Hall delivered funeral orations for him, which appeared in print in 1793. (N.N.B.Wb. II, 993 f.; ML III, 254.) vdZ.

Nieuwezijl (Niezijl) is a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) in 1551-54 baptized five persons, and where a Mennonite congregation later came into being, which joined the Friesche Sociëteit (Conference of Friesland) in 1695 (membership then only 11), but soon after that date merged with the Pieterzijl (q.v.) Mennonite congregation. (DB 1895, 4 f., 20; ML III, 254.) vdZ.

Nieuwland, an area north of Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) in 1563-65 baptized 12 persons and in 1568-82 another 94. This considerable number indicates the existence of a Mennonite congregation, of which, however, nothing is known. Perhaps the converts joined the congregation of Leeuwarden, which for reasons of safety may have held its meetings outside the city. In 1594 a Mennonite meeting held on the Nieuwland in the home of Johannes Gaukes and led by Peter van Coelen (q.v.) was disturbed by the Reformed minister Ruardus Acronius. The elders of the Jan-Jacobsz group in 1604-31 baptized 53 persons in Nieuwland. (Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 131.) vdZ.

Nieuwpoort, a town in the Dutch province of South Holland, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 12 persons in 1563-65. Of a Mennonite congregation at Nieuwpoort nothing is known. These converts may have constituted the original core of the Mennonite congregation in the neighboring town of Vianen (q.v.). vdZ.

Nieuwpoort, West Flanders, Belgium, was in 1534-35 the seat of an Anabaptist congregation, mostly consisting of Anabaptists from Holland, who often stayed here some time before crossing the channel to England. vdZ.

A. L. E. Verheyden, "Le protestantisme à Nieuport," in Bulletin . . . d'Histoire de Belgique LXVI (Brussels, 1951) 2.

Nieuw-Scheemda, during the 16th-18th centuries usually called Scheemder-hamrik, is a hamlet in the Dutch province of Groningen and formerly seat of a Mennonite congregation. Of the origin and history of this congregation not much is known. S. Blaupot ten Cate's assumption that the congregation of Scheemder-hamrik is identical with the Klei(n) Oldampt (q.v.) congregation is questionable. In 1650 Peter Jansen was a preacher of the Scheemder-hamrik congregation, which belonged to the Groningen Old Flemish branch and at this time had no meetinghouse, meetings being held in Dirk Jans's home. From the early 18th century the congregation of Scheemder-hamrik, whose membership probably never surpassed twenty, was always united with the congregation of neighboring Noordbroek (q.v., later mostly called Noordbroek and Nieuw-Scheemda). It was apparently not until the early 19th century that a meetinghouse was built at Nieuw-Scheemda, which was remodeled in 1840 and used until 1919. In 1921 it was sold, after its organ had been transported and installed in the Noordbroek church. (DJ 1840, 46; 1850, 57; DB 1879, 6, 9, 89; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 92, 213; ML III, 265.) vdZ.

Nieuwvaart: see Klundert.

Nieuwvliet "in 't lant van Cadsant" is a hamlet in Dutch Zeeland-Flanders, where a Mennonite congregation existed from the 16th to the 18th century. The congregation, which was composed of refugees from Belgian Flanders in 1614 and the following years and which was always small, had a preacher of its own only a part of the time, but had a church. After 1771 this meetinghouse was apparently no longer used. In the lists of Mennonite congregations it is mentioned for the last time in 1775. On July 10, 1779, the members joined the neighboring congregation of Aardenburg (q.v.). The Nieuwvliet congregation is often called Cadzand (q.v.) or Groede (q.v.). vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1166; DB 1879, 20; 1883, 112; 1884, 45, 108, 113 f.; a history of the congregation, DB 1889, 90-116; ML III, 254.

Nijdam (Nydam), a widely ramified family of farmers, still found in the Dutch province of Friesland and elsewhere in the Netherlands, whose ancestor, as far as is known, was Willem Willems Nydam (about 1550-1635), living at Nydamstra Estate (state farmhouse) near Irnsum. He belonged to the Reformed Church, as did the first generations of his descendants; but since the 18th century there have been a number of Mennonite Nijdam families, particularly near Akkrum and Grouw. Cornelis Nijdam (q.v.) was a descendant of Willem Willems Nydam. (W. Tsj. Vleer, Het Nijdamstra-boek, n.p., 1956.) vdZ.

Nijdam, Cornelis, b. April 24, 1884, at Leeuwarden, d. July 12, 1946, at Amsterdam, a Dutch Mennonite minister, studied theology at the universities of Groningen and Amsterdam and at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, and served as pastor in the following congregations: Noordeind van Graft 1909-12, Veenwouden 1912-26, Borne 1926-30, Amsterdam 1930-33, and Zeist 1933-46. By his kindness, his simplicity, his untiring work, and particularly by his strong evangelical faith Nijdam was a great blessing to the Dutch brotherhood. Influenced by the pietistic theology of Friedrich Schleiermacher, and inspired by contacts with English Quakers, a Biblical faith and practical Christianity were firmly linked in him throughout his life. Nijdam was always a warm friend and a promoter of missions. In 1915 he became a member of the executive board of the Dutch Missions Association, in 1923 its secretary, and served as its chairman from 1934 until his death; in 1926-30 he was also the editor of Onze Zending, a monthly dedicated to the interests of the Mission Association. Nijdam was one of the first members and leaders of the "Vereeniging voor Gemeentedagen," now "Vereniging voor Doopsgezind Broederschapswerk" (q.v.), founded in 1917. He wholeheartedly welcomed the spiritual renewal of the Dutch brotherhood for which this association was striving. In 1924-27 he was treasurer of this association, and 1927-34 its president. In 1922 in collaboration with P. Vis (q.v.) and W. H. toe Water (q.v.), he instigated the founding of the "Friese Doopsgezinde Jongeren Bond" (q.v.) (Youth Association of Friesland). From the beginning (1924) he was on the committee for the Elspeet Mennonite Brotherhood Home, serving as secretary of this committee 1925-32 and its president 1932-46.

In September 1945 Nijdam was appointed president of the A.D.S. (q.v.; Dutch General Mennonite Conference), of which he had been for many years a trustee. He entered his presidency with great plans, but his premature death prevented him from carrying out his intentions. One of his projects, a general Mennonite weekly, which was to be read by all the Dutch Mennonites, was realized after his death. De Noodbrug (q.v.), a temporary periodical published by the A.D.S., was edited by Nijdam and S. H. N. Gorter (q.v.).

Nijdam published a large number of articles in De Zondagsbode and Brieven; he also contributed to the Doopsgezind Jaarboekje. Besides this he published some sermons and separately Het Nieuwe Huis (Bergum, 1916), De Doopsgezinde Zending (Wolvega, n.d.), and Een Winter in de Oase, brieven uit Biskra (Haarlem, 1934). Nijdam was married to Anna A. Vogelsang, Th.D. vdZ.

De Noodbrug, September 1946; DJ 1949, 36 f.; C. Nijdam, "Spiritual Reconstruction," Menn. Life II (January 1947) 31-33; H. Craandyk, "In Memoriam—Cornelis Nijdam," op. cit., 33 f.

Nijmegen (German, Nimwegen), a city in the Dutch province of Gelderland with (1951) a population of 112,800 (231 Mennonites). The first mention of Anabaptists in this city occurs in 1539; on April 19 of this year three unnamed Anabaptist men were burned at the stake here, and shortly after two women were drowned in the Waal River. Two other victims of persecution in this city are known: in 1557 (van Braght gives the year as 1556) Gerrit Hazenpoet was burned at the stake, and in 1569 (van Braght 1572) Jan (Johan) Block (q.v.) met the same fate. But the city government did not always take such strong action against the Anabaptists; as early as 1565 Jan van den Berg was expelled from the city with his whole family because he refused to have his children baptized.

The next mention of Anabaptists is made in 1639. The city, which had become predominantly Reformed, suffered a terrible epidemic of the plague in 1635-37, losing about half of its inhabitants. It therefore considered bringing weavers in from other places for its linen weaving industry. During this time many Reformed came here from the duchy of Jülich (q.v.), Germany, where they were oppressed because of their religious faith. Mennonites came too; in 1639 a Mennonite acquired the rights of citizenship, and two others in 1640. Instead of giving the customary oath they were received upon their vow of truthfulness ("by mannen-waerheyd"). In 1642 and the following years more Mennonite weavers came to Nijmegen from Jülich, who practiced their craft, becoming citizens in the same way. The number of Mennonites there in 1652 was considerable. The complaint of the Reformed to the government that the Mennonites were meeting regularly for services indicates that there was an organized congregation. In 1654-57 new refugees came, strengthening the congregation, which Guyot estimates at 180 souls. The Mennonites of Nijmegen belonged to the United Flemish, Frisians, and High Germans and used this name although there were never any divisions there. After the Lamist-Zonist (q.v.) schism the Nijmegen congregation held to the conservative Zonist views. In 1664 Willem Kops, Jan Welsinck, and Pieter Willemsz signed the Verbondt van Eenigheydt (q.v.) in the name of the Nijmegen congregation.

A man of importance who did much to promote the financial status of the brotherhood was the deacon Jan Godschalks van Elten (q.v.; d. 1700), who came from München-Gladbach, Jülich, and obtained citizenship in 1655. In 1665 the council of the Reformed Church protested that the Mennonites had a fixed place of meeting; thereupon they were forced again to meet in the homes of the members. In 1706 they bought a house which they remodeled as a church. In 1728 they found another place in the Remonstrant church on the Arminiaansche Plaats, which was now sold to the Mennonites.

In the 18th century the membership suffered a sharp decline. In 1655 the membership including children was estimated at 180, the number of baptized members in 1783 was 99, in 1798, 39, and in 1847 only 28. The French occupation brought a time of trial and difficulty. In 1794 the church was used as a stable. But by 1802 it was again in use as a church. After 1860 the membership increased rapidly. The 28 members of 1847 grew to 240 by 1900. In 1940 the membership stood at about 200, in 1955 at 135. The congregation of Nijmegen seems to have had as its first regular (lay) preacher and elder Thomas Ameldonck, who came from Goch (q.v.) and served at Nijmegen 1672-89. After his decease the congregation was for some time served by elders from the outside, but in 1690 two preachers had been appointed, i.e., Jan Ameldonck Leeuw, the son of elder Thomas Ameldonck, and Laurens Hendriks. They were followed by Hendrik Laurens (son of Laurens Hendriks) and Pieter Hendriks (Pieter de Eger, or van Egen), who were both appointed elders in 1724. Laurens Hendriks served until 1759, in which year he retired; Pieter van Egen served until his death in 1770. They were followed by Cornelis Bruyn, serving 1773-82, J. H. Floh, who was their first minister trained at the Amsterdam Seminary, 1782-83, Evert Akkeringa 1784-99, Herman I. van Hinte 1799, Abraham de Vries 1800-1, Pieter Hollenberg 1801-5, Sybren Sybrandi 1805-7, Coenraad Bavink 1807-10, Anthonie Doyer 1811-18, Cornelis S. van Geuns 1819-22, Abraham Doyer 1825-28, Jan Boeke 1828-30, Klaas Sybrandi 1830-34, J. ten Cate Fennema 1835-60, J. Attema 1861-81, P. Feenstra Jr. 1881-91, B. Haga 1891-1917, Y. S. Buruma 1917-50, H. C. Valeton 1950—.

During World War II the church was destroyed in September 1944; a new church was dedicated on May 25, 1952. There is a Sunday school for children and a ladies' circle. The city is now predominantly (79 per cent) Catholic.

In 1710 a number of Mennonites from Switzerland, who were to be deported to the English colonies in America, were set free by the Dutch authorities at Nijmegen on April 9, when their ship, sailing down the Rhine, passed Nijmegen. They were cordially received by the Mennonites of Nijmegen. vdZ.

P. C. G. Guyot, Bijdragen tot de geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden te Nijmegen (1845); B. Haga, De Doopsgezinde Martelaren te Nijmegen (Geschriften t. b. v. de Doopsgezinde in de verstrooiing) (Amsterdam, n.d.); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1261, 1772; II, Nos. 2154-74; DB 1874, 1-33; 1875, 67-92; DJ 1953, 38-40; Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad XI (1955 f.) Nos. 36 and 40.

Nijpkerke: see Nukerke.

Niklas, Nikolaus, an Anabaptist martyr: see Claes Claesz.

Nikolaidorf, a village in the Molotschna (q.v.) settlement, South Russia, on the south bank of the Apanlee River, was founded in 1852 by Mennonites from West Prussia. In 1914 it had 319 inhabitants and 4,100 acres of land.

Another village with this name was founded by Mennonite immigrants in Barnaul (q.v.), province of Tomsk (Siberia), in 1909. The village belonged to the Orloff Mennonite Church and had a school which gave instruction in both Russian and German. (ML III, 254.) Hege.

Nikolaifeld (Nikolaipol), a common Mennonite village name in Russia named after Czar Nicholas. The name appeared in the following Mennonite settlements: Zagradovka, Borissovo, Yazekovo, and Don Ukraine; Aulie-Ata, Central Asia; Suvorovka, Caucasus; Barnaul and Omsk, Siberia; and Neuland, Paraguay. (ML III, 254.) C.K.

Nikolaifeld (Nikolaipol) was a village in which the administration (volost) of the Yazekovo Mennonite settlement (q.v.), near Chortitza, Russia, was located. The village was established in 1869 and had 4,300 acres of land in 1918, and under the Soviet regime as a collective farm 2,650 acres. In 1914 the population was 221; in 1941 it was 610. Thirteen persons were murdered in 1919, three starved to death in 1933-34, and 113 were exiled during 1929-41. During the German occupation of the Ukraine in 1941-43 the economic and cultural life was somewhat revived. When the Germans withdrew the population was evacuated to Germany, whence probably half of it was returned to Russia by the Russian army, and the other half found its way to America. C.K.

K. Stumpp, Bericht über das Gebiet Chortitza (Berlin, 1943); ML III, 255.

Nikolaifeld (Nikolaipol) Mennonite Church was located in the Yazekovo Mennonite settlement (q.v.) of Ukraine, 15 miles north of Chortitza in South Russia. The congregation was established in 1869. Originally it was a subsidiary of the Chortitza Mennonite Church (q.v.). Early ministers were Peter Penner (ordained 1865), Isaak Klassen (1871), Anton Löwen (1871, leading minister), Martin Dyck (1876), Heinrich Rempel (1876), Heinrich Siemens (1880), Heinrich Löwen (1885), Jacob Siemens (1888), Cornelius Lehn (1888), Aaron Klassen (1905), Klaas Quiring (1908), Peter Schulz (1908).

The church was located in the village of Nikolaifeld (Nikolaipol). In 1905 the total population of the church was 1,046, of whom some 240 were members. The church contributions during that year amounted to 1,345 rubles. In 1928 the total population was 1,009, with 472 members. In these 25 years the congregation had indeed grown, but the surplus population had gone to daughter settlements and particularly to Canada. Of the total population, 58 had a Zentralschule education, 10 a normal training, 4 a secondary training, and 2 university training. Heinrich D. Epp (q.v.), a teacher of the local Zentralschule and minister of the church, was ordained elder in 1920. At that time the church became independent. He was assisted by five ministers and three deacons, most of whom had a secondary education and had been teaching. On Nov. 12, 1926, the congregation observed the fortieth anniversary of the ministry of Heinrich D. Epp, for which occasion the elders Isaak Dyck, Johann Martens, Peter Neufeld, and others came. In 1935 the church was confiscated and Heinrich D. Epp left the community.

During the war the members of the church were scattered. At the time of the German occupation of the Ukraine (1941-43) the congregation had meetinghouses in the villages of Nikolaifeld, Adelsheim, and Hochfeld. Each village had a choir. Information about the religious life and the hardships of the congregations under the Soviets is not available. (See also Yazekovo Mennonite settlement, and the respective villages.) Some of the members have meanwhile found their way to Canada and South America. (See Nikolaipol.) C.K.

H. Dirks, Statistik, 1905, 61; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 70; Unser Blatt II (April 1927) 206; K. Stumpp, Bericht über das Gebiet Chortitza (Berlin, 1943); ML III, 254.

Nikolaifeld Mennonite Church was the congregation in the Suvorovka Mennonite settlement, province of Stavropol, Caucasus, with its meetinghouse in the village of Nikolaifeld. The settlement was established in 1894 and consisted of two villages; the congregation was organized in 1901. Cornelius Harder (q.v.) was the first leading minister, assisted by Jacob Enns and Jacob Janzen. In 1905 the total membership of the church was 405, with 173 baptized members. Little is known about the later development of the congregation. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 717; Dirks, Statistik, 1905, 40, 65.) C.K.

Nikolaifeld Mennonite Church, located in the Zagradovka settlement, province of Kherson, South Russia. The Zagradovka settlement was established 1872-79, comprising seventeen villages. The settlers had come from various places. In this heterogeneous mass there was not a single minister. The first election of ministers was held Oct. 22, 1872. Three men were elected to preach; next year a few more were added. On June 2, 1874, the congregation was organized as the Tiege Mennonite Church, and Wilhelm Voth was elected and ordained elder of the congregation. Services at first were held in schools and large sheds, but in 1888 construction of a large church in the village of Nikolaifeld began. The first service in the new church was held May 5, 1891, after which the congregation was renamed the Nikolaifeld Mennonite Church.

Among the first ministers were capable men, some of whom had belonged to the Gnadenfeld "brother" circle; most of them had been affected by the wave of reformation that had swept through the Mennonite villages of Russia during the 1860's and which is to be identified with such names as Eduard Wüst and Bernhard Harder. The Nikolaifeld ministers preached the necessity of rebirth and sanctification of life; they did not read their sermons as was customary at that time but spoke extemporaneously. Bible conferences, prayer meetings, visitation of members in their homes, mission circles, etc., were introduced.

Elders of this church were Wilhelm Voth 1874-95, Gerhard Warkentin 1895-1902, Franz Martens 1902-7, Johann Voth 1908-21, Franz Wiens 1921-24, Heinrich Voth 1925- . Martens, Wiens, and H. Voth were teachers by profession.

In 1907 Martens and most of the ministers left the church and organized the Orloff Evangelical Mennonite Church. The reason for this action was their desire to establish a "pure" church. Admissibility to baptism and communion, as well as church discipline in general, were the problems.

Martens was followed by Johann Voth, the son of the Elder Wilhelm Voth. Voth resigned in 1921. His successor, Franz Wiens, resigned and joined the Evangelical Church. Heinrich Voth, no relative of the above-named Voths, now was elected and ordained as elder; he was young, energetic, and capable. He was sent into exile in 1931 and the church building converted into a granary by the Soviets. All ministers either were sent into exile or else killed. Under ruthless Soviet pressure all organized religious life had ceased to exist.

In 1922 the congregation had 1,241 members. In the course of time subsidiary congregations were established (1) near the station Zuvorovskaya in the Caucasus, (2), Pissarev, (3) Trubetzkoy, and (4) Durilino. Missionaries from the congregation in foreign fields were Johann Wiebe, German East Africa; Peter J. Wiens, Champa, India; Suse Richert, Java; Helena Goossen, Java. G.L.

Friesen, Brüderschaft, 462-64, 709-11, 724-27; G. Lohrenz, Sagradowka (Rosthern, 1947) 64-79.

Nikolaipol, the name of numerous Mennonite villages in Russia. In the province of Ekaterinoslav Mennonites from the Chortitza and Kronsweide established the Nikolaipol settlement in 1869-72 with eight villages, one of them also called Nikolaipol, originally Nikolaifeld, with 5,130 acres of land. In 1912 it had a population of 314 and was the seat of a Mennonite congregation, which built a church between Nikolaipol and Franzfeld in 1888. To this congregation belonged the Mennonites of the following villages: Eichenfeld (Dubovka, q.v.), Neu-Hochfeld (Morozovo, q.v.), where in 1905 a congregation of the "Evangelical Mennonite Brethren" was also organized, Adelsheim (Dolinovka, q.v.), Franzfeld (Varvarovka), Reinfeld (Tchistopol), Paulsheim (Pavlovka), and Petersdorf (Nadeschovka). Dubovka, the village destroyed during the Revolution, most of whose male population was killed on Oct. 26, 1919, was also a part of this congregation, which had a membership of 500. The Mennonite Brethren had a subsidiary congregation and chapel in Nikolaipol, whose members also lived in the above eight villages. Before World War I the settlement was very prosperous, and many of the settlers were able to replace their simple homes with stately residences. All the villages had schools from the beginning. In the village of Nikolaipol a large Zentralschule was built in 1906, with an enrollment of about 100. It was later changed into an agricultural school and taken over by the government.

In 1892 another village called Nikolaipol was founded in the province of Ekaterinoslav, Santurinovskaya district, Bachmut area, Borissovo (q.v.) settlement (daughter settlement of Chortitza), with 204 inhabitants in 1912.

A congregation with this name was founded in 1881 in Asia, in the region of Sir-Darya, at the foot of the Thian-schan Mountain (on the Talash River) in Turkestan by Mennonites from the Am Trakt settlement (q.v.), whose members lived in five villages. The congregation built a hospital near Tashkent in the village of Nikolaipol in 1908 for the care of sick Kirghiz.

One of the villages in the Slavgorod settlement (formerly Barnaul, q.v.), province of Omsk, was called Nikolaipol. Hege.

Dirks, Statistik, 1905; D. H. Epp, Die Memriker Ansiedlung (Berdyansk, 1910); W. Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitza in Süd-Russland (1928) 31 f.; Neuer Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender, 1913, 32, 50, 52, 70; Menn. Jahrbuch, 1908, 87; ML III, 255.

Nikolaipol Mennonite Brethren Church, located at Nikolaipol, Aulie-Ata (q.v.), 150 miles northeast of Tashkent (q.v.) in Central Asia, started as an independent Mennonite Brethren congregation among the followers of Abram Peters (q.v.), and Claas Epp (q.v.), who had come from the Molotschna and Trakt settlements looking for a refuge to escape military service and to meet Christ at His second coming. This Mennonite Brethren church was freer in the form of baptism, admitting members who were not immersed. The organization of the church took place in 1887 (Dirks, 1889), with Heinrich Kröker as its first elder. In 1905 Heinrich Kröker was elder, assisted by the ministers Jakob Janzen, Jakob Mantler, Johann Klassen, Aron Dyck, and Franz Braun. The congregation at that time numbered 377, with 173 baptized members. The history of this church is not quite clear. Johannes Janzen gives the information that the M.B. church underwent a reorganization challenged by the work of the more vital Evangelical Mennonite Church. The Nikolaipol M.B. Church maintained a special status within the Mennonite Brethren Conference of Russia although fellowship was maintained (Friesen, 482). From all information available, this congregation must have been more or less independent. Little is known about the later development and the present status of this congregation, although it can be assumed that it is still in existence. C.K.

J. Janzen, "The Mennonite Colony in Turkestan," MQR IV (1930) 282-89; Friesen, Brüderschaft; H. Dirks, Statistik (1905) 58, 69; Unser Blatt (October 1925) 10.

Nikolaital (Novo-Sofievka), a village in the Novo-Sofievka district of Ekaterinoslav, South Russia, founded in 1865, one of seven villages constituting the Mennonite settlement of Borozenko (q.v.). In 1913 it had 96 inhabitants with 2,676 acres of land.

W. Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitza in Süd-Russland (Munich, 1928) 31; ML III, 255.

Nikolayev Mennonite Church in the Orenburg Mennonite settlement, Russia, first consisted of Mennonites from the Molotschna settlement who settled in the province of Orenburg (Chkalov) in 1895. The church was founded in 1897 under the leadership of Johann Bärgmann, who was assisted by Peter Dück, David Littke, Henrich Janzen, and Abraham Bärgmann. In 1905 the total population of the church was 1,238, with 494 baptized members. The first church building was located in the village of Stepanovka. In 1913-14 the old church was torn down and a large new church of brick was erected. In 1906 a second church was built of brick in the village of Chernozernoye. The elder Johann Bärgmann also lived in this village. In addition to the early ministers mentioned above, Jacob Wolff was ordained in 1906 and Heinrich Brucks in 1911. The Mennonites maintained for a time a Bible school, called "Pniel."

After the Revolution, the congregation suffered severely. The ministers had to give up their work. Many members of the church emigrated to Canada and others were exiled. The lowest economic and spiritual status of the settlement was reached during World War II. This settlement was evidently spared the fate of many of the others of having its population completely removed. Recent reports indicate that the religious life of the settlement has been revived. (See Orenburg Mennonite Settlement.) C.K.

Peter Dyck, Orenburg am Ural (Clearbrook, 1951); Dirks, Statistik (1905) 33, 64; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 717; Cornelius Krahn, "Revival Sweeps Mennonite Settlement in Russia," Menn. Weekly Review, Jan. 31, 1957, p. 11.

Nikolayevka, the name of a number of Mennonite settlements in Russia and Siberia, most of which were given German names at their founding.

Two settlements with this name were made in the province of Ekaterinoslav (q.v.). One was that of 1884 in the Santvinovka district, which in 1913 had 289 inhabitants and 6,525 acres of land. Another was made in 1885 (originally called Ebental) in the Memrik settlement, a daughter colony of the Molotschna settlement, Golitsinovka district, Bachmut area, with 209 inhabitants and 2,592 acres of land. The settlers had great difficulties to overcome, but in two years a school was opened, and in the next year a schoolhouse was built. In 1889 a third village was given this name, one of seven villages in the Ignatyevka settlement, a daughter settlement of Chortitza, in the Zhelezyanskaya district of the Bachmut area.

In the Terek (q.v.) settlement in the Caucasus, a daughter of the Molotschna settlement at the mouth of the Sula River, where it flows into the Caspian Sea, was given this name in 1901. Also a village in the Orenburg-Dyeyvka (q.v.) settlement was so named, a daughter settlement of Chortitza, Uranskaya area of the province of Orenburg, which was founded in 1894-1901 and contained 15 villages.

The name occurs likewise in a number of Mennonite settlements made in Siberia. One of these was in the province of Omsk, ten miles from the town of Slavgorod in the Slavgorod settlement (formerly Barnaul, q.v.) which consisted of 58 villages with (1925) a population of 13,173. Another was 45 miles west of Slavgorod in the Tchaiatchi settlement. HEGE.

Dirks, Statistik (1905); D. H. Epp, Die Memriker Ansiedlung (Berdyansk, 1910); W. Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitza in Süd-Russland (Munich, 1928); ML III, 255.

Nikolayevka Mennonite Brethren Church, located in the Bachmut Mennonite settlement (New York), province of Ekaterinoslav, South Russia, was founded in 1889 by Mennonites coming from the Chortitza settlement. The congregation was at first affiliated with the Einlage M.B. Church under the leadership of Gerhard Regehr. It became independent in 1905, when Hermann A. Neufeld (q.v.) was ordained elder. Other ministers who served the congregation were Cornelius Grunau, who later emigrated to the United States, Abraham Pätkau, Paul Wiebe, Johann Schellenberg, Johann Siemens, Peter Wiebe, David Block, Wilhelm Klassen, Peter Janzen, Peter Krause, Johann Fröse, Johann Klassen, Peter Siemens. In 1905 the total population of the congregation was 501 and the number of baptized members was 146. For a while the Mennonites and the Mennonite Brethren worshiped at the same place on alternate Sundays. In 1923 Hermann A. Neufeld emigrated to Canada and a number of other members followed. Little is known of the congregation after this date. So far as is known, the congregation survived the troubles of the 1920's and 30's but its fate was sealed during World War II. P.H.B., C.K.

Dirks, Statistik, 1905; Friesen, Brüderschaft, 476; A. H. Unruh, Die Geschichte der Mennoniten-Brüdergemeinde (Winnipeg, 1954) 201.

Nikolsburg, a city and domain in the former Brno area of the margravure of Moravia, belonged since the middle of the 13th century to the Lower Austrian branch of the old noble family of Liechtenstein. In 1566 the domain fell to Emperor Maximilian II, who in 1575 ceded a part of it to the Baron Adam von Dietrichstein.

In the third decade of the 16th century Nikolsburg became noted as the center of Moravian Anabaptism. Indeed, throughout the entire 16th century Moravia was considered the promised land of religious tolerance. Here lived, besides the Catholics and the Utraquists, Bohemian Brethren who had fled from persecution in Bohemia to Moravia, and in general all those of any creed who were persecuted in any other country.

Already in 1524 the Protestants had established a congregation at Nikolsburg under the protection of Leonhard of Liechtenstein (q.v.). Their preacher was Hans Spittelmaier, assisted by Oswald Glaidt, (q.v.). At the beginning of July 1526 Balthasar Hubmaier arrived from Augsburg. Contemporary reports indicate that he had an extraordinary following throughout Nikolsburg; something like 12,000 Anabaptists are reported to have gradually found their way into the city and the vicinity. To them this Moravian spot became a sort of "Emmaus."

Anabaptists streamed together here from South Germany and from Austria. All the records of their trials at courts to which the Anabaptists at Schwaz in Tirol, in Augsburg, and in other places, were subjected in 1528-29, give the information that most of them either had been baptized in Nikolsburg or perhaps lived there for some time. Some of them were Hubmaier's friends. Some of the noted names were Hans Hut (q.v.) who found ten leaders (Vorsteher) already serving the Anabaptists in Nikolsburg; also Hans Nadler (q.v.), Georg Nespitzer (q.v.), and the better known Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.), who was the first Anabaptist bishop in Upper Austria. Another was Hans Schlaffer (q.v.), "who had previously been a Roman priest." In his statement Schlaffer said that in Nikolsburg baptisms were performed in the following manner: "First there was a sermon for the congregation. Then they baptized whoever came and desired it. Not everyone was questioned apart, nor an account demanded of him. Therefore our dear Hans Hut differed with Dr. Balthasar and the great division arose between him and the Brethren." In Nikolsburg there was probably also the Anabaptist preacher Thomas Waldhauser (q.v.). This was stated by Jacob Wiedemann and Philipp Jäger.

In Nikolsburg Hubmaier did a great deal of writing supported by the publisher Simprecht Sorg, called Froschauer. Here he wrote his well-known tracts, most of which he dedicated to the heads of the Moravian people, e.g., the Lords Leonhard and Hans von Liechtenstein, the magistrate Johann von Pernstein, the chief chamberlain Arkleb von Boskowitz, and Johann Dubcansky von Zedenin and Habrowan, in order to win their favor for Anabaptism. Here in Nikolsburg, however, Hubmaier found opponents among the Anabaptists themselves, such as Hans Hut, with whom he debated twice, once in Bergen and once in Nikolsburg. At the first of these debates the question considered was "whether one should use the sword or whether one should pay taxes for war or not." According to the position one took on these questions he belonged to the Schwertler (q.v.) or to the Stäbler (q.v.). In the second disputation, as Hans Nadler of Erlangen stated in 1529, seven subjects were debated: baptism, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, God's judgment, God's verdict, the end of the world, the new kingdom, and the coming of Christ. This disputation at Nikolsburg created considerable excitement beyond Moravia, as can be seen from the wide distribution of the so-called Nikolsburg Articles (q.v.), the refutation of which became a serious matter for the opponents of the Anabaptists, and which were placed on the Index in Rome.

While Hubmaier was developing his extensive work in Nikolsburg the Austrian government was eagerly trying to arrest him. But his death as a martyr in May 1528 did not stop the progress of Anabaptism; not only did the government fail to get it under control, but it even spread to a much wider extent. It was injured by divisions more than by persecutions; these divisions finally led to the separation of the followers of Wiedemann and Jäger, the Stäbler, from their brethren, the Schwertler; the Stäbler moved to Austerlitz, which now became a chief center of Anabaptism in Moravia.

The Anabaptists who remained in Nikolsburg were later usually called collectively Swiss Brethren. They occupied several villages in the vicinity of Nikolsburg and shared on the whole the changing fate of their other brethren in Moravia, who, to be sure, after Jakob Hutter (q.v.) became their leader, soon surpassed their former brethren in numbers and in ability. The Nikolsburg Anabaptists furthermore, upon the death of Leonhard of Liechtenstein, lost the protection which he had given them. Besides in Nikolsburg, they were found in Pollau (q.v.), Bergen, Wisternitz, Voitelsbrunn, Tasswitz, Urban, some in Znaim (q.v.), and Eibenschitz (q.v.), and in the mountain city Jamnitz, where Oswald Glaidt was their leader for a considerable period of time until his martyrdom in 1545. LOSERTH.

How many believers reached Nikolsburg at Hubmaier's time is seen from the confession of Hans Nadler (q.v.) of 1529, when he said that when he was staying in Nikolsburg for about 14 days in 1527 he himself watched how "they publicly baptized in the churches about 72 persons on one day." The parting of Leonhard von Liechtenstein from the Stäbler, who were driven out in 1528, was not unfriendly. He accompanied them to Unterwisternitz, gave them drinks, and freed them from the tax; from there they went on to Austerlitz.

Between the Schwertler who had remained in the Nikolsburger domain or settled in the villages of Bergen, Klentnitz, Pollau, Tracht, Voitelsbrunn, and Wisternitz, and the Hutterian Brethren there was no fellowship. To the government at Vienna, however, all Anabaptists were equally thorns in the flesh. The government gave instructions to the representatives traveling to the Landtag of Moravia on Jan. 2, 1540, that they should persuade the estates nowhere to tolerate the Anabaptists, who were reputedly spreading widely in the Nikolsburg domain and other places. The estates rejected this idea on January 4 to the extent that they declared that they did not openly tolerate the Anabaptist brotherhood but could not forbid the individual lords to keep their Anabaptist subjects, because otherwise whole strips of land would have become desolate and the lords would then furthermore no longer be in a position to furnish the money for important public undertakings, such as aid against the Turks, etc.

From 1543 on gradually the influx of the Swiss Brethren, in this case the former followers of Hubmaier, into the Hutterian brotherhood began; Hans Klopfer of Pollau and his group were the first of these. In the persecution of 1550 Mayden Mountain near Pollau offered them a refuge where they "had in many places pits and holes, in which they maintained themselves for a time, also in the clefts of the rocks and in the hollows and in the high mountains." Especially severe was the persecution of those who had fled to Pulgram; they were relentlessly driven out and plundered.

In 1556, when the Hutterian Brethren began to live in Nikolsburg, numerous Anabaptists from the neighboring area in Lower Austria, especially from Laa and Falkenstein, found their way to this place. The establishment of the Bruderhof (which is still standing) was followed in the next years by Bruderhofs in Bergen and Voitelsbrunn, which the Anabaptists developed, by making use of a healing spring there, into a noted and widely patronized bathing resort. In 1569 they suffered severely in the entire country, when during the famine in Nikolsburg a loaf of bread cost 45 Kreuzer.

A new section of Hutterite history in the Nikolsburg domain is introduced by the ceding of the domain to Adam von Dietrichstein (q.v.). He had called in the Jesuit Cardaneus for the conversion of the Lutherans in his domain in 1579. Adam experienced a certain embarrassment from the zealous Jesuit in that he had wanted the Anabaptists to be an exception in the work of conversion on account of their usefulness. Adam stated this in a letter he wrote from Prague on May 24, 1579, to Cardaneus in which he excused his (in the eyes of a zealous missionary) serious negligence in respect to the Anabaptists with the explanation: "Not everything can be done at the moment as one would like to see it." That in spite of this request Cardaneus (according to the Geschicht-Buch) did not avoid conflicts with the Anabaptists, resulted first from the fact that they refused to give him the required greeting. In January 1580 Cardaneus even announced the conversion of several Anabaptists, and in 1582 again the conversion of several Anabaptist women in Unterwisternitz; but on the whole there were only some individual conversions.

The new priest of Nikolsburg, Christoph Erhard (q.v.), wrote to the Jesuit Possevinus on June 17, 1584, that the oppression of Lutheranism had to be sure been successful, but for the complete and enduring conversion of the domain of Nikolsburg also the Hutterites would have to be made Catholic without an exception. A hindrance to the complete conversion was of course the undisciplined conduct of many a Catholic priest, newly established in the parishes of the domain, concerning which also Erhard, who had been made dean, soon complained. Also an evil and calumnious pamphlet was circulated in Nikolsburg in 1587, which appeared anonymously against the Hutterites, but failed to accomplish its purpose. Nor can it be said that the pamphlets of two renegade Hutterites, namely, that of Hans Jedelshauser (q.v.) and the one of Johann Eysvogel (q.v.) in Cologne had any more effect. The former charged the Hutterites with envy, quarrelsomeness, and ill will, and charged the Vorsteher of the entire brotherhood, Klaus Braidl (q.v.), as well as the noted physician Jörg Zobel (q.v.) with moral misdemeanors. The latter, when he left the Austerlitz brotherhood, had his song of calumniation printed in 1586. Zobel, the great physician of the brotherhood, who mostly lived in Nikolsburg, had even been called to the imperial court at Prague and been able to heal Rudolf II. Even the abbot of the nearby monastery Klosterbruck, who requested the help of the emperor in his quarrel with the Hutterites (in a private audience), did not allow this to move him to cease addressing Jörg Zobel as "dear friend" and to invite him to a visit, and even to have him called for in a carriage. In 1599 Zobel was called to Emperor Rudolf in Prague a second time, "because of the infection which reigned at that time violently in Bohemia, in the good hope and confidence that he would be able to give counsel for the illness in the emperor's fortress."

The influx to Moravia, especially into the Nikolsburg domain, continued especially in these years. On May 28, 1587, Rudolf Stumpf reported from Zurich to Theodor Beza (q.v.) that now especially many Anabaptists were moving from the canton of Zürich to Moravia, and Erhard estimated the influx out of the "German and Oberland" regions in this year alone at 1,600 persons.

In 1589 there was complaint about a heavy tax imposed by the estates. Adam von Dietrichstein had died on Feb. 5, 1590, and had passed on the inheritance to his three sons, Maximilian, Sigismund (who in spite of his extreme youth became the underchamberlain in 1597), and Franz, who at the age of 29 was made cardinal by Pope Clemens VIII and afterwards, under pressure, became bishop of Olmütz.

On May 12, 1592, Thoman Haan (q.v.), of Nikolsburg, died a martyr's death as a true confessor at Freiburg, Bavaria.

Although in consideration of his clerical office he should not have admitted the heretics, Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein (q.v.) was much more tolerant when he, coming from Rome, assumed the rulership of Nikolsburg in 1599. To be sure, economic reasons determined his position, for he recognized the great advantage accruing to him from this Anabaptist settlement and he knew how to enrich himself, as he demonstrated later as governor of Moravia.

A really hostile attitude of the cardinal did not appear until the Moravian "rebellion" in 1619, in the course of which he, having been sent to Vienna for negotiations, decided with the emperor against the estates who had commissioned him, whereas the Anabaptists, who were most barbarously treated by the imperial troops in southern Moravia, naturally sided with the estates protecting them. In the Nikolsburg domain, however, a difficulty for the Brethren arose from the fact that their baron was opposed to the protectors of the Hutterian Brethren in the country. And since he furthermore was the highest dignitary of the Roman Church, which was considered as idolatry by the Hutterites, their attitude in Nikolsburg was self-evident.

The cardinal, having heard that the Brethren of his domain sided with the rebels, ordered his magistrate to consider their expulsion. The magistrate Johann von Denée, in a letter of August 7, reported the situation to his master, especially of the conduct of the imperial troops against the Brethren in the domain. He reported that the miller Christoph had been killed, and the wounded Duke of Saxony, to whom Denée had offered a room in the castle, had preferred to commit himself to the care of the Hutterite physicians. On August 17 the cardinal wrote to his officer Brus that in case the Hutterites of Nikolsburg, who were guilty of treason, refused to send to him as their lord secret messages, Brus would be permitted to punish them physically himself. On September 5 the official was compelled to report to the bishop that his famous Hutterite doctor Kolert had been killed without any reason by one of the gentlemen quartered in the castle. Dietrichstein, who from Vienna had a view over the whole situation, which was changing day by day, on September 14 again permitted his official Brus to deal with the Brethren as he thought best. Two days later the Czech secretary in Nikolsburg announced the mandates sent from Vienna and complained about the defiant attitude of the Hutterite householder. On September 25 followed the announcement from Nikolsburg to Vienna that several Anabaptist subjects were yielding service to the enemy.

On October 19 the Nikolsburg Bruderhof was "severely plundered, also the sick robbed." Denée on November 13 announced to the cardinal that he had confiscated and taken away from the Bruderhof all the flour and the drugs and that he had expelled the Brethren completely out of the estate and he had let them take along only the simplest kind of equipment. The cardinal's answer from Vienna on November 17 was reproachful; the Anabaptists should not have been allowed to take along any possessions at all.

Meanwhile Puchheim had begun the siege of Nikolsburg, which, after the arrival of reinforcements from Olmütz (Olomouc) including field pieces from Olmütz, was to lead finally to the conquest of the city and even of the castle in the middle of January 1620. Of course both had to be yielded soon again to the imperial troops and so came back into the cardinal's possession. In Nikolsburg the Vorsteher of the entire brotherhood, Rudolf Hirzl, and two brethren lay imprisoned from June 2, 1621, until the cardinal had by treachery gained from him the betrayal of the treasure of the brotherhood in Neumühl (q.v.). The cardinal had been made governor and now fulfilled his threat, that when he returned to Moravia he would not tolerate the Brethren in the country. He sent his officials with soldiers to the Bruderhofs in Nikolsburg, Tracht, and the newly won Niemtschitz, "had all the rooms, chambers, attics, and grain and flour storage places, also the attics and rooms where the people lived, sealed shut so that no one could go to his place any more, and soldiers guarded the houses." After this the imperial orders were read to the assembled Hutterites, denying them protection even in Hungary and Transylvania, and offering them conversion to Catholicism as the only way to save their lives and possessions. Two hundred and thirty persons declared themselves willing to do this, "mostly careless and indifferent people, who had previously been a burden and difficulty to the brotherhood." Most of the Brethren, however, were steadfast. Jakob Braitensteiner, the manager of the Tracht Bruderhof, answered the cardinal "to his face in the presence of many people of the world," that he would not trust his salvation to a faith whose followers "had burned down their houses, cut down their men, and raped their women and daughters." With the cardinal and his followers people of that kind were "good Christians, even if they acted worse than the Turks. But the good, God-fearing people who nourish themselves with the faithful works of their hands and do no man an injury must leave the country."

Most of the Brethren were expelled; they were not allowed to take much with them, especially no tools. "The elders appealed to the cardinal, pointed out the great economic services of the Brethren to the country and the injustice that was being done to them if they took away from them their cattle, their possessions, their tools, their property, without compensation. It was all in vain." Wherever they looked for help in their oppression, they were referred to their enemy, the cardinal, as the only one who had any power.

When the elders once more presented a humble written supplication and asked for pity for their poor brotherhood, the prince of the church replied to them with laughter and mocking words: "You have brought to me only a written supplication from your elders. But I will give you a printed reply," and sent to them the mandate of expulsion which was issued at Brno on Sept. 28, 1622, which was applied so harshly that even the petition they presented to the emperor asking for shelter for the winter or a refuge for their aged sick and weak was rejected.

From almost all the 24 Bruderhofs of the country the Brethren had to leave in October "with empty hands" (see ML II, 715). Nikolsburg had been destroyed before that date; the Brethren from Nikolsburg were then lodging in Schächnitz in Hungary. The patents of April 13, 1623, and of March 1624, in the latter of which the cardinal ordered that the few scattered Brethren who had again been received by a few of the barons, be cut down after two weeks without a trial or hung to the nearest tree, drove most of this scattered people out of the country. The very last Hutterites who had been anxiously and secretly employed by their patrons were finally expelled from Moravia by the mandates of 1628 and 1650, where, however, for a long time not only the buildings but also the beautiful majolica ware of the Brethren served to remind the inhabitants of them. P.De.

J. Loserth, Doktor Balthasar Hubmaier und die Anfänge der Wiedertäufer in Mähren (Brno, 1893); idem, Anabaptismus; idem, Communismus; Lemker, Nachricht von der Unterdrückung der evangelisch-lutherischen Lehre auf der Herrschaft Nikolsburg (Lemgo, 1748); Adauctus Voigt, Leben Franz Fürsten u. Kardinals von Dietrichstein von Fulgentius Schwab (Leipzig, 1792); Falke, Gesch. des fürstlichen Hauses Dietrichstein II; Christoph Erhard, Gründliche kurtz verfaste Historia (Munich, 1589); F. Kl. Schenner, "Quellen zur Gesch. Znaims im Ref.-Zeitalter," in Ztscht des deutschen Vereins für die Geschichte Mährens und Schlesiens VII f. (1903 f.); P. Dedic, "Die kirchlichen und religiösen Verhältnisse in Mähren im Ref.-Jahrhundert" (Dissertation, University of Vienna, 1922); Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Fr. Hruby, New Additions to the History of the Moravian Anabaptists (Czech language) (Prague, 1929); ML III, 256-60.

Nikolsburg, Articles of. The articles of faith drawn up under this title by enemies of the Anabaptists have had disastrous consequences for the Anabaptists. In the trials of the Brethren in the imperial cities in South Germany they played a considerable role. They have been published by Nicoladoni, Cornelius, Jörg, and Schornbaum in the following form:

(1) The Gospel shall not be preached openly in the churches, but only into the ears and secretly in the houses; (2) Christ was born in original sin; (3) Mary is not the mother of God, but only the mother of Christ; (4) Christ is not God, but a prophet, to whom the Word of God was entrusted; (5) Christ has not made "satisfaction" for the sin of the whole world; (6) Among Christians there shall be neither violence nor government; (7) The Last Judgment is due in two years; (8) The angels were conceived with Christ and assumed flesh with Christ.

But the Articles of Nikolsburg were distributed not only in this version. In the state archives of Nürnberg in the Ansbacher Religionsakten there is an undated document that has been printed by Jörg and Cornelius, which also contains eight articles which are expressly called Articles of Nikolsburg. In the archives of the church of St. Thomas in Strasbourg these articles are found with "several additions by Hut" and with the title, "Articles which Anabaptists in Augsburg have confessed, and learned by careful questioning of the tweny-five still imprisoned there" (Cornelius, II, 281). And finally they are found in the Chronicle of Clemens Sender. Later works then cite Sender.

Until a few decades ago historians accepted these articles without question as the work of the Anabaptists themselves. Indeed, this seemed the more probable because the Martyrs' Synod (q.v.), in which Denk and Hut probably participated, was held in Augsburg on Aug. 20, 1527. Cornelius (q.v.) was the first historiographer of recent times to oppose this idea. He thought, as did Loserth (q.v.) and Sachsse (q.v.), that Hubmaier must be rejected as the author. Loserth assumes that the articles were not formulated until the cross-examination of Hut and his brethren in the summer and fall of 1527, in which Urban Rhegius made use of Hut's own booklet and the information from Nikolsburg. That such doctrinal statements were discussed in Nikolsburg is today considered out of the question. Wilhelm Neuser, who discusses these articles at length in his book on Hans Hut (1913), believes that these statements supposedly confessed by Hut were in their essence discussed at Nikolsburg; but this assumption must be rejected.

Again the articles were thoroughly discussed by Erich Meissner in his doctoral dissertation, Die Rechtsprechung über die Wiedertäufer und die antitäuferische Publizistik (University of Göttingen, 1921). Although the author does not yet arrive at a generally satisfactory solution of this problem, we are convinced on the basis of some sources that were unknown to Meissner, that the articles did not originate with the Anabaptists, but were falsely attributed to them by their enemies.

The earliest dated version of these articles is in the state archives in Augsburg. They were discussed in detail in Hut's trial. Hut is said to have confessed to them, as the court record of Nov. 4, 1527, reports. And so it has hitherto been assumed that they reached the public through Anabaptist hands. But Meissner proves that the articles were known to the Augsburg city council before the opening of the inquisitory proceedings against Hut. For there is in the archives of Augsburg another document, not yet published, a questionnaire drawn up for the first trial of Hut on Sept. 16, 1527. Even the very thorough and scholarly Friedrich Roth seems to have overlooked it. This manuscript is undated and is written in an almost illegible hand. It consists of 84 questions that were used for the first day of Hut's trial on September 16. Among them the articles of Nikolsburg are clearly recognizable. But Hut answered these questions definitely and briefly in the negative. And now that Hut's life and work have been made known and the Hutterite Geschicht-Buch is available, it can be positively asserted that Hut did not teach at least the two articles of Nikolsburg, that Christ is not God, and that He did not make satisfactory atonement for the sins of man. For two hymns composed by Hut, the "Communion Hymn" and the second one composed by him as "a prisoner of Christ," very clearly state his belief that Christ is God, and that through His death on the cross we have obtained salvation from the Father.

Concerning his attitude toward government, note Nadler's statement on Feb. 13, 1529, "Neither Hans Hut nor the pastor at Eltersdorf (Wolfgang Vogel), nor any other brother has said anything about revolt and the like," which corresponds with Hut's reply to this question before the court. The Geschicht-Buch confirms this idea: "This is the Hans Hut, who at Nikolsburg could not agree with Balthasar Hubmaier in the matter of the sword" (p. 47). Certainly the Hutterite chronicles would not have said of Hut that he died as a true servant of Jesus Christ if he had harbored such radical ideas as the articles of Nikolsburg attribute to him.

When Hubmaier, especially in his Rechenschaft, repeatedly attacked Hut sharply and charged him with deceptive and revolutionary teaching, he was certainly not thinking of the statements in the articles of Nikolsburg, but of Hut's rejection of the "sword" and of "war taxes."

That the Anabaptist preachers in Nikolsburg discussed the eight articles is impossible. According to the Geschicht-Buch the questions under discussion concerned "whether one should use the sword or not, and whether one should pay taxes for war." But at the same time it is indicated that other "doctrines" were also discussed. This is confirmed by the Anabaptist Hans Nadler of Erlangen, who said they also talked about "seven other decisions," namely baptism, communion, the judgment, the end of the world, the new kingdom in Revelation, and the coming of Christ (Cornelius, 281). But the chief topics of discussion were the sword and the payment of war taxes.

The discussion at Nikolsburg did not concern the Nikolsburg articles, but the "seven decisions," as Nadler confirms. But these originated with Hut, as he himself said in his epistle. Ambrosius Spittelmayer (q.v.) also names these "seven decisions" in his cross-examination (TA, 49 f.); likewise Julius Lober (q.v.). Meissner's surmise is probably correct: "The problem of the Nikolsburg disputation with which the authorship of the Nikolsburg articles is inextricably connected by the report of Hut's trial of November 4, seems to be especially complicated by a persistent confusion. The seven decisions play a part here."

But how did the city council of Augsburg come to connect the Nikolsburg articles, all of which are included in the Augsburg questionnaire, with the Nikolsburg disputation? Meissner suggests, probably correctly, that there was a sort of preliminary sketch, not yet published, upon which the questionnaire was based. On the basis of this sketch Hut was to be questioned about his connections with Hubmaier. That there was only a sketch is clear from the fact that the court record of November 4 contains nearly fifty questions, and the sketch only four: (1) The council believes that many articles have been set up by Hut for the disputation at Nikolsburg; Hut shall show what these articles are; (2) What else he did there; (3) When he stayed there and when he left; (4) In any case the council wants to know what the Anabaptist secrets are and what their articles are.

The admission of the council in point four is worthy of notice. They had in their possession the "Augsburg Interrogatorium," but they saw in it not the "Anabaptist secrets and articles," but merely an interrogatorium. In order to learn something definite about the Nikolsburg disputation they again referred to the questionnaire, which contains a long list of heretical doctrinal statements. Indeed, Hut replied briefly to it in his cross-examination of September 16, and so they hoped certainly to learn more about it.

From the above sketch of the questions for the trial of November 4 it may be safely concluded that the Augsburg council did not take the "Nikolsburg articles" from a dependable Anabaptist source, for the statement that the council wanted especially to learn the Anabaptist secret and articles would be odd if they had been for "two months in possession of fourteen doctrinal statements of dogmatic theological and revolutionary content, whose origin lay in guaranteed Anabaptist circles" (Meissner).

Since there is no Anabaptist source as a preliminary basis we must look through the literature to see whether the Augsburg city council could not have received its information there, and in this review the work of Urban Rhegius, the violent opponent of the Augsburg Anabaptists, comes first to mind. This theologian was one of the skilled polemicists of the time. His argumentation is often artificial and casuistic, but in the capacity to exploit the statements of his opponents in his favor he achieves amazing results (Meissner). This capability of casting scanty material that contains little that shows guilt, into a devastating charge, Rhegius reveals in his first book against the Anabaptists, Wider den neuen tauforden, notwendige Warnung an alle Christgläubigen durch die Diener des Evangelii zu

Augsburg am 6. Tag September anno 1527. Loserth and Meissner also say that it is highly probable that Rhegius influenced the formulation of the articles.

So much at least is certain today, that it is no longer right to seek an Anabaptist origin for the Nikolsburg articles, and equally wrong to claim that they represent Anabaptist doctrines as they were set up for discussion in the disputation of Nikolsburg. W.W.

A. Nicoladoni, Johannes Bünderlin von Linz und die oberösterreichischen Täufergemeinden (Berlin, 1893); C. A. Cornelius, Gesch. des Münsterischen Aufruhrs II (Leipzig, 1860); J. E. Jörg, Deutschland in der Revolutionsperiode von 1522-1526 (Breisach, 1851); TA Bayern II; Wappler, Thüringen; Wiswedel, Bilder I; idem, "Die Nikolsburger Artikel," in Ztscht für bayrische Kirchengeschichte, 1938, 34-36; ML III, 260-62.

Nikoltschitz (Nickelschitz; Czech, Nicolcice), a village in the Zierotin domains in Moravia. Under the protection of Frederick of Zierotin, whom the Brethren called "our Fritz," they founded a Bruderhof here in 1570.

In 1602 this Bruderhof suffered considerably at the hands of the soldiers quartered in the region. On April 6, 1605, six horsemen broke in, stabbed one brother, shot another through the arm. At Christmas the Brethren were attacked while hauling grain to Olmütz, and one of them wantonly killed. In the following years troops on the way to and from Hungary fell upon the Nikoltschitz Bruderhof and others in the neighborhood, requisitioned much, and took away horses. At the beginning of the Thirty Years' War Nikoltschitz endured great suffering. On Sept. 18 and 21, 1619, Dämmerschitz and Nikoltschitz were plundered by Dampierre's army; doors, windows, and chests were broken, and many things taken. On October 18 "poor Nikoltschitz" was plundered for the third time, this time by Hungarian troops. Scarcely had they rebuilt and repaired this damage, when imperial troops broke into the Bruderhof on Jan. 28, 1621, and took leather, salt, lard, wool, and copper kettles. "Thereafter they continued to plunder until nothing was left." All the cattle were driven away from Nikoltschitz. The lists of the 24 Bruderhofs abandoned by compulsion in October 1622 found in the Breslau codex, the codex of Braitmichel in Gran, and codex Dreller in Sobotiste, include Nikoltschitz; this is correct. Most of the manuscripts erroneously name Nikolsburg (q.v.) in its place, but Nikolsburg was destroyed before this date. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Zieglschmid, Chronik; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; ML III, 262 f.) P.De.

Niles United Missionary Church, located just outside the city limits of Niles, Mich., is a member of the Indiana Conference. The meetinghouse was built in 1951. Ministers were Joseph Kimbel in 1951, Russel Miller 1951-53, Delmer Horn 1953-55, and Lloyd Murphy 1955- . The membership in 1956 was 20. D.J.H.

Nimrich, Hemes, an Anabaptist preacher, was taken with several brethren to the gallows at Wittgenstein, Germany, in 1605, severely lashed, and then driven from the city with whips. Nothing more is known of him at present. (Mart. Mir. D 803, E 1103; ML III, 263.)

Ninth Street Mennonite Church (MC), Saginaw, Mich., was begun in 1950 as a mission for the colored people of the city and is still operated under the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, with partial support from the Board, though organized as a congregation. In 1956 the membership was 58, with LeRoy Bechler as pastor. H.S.B.

Nippold, Friedrich (1838-1918), a German Protestant theologian, professor of church history in a number of universities: Heidelberg 1867-71, Bern 1871-84, and Jena 1884-1907, then lived in retirement in Oberursel. He was one of the founders of the Protestant League. In his youth he had become well acquainted with the Mennonites on both sides of the Dutch border. Until his death he was appreciative of and friendly toward the Mennonites. While he was teaching at the University of Jena he gave friendly assistance in the organization of the Vereinigung (q.v.) (a Mennonite conference in Germany), and participated in the examination of the first Mennonite theological students. In his writings he warmly defended the Mennonites. Among his articles and books were: Berner Beiträge zur Geschichte der Schweizerischen Reformationskirchen (1884); a new edition of Hagenbach's Kirchengeschichte (1885-87); Handbuch der neuesten Kirchengeschichte (1880-1906); various articles in the Protestantische Jahr-Bücher (especially 1887). Special mention must be made of his important monograph, "David Joris von Delft. Sein Leben, seine Lehre und seine Sekte," in Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie, 1863, 3-166, and 1864, 483-673.

Nippold was one of the first historians to take a position contrary to traditional biased historiography against the Mennonites. As early as 1861 he published in the Allgemeine kirchliche Zeitschrift (618-28) a treatise, "Die niederländischen Taufgesinnten," in which he demonstrated that the prevailing principle of the brotherhood in the Reformation period as well as later was not the rejection of infant baptism, but the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth, and that in the Netherlands they were "one of the most important ecclesiastical phenomena on Protestant soil." Even though external changes have come about in the process of development, nevertheless "the contrast of the simple Biblical standpoint with symbolic Christianity remains."

In another article in the Protestantisches Monatsblatt (December 1865) Nippold discussed the "Anabaptist Tendencies in Their Significance for Understanding the Period of the Reformation," and in his greatest work, Handbuch der neuesten Kirchengeschichte (third edition, Vol. I, 1889, p. IX f.), in which he traces a parallel between the various churches back to the Reformation, he presents a thorough correction of the customary manner of presenting church history, by showing that the basis is found in the central point of the Gospel, in a sketch of the kingdom of God. "But this very Gospel is buried under all sorts of dogmatic repainting." The need of a thorough correction of the traditional presentation of church history is very clear, and is being more strongly voiced by professional historians year by year, says Nippold. (ML III, 263 f.)

HEGE, NEFF.

Nissley (Nisley, Nissli, Nüssli), a family name found among the Mennonites of the Lancaster Conference (MC) in eastern Pennsylvania and elsewhere, and among the Old Order Amish in the states of the midwest to which they have migrated: Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Kansas. The progenitor of the family was named Jakob Nissley from the Swiss Emmenthal, who died in Lancaster County in 1752. The spelling of his family name seems to have been uncertain. According to tradition it may have been Nutt or Nolt; but more likely it was Nuss or Nüssli. In any case his descendants are almost uniformly known by the name Nissley. Among them may be mentioned three bishops in the Lancaster Conference: Samuel Nissley (1761-1838), who was ordained as preacher in 1790 in the district west and north of Lancaster, and as bishop before 1800; Christian Nissley (1777-1831), who became a preacher in the Mount Joy area in 1812, and bishop in 1820; and Peter R. Nissley (1864-1921), who was ordained as a preacher in the Kraybill congregation in 1904, and bishop in 1911. There were numerous other Nissleys in the ministry in the Lancaster Conference. One of the best known of them was Joseph M. Nissley of Mount Joy, Pa., who served for many years as superintendent of the Altoona (Pa.) Mission, beginning in 1919. The Amish Nissleys may have a different progenitor from the above Jakob. In 1955 there were three Old Order Amish bishops named Nissley, one being Ira Nissley of Kalona, Iowa. J.C.W.

Nitsche, Richard, author of Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in der Schweiz zur Reformationszeit, 107 pages (Einsiedeln and New York 1885), written from the Catholic point of view.

Nitschmann, David (1696-1772), chief bishop of the Moravian Brethren, who was consecrated on March 13, 1735, in Berlin, Germany, in the home of the court chaplain Daniel Ernst Jablonski, undertook many trips to America in the service of the Brethren. In this way he came to Amsterdam, where he became the friend of Johannes Deknatel (q.v.), the pietistic Mennonite preacher. In 1738, while he and Count Zinzendorf were staying in the Rönneburg Castle near Büdingen, Hesse, he wrote a letter to Deknatel dated June 19, 1738. He also wrote a second letter to Deknatel from Pennsylvania, dated Jan. 3, 1741. (Menn. Bl., 1858, 32; ML III, 264.) NEFF.

Nittert Obbesz: see Obbes, Nittert.

Nivenius, Johannes (Johan van Nieuveen), rector of the Old School in Amsterdam, wrote an account of the Anabaptist attack on Amsterdam in 1535 in Latin verse. It appeared in 1552 under the title Tumultus Anabaptistarum in noblissimo totius Hollandiae emporio Amsteldamensi, nuper exorti descriptio. C. G. Plemp (q.v.) published a Dutch translation in 1631 and also an enlarged and revised Latin edition in Antwerp, 1632. (ML III, 264.) vdZ.

Niverville (Man.) Chortitz Mennonite Church is a subsidiary of the Chortitz Mennonite Church (q.v.), which originated in the early days of the settlement of the Mennonites on the East Reserve of Manitoba. The present elder of the total church, P. S. Wiebe, lives in the village of Chortitz. Originally a group worshiped a few miles from Niverville in the Reinland schoolhouse. After World War I a church was built in Niverville, which has recently been replaced by a new building with a seating capacity of 250-300 and a full basement. The church has a young people's program and Sunday-school activities. The local minister is P. F. Wiebe. C.K.

Niverville (Man.) Mennonite Brethren Church, a member of the Manitoba Provincial and the Canadian District conferences, was organized on Oct. 8, 1933, with 69 members. In 1937 a new church building was erected. Three ministers and one deacon have been ordained. The baptized membership in 1955 was 140, with William W. Dyck as the leading minister. H.NE.

Niverville (Man.) Mennonite Church (GCM) originated after World War I, when Mennonites from Russia settled in and around Niverville. In 1955 the congregation had 139 baptized members, with Jacob J. Klassen as leading minister and Wilhelm Buhler as deacon. The meetinghouse is located in the town of Niverville. C.K.

Nizhnaya-Chortitza: see Nieder-Chortitza.

Noah's Ark, a former Mennonite meetinghouse in Amsterdam: see Arke Noachs.

Noë, a Mennonite family of Belgian Brabant, which lived in Antwerp. François Noë and Pereira de Mol were married there and about 1568 fled to Hamburg from Alba's (q.v.) catchpolls. François, the oldest of their children, became a rather wealthy man in Hamburg. Closely connected with the name of his son François Noë II is the first blossoming of the village of Altona and also the formation of a Mennonite congregation in Altona (q.v.). For it was François Noë II to whom Count Ernst von Schauenburg translated into action his proclamation of freedom to practice the crafts. The count assigned to Noë a place near Altona where he could build houses and settle people of all faiths, without the guilds being permitted to object. Under Ernst's successor the boundaries were more sharply defined. By thinking of his brethren in inviting settlers, Noë laid the foundation of the Altona congregation; for freedom of religion went hand-in-hand with freedom of crafts. Services were, of course, held in private. At the same time Noë had become a wealthy landowner, building nine houses in three years, many more than any other "privileged" person.

Little is known of Noë's business. He delivered to the count a sort of plush. The craftsmen he had brought in did not work for him, but only paid him rent, which in Hamburg was more expensive than in Altona. Nor is much known of his life. He died before 1636, for in that year his name in the record is followed by "deceased." None of his descendants showed his skill. They were soon lost to the Mennonite brotherhood.

Joost Noë, also a Mennonite, perhaps a relative of François, who later fled from Antwerp to Franeker in Friesland, was a friend of the martyr Lenaert Plovier (Mart. Mir., where he is erroneously called Nose, D 270, E 641). Other members of the Noë family, of which there are still some Mennonite descendants, are found in the 17th century at Danzig, in West Prussia (Kordt Noweh von Hamburg was a member of the Danzig congregation in 1681), Leeuwarden, and Amsterdam. O.S., vdZ.

Bolton, Historische Kirchennachrichten von Altona I (1790); R. Ehrenberg, "Gewerbefreiheit und Zunftzwang in Ottensen und Altona 1543-1640," in Altona unter Schauenburgischer Herrschaft (1892); R. Dollinger, Gesch. der Menn. in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster, 1930); B. C. Roosen, Gesch. der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona I (Hamburg, 1886) 10 f., 25, 29, 32 f., 36, 44; G. A. Wumkes Stads- en Dorpskroniek van Friesland II (Leeuwarden, 1934) 86, 313, 554; ML III, 264 f.

Noëlle Mazille, an Anabaptist martyr, the wife of Antoine Rogne (Anthonie de Rocke, q.v.), was drowned in a tub at Antwerp in the night of Aug. 20, 1558, because she refused to recant. Her name is found in the hymn "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), No. 16 of the Lietboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. vdZ.

Offer, 565; Mart. Mir. D 202, E 583; Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 447, 464; XIV, 24 f., No. 260; DB 1899, 109; Wolkan, Lieder, 63, 72; ML III, 64.

Nogaies, a nomadic, very warlike branch of the Tartars, who lived on the steppes of South Russia when the Mennonites founded the Molotschna (q.v.) settlement there, and who resented their coming, for they occupied a number of Nogai meadows. The Nogaies in revenge became guilty of theft, and on one occasion murdered four Mennonite men. The government then interfered and compelled the Nogaies to abandon their nomadic life. They later became friends with the Mennonites. In 1860 the tribe emigrated to Turkey. (ML III, 265.) A.B.

Nolan Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located in northeastern Michigan, had its beginning in 1907 when a number of M.B. families settled on land cleared of timber. Abraham Richert of Corn, Okla., organized the church and H. F. Janzen became its leader. Because of economic difficulties the settlers left and the church discontinued in 1919. H.F.W.

Nold, Jacob (1765-1834), the first Mennonite (MC) bishop in Ohio, was born in Milford Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., of parents who came from the Palatinate, Germany, in 1754. He was ordained to the ministry March 30, 1794, and served the Swamp congregation, where he was later ordained a bishop. In 1813 he and Abraham Wismer conducted a tour of preaching appointments in Lancaster County. In the same year he and a few others came to Ohio evidently looking for a location. Four years later, in 1817, he moved to Ohio with his family, locating in Columbiana County just east of Leetonia. He was extremely active and energetic and is said to have been instrumental in effecting the organization of several congregations in Medina, Stark, and Wayne counties, serving these congregations as bishop, going from one to the other on foot or on horseback. Footwashing was optional in the Columbiana-Mahoning congregation in the early years, many being opposed to it. In order to have fellowship with the Wayne-Stark County Mennonites who favored it, Nold introduced footwashing in his home congregations as the result of great effort. This counsel with the Wayne-Stark group in time grew into the Ohio Mennonite Conference. Bishop Nold had a son Jacob Nold (1798-1864), who was the first Mennonite deacon in the Leetonia area, and who had a third edition of Christopher Dock's (q.v.) Schulordnung published at Columbiana, Ohio, in 1861. W.D.S.

Nonconformity. General. Nonconformity has been and still largely is a major doctrine in the faith and life of the Anabaptist-Mennonite brotherhood. It is anchored directly to the Scripture passage (Romans 12:1, 2) in which Paul says: "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God." Other Scripture passages are also used, such as (I John 1:15, 16) "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world"; and (1 Peter 2:11) "Dearly beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul." The German has no exactly corresponding term for nonconformity, although the phrase "Nichtgleichstellung mit der Welt" and its counterpart "Weltförmigkeit" have often been used. "Weltlichkeit" corresponds to the English term "worldliness."

The concept of nonconformity is not unique to Anabaptists or Mennonites, but it has found an unusually intense and detailed application among them, particularly in earlier groups and at certain times in their history, such as 16th-17th century Holland, and 19th-20th century North America, especially among the more conservative bodies. In the course of Christian history all earnest Christian groups who have taken the concept of discipleship seriously and have sought to apply Christian ethical principles vigorously to their everyday life, have had to come to grips with the problem of the relation of the Christian to the world, to society, and to culture. This has been true in the early church, in the monastic solution to the problem of worldliness in the medieval church, in the medieval sects such as the Waldenses, in the Anabaptists of the Reformation period, in the various pietistic movements including the Moravians, and the Wesleyan movement and its modern descendants, etc. The practical answers have not always been the same, but the general principle of nonconformity to the spirit, ideals, and culture of the non-Christian world or a seriously diluted Christian culture, sometimes called sub-Christian, and an attempt to mold life after the image of Christ, has been the same.

The content of the concept of nonconformity as held by Mennonites has been compounded out of a complex of ideas and factors. One of these is the clear Biblical teaching on holiness and purity of life, on obedience to the teaching of Christ and "following after Him," and on taking up the cross, particularly the cross of suffering. The positive and negative aspects, nonconformity to the world and conformity to God's holy nature and will, are commonly teamed together, but at times the negative idea has become dominant, probably in part because of the easy availability of the negative word, and the lack of a corresponding positive word, the nearest being "holiness." However, Mennonites have seldom used the word "holiness" and are reluctant to do so in modern times because of its association with certain types of "holiness" doctrine and piety current in America. Another idea in the complex is that of being "pilgrims and strangers" on the earth, with "no abiding city here" but with a "citizenship in heaven." This involves the relativization of human society and culture and emphasis upon the transcendent value of relationship to God and of the future life with Him in a world to come, and easily turns into an other-worldly emphasis of either indifference to or rejection of many cultural values and expressions. Another idea is that of asceticism, the deliberate denial of certain material and human values for the good of the spiritual life or as an expression of anti-worldliness. Even just the emphasis on high Christian ethical ideals of purity, love, and righteousness, with which contemporary non-Christian or "nominal" Christian ethical ideas and practices stand in contrast, logically merges into a concept of nonconformity, derived from other ideas. Then there is the concept of a people of God, separate from other people and from the world. This is a major idea in the Old Testament, and carries over into the New Testament concept of the kingdom of God and the Church of Christ. (John 10: "I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep." "My sheep hear my voice." Luke 12: "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." John 17: "I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil. They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." II Cor. 6: "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers." "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate." "I will be their God, and they shall be my people." I Peter 2: "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people." "But are now the people of God." Gal. 6: "The Israel of God.")

The persecution and oppression of the Anabaptists and Mennonites by the state and church authorities not only of the Reformation period, but of the following centuries until the 19th century, added intensity and urgency to the idea of nonconformity, but did not create it. Mennonites were not considered citizens in most areas until late in the 18th century and beyond, or were at least treated as a special class of citizens or inhabitants, and given special privileges of exemption from military service and the oath, which set them apart from the ordinary citizen of the country. The often intense and bitter opposition of the state church clergy to all dissenters, whom they called "sects," intensified this feeling of separateness. And the fact that in most areas the church and state were coextensive contributed to an identification by the Mennonites, sometimes too radically, of the state church structure with the world per se. Both state and church shared in the persecution and both tolerated unholy and worldly living, hence the idea of a separation from both merged imperceptibly into the idea of nonconformity. The rise of pietistic influence upon the Mennonites, first in Hamburg and then in the Palatinate in the 18th century, and soon also in West Prussia in certain sections, and the strong influence of the Gemeinschaft movement (q.v.) in South Germany, Alsace, and Switzerland in the late 19th and 20th centuries contributed further to the general idea of nonconformity. However, the very familiarity of Mennonitism with Pietism and the Gemeinschaft movement also contributed to the breakdown and ultimate disappearance of the uniquely Mennonite emphasis on nonresistance, nonparticipation in state affairs, and general withdrawal from public life. Mennonite conformity in these areas now became more a general all-Christian emphasis upon a warm piety and personal holiness. In this process the conscious Mennonite tradition itself was de-emphasized and often discredited and even broken off completely, even to the point of abandoning the name Mennonite because of its connection of nonconformity.

The propagation and maintenance of the idea and practice of nonconformity among Mennonites has been carried largely by three forces—tradition, indoctrination, and discipline. In the close-knit self-conscious congregation or settlement group, with strong solidarity, deeply rooted tradition, and distinct separation from the surrounding culture, it has usually been taken for granted with little written regulation or deliberate group decision. In times of struggle with the forces of accommodation and strong environmental influence, usually more weight has been put upon deliberate teaching and specific regulations adopted by conferences or ministerial leadership. The device of church schools to support nonconformity has also been consciously introduced. All of these methods have operated with varying success and the emphasis has shifted from one type of action to another as deemed necessary.

The problems related to the practice of nonconformity have caused much trouble in Mennonite history and have been major factors in schisms, particularly in Holland and the United States. It is notable that practically never has any significant Mennonite schism occurred over doctrinal questions. It was more often questions of discipline, particularly in relation to nonconformity, that led to breaks in personal and group relations. The Dutch schisms from 1560 to 1700 practically all involved major or minor aspects of nonconformity. In America the labels "progressive" and "conservative" as applied to different orientations in Mennonite groups usually refer to attitudes on nonconformity or separation from the world, although they also at times refer to methods of church work and forms of worship.

The close interrelation of nonconformity and nonresistance should also be noted. History reveals that the maintenance or loss of one involves the other, and that as groups weaken on nonconformity they tend to weaken on nonresistance. While this is not absolutely true and need not be so, it has occurred often enough to give considerable ground for a generalization. The reason is probably not to be found in the logical connection of the two ideas, but rather in the fact that both positions are not popular in Christendom and can only be maintained by vigorous effort and readiness to oppose main elements in Western culture.

The following discussion will deal with the ideal and practice of nonconformity among the Mennonites under the following subdivisions: (1) Netherlands; (2) Europe, aside from the Netherlands; (3) The Mennonite Church (MC), and related groups in North America; (4) the General Conference Mennonite Church in North America; and (5) Other groups in North and South America.

H.S.B.

C. J. Cadoux, The Early Church and the World (New York, 1925); G. J. Heering, The Fall of Christianity (New York, 1943); H. R. Niebuhr, Christ and Culture (New York, 1951); George R. Brunk, Ready Scriptural Reasons (Scottdale, 1926); Daniel Kauffman, Doctrines of the Bible (Scottdale, 1928); Richard R. Caemmerer, The Church in the World (St. Louis, 1949); H. R. Niebuhr, W. Pauck, and F. P. Miller, The Church Against the World (New York, 1935); J. C. Wenger, Separated unto God; a Plea for Christian Simplicity of Life and for a Scriptural Nonconformity to the World (Scottdale, 1951); C. Henry Smith, "Mennonites and Culture," MQR XII (1938) 71-84; Proceedings of the Fourth Mennonite World Conference (Akron, 1950), containing the following papers: "The Divine Imperative of Nonconformity to the World" by Frank and Harry Wenger; "The History of Nonconformity Among Mennonites" by Donovan Smucker; "The Purpose and Power of Nonformity" by Pierre Widmer; and "The Limitations of Nonconformity" by Paul Mininger.

(1) Netherlands. Nonconformity as a practice of difference in dress and of difference in style of living as compared with other Christians and non-Christians is at the present time not found among the Dutch Mennonites. They dress like other people, partake in the cultural life and the common amusements like theater and cinema, and have no objection to smoking or drinking alcoholic beverages; they do not reject voting and by far the majority assume the obligation of serving in the army. In all these matters the church does not give any regulations or prohibitions, leaving to each member individually the decision on his private attitude to life.

This free responsibility of the Dutch Mennonites is largely due to the fact that they, at least since the early 17th century, have not lived in separated and closed groups like the Mennonites of some other countries, but have lived in towns and from early times have been engaged in businesses of various kinds, closely associated with other Christians. Besides this, the fact that they esteemed the government and the country where they were permitted to live quietly may have largely contributed to the loss of nonconformity in the sense of antithesis to the pattern of life of other Christians. In a higher sense the Dutch Mennonite always has been aware of a difference between the "world" and the "kingdom of God," and being convinced in his heart that the "world" is always to be appraised lower than the kingdom of God, he has the responsibility of faith to decide in each case where he is to draw the line between "world" and the kingdom. Thus he has to practice what may be called ethical nonconformity.

For the early Anabaptists and Mennonites in Holland these matters were quite different. They were a plain people, living in a period of persecution; and led by their eschatological views they expected the destruction of this world and the coming of the new aeon in the near future, which drew a sharp line between the church and the world, and between Christian life and worldly life. Though they did not make any special regulations or prohibitions before the resolutions of Wismar in 1554 (found in BRN VII, 52-54, and K. Vos, Menno Simons, 123-27, and Writings, 1041 f.), their attitude toward the world involved a special style of life, and even after the eschatological belief was dropped, they observed a plain style of living, including plain dress, houses, furniture, and food, though they never practiced asceticism, for example never prohibiting the use of beer, then the common beverage. Many from abroad, who visited and studied the Dutch Mennonites, like Benthem (1698) and Rues (1741), were struck by their "humility in dressing" and their "simplicity of life."

But after the congregations became established and organized, a difference appeared between those who wanted to maintain strictly the old plainness, and those who regarded these matters as insignificant and did not want to make any regulations.

One of the sources of the Flemish-Frisian schism in 1566-67 was the feeling of the Mennonites of Friesland that those from Flanders were dressed too worldly. The Flemish immigrants on their part accused the Frisians of paying too much attention to their houses and furniture. In the preface to the martyr's book of 1615 Hans de Ries states that the simplicity of the Mennonites had been changed into pomp and show; possessions having increased while the souls became impoverished, their clothing had become magnificent, but "the inward adornment" had been lost. From then on, the lamentations about luxury and worldliness are numerous. One illustration is Jacob Cornelisz van Dalen (q.v.), a preacher in the Waterlander congregation at Amsterdam, who in 1652 published a collection of sermons along this line under the title Onciersel en cieraet van de godsalige vrouwen (Disfigurement and Adornment of the Godly Women), in which he attacked the inclination to ostentation both in dress and furniture and the custom of pompous weddings, "in which the Mennonites follow outright those who serve the world." Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) of Amsterdam in his sermons often urged the congregation to soberness of clothing and house appointments and repeatedly warned against superabundance in food and drinks. Peter Langendijk (q.v.) in his poem De Zwitsersche Eenvoudigheid (Swiss Simplicity, lamenting the depraved morals of many Dutch Mennonites) of 1713 exaggerates somewhat, but nevertheless it is true, as was also observed by some Prussian immigrants settling in Holland in 1734 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 2041), that many Dutch Mennonites did not differ much from other people as to the style of their living.

Sometimes regulations were drawn up concerning the matter of nonconformity. The Waterlanders in their delegates' meeting at Amsterdam 1647 renewed the resolutions of 1581 to urge the preachers to warn against the loss of nonconformity in matters of dress, meals, homes, and trade (DB 1877, 62-93), and the Frisian Conference of North Holland drew up twelve articles in 1639, enlarged in 1697, which deal with nonconformity in various matters (Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 223-28). These resolutions, however, did not prohibit, but merely gave advice. The Groningen Old Flemish group passed a resolution in their conference at Loppersum in 1659 (Blaupot ten Cate, Friesland, 307 f.), making a number of restrictions and forbidding certain things; these regulations were strictly maintained for about a century, and many were banned for breaking the precepts and inclining to unseemly luxury in dress and furnishings. The extremely conservative groups of Danzig Old Flemish and Jan-Jacobsgezinden, all together called "Fijne Mennisten," may have had regulations of the same kind, watching that the members did not trespass even in small matters like the style of haircutting.

Of such regulations nothing is found either among the Lamists of the 17th and 18th centuries, or among the Zonists. In the matter of refusing to accept office in the government the Zonists were stricter than the Lamists, though some Mennonites of both groups, particularly in the country, served as sheriffs, bailiffs, and in other functions even in the 17th century. In general there was no objection against business and trade, though Mennonites are said to have objected to the reprehensible practices as often found in business. Mennonite merchants and bankers had a reputation of great fairness and honesty. Yet some Mennonites objected to business, particularly for preachers. Binnert Tjallings of Grouw, when he was appointed preacher in 1781, retired from business because it seemed improper to him to be a preacher of the Gospel and at the same time to be involved in worldly matters of business. Klaas Rinses Koopmans had also taken this step when he became a preacher of the Leeuwarden congregation in 1772. "Outside marriage" (marriage with nonmembers of the church) originally was not allowed, as is stated in the Waterlander resolutions of 1568 and held by the Groningen Old Flemish until the 18th century, but among the Waterlanders, "outside marriage" was found as early as about 1620, and a few decades after also in the Lamist and Zonist congregations. Originally the Mennonites, when they had a difference with other members of the congregation, did not take the matter to a secular court. It cannot be stated how long this aversion to litigation lasted among the Dutch Mennonites (in 1613, Mennonites of Amsterdam did not ask the decision of the court), but apparently it soon disappeared, for as early as 1620 there are cases of Mennonites settling their disputes before the secular courts. A privilege granted by Prince William I of Orange in 1577 exempted the Dutch Mennonites from rendering an oath. This privilege is still in force and strictly observed by the Dutch Mennonites.

From the beginning until the end of the 17th century the Mennonites in the Netherlands did not take up military service; during the 18th century this doctrine gradually fell into decline, though there were a number of cases even in the last decades of the 18th century to show that on this point nonconformity had not yet been entirely lost. In the Napoleonic period (about 1810) some Mennonites were forced to serve in the army, but it was not until 1830 (Dutch war with Belgium) that Mennonites became volunteer soldiers. Though until 1898 there was no compulsory military service in the Netherlands, those who had objections having the opportunity of hiring a substitute, from about 1860 on there has been a rather high percentage of Mennonites in the army, especially in the higher ranks.

Surveying the matter of nonconformity as a whole, the Dutch Mennonites, though originally "separate," now do not differ from other Dutchmen. vdZ.

H. W. Meihuizen, "Die Gemeinde in der Welt, aber nicht von der Welt," in Die Gemeinde und ihr Auftrag (Karlsruhe, 1953) 210-18; N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnhem, 1952) 133-56; C. N. Wijbrands, Het Menniste Zusje (repr. 1913); S. Hoekstra, Leer der Oude Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1863); Yearbook Amstelodamum XXV (1928) 71; Irvin Horst, "Simplicity Laments Corrupted Manners," Menn. Life X (July 1955) 129.

(2) Europe, aside from the Netherlands. The Mennonites of Switzerland, South Germany, and France, believing strongly in the spiritual principle of nonconformity, have sought to apply it practically in nonconformity in life and separation from the world. The first three centuries of their history with its severe persecution added to their strong distrust of the "world." In these centuries when they were rejected by society in general, often oppressed and restricted in their manner of life, occupation, and even place of residence by official decrees, and subject to exile, the problem of nonconformity to the world was not a difficult one. They rejected the holding of civil office and all participation in government, as well as all litigation and swearing of oaths. They clung tenaciously to the Biblical doctrine of peace and nonresistance, and therefore rejected all participation in war and military service. They accepted the stigma associated with not practicing infant baptism which was, in the lands where they dwelt, a universally observed rite. They strictly opposed marriage with persons outside the brotherhood. They maintained a general simplicity in costume, home furnishings, and manner of life, although no specific or uniform costume was developed except that the Amish (after 1697) required the beard for men, and the wearing of hooks and eyes instead of buttons by all. Since these Mennonites and Amish were always strongly rural and very conservative in general, there was little direct contact with society and its changing culture, and little tendency to "worldly" fashions and practices. European rural society was itself conservative and slow in changing, and "fashions" as such were considered to be the prerogative of the urban and upper classes, not permitted to peasants and rural people. Thus a good, consistent general position on nonconformity was maintained until into the 19th century.

The 19th century witnessed a gradual transformation of the relationship of these groups to the society and culture round about them. As the old restrictions imposed by law fell away and modern culture began to penetrate the relatively isolated rural Mennonite groups, the Mennonites began to participate in the general culture and gradually lost their sense of distinctiveness and with it the desire to be different from the surrounding culture. This occurred most rapidly in the North German urban Mennonitism (Hamburg, Emden, Crefeld, Danzig), then in the Palatinate, and last of all in the rest of South Germany, Alsace-Lorraine, and Switzerland. The threat to nonresistance and nonconformity under the Napoleonic regime led to the calling of two special conferences of the Palatine congregations at Ibersheim in 1803 and 1805, where resolutions were passed reaffirming the historic Mennonite position on these two principles, with specific prohibition of military service and office holding. But this did not prevent the gradual loss of both positions. By the beginning of the 20th century the distinctive Mennonite position on nonconformity had disappeared practically everywhere, and office holding and military service were tolerated, even though not universally accepted. No distinctive practices in costume were maintained except the resistance to the cutting of women's hair in the second quarter of the 20th century. The prayer veiling gradually disappeared. Only the nonswearing of oaths remained as a remnant of distinctiveness everywhere. In Switzerland resistance to noncombatant military service has remained relatively strong, though not universal, down to the present day. In general in France and Switzerland, also in the Verband (q.v.) in South Germany, a certain spirit of simplicity and opposition to the crasser forms of worldliness has persisted, such as card playing, dancing, theater attendance, and the use of cosmetics. For Germany as a whole the verdict of Ernst Crous (article Germany, ME II, 490) may well stand, "Thus the world overcame nonconformity"; but this is not quite true for the Verband congregations in the South, where both the ideal and practice of nonconformity are still held to a certain extent.

However, this loss of outward nonconformity did not come without a struggle in some areas. Evidence of this is to be found in the content of the Gemeindeblatt der Mennoniten, founded in 1870 as the organ of the Verband. From its beginning there was in its columns a vigorous effort to maintain the sense of separation and holiness which had for centuries characterized the Mennonites. Ulrich Hege of Reihen, the first editor, wrote many articles on church discipline, on opposing marriages outside the church, etc. He published various excerpts from Anabaptist writings, including Menno Simons and the Martyr's Mirror, on such topics as baptism and communion. A sample article on the subject of nonconformity was (July 1887) "Gleichförmigkeit mit der Welt," in which the writer points out that Christians are forbidden to love the world, and the Apostle Paul calls for not being conformed to the world; but that there are, alas, many lukewarm Christians in contemporary Christendom. The writer admits, of course, that there are no detailed applications of the principle in Scripture, but finds that the general principle is quite clear. Since Christians cannot be conformed to the world, he argues, there is no other possible view for a believer to take than that of nonconformity; God's Word demands it, and Scripture must be obeyed.

In the West Prussian Mennonite rural group around Danzig and Elbing, and along the lower Vistula and the Vistula delta, the development was very similar to that in the South German, French, and Swiss Mennonites, with the exception that some dancing and patronage of local inns (Wirtshäuser) was tolerated in the 20th century.

In the urban Mennonite congregations in Germany, such as Emden, Crefeld, Hamburg-Altona, Danzig, Elbing, and Königsberg, the accommodation to the world, the acceptance of office holding and military service, and the dropping of any outward expression of nonconformity to the world came much earlier, and paralleled more nearly the history in Holland, with which there were close connections. This was due probably as much to the greater wealth of the families as to the influence of the urban environment.

In Russia the ideal and practice of nonconformity was made both more easy and more difficult by the pattern of settlement in the closed colonies, founded from 1789 on, and the grant of cultural autonomy to Mennonites by the Russian state, including special recognition of the Mennonite principle of nonresistance. The level of ethical and cultural life of the Mennonites was on the whole so much higher than the surrounding Russian culture and morals that there was little pull away from Mennonitism toward accommodation to the surrounding world. The principle of nonresistance was never exposed to real danger by any acculturation process, and when the government threatened to withdraw exemption from military service the threat of emigration caused a restoration of the privilege. Since the Mennonites who came to Russia from West Prussia had no particular form of costume or similar outward regulations, although in general simplicity of dress and manner of life, sobriety of deportment, and high standards of business dealings prevailed, costume never became a serious issue in Russia, particularly since the rural Mennonite settlements were far removed from the influences of urban culture and fashion. However, the prevalent complete separation from the Russian society made a practical identification of Mennonite Church and Mennonite community almost inevitable, and the retention of unbaptized persons and of spiritually indifferent baptized persons in the general complex of Mennonitism tended to obscure clear-cut ethical and behavior lines and to confuse thinking on the church and the world. The reaction of the Kleine Gemeinde (1812) in the Molotschna, and the Mennonite Brethren movement (1860) in the Molotschna and Chortitza settlements, was by the clear testimony of its leaders directed largely against the dilution of spiritual and ethical standards and performance in the Mennonite settlements and the encroachment of "worldliness," with which, in their mind, the established church leadership seemed either unable or unwilling to cope. Hence these two groups, as well as all the other schismatic groups in Russia (K.M.B., Peters group, etc.), taught and disciplined vigorously on matters of nonconformity and worldliness, and succeeded in promoting a relative elevation of general patterns of living both in their own groups and in the general Mennonite society. They were strong against the moral looseness which had developed in the toleration of drinking in the inns, for instance, and related undesirable practices. However, although these new Mennonite groups emphasized general strictness of discipline and simplicity of dress and manners, they did not develop uniform costume patterns. The Kleine Gemeinde, however, was inclined to a considerable degree of legalism and formalism along with its spiritual strength (Friesen, Brüderschaft).

The attitude toward alcohol and tobacco among Mennonites in general deserves a special note. It is only in the late 19th and the early 20th century that prohibition of drinking and smoking (see Alcohol and Tobacco) became a fixed part of Mennonite nonconformity either in Europe or America. Where it has done so, it has come in from outside influences, such as the temperance movement. It is interesting to note that in the most radically culturally nonconformed American group, the Old Order Amish, there is still no general prohibition of drinking and smoking. The same has been true of smoking in the conservative nonconformed groups in Eastern Pennsylvania, including the Franconia and Lancaster conferences, where dress nonconformity has been strictly maintained, but where smoking has only recently been disappearing. H.S.B.

Ernst Crous, "Mennonites in Germany Since the Thirty Years' War," MQR XXV (1951) 235-62; idem, "Wie die Mennoniten in die deutsche Volksgemeinschaft hineinwuchsen," Gesch.-Bl. 1939, 13-24.

(3) Mennonite Church (MC) and Related Groups in North America. American Mennonites in the 20th century are divided into several distinct groups, some of which differ rather sharply from other groups in the matter of nonconformity. The stricter groups, such as the Old Order Amish, Old Order Mennonites, and Old Colony, almost identify certain items of 18th- or 19th-century culture with the will of God, while the culturally more liberal groups have but little sense of difference from the world and its culture except on nonresistance, the rejection of the oath, and secret societies. A middle position is taken by the largest group of American Mennonites, the Mennonite Church (MC). A typical member of this body would, ideally at least, hold that nonconformity applies to every area of life. In business it means the avoidance of the "unequal yoke" with unbelievers, i.e., not entering into business partnership with non-Christians, maintenance of strict standards of honesty and integrity, a willingness to remain content with a smaller business in order to have much time and energy left for the life and service of the church, and the rejection of litigation to collect debts. In relation to the state he would not hold any office which would violate the principle of nonresistance, such as an executive, legislative, or judicial position, or serving as sheriff, constable, etc., and for some it means not even voting for any political office, although serving on a local school board might be allowed. As to costume, the fashions of the world are rejected (although the general conventions of contemporary culture are followed), no jewelry is worn, and in certain large parts of the church at least a considerable portion of the members still maintain a "plain" garb which differs from the common dress, more particularly for women, but also for men, especially at church services. The mustache is avoided because it originally had a military association. The Old Order Amish and the Church of God in Christ Mennonites require the beard. The oath is rejected absolutely, and instead a simple affirmation is used for legal documents and in court. In general demeanor one seeks to be restrained and quiet, rather than loud, talkative, or boastful. In recreation various activities are forbidden, such as card playing, theater attendance, commercial motion pictures, pool-playing and dancing. Membership in secret societies is rejected because of the oath, hierarchical titles, religious relativism, and the secrecy practiced. Marriages with "outsiders," i.e., non-Christians or non-Mennonites is almost unknown; it was formerly forbidden completely though now more often than not tolerated, except in the most conservative groups. Meetinghouses are simple and functional, and in no case carry steeples or bells. Musical instruments are not used in worship. Women members wear a veil on their heads during worship in obedience to I Corinthians 11. Both a highly liturgical service and a noisy type of religious enthusiasm are rejected for a more sober and quiet form of piety and worship. In economics there is a strong emphasis on mutual and brotherly aid and stewardship rather than on individualism which puts an undue emphasis on self-seeking and wealth-seeking, although materialism is a constant temptation. In earlier times even taking interest from a brother was not permitted; in the 20th century this has been reduced to limiting the rate of interest to what is considered reasonable. There are, however, still Mennonites who do not charge interest on money loaned to a needy person.

The standard of nonconformity upheld by the church has been high, but the level of performance has sometimes sagged. Sometimes also what was intended to be only a consistent Biblical emphasis on nonconformity has tended to become the freezing of neutral social conventions of the past which are without any direct moral or spiritual significance or value in life or witness. Nonconformity has also at times been confused with a rejection of modern inventions, or identified with a rejection of the fine arts or the maintenance of the German language. This has been particularly true with the Old Order Amish, Old Order Mennonites, and Old Colony Mennonites, who have variously rejected the automobile, telephone, electricity, carpets, curtains, pictures, etc., and maintained certain German dialects, such as Pennsylvania German and Plattdeutsch.

Some groups and sections have identified ruralism with nonconformity, forbidding living in town or working in industry or business, and restricting occupations to farming and farm-related work. This has often meant a retreat into a pattern of rural sociological group life and withdrawal, with a consequent denial of evangelistic responsibility or witness, and even complacency about the group's spiritual life. Again, nonconformity patterns have sometimes been advocated on the grounds of "distinctiveness," that is, using outward marks of separation as devices to aid in the maintenance of spiritual nonconformity and to resist the process of acculturation, and to help ward off temptation to ungodliness. There has been some confusion between the concepts of nonconformity and separation, and between principles and applications. There has been a confused identification of "worldliness" with mere variation in cultural convention from age to age and place to place. There has also been considerable difference as to the degree of severity of discipline to be used to maintain nonconformity. Some have confused nonconformity with uniformity, or have felt that uniformity —e.g., in costume—is necessary to maintain nonconformity. Problems have also arisen when foreign mission work has been undertaken in lands with their own cultural conventions which are quite different from those of North America or the North American mother churches. Confused attempts have been made to impose the particular external nonconformity practices—e.g., in costume—of the sending group upon the newer indigenous churches, with attendant tensions and problems.

The struggle to maintain true Scriptural nonconformity continues to be a major problem for the Mennonite Church (MC). With the acceleration of cultural change in American life and the pervasiveness of modern American urban cultural influences through almost universal advertising, periodical reading, radio, and television, even the most withdrawn groups are subjected to pressures to surrender principles, not to speak of the more open groups. Universal compulsory education up to and including high school with the accompanying generally lower ethical standards often constitutes a severe test. Consequently increasingly recourse is being taken to church high schools and elementary schools, some sixty of the latter and ten of the former having been established in recent years. Attempts have been made to forbid radio and television in the homes, often largely because of the concern to keep out influences militating against standards of nonconformity.

As the former barriers to intercourse with the larger society and general culture fall, such as language, rural remoteness, or costume, the more open groups discover it increasingly difficult to maintain a clear and strong position on nonconformity. The moving line of demarcation between the church and the world is increasingly hard to define; sincere and honest people differ on where to establish it. The result is a certain amount of internal tension, which at times has resulted in local schisms and some estrangement between areas and groups or between the generations. The problem of unity becomes intensified, and the threat of undue diversion from more urgent spiritual tasks to struggles over the definition of the nonconformity frontier and the details of application becomes very real. Considerable numbers of members in certain areas become alienated by the atmosphere of what seems to them legalism and formalism and arbitrary action of church leaders and leave the church. On the other hand, bishops and pastors, alarmed by trends which they find difficult to comprehend or halt and fearful for the loss of real nonconformity and spiritual decline, are tempted to reach for increasingly repressive and authoritarian measures to meet the need. That in the face of all this the Mennonite Church (MC) has maintained unity and solidarity together with substantial spiritual and practical nonconformity and an increasingly strong evangelistic and mission outreach as well as a large general service program, and also largely retained its youth, is an indication of the vitality both of the spiritual heritage and the spiritual forces at present at work in the group.

The tensions within the Old Order Amish group in recent years over the degree of nonconformity and separation from the world, as well as over other questions, have become so serious as to result in repeated local schisms and the formation of new groups, such as the Beachy Amish. There has also been a constant and significant loss of members to the Conservative Mennonite Church and the Mennonite Church (MC). (See also Dress.)

J.C.W., H.S.B.

Biblical and Practical Nonconformity (published by the Bible School Board of the Lancaster Conference, Lancaster, 1950); Declaration of Commitment in Respect to Christian Separation and Nonconformity to the World (A statement of position adopted by the Mennonite General Conference, MC, Scottdale, 1955); General Problems Committee, A Book of Standards (Scottdale, 1940); Bible Teaching on Nonconformity (Scottdale, 1940); David Sherk, Nonconformity to the World (Elkhart, 1882); J. C. Wenger, Historical and Biblical Position of the Mennonite Church on Attire (Scottdale, 1944); Proceedings of the Fourth Mennonite World Conference (Akron, 1948) contains the following papers: Frank and Harry Wenger, "The Divine Imperative of Nonconformity"; Don. E. Smucker, "The History of Nonconformity Among the Mennonites"; Pierre Widmer, "The Purpose and Power of Nonconformity"; Paul Mininger, "The Limitations of Nonconformity."

(4) The General Conference Mennonite Church, organized in 1860, though now composed of groups with different cultural and ethnic backgrounds, had its original nucleus in a Pennsylvania-German group of Mennonites who seceded in 1847 from the Franconia Conference of the Mennonite Church (MC) in Eastern Pennsylvania. The secession was in large part a reaction against an overemphasis on literalistic adherence to nonconformity as expressed in traditional forms of dress and personal and social conduct. The new conference assumed that the changes it advocated could be made without sacrifice of the New Testament principle of separation from the world. It argued that adherence to traditional church regulations was not necessarily practicing the principle of apostolic nonconformity to the world; nor that departure from these traditions was necessarily violating Christian principles of separation from the world as taught in Rom. 12:1, 2. In brief, it claimed that many of the old forms were outmoded and actually hindered the most effective kind of Christian witnessing.

The coming of the large number of Mennonite immigrants from Switzerland in the middle of the 19th century to Ohio and Indiana, and toward the end of that same century of immigrants from Russia, Prussia, and Poland to Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota, and Minnesota, strengthened the General Conference membership, giving new life, more spiritual strength and vigor, and more advance in the major concerns of the Conference such as the development of Sunday schools, higher education, missions, trained ministers, congregational church government, and a greater degree of individual freedom of choice in such matters as dress and social conduct.

In principle the General Conference Mennonites have always stressed nonconformity to the world. In practice, however, there has been wide variation in interpreting this principle. Since the Conference, in the United States at least, has no centralized ruling system, and since each congregation is its own authority in matters of faith and conduct, and because of a heterogeneous background, time has tended to accent rather than minimize differences in observance of separation from the world. In many instances local congregations leave matters, except in extreme cases, almost totally up to the individual believer.

In the most recent revised General Conference constitution, the part dealing with "The Basic Faith" says with regard to the separated life: " . . . membership in oath-bound secret societies, military organizations, or other groups which tend to compromise the loyalty of the Christian to the Lord and to his church is contrary to such apostolic admonitions: 'Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers' (II Cor. 6:14-15), and that the Church should be 'holy and without blemish' (Eph. 5:27)." In addition to these and several other references the "Statement of Doctrine" of the Cornelis Ris Articles of Faith is approved as authoritative conference practice.

The fact that there is no uniform pattern of nonconformity in General Conference Mennonite churches does not imply that there is no effort on the part of individual congregations to exercise control over members in an effort to secure genuinely devout forms of behavior. Most congregations have exercised discipline on members whose conduct deviated too far from defined norms. The areas in which discipline has been most frequently exercised are in matters of military service, secret societies, and moral matters such as fornication, adultery, and remarriage of divorced individuals. Such practices as the use of tobacco and alcoholic beverages are generally discouraged but are not forbidden. Matters relating to attendance at theaters, motion pictures, and professional sports, or the use of radios, television, and other modern conveniences are handled variously from congregation to congregation. In few, if any, congregations is a member suspended or expelled for purchasing these items or engaging in any of these activities.

There is general recognition of the need for stronger emphasis on the separated life for modern Christians within the General Conference Mennonite congregations. This was evidenced by the calling of a special conference on "The Believers' Church" in 1955, and by the appointment of the Study Committee for matters pertaining to church discipline. Efforts are being made to solicit full general approval toward developing a consecrated type of Christian living and establishing a "pure" church. Close cooperation with other Mennonite bodies in fields of peace, voluntary service, relief, education, hospital service, and mutual aid has greatly strengthened the concerns for Christian nonconformity in the General Conference. J.W.F.

(5) Other Groups in North and South America. The strictest and most intense application of nonconformity in North and South America, aside from the Old Order Amish, has been practiced by the Old Colony Mennonites in Manitoba, Mexico, and Paraguay. This has included not only nonresistance affairs, and rejection of many modern inventions, and nonparticipation in civic and governmental but also rigid maintenance of the German (and Low German) language, certain regulations in costume, and strong traditions regarding house building, home furnishings, village layout, etc. In all this they have become stricter and more nonconformed than they had been in Russia and at first in Manitoba. As in the case of the Amish some more progressive elements (e.g., the Rudnerweide group) have broken away from the strict traditions of the Old Colony and are accommodating themselves increasingly to the surrounding culture. The Hutterites in North America have also been very strict in nonconformity.

The Church of God in Christ Mennonite and the Kleine Gemeinde have maintained a relatively strict application of nonconformity, though without much distinctive costume. The latter group, now called Evangelical Mennonites, are increasingly open to change and are beginning to accommodate themselves culturally.

The M.B., K.M.B., E.M.B., and Evangelical Mennonites, while maintaining ideally a strong position on nonconformity, have modified their practical application of nonconformity in recent decades. None of these groups, except the K.M.B., has ever had distinctive costume requirements, but all have emphasized simplicity, nonparticipation in worldly amusements, and an unworldly spirit. They have in general accommodated themselves more readily to cultural change than the more conservative groups. The K.M.B. group in its earlier days in Kansas had certain strict costume regulations (see Krimmer Mennonite Brethren). On the whole this group of conferences has maintained a generally stricter position on drinking, smoking, worldly amusements, and the use of cosmetics than the more liberal Mennonites of North America; but in general in outward expression of nonconformity, in business practices, in nonresistance, and litigation there has been less difference. H.S.B.

Nonnenberg, Gotthard von: see Gotthard of Nonnenberg.

Nonresistance is the term which in Anabaptist-Mennonite history has come to denote the faith and life of those who believe that the will of God requires the renunciation of warfare and other compulsive means for the furtherance of personal or social ends. The term itself is derived from the words of Jesus, "Do not resist one who is evil" (Matt. 5:39). The term pacifism (q.v.) is likewise derived from the words of Jesus, "Blessed are the peacemakers" (Matt. 5:9); hence true Christian pacifism may be thought of as synonymous with Christian nonresistance. Certain forms of pacifism or nonviolence (q.v.), however, being based more upon humanitarian, philosophical, or political considerations than upon New Testament ethics, are not to be confused with nonresistance as here defined. Nonresistance was held by Anabaptists universally from the beginning, except for the revolutionary fringe in Münster and related elements (1534-40), and for the short-lived Hubmaier group in Moravia (1526-28). It was characteristic of all Mennonite groups in Europe until into the 19th century, and has been universally held by all American Mennonites until the present day. In Russia it was held by all groups until World War II.

Christian nonresistance is more than conscientious objection (q.v.) and more than refusal to engage in military service (q.v.) or to participate in war (q.v.). The doctrine of nonresistance is founded on the way of love and the cross as portrayed in the New Testament. Jesus Christ, "when he was reviled, did not revile in return, when he suffered he did not threaten," and in doing so gave His disciples an example that they should follow in His steps, having died that men should live unto righteousness in this present world. As God through Christ reconciled men unto Himself He in turn gave unto them the ministry of reconciliation, God making His appeal of love through the Christian disciple who does not repay evil for evil, who does not avenge himself, who loves his enemies and prays for those who persecute him. This is the way of love and the cross as lived by Christ, which culminated in His death on the cross of Calvary. The doctrine of nonresistance holds that the Christian disciple must enter into this same experience with Christ, being crucified with Him, following His steps, forgiving even as He forgave. During World War I a Mennonite minister counseling his brethren as to their manner of life for that time said: "We cannot take the place of Christ in the work of redemption, but we can take our place as His followers and share in the love which prompted Him to lay down His life for His enemies." (This and the quotations on the following page are taken from the author's War, Peace, and Nonresistance.)

The doctrine of nonresistance has implications for every phase of the Christian's life, first of all in personal relations. The Christian brotherhood is a community of forgiven sinners whose attitude toward one another is that of unbounded forgiveness, unto "seventy times seven." Its members do not seek the highest position; they live in humble subjection one to another out of reverence for Christ who in washing the disciples' feet is their great example in humble, loving service. In the wider social relationships the emphasis is on doing justice, loving mercy, and walking humbly before one's God. Doing that which is just to others takes precedence over seeking justice for one's self or for one's group. Instead of going to law for the settlement of differences the Christian would rather suffer himself to be defrauded. In economic relationships the Christian community does not think in terms of buyer and seller or of management and labor, each seeking his own good; it thinks of itself as a brotherhood whose members are laborers together with God, in honor preferring one another.

This way of love and nonresistance characterized the Anabaptists from the beginning. Walter Rauschenbusch says, "Their communities were prophetic. . . . They stood against war, against capital punishment, against slavery, and against coercion in matters of religion before others thought of it." Sixteenth-century Catholic opponents said they found among them "no lying, deception, swearing, strife, harsh language . . . , but . . . humility, patience, uprightness, meekness, honesty, temperance, and straightforwardness. . . . They call each other brethren and sisters, . . . they use no weapons of defense. . . . They do not go to law before judicial courts."

Menno Simons said: "The regenerated do not go to war, nor engage in strife. They are the children of peace who have beaten their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruninghooks, and know of no war. . . . Since we are to be conformed to the image of Christ, how can we then fight our enemies with the sword? . . . Spears and swords of iron we leave to those who, alas, consider human blood and swine's blood of well-nigh equal value." Conrad Grebel, the first leader of the Swiss Brethren, said: "True, believing Christians are as sheep in the midst of wolves. . . . They . . . must reach the fatherland of eternal rest, not by overcoming bodily enemies with the sword, but by overcoming spiritual foes. They neither use the worldly sword nor engage in war, since among them taking human life has ceased entirely, for we are no longer under the old covenant."

The Anabaptists recognized the state (q.v.) as ordained of God for the maintenance of order by means of the sword in the sub-Christian society of this world. They did not believe, however, that the disciple of Christ was called to perform this coercive function. The (Swiss Brethren) Schleitheim Confession of Faith, adopted in 1527, says: "The sword is ordained of God outside the perfection of Christ." The (Dutch Mennonite) Dordrecht Confession of 1632 says: "We believe and confess that the Lord Jesus has forbidden His disciples and followers all revenge and resistance, and has thereby commanded them not to 'return evil for evil, nor railing for railing'; but to 'put the sword into the sheath.' . . . Also, if necessity should require it, to flee, for the Lord's sake, from one city or country to another, and suffer the 'spoiling of our goods,' rather than give occasion of offense to anyone; and if we are struck on our 'right cheek, rather to turn the other also,' than revenge ourselves, or return the blow. . . . And we are, besides this, also to pray for our enemies, comfort and feed them, when they are hungry or thirsty, and thus by well doing convince them and overcome the evil with good."

The old Anabaptist hymnal, the Ausbund (q.v.), the Offer des Heeren, with the Lietboecxken of 1562, the oldest documents about the Dutch martyrs, and T. J. van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (q.v.), first published in 1660, are filled with accounts of the Anabaptists who suffered for their nonresistant faith. In the 18th century the Mennonites of Pennsylvania published new editions of these works with the avowed purpose of encouraging steadfastness and strengthening the faith of the brethren, "as the flames of war appear to mount higher." Since "no man can tell whether the cross and persecution of the defenseless Christians will not soon come, . . . it is therefore of importance to prepare ourselves for such circumstances with patience and resignation, and to use all possible means that can encourage steadfastness and strengthen faith."

In 1775 during the American Revolution, following an appeal by the Pennsylvania Assembly to assist the country and its people in such manner as is consistent with their nonresistant faith, the Pennsylvania Mennonites and Dunkers in a joint petition thanked the Assembly for its advice and its liberality in granting freedom of conscience. The petition said the Mennonites and Dunkers were ready at all times to help those in need and distress, "it being our principle to feed the hungry and to give the thirsty drink; we have dedicated ourselves to serve all men in everything that can be helpful to the preservation of men's lives, but we find no freedom in giving, or doing, or assisting in anything by which men's lives are destroyed or hurt." On various occasions in the following 175 years similar sentiments were addressed to the American and Canadian governments by the American Mennonites, as in 1915, 1917, 1919, and other times.

In 1937 the Mennonite Church (MC) at its biennial conference adopted a statement of position on Peace, War, and Military Service, saying: "We are constrained as followers of Christ to abstain from all forms of military service and . . . support of war," from service in civil organizations allied with the military, from "the financing of war operations . . . through voluntary contributions," from participation in the manufacture of munitions and from making financial profit out of war. This statement also expressed a willingness "at all times to aid in the relief of those who are in need, distress or suffering, regardless of the danger in which we may be placed in bringing such relief, or of the cost which may be involved in the same. If our country becomes involved in war, we shall endeavor to continue to live a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty; avoiding joining in the wartime hysteria of hatred, revenge, and retaliation; manifest a meek and submissive spirit, being obedient unto the laws and regulations of the government in all things, except in such cases where obedience to the government would cause us to violate the teachings of Scriptures so that we could not maintain a clear conscience before God."

Four years later the same group issued a declaration of the principle of nonresistance as applied to industrial relations: "We believe that industrial strife, unfair and unjust practices by employers or employees, and every economic and social condition and practice which makes for suffering or ill will among men is altogether contrary to the teaching and spirit of Christ and the Gospel."

In 1941 the General Conference Mennonite Church (GCM) at its triennial meeting adopted a similar statement on nonresistance in which it said: "We believe that war is altogether contrary to the teaching and spirit of Christ and the Gospel; that therefore war is sin, as is all manner of carnal strife; that it is wrong in spirit and method as well as in purpose, and destructive in its results. Therefore, if we profess the principle of peace and nevertheless engage in warfare and strife, we as Christians become guilty of sin and fall under the condemnation of Christ the righteous judge." (Minutes and Reports of the 29th Session of the General Conference of the Mennonite Church of N.A., 1941, p. 164.)

As a positive expression of nonresistance in the form of Christian love and service, and as an alternative to military service, the G.C.M. statement says: "We . . . express our willingness . . . at all times to aid in the relief of those who are in need, distress or suffering, regardless of the danger in which we may be placed in bringing such relief, or of the cost which may be involved in the same. We are also willing to render such services as housing, road making, farming, forestry, hospitalization, and recreational work during time of war. Wherever we render such service it shall always be our purpose to spread the Gospel of Christ by word as well as deed."

In 1954 the Mennonite Brethren Church at its General Conference session also adopted a statement in which it said: "The Mennonite Brethren Church believes in nonresistance because: (1) Nonresistance is a Biblical principle clearly exemplified by Jesus Christ. (2) The Church as the body of Christ is a fellowship of the redeemed, therefore: The members are a separated people. John 17:16. They accept Christ as their pattern. I John 2:6. Their lives are controlled by redemptive love. Rom. 5:5. Since the responsibility of the Church is to represent Christ, its Head, and to evangelize the world, participation in any form of war becomes impossible for its members. (3) The practice of the redeemed in Christ demands that every phase of their life in all relationships, such as personal, social, national, and international, be governed by the supreme law of love, and is not limited to an abstinence from military service. It is a general attitude of the Christian as he seeks the redemption of his fellow men. (4) Human life is sacred unto God, and a Christian has no right to destroy life. (5) War is evil, brutal, and inhuman. It glorifies might, greed, and selfishness. The nature of war remains incompatible with the new nature of a regenerated Christian." (Year Book of the 46th General Conference of the M.B. Church, 1954, p. 121.)

In Europe, following a long period of persecution for their nonresistant faith, the Mennonites experienced first a period of toleration and then in course of time a gradual loss of the principle for which the fathers had died. In Holland the latter tendency was first manifested as early as the late 17th century. This tendency in the first instance may have been caused in part by the influence of Calvinism, which was very great from the 17th century on, not only on the more liberal Lamists (who, for example, took over the Calvinist liturgy, pulpit, and organ), but also on the stricter Zonists, and in part by the worldliness and economic prosperity. Although a number of Dutch Mennonites performed military service during the Napoleonic wars (1796-1815) most of the leaders of the church were opposed to voluntary service in the army as late as 1850. At that time it was still possible to secure exemption from service by hiring a substitute. When the new law requiring military service was passed by the Dutch parliament in 1898, however, without any exceptions or special privileges for Mennonites, even the leaders of the church failed to offer any objections. By the first quarter of the 20th century individual Dutch Mennonites were holding important political positions, a Mennonite deacon even serving as Minister of the Navy, and during the time of World War I there was only one known conscientious objector among the Mennonites called up for military service in Holland. By this time the Dutch Mennonites as a whole were persuaded that the nonresistant position was no longer valid, although as late as 1890 such an important leader as Tjepke Kielstra took his stand firmly for New Testament nonresistance.

In Switzerland the Mennonites suffered persecution for nearly three centuries, and were not granted complete religious toleration until 1815. Most of those who had not been put to death were driven out, eventually finding homes in Alsace, in the Palatinate, and many in America. As a result of the persecutions the few Mennonites who remained in Switzerland developed a spirit of self-depreciation and when that country adopted universal conscription in the mid-19th century those who did not emigrate to escape conscription accepted noncombatant service, which was their privilege, although by the mid-20th century about 15 per cent took full service. Officially, however, the Swiss Conference maintained the nonresistant position.

Following the Napoleonic wars, conscription for military service became the universal practice on the continent of Europe. In Germany as elsewhere when this occurred those Mennonites who took their nonresistance most seriously migrated to new homes where their faith and their way of life would be respected. In the 1780's the Mennonites of West Prussia were required to give financial support to the military academy at Culm. They also suffered other forms of oppression, such as restrictions in land ownership. As a result of this situation large numbers of the Mennonites moved to Russia in 1788-1820, where they were exempt from military service.

No doubt the Mennonites of West Prussia who migrated to Russia were those who took their nonresistance most seriously. Nevertheless, those who remained in West Prussia and the Vistula delta did not give up their position without a struggle. During the Napoleonic wars, for example, when one of the members of the Elbing congregation volunteered for service and fought at Waterloo, he was excommunicated. Following the enactment of the Prussian universal military training law in 1814 the Mennonites appealed for exemption, which was granted, but only on condition that they pay a heavy tax in addition to that paid for the support of the military academy. In the Revolution of 1848, when the Frankfurt Assembly drew up a constitution for the proposed new German confederation, a non-Mennonite delegate from Danzig suggested a provision for the exemption of Mennonites from military service. Astonishing as it may seem, however, a Mennonite delegate from Crefeld, in northwestern Germany, opposed the suggestion, with the result that it was turned down. Since the proposed German confederation did not materialize, the new constitution never went into effect. From what happened at the Assembly, however, it is clear that the influence of the Mennonites of the Lower Rhine, who were rapidly losing their nonresistance, made it more difficult for their brethren of northeastern Germany to maintain their faith.

In the 17th century large numbers of persecuted Mennonites had also moved from Switzerland into the Palatinate and other parts of southern Germany. They continued to suffer many hardships here, however, both from persecution and from the wars at the end of the century. As a result, many of these South German Mennonites moved to America in the first half of the 18th century. As the pressure of militarism increased and opportunities for migration opened up, some Mennonites of all parts of Germany continued to migrate to America and to Russia during the late 18th and the 19th centuries.

The end of full nonresistance among the Prussian and all of the North German Mennonites came following the founding of the North German Confederation in 1867. In that year a new universal military service law was enacted, with no exemption for Mennonites. After the law was passed the Mennonites appealed to Berlin, but the only concession they received was the cabinet order of March 3, 1868, permitting noncombatant military service for those who had scruples against regular service. After the cabinet order was issued many of those Mennonites who were genuinely nonresistant migrated to Russia and America. Those who remained at first accepted noncombatant military service. This was especially true of the North German Mennonites after the cabinet order of 1868. It soon became clear, however, that there was little difference in principle between noncombatant and regular service. As a result, the Mennonites of Germany gradually gave up all objection to army service, and in World War I most Mennonites in the army were in the regular service. Only a few chose the noncombatant service provided for by the law, although about one third of those in West Prussia did so. Thus, for more than a century the process of adaptation went on until it culminated in the almost complete abandonment of the nonresistant faith by the Mennonites of Germany.

Before the opening of World War II (1934) in fact, the Vereinigung der Mennonitengemeinden im Deutschen Reich, the official conference which included the churches of northern Germany and the Palatinate, had taken official action openly disavowing the nonresistant position by stating that the privilege of exemption from full military service would no longer be claimed. The Mennonites of Germany as a whole had become convinced that the old Mennonite position was no longer valid, and that they owed it to their country to assume the full burden of citizenship like their fellow citizens. The older status of exemption had been based upon the conception of the Mennonites being a special class of citizens, with limited rights and exceptional privileges. Ernst Crous has shown (MQR XXV, 241-44) that the process of accommodation by which the German Mennonites changed their convictions on nonresistance seemed right and good to them and was not viewed as compromise, although viewed historically it appears as such.

In France the story is much the same as elsewhere in Europe. After 1870 the French military laws made no provision whatever for conscientious objectors, and military service came to be generally accepted by the Mennonites in that country. From 1870 to 1914 Alsace, being annexed to Germany, was subject to German military law.

When the Mennonites migrated from Prussia and elsewhere in western Europe to Russia during the latter part of the 18th century the principle of nonresistance was one of the factors responsible for the move. When they came to Russia they, like all other German immigrants, were guaranteed complete exemption from military service. This policy of exemption was continued according to promise until 1870. In that year, however, the Russian government issued a ukase abolishing all special privileges to non-Russian settlers in South Russia, including exemption from military service effective in 1880.

The imperial edict caused great concern among the Mennonites, and from the beginning some of them considered the situation serious enough to warrant emigration. Numerous official delegations were sent to St. Petersburg in 1871-73 with appeals to the government to withdraw its order regarding military service. As these efforts proved fruitless, however, an emigration to America, which began in a small way in 1873, actually assumed mass proportions in the following year. In 1873 the total population of the Mennonites in Russia was 45,000, and before the migration movement was concluded one third of this number had gone to the prairie regions of the United States and Canada.

The Russian government now became alarmed, realizing too late that it had not taken Mennonite nonresistance seriously enough. Determined to hold as many of them as possible the Czar sent General von Todtleben to the colonies in April 1874. After acquainting himself with the faith and the convictions of the Mennonites he offered them civilian service of an entirely nonmilitary character as an alternative to military service. The result was the alternative forestry service (q.v.) program for conscientious objectors (q.v.) operated by the Mennonites under the Russian government from 1880 through World War I and financed by them. By the time of World War I the annual enrollment in this service was about 1,000 men. During the war itself about 12,000 Mennonites were engaged in government service, about 6,000 in the forestry and another 6,000 in the Mennonite hospital and medical corps. Practically no Mennonites entered the army.

The coming of the Russian revolution in 1917 following three years of war proved to be a very severe test for the nonresistant faith of the Russian Mennonites. In 1918 some Mennonites in the Ukraine organized a Self-Defense Corps (q.v.) (Selbstschutz) at the suggestion and with the help of officers of the German army of occupation. There was some actual fighting between armed Mennonites and groups of Russian bandits. This serious lapse no doubt increased the difficulties experienced by Russian Mennonites who were sincerely and genuinely nonresistant, and who were the great majority.

Some form of alternative service was granted by the Soviet government upon individual application quite regularly down to 1927, on the basis of the Lenin decree of 1919 (which has never been repealed). Thereafter it became increasingly difficult, although cases are known to have been granted as late as 1935. In some cases also the CO's are reported to have been shot, and in other cases the alternative service amounted to forced labor in concentration camps. Many of the Mennonite men who were brought out of Russia in 1943 by the German army of occupation were drafted into the German army.

From the time of the first Mennonite immigration to America in the late 17th century to the present time, concern for the principle of nonresistance has always been a major cause for the emigration of Mennonites from Europe. This was especially true after the introduction of universal military service in Europe by Napoleon early in the 19th century. The coming of the Swiss Mennonites and the Alsatian Amish to Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa in the mid-19th century are cases in point. Further illustrations would be Mennonite groups coming from Prussia to Kansas and Nebraska as well as other Mennonites and Amish groups from Germany to Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and Iowa. By far the largest migration before World War I was that from Russia in the 1870's, and this was brought about almost entirely by the Russian threat to the nonresistant way of life of the Mennonites. These successive waves of immigration accordingly strengthened the American Mennonite devotion to the principle of nonresistance.

Although there have always been individuals who did not follow the teachings of the church, the American Mennonites during the wars from the 18th to the 20th centuries have maintained a fairly consistent testimony against military service. The nonresistant faith of the Pennsylvania Mennonites was not only stated in their declaration to the Pennsylvania Assembly in 1775; it was also demonstrated by the assistance and relief which they brought to the war sufferers of that time. There were also numerous cases of Mennonites on the American frontier in colonial times who suffered in various ways, some of them even being murdered at the hands of hostile Indians, such as in Page County, Va., and Berks County, Pa. In all of these trials there is no case on record of any Mennonite using force against the enemy. In 1789 Benjamin Rush said: "Perhaps those German sects of Christians among us who refuse to bear arms for the purpose of shedding human blood, may be preserved by divine providence as the center of a circle, which shall gradually embrace all nations of the earth in a perpetual treaty of friendship and peace."

The period before the Civil War (1860-65) was one of spiritual decline among the American Mennonites. For a long time no peace literature had been produced and in many cases the young men were not prepared to meet the test of war and conscription when it came, and a considerable number of them accepted military service.

This failure became the occasion for a revival of teaching on nonresistance and a cause for a great awakening in the Mennonite Church. In June 1863 appeared two little booklets on nonresistance, "the first trickles of a stream of literature that has flowed into the church in growing volume since." One was entitled, Warfare, Its Evils, Our Duty, and was written by John F. Funk, the young minister who was to found the Herald of Truth in Chicago the following year. The other, entitled Christianity and War, was written by John M. Brenneman, Mennonite minister of Elida, Ohio. The Herald of Truth, which began publication in January 1864, promoted the cause of nonresistance from the very beginning. In an editorial in the January 1865 issue of the Herald, Funk discussed various alternatives to military service and evaluated them as to their consistency with the nonresistant faith. He presented a convincing case against the hiring of substitutes. "It is now generally admitted to be wrong," he says, "and there is probably scarcely a single one who professes to hold to the doctrine of nonresistance, that would be willing to send a man to do that which he himself . . . considers altogether against the gospel of Jesus Christ."

While the testimony of the church leadership was clear on the question of hiring substitutes, there is evidence of confused thinking on the matter of the commutation fee, service to sick and wounded soldiers, and noncombatant service in the army which some accepted, both in the North and in the South. The church at that time showed a weakness in not being able to grapple adequately, on the basis of its own principles, with the issues at hand. The considerate attitude of the government, however, especially in the North, in recognizing the scruples of nonresistant people when they were effectively presented, makes it seem certain that if the Mennonites had been sufficiently advanced in their thinking to conceive and promote a comprehensive program of civilian alternative service in harmony with their principles, it would have been granted them. As it was, however, such a program was not developed until the time of World War II.

During the Civil War the Mennonites of Virginia, located within the Confederacy, were very hard pressed. Much of their property was destroyed. Some of them suffered imprisonment. Some remained in hiding in the mountains for months at a time. Others managed to escape to the North where some of them remained permanently. The vigorous leadership of Bishop Samuel Coffman, who stood courageously for the nonresistant faith at the risk of his own life, enabled the Mennonite Church in Virginia to maintain a fairly consistent nonresistant record, considering the seriousness of the military situation and the period in the history of the church when these events occurred.

The great awakening in the Mennonite Church (MC) which followed the Civil War, and the spiritual developments of the next half century, prepared the Mennonites of America to meet the problems of World War I with greater effectiveness than they did those of the Civil War. When the war came a firm position was taken against noncombatant as well as combatant military service, and the wartime experience was such as to clarify effectively the issues here at stake and to gain the recognition of the government for the principle of nonresistance as well as its co-operation in an effort to find acceptable alternatives for military service. Relief and reconstruction work abroad in the last year of the war and immediately following (1917-19), the farm furlough, and proposals near the end of the war for the assignment of conscientious objectors to projects of land reclamation and agricultural and educational service helped to set the pattern for later Civilian Public Service and comprehensive relief and voluntary service programs, both home and foreign, developed during and following World War II, which functioned both as an alternative to military service and as a positive service and witness for peace in the modern world.

These gains were made, however, only because the men in the army camps and in the home communities were willing to pay for them with the necessary price, often in the form of genuine suffering. The experience of the men in the camps was often not a happy one. C. Henry Smith says they "were frequently roughly handled. . . . In all the camps they were subject to ridicule. . . . Some . . . were brutally handled in the guardhouse; they were bayoneted, beaten, and tortured by various kinds of the water cure; eighteen men one night were aroused from their sleep and held under cold showers until one became hysterical. . . . Men were forced to stand at attention, sometimes with outstretched arms for hours and days at a time . . . exposed to the inclemencies of the weather as well as to the jeers and taunts of their fellows until they could stand no longer, . . . occasionally tortured by mock trials, in which the victim was left under the impression to the very last that unless he submitted to the regulations the penalty would be death. Every conceivable device—ridicule, torture, offer of promotion, and other tempting inducements were resorted to in order to get them to give up their convictions; but with only few exceptions the religious objectors refused to compromise with their consciences." (Story of the Mennonites, 794 ff.)

In World War I the total number of objectors in the United States who were court-martialed and sentenced was 503. Of these, 360 were religious objectors; and of the latter, 138 were Mennonites. Prison sentences ranged all the way from one year or less to life. Life sentences were given to 142 men, and 17 men were even sentenced to death. Sentences from five to thirty years were very common. None of these severe sentences were fully served. Within a few months after the close of the war most of the prisoners had been given their freedom by Presidential pardon.

The darkest chapter in the entire story of the treatment received by the conscientious objectors in World War I is that of the four Hutterian Brethren—Joseph, Michael, and David Hofer, and Jacob Wipf. After spending two months in the guardhouse in a military camp these four men were court-martialed and sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment. They were taken to Alcatraz federal prison in California, where they suffered very cruel treatment, from which Joseph and Michael Hofer died.

The brotherhood in the home community was also tested. In some communities Mennonites were most severely criticized, and even abused. In Kansas and Illinois and in other places a number of meetinghouses were painted yellow. In at least two cases meetinghouses were burned to the ground. In Kansas several men were tarred and feathered because of their nonresistant objection to the purchase of bonds. One minister in Ohio was dragged from his home at night, and his hair was clipped from his head. In South Dakota a mob, with the connivance of a local bond committee, actually robbed the Hutterian community of livestock worth $40,000. This, with other abuses, was responsible for driving the Hutterites out of the state into Canada. No doubt this is the worst example, but it would be possible to enumerate cases of mistreatment and mob violence by the score.

One of the effects of World War I was to arouse all of the peace churches to the need for an aggressive program of peace teaching and peace action. The various Mennonite groups appointed official peace committees who were responsible for carrying on this program. The Brethren and Friends groups did likewise. Following the war, the amount of peace literature produced by all of these groups was greater than ever before in their history. Peace conferences sponsored by the peace groups, both individually and co-operatively, were a common thing during this period. The most important of the co-operatively sponsored meetings was that held at Newton, Kan., in 1935, at which time the name "Historic Peace Churches" was first used. This meeting created an unofficial Continuation Committee (the Mennonite member appointed by the MCC) whose duty it was to plan for future conferences and to guide the co-operative efforts of the Historic Peace Churches. Among these co-operative efforts was the bringing of a testimony for the Christian way of peace to the official bodies of other Christian denominations. In 1937 representatives of the Historic Peace Churches called on President Franklin D. Roosevelt, each of the three groups (Mennonites, Friends, and Brethren) presenting a letter stating its views on war and peace, and refusal to bear arms. A similar delegation visited the President again on Jan. 10, 1940, with concrete proposals for alternative service in case universal military training and service should be adopted.

In 1939 various Mennonite groups, realizing the need for a united position, organized the Mennonite Central Peace Committee, which then drafted a proposed plan of action in case of war; this plan received official approval on Sept. 30, 1939. The other Historic Peace Churches also gave official approval to this plan of action. As a result of these efforts the provision for conscientious objectors in the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940 was more generous and satisfactory than that of the draft law of 1917. Under the new law all persons "who, by reason of religious training and belief," were conscientiously opposed to all forms of military service, should, if conscripted for service, "be assigned to work of national importance under civilian direction." The implementation of this law resulted in the CPS system of World War II and in the revised civilian work program inaugurated in 1952 (as described in ME I, page 698).

The experiences of World War II had a profound effect for both the Mennonite conscientious objectors and their churches. For four years the principle of nonresistance and its applications were put under a strenuous test, in both the United States and Canada. Civilian Public Service (q.v.) in the United States with over 4,000 Mennonite CO's in service for several years, and the vast effort of administration and financial support for it required of the associated Mennonite bodies (the entire Mennonite brotherhood of North America was united in its stand and co-operated in CPS), was a tremendous experience for all, whose great and lasting effects are still being measured. Much thorough thinking on the basic principle of nonresistance went on throughout the period, with a resultant clarification and deepening of understanding and commitment. Some of the side effects on the churches will be reported later on in this article, but it should be said here that by the end of the war the nonresistance position of the Mennonites in North America was solidified as never before. The Canadian Mennonite experience with Alternative Service (q.v.) had a similar significance. The ripest expression of this fuller understanding and conviction found its precipitate in a powerful and moving declaration of nonresistant faith as set forth in "A Declaration of Christian Faith and Commitment" adopted at a "Study Conference on Nonresistance held by Representatives of the Mennonite and Brethren in Christ Churches of North America held at Winona Lake, Indiana, November 9-12, 1950." A further and more elaborate and theological statement, incorporating much of the Winona Lake statement but twice as long, was adopted by the Mennonite Church (MC) as its position at its General Conference, Aug. 23, 1951, entitled "A Declaration of Christian Faith and Commitment with Respect to War, Peace, and Nonresistance." Both statements are to be found in Twenty-Seventh Mennonite General Conference, Scottdale, 1951, pp. 41-50.)

The experience of both of the world wars served to stimulate and expand the Mennonite relief and service programs as forms of a positive world-wide witness for peace. The reconstruction work in France, followed by the Near East Relief and the Russian famine relief, were supported by the Mennonites both with funds and personnel. The latter project led to the formation in 1920 of the Mennonite Central Committee, which has become the great relief and service organization of North American Mennonitism, and which has also carried the banner of a united Mennonite nonresistance testimony. The total amount contributed by the American Mennonites and distributed through its own organizations for the relief of war sufferers in Europe and the Near East during the period of World War I and immediately afterwards is estimated at about $2,500,000. The Mennonites of Holland also contributed several hundred thousand dollars for the work in Russia. During the Spanish Civil War (1937), the American Mennonites (MC) carried on a relief work in that country, contributing about $57,000.

This record of work in migration, relief (q.v.), voluntary service (q.v.), and civilian service (q.v.) of North American Mennonites as an alternative to military service from 1940 on constitutes a 20th-century Mennonite peace testimony which is world-wide in its scope. The story of the Mennonite migrations for conscience' sake has attracted wide attention, and their relief and humanitarian service projects have touched many countries on every continent on the globe, except Australia. Their record as conscientious objectors in the United States and Canada is likewise well known.

This world-wide witness was bound to have a profound effect upon the Mennonites themselves. It gave them a new vision of their own faith and life, and of the Anabaptist contribution to theology, and brought a deepened conviction that the Christian Gospel and the message of love and nonresistance which according to the New Testament is an integral part of it were sorely needed in their world. Those Mennonites who had formerly given up their nonresistant faith were challenged to espouse it once more, which some of them did. Even as early as 1915 a spirit of renewal was beginning to stir among the Mennonites of the Netherlands, which by 1950 had done much to turn the church in the direction of its original evangelical and nonresistant principles. This spirit was first symbolized by Jan Gleijsteen, the one and only Dutch Mennonite who took his stand as a conscientious objector when called up for military service during World War I. Gleijsteen served a term in prison for taking this stand. At the same time some young ministers, T. O. Hylkema, J. E. van Brakel, and J. M. Leendertz, through a study of the Bible and church history, began to find their way to the early and historic position of the Dutch Mennonite church on nonresistance and related Biblical principles. In this they were helped to some extent by their contacts with the English Quakers at Woodbrooke. In 1917 Hylkema and his associates organized the Gemeentedag movement, the aim of which was to bring the church to a more thoroughly Biblical faith. Included in its emphasis was nonresistance. During the 1920's and 1930's there gradually developed among the Dutch Mennonites a vigorous body of opinion opposing military service and militarism. In 1922 this led to the formation of a Committee against Military Service (Arbeidsgroep, q.v.) with over 300 members, which some fifteen years later prepared a Mennonite Peace Manifesto, appealing to its members "to witness vigorously to our peace testimony in our congregations everywhere," and calling "all Mennonites throughout the world to fulfill the task entrusted to us by the history of our Mennonite forefathers, in the propagation of the Gospel of peace." This Manifesto, signed by representatives of Mennonites in various countries at the organization of an International Mennonite Peace Committee in the summer of 1936 following the third Mennonite World Conference, was widely circulated among the Mennonites of the world.

Shortly before the beginning of World War II the Dutch government liberalized its military laws so as again to give some recognition to conscientious objectors. Following the war a program of alternative service was inaugurated, with service camps for conscientious objectors similar to those in the United States. The program included service in mental hospitals and other similar assignments. In 1952 several hundred Dutch conscientious objectors were engaged in this service, about thirty of them being Mennonites. In 1952 also two Dutch Mennonites whose CO position was not recognized by the government were serving prison sentences.

Following the war the organized peace work of the Dutch Mennonites also underwent some change. The earlier Committee against Military Service became the Mennonite Peace Group (Doopsgezinde Vredesgroep, q.v.). This change of name symbolized a changing emphasis in the group's peace teaching and peace work. If the earlier emphasis was largely one of antimilitarism, the later emphasis was increasingly that of Biblical nonresistance, so that by 1950 the Biblical position was dominant in the Dutch Mennonite peace movement. The fact that by 1953 the Peace Group had a membership of nearly 700 members, among whom were 32 per cent of the Dutch Mennonite ministers, is evidence enough that Dutch Mennonitism had made much progress in the recovery of its earlier faith.

The principles of the Peace Group are set forth in the following declaration, adopted at its founding on Sept. 2, 1946. "The Mennonite Peace Group, in obedience to Jesus Christ our Lord, and moved by His love, seeks in a world torn by sin to give a witness for the peace spirit and a purely spiritual arming which seeks to overcome the evil by the good. It knows that it can achieve this only as its members, in union with Christ, in prayer and consecration, allow their weakness to be renewed by His strength. It seeks to reach this goal by: (1) striving for a personal life witness by its members (acceptance of Christ's command to love, even the enemies, as their obligation) in Biblical nonresistance; readiness to sacrifice the selfish ego, whatever heavy sacrifices of time and money the Lord may require; (2) strengthening in our churches the attitude of caring for one another in the spirit of mutual responsibility and intercession; (3) lending spiritual and material support to those who come into difficulties because of their Christian peace testimony (in particular, help to those who in obedience to Christ feel called to refuse military service; co-operating in establishing in our country an alternative service of life like the Civilian Public Service in America); (4) co-operating in relief work." (Doopsgezinde Vredesgroep Brief, December 1949, "Verklaring.")

The International Mennonite Peace Committee mentioned above was organized following the third Mennonite World Conference in Holland in the summer of 1936. Participating in the formation of the new organization were members of the Dutch Mennonite Committee against Military Service and representatives of several peace committees from North America. Harold S. Bender of the United States was chosen chairman of the committee, and

Jacob ter Meulen of the Netherlands secretary-treasurer. The achievements of the new organization, however, were very modest. Moreover, with the coming of World War II the connections between America and Holland were broken, so that the International Mennonite Peace Committee became inactive. In the summer of 1949, however, an international Mennonite peace conference in Holland provided the occasion for its revival. In its reorganized form Harold S. Bender again became chairman, and Carl F. Brüsewitz of Holland was chosen secretary. It has continued in a modest program of activity to the present. In Holland the Peace Group, with the help of American Mennonites, established a peace center at Heerewegen near Zeist.

The most significant feature of the 1949 conference, however, was the presence of representatives of the German, French, and Swiss Mennonites, as well as those of Holland and America. Representatives from each of these countries were also named officials of the new organization. The new organization held a second international Mennonite peace conference at Heilbronn, Germany, in the summer of 1950, and a third conference in France in 1951. In 1952 it held a meeting in connection with the Fifth Mennonite World Conference in Basel. Several similar meetings have been held since then.

The participation of the German, French, and Swiss Mennonites in this movement was of much significance, indicating a growing interest in nonresistance. However, even in 1957 it was uncertain whether or not this interest would grow into a movement as significant as that of the Dutch Peace Group. The leaders of the movement in these countries were only a few, and their following was not large. And yet there were signs that the movement had genuine life. In Germany a peace conference for German Mennonites was held in 1949. In both 1949 and 1950 the question of nonresistance was discussed at official conferences of the German Mennonites. The constitution of the new West German Republic provided that no one should be compelled against his conscience to perform military service. When the question of remilitarization arose, the German parliament took steps to enact legislation to implement this constitutional provision, and the German churches were given the opportunity of stating their position on conscientious objection. In 1950 the German Mennonite conferences officially went on record as supporting the position of the conscientious objector. This did not necessarily mean that the great body of German Mennonites had come to accept nonresistance in faith and practice once more. It did mean, however, that those who took that position would have the support of the church. Moreover, the editor of the official South German Mennonite periodical, the Gemeindeblatt, was personally committed to nonresistance; and in the middle of the century the pages of this periodical were carrying articles on nonresistance by influential members of the church.

Inductions into the new German army were scheduled to begin in 1957. In the meantime a German Mennonite Peace Committee had been organized, which in turn was represented on the Central Agency for Conscientious Objectors organized by the various peace groups for handling objector affairs with the German government similar to the operations of the National Service Board for Religious Objectors (q.v.) in the United States. Under the German conscription system men registering as conscientious objectors were to be examined by twelve regional committees and if their claims were recognized were to be assigned to civilian service under the Labor Ministry of the federal government. Government-operated camps were to provide projects in land reclamation, disaster service, health services, and construction of welfare and charitable institutions. Private agencies were also to be licensed for giving alternative service employment to objectors. At the time of this writing it was impossible to know the extent to which the German Mennonites would take their position as conscientious objectors under the provisions of the new law.

By 1948 the editor of the French Mennonite periodical, Christ Seul, was also committed to nonresistance, and his journal likewise promoted the cause. He was also an influential evangelist and youth leader whose sincere peace convictions showed signs of bearing fruit. He, along with several other French Mennonites, had notified the government that although they had previously served in the army they could not do so again. Youth meetings were discussing nonresistance, and even an all-day conference of the French Mennonite ministers in the summer of 1950 was devoted to a consideration of the ancient nonresistant testimony of the church, an event without precedent within the memory of those present. This meeting revealed an interest in testifying to the French government against its intolerant attitude toward the conscientious objector, which later was done. Present at the French ministerial conference were also representatives of the Swiss Mennonites, including the president of their conference, indicating a serious interest in nonresistance on their part. That in the mid-20th century a new interest in nonresistance had been aroused in the European Mennonite churches there could be no doubt.

In all of this the European Mennonite peace leaders were working closely with the American Mennonites. In the summer of 1949 three representatives of the peace section of the MCC, Harold S. Bender, Erland Waltner, and C. J. Rempel, spent several months in Europe on a preaching mission, holding conferences and doing what they could to encourage their brethren in the recovery of their nonresistant witness. During the year 1949-50 Guy F. Hershberger served in a similar way, his work including a study of the general pacifist movement in Europe. In the summer of 1951 Bender and Waltner engaged in a second preaching mission and, in addition to their labors among the Mennonites, participated in conferences with peace leaders in the German evangelical churches. Similar missions were sent to the Mennonite colonies in South America about the same time.

This outward reach of the Mennonite peace witness into the general Christian peace movement was manifesting itself in a number of ways. The Dutch Mennonite Peace Group was making its influence felt upon Dutch Christianity in general. Since 1949 the Dutch Peace Group and American Mennonites had been holding occasional conferences with representatives of the Friends and the Church of the Brethren in Europe, and a European Historic Peace Church Continuation Committee was organized in that year, with the British Friends, the European representatives of the Brethren Service Committee, and MCC workers (plus later representatives of the Dutch Peace Group) participating. A conference of these groups in 1950 took steps toward the presentation of the concerns and convictions of the Historic Peace Churches to the World Council of Churches before the time of its world conference in 1953. This presentation was made in the form of a booklet Peace Is the Will of God (Amsterdam, 1953). Since then the European Mennonite peace witness and work has continued under the leadership of the International Mennonite Peace Committee assisted by American MCC workers John H. Yoder, Albert Meyer, Ernst Harder, Milton Harder, Paul Bender, and others. In the summer of 1957 a number of peace conferences were held in meetings associated with the sixth Mennonite World Conference. At the same time the Mennonites of the Latin-American countries were also growing increasingly conscious of their responsibility to strengthen the witness of peace among themselves, and to make that witness felt beyond their own circles through the publication of peace literature and by other means. This was true both of the Mennonite colonists who had recently settled there as immigrants, and of the Mennonite missions in those parts. The same was also true of Mennonite missions in Africa, India, and in other parts of the world. During 1955-57 Melvin Gingerich gave a two-year term of service under the Peace Section of the MCC bringing the peace witness to the people of Japan, working with Japanese Christians and peace workers in that country. In September 1957 he was succeeded by Paul Peachey in this ministry. Thus at the middle of the 20th century there was a growing conviction among Mennonites that nonresistance was an integral part of the Gospel of Christ. And the Mennonite peace witness was growing ever more world-wide in its scope.

Another effect of the growing interest in the Christian peace testimony was a deepened concern among Mennonites for the wider social implications of the Gospel and of the principle of nonresistance in particular. "A Declaration of Christian Faith and Commitment," adopted by a study conference called by the Peace Section of the MCC at Winona Lake, Ind., in 1950, says: "We . . . have the responsibility to bring to the total social order . . . the utmost of which we are capable in Christian love and service. . . . For this reason the social order, including our own segment of it, must be constantly brought under the judgment of Christ. . . . We must practice an increasingly sharper Christian control of our economic, social, and cultural practices among ourselves and toward others, to make certain that love truly operates to work no ill to our neighbor, either short-range or long-range. Knowing how much the selfishness, pride, and greed of individuals, groups, and nations, which economic systems often encourage, help to cause carnal strife and warfare, we must see to it that we do not contribute thereto, whether for the goals of direct military operation or to anything which destroys property or causes hurt or loss of human life."

In 1951 a conference at Laurelville Mennonite Camp, sponsored by the Committee on Industrial Relations of the Mennonite Church (MC), adopted "A Statement of Concerns" which said: "We are further concerned that the church should acquire a better understanding of the principles of social justice contained in the Gospel of Christ, and urge our preachers and teachers to study and to set forth the social obligations expressed and implied in the teachings of the Old Testament prophets, of our Lord, and of all the apostles. We are deeply concerned that the social conscience of all our people may be aroused and sharpened, so that we may sense more and more the implications of Christian love and brotherhood in the complex details of modern life. We believe that our Christian testimony to the world about us can be effective only as we confess unsocial conduct to be sin and cleanse our lives of its defilement."

"A Declaration of Christian Faith and Commitment with Respect to Peace, War, and Nonresistance," adopted by the Mennonite Church (MC) in 1951, repeated the admonition of the Winona Lake statement to "practice a sharper Christian control of our economic, social, and cultural practices," and added that "Christian love must hold primacy in all our economic and labor relations, that we cannot participate in activities, organizations, investments, or systems which use the methods of force and violence, compromise Christian ethics, or do not permit the full exercise of Christian love and brotherhood, and that we seek in our own practices to work out this love and brotherhood in concrete applications."

In 1955 the Committee on Economic and Social Relations sponsored a study conference on Christian race relations which drafted a statement which later that same year was officially adopted by the Mennonite Church (MC). This statement, "The Way of Christian Love in Race Relations," condemned racial prejudice and discrimination as a sin, as "a violation of the basic moral law which requires a redemptive attitude of love and reconciliation toward all men," and as "a major cause of present-day international conflict and war" in which a nonresistant people can have no part.

The growth of the Mennonite peace witness also seems to have been accompanied by deepened convictions and a more complete commitment to the principle of nonresistance by the rank and file of the Mennonite brotherhood in America, as reflected in the percentage of conscripted men who chose alternative service. In World War II 46.2 per cent of all conscripted Mennonites and 59.2 per cent of conscripted members of the Mennonite Church (MC) chose alternative service under the CPS system. Under the alternative service work program reinstituted in 1952, however, the figure for the Mennonite Church (MC) had been raised to 88 per cent and that for Mennonites as a whole had been raised proportionately, although precise figures were not available in every case. G.F.H.

Nonresistance in Germany. The 19th century witnessed a general decline in nonresistance among the German Mennonites. In South Germany for some time payment instead of personal service was allowed. Those with strong nonresistant convictions emigrated to America (1830-60). After 1871 payment was no more possible. In West and East Prussia in the last quarter of the 18th century the Mennonites were required to give financial support to the military academy at Culm and had to face restrictions in gaining more land. Consequently large numbers emigrated to Russia. When the Prussian universal military training law was passed in 1814 the Mennonites were granted exemption, but still had to pay a fee in place of personal service. After the revolution of 1848 (equal rights, equal obligations!), when a new universal military law with no exemptions for the Mennonites became imminent and in 1867 became reality, the Mennonites again and again appealed to Berlin. Their appeals to the parliament, which now had to decide the question, were futile; but the king as commander-in-chief of the army succeeded at least (1868) in granting them a cabinet order permitting noncombatant military services for those who had scruples against full service. As a result of this legislation Mennonites with strong nonresistant convictions again emigrated to Russia (from 1853) and later to America (from 1874). Among those who remained the question of following the cabinet order or accepting full service remained in dispute, but more and more the full service was accepted, especially in World War I (about one third to one half of all males of the Mennonite congregations had to enter the army; about 10 per cent of them killed in action). So in 1933, when again universal military conscription was at hand, the Vereinigung (q.v.; Union of Mennonite Churches in Germany) resolved not to ask for more exemption from the law; its constitution of June 11, 1934, published in 1936, explained this development; and indeed there were no Mennonite conscientious objectors in World War II. (See Germany.) E.C.

Peter Froese, Liebreiche Erinnerung von der Wehrlosigkeit (1850); W. Mannhardt, Die Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten (Marienburg, 1863); John Horsch, Die biblische Lehre von der Wehrlosigkeit (Scottdale, 1920); Wilbur J. Bender, Nonresistance in Colonial Pennsylvania (Scottdale, 1934); G. F. Hershberger, Nonresistance and the State, the Pennsylvania Quaker Experiment in Politics 1682-1756 (Scottdale, 1936); C. H. Smith, Christian Peace: Four Hundred Years of Mennonite Peace Principles and Practice (n.p., 1938); E. J. Swalm, Nonresistance under Test (Nappanee, 1838); John Horsch, The Principle of Nonresistance as Held by the Mennonite Church (Scottdale, 1927); S. C. Yoder, For Conscience Sake (Goshen, 1940); G. F. Hershberger, Christian Relationships to State and Country (Akron, 1942); Jacob Sudermann, "The Origin of Mennonite State Service in Russia 1870-1880," MQR XVII (1943) 23-46; Edward Yoder, Compromise with War (Akron, 1943); Edward Yoder, Must Christians Fight (Akron, 1943); G. F. Hershberger, War, Peace, and Nonresistance (first ed., Scottdale, 1944, third rev. ed., Scottdale, 1953); Edward Yoder and Don. E. Smucker, The Christian and Conscription (Akron, 1945); Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace: A History of Mennonite Civilian Public Service (Akron, 1949); idem, What of Noncombatant Service (Akron, 1949); G. F. Hershberger, The Mennonite Church in the Second World War (Scottdale, 1951); Ernst Crous, "The Mennonites in Germany Since the Thirty Years' War" (section on nonresistance), MQR XXV (1951) 241-44; S. A. Yoder, Middle-East Sojourn (Scottdale, 1951); John D. Unruh, In the Name of Christ: A History of the Mennonite Central Committee and Its Services, 1920-1951 (Scottdale, 1952); Don. E. Smucker, "The Theological Basis of Christian Pacifism," MQR XXVII (1953) 63-86; John A. Toews, True Nonresistance Through Christ (Winnipeg, 1955); Peace Is the Will of God (Amsterdam, 1953); H. P. Krehbiel, War—Peace—Amity (Newton, 1937); Erfahrungen der Mennoniten in Canada während des zweiten Weltkrieges—1939-1945 (Steinbach, 1948); Edward Krehbiel, Nationalism, War and Society (New York, 1916); Krahn, Fretz, Kreider, "Altruism in Mennonite Life," in Pitirim A. Sorokin's Forms and Techniques of Altruistic and Spiritual Growth (Boston, 1954); Cornelius Krahn, "Public Service in Russia," The Mennonite LVIII (June 8, June 22, August 31, and September 21, 1943); Gustav Reimer and G. Gaeddert, Exiled by the Czar (Newton, 1956); C. Henry Smith, The Story of the Mennonites (Newton, 1950); Peace Study Conferences, Moundridge 1953, Winona 1950, etc.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 428 f., 431, 433, 436 f., 441, 453 f., 570-84, 887, 1471, 1559, 1638, 1736, 2359, 2471; II, Nos. 2994, 3290 f., 3293-3319; II, 2, Nos. 37, 211-15, 309-12, 330; DB 1864, 113, 115 f.; 1867, 103; 1873, 144; 1877, 17 et passim; 1878, 29; 1879, 27 et passim; 1880, 53, 56-60; 1881, 1-32, 87; 1882, 91-94; 1883, 35; 1884, 33; 1887, 120; 1891, 20; 1898, 123-49; 1903, 94; 1904, 45, 53 f.; 1905, 23 f.; 1907, 128-33, 157, 160; 1908, 36-47, 114; 1909, 154 f.; 1910, 9, 22; 1919, 39-41, 63-67; J. Dyserinck, "De weerloosheid volgens de Doopsgezinden," De Gids I (1890) 104-61 and 303-42; De Zondagsbode, Jan. 10, 1915; K. Vos, De Weerloosheid volgens de Doopsgezinden (Geschr, t.b.v. de Doopsgezinden in de Verstrooiing, No. 52, Amsterdam, 1924); J. M. Leendertz, Een Doopsgezind getuigenis tegen militair geweld (Wolvega, n.d.-1924); Evangelie en Krijgsdienst (1929); N. van der Zijpp, De vroegere Doopsgezinden en de Krijgsdienst (Wolvega, 1930); H. Bremer, De basis van ons weerloos Christendom (n.p., n.d.-1952); T. O. Hylkema, Wat de Bijbel zegt: Dienende weerlose liefde? . . . Of niet? (n.p., 1953); J. M. Leendertz and T. O. Hylkema, Nieuw Leven in een Oude Broederschap (n.p., 1956); E. Crous, article "Germany," ME II, 495-97.

Nonresistant Relief Organization (NRRO), a fund-raising organization created in 1917 by the several Mennonite and Brethren in Christ bodies in Ontario. A preliminary meeting of ten persons representing four groups of nonresistant churches was held in the Wideman Mennonite Church (MC) near Markham, Ont., on Nov. 17, 1917, to consider the status of nonresistants under the Canadian Military Service Act of 1917, and to devise a practical expression of appreciation to the government for past exemptions from military service. L. J. Burkholder of Markham was chairman of the meeting and David W. Heise of Gormley, Ont., was secretary. The permanent organization was effected in Kitchener, Ont., on Jan. 16, 1918, by representatives of the following bodies: Ontario Conference (MC), Markham district (OOM), North Waterloo district (OOM), United Missionary Church (MBC at that time), Brethren in Christ (Tunker), Amish Mennonite, United Mennonite (GCM), Mennonite Brethren, and Stirling Avenue (GCM, at that time independent). Each group is entitled to three representatives. A fund of $70,000 was contributed and presented to the government in appreciation for exemption privileges, and at government request was distributed to various relief organizations for war sufferers in Europe. Contacts were maintained with the government in the interpretation and application of the Military Service Act as it affected members of the churches, to maintain exemption privileges. The organization was active in raising funds for China famine relief in 1920, Russian famine relief 1921, support of Russian immigrants to Canada 1923, Spanish relief 1937, drought relief in the Canadian Northwest 1937-38, evacuees' relief in England 1939, European relief through the MCC 1939, co-operation with Western Canada relief organizations, support of relief homes in England 1941, food and clothing shipments for MCC relief from 1946 on. The organization, for the sake of better service, was co-ordinated with the Conference of Historic Peace Churches in 1946, but functions as an organization as before. Since 1944 it has regularly appointed a member on the MCC. It now works through the regional office at Waterloo. S.F.C.

Nonviolence is a term used to characterize the strategy of coercion without the use of physical force, for the furtherance of social ends, such as that used by the Indian leader, Gandhi, as well as by certain types of western pacifism. While illustrations of so-called nonviolence can be cited which approach the spirit of New Testament nonresistance, the latter is not to be equated with the Gandhian type of nonviolence, which is aggressively coercive in its strategy as well as non-Christian in its basic philosophy.

The chief source of Gandhi's philosophy was the Hindu idea of suffering as a means of appeasing the gods. As the Hindu endures self-inflicted suffering in order to wrest from heaven some good for himself, so the nonviolent coercionist may employ the hunger strike, the picket line, non-co-operation, and similar strategies to compel his social or political opponent to do him good. Gandhi's followers even threw themselves before the wheels of British military vehicles, risking their lives in an effort through embarrassment and frustration to thwart the imperial power and thus compel it to do that which the coercionist desired.

While such a strategy is preferable to violence and bloodshed it is in reality a form of warfare rather than the New Testament way of peace. Nonviolent coercion is a strategy for compelling the other party to do one good, to do that which is just. New Testament nonresistance is not a strategy. It is the way of love and the cross, not seeking suffering for the achievement of some social end, but rather following Christ in sacrificial service for the good of the other party, whether this good is reciprocated or not.

In nonviolent coercion the primary aim is to obtain the good for oneself or one's cause, although there may be love for the one against whom the coercion is directed. The greater the love, however, and the nearer the way of the cross is approached, the more will be the aim to appeal to the other party and win him to the way of love, rather than to embarrass him and to compel him, and thus the nearer will be the approach to New Testament nonresistance.

The nonviolent protest of the Negro minister Martin Luther King and his followers against discrimination in transportation facilities in Montgomery, Ala., in 1956-57, inasmuch as it was a strategy of simply declining the use of the buses, without aggressive acts of embarrassment or attempts to restrain others from using the buses, and inasmuch as great emphasis was placed on prayer and on love for those who engaged in unjust discrimination, would seem to be more a strategy of appeal and less one of compulsion, and thus would seem more nearly to approach New Testament nonresistance than is the case of most forms of nonviolence. G.F.H.

R. B. Gregg, The Power of Non-Violence (Philadelphia, 1934); K. Shridharani, War Without Violence (New York, 1939); Guy F. Hershberger, War, Peace, and Nonresistance (Scottdale, 1944, rev. ed. 1953).

Noodbrug, De (Emergency Bridge), a Dutch Mennonite periodical, edited by S. H. N. Gorter and C. Nijdam, which was published by the A.D.S. (Dutch General Mennonite Conference) after the end of World War II, to replace De Zondagsbode (q.v.), which had been forbidden during the war by the German Nazi regime then occupying the Netherlands. The first issue of De Noodbrug appeared in June 1945, the last (12th) number in September 1946, when it was succeeded by the Algemeen Doopsgezind Weekblad (q.v.). vdZ.

Nooddruft, Louwerens, an Anabaptist martyr: see Laurens Janssen.

Noodfonds vanwege de A.D.S. is a fund established in 1944 by the A.D.S. (Dutch Mennonite General Conference) to raise money for the rebuilding of Mennonite churches in the Netherlands which were destroyed during World War II. More than 600,000 guilders were raised by congregations and individuals, making it possible to rebuild the four churches of Vlissingen, Wageningen, Rotterdam, and Nijmegen, and to aid a few other congregations in repairing meetinghouses and parsonages damaged in the war. vdZ.

Noomen (Noome, Nome, Nomen), a Dutch Mennonite family, found in the Zaan region and particularly at Zaandam, North Holland, where many members of this family have been deacons. Klaas Noome, a farmer and weaver, was a Mennonite preacher at Zaandam as early as 1543. In this year he was arrested because he read the Bible, but escaped en route to Haarlem. Krelis Jansse Noome was a preacher of the Frisian congregation (Oude Huys) at Zaandam 1651-69. Pieter Noome is said to have preached a remarkable sermon before Czar Peter I of Russia, then staying at Zaandam (about 1700). A lateral branch of this family is the van Lijnen Noomen family. vdZ.

S. Lootsma, Het Nieuwe Huys (Zaandam, 1937) 11, 80, 85, 94, 189, 191, 194.

Noordbroek and the adjacent Nieuw-Scheemda (q.v.) are villages in the Dutch province of Groningen (q.v.), the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Its origin is still unknown. It is however known that there were at first two congregations, one of them in Noordbroek, the other, as Blaupot ten Cate supposes, called Nieuw-Scheemda or Scheemder-hamrik, another name for the place "Klein - Oldambt," which name is found on the list of preachers and in the records of the Groningen Sociëteit (Conference) of the Old Flemish until 1743. Both congregations belonged to this Sociëteit. Noordbroek was also the home of the noted Elder Uko Walles (q.v.), who was banned in 1637. Both congregations suffered grievously in the "Martini" flood, which put a part of the province of Groningen under water in 1686. In Klein-Oldambt four men and eight women, and twenty-seven children perished, besides many cattle; in Noordbroek the damage was limited to cattle. In 1717 another flood caused a great deal of damage, drowning many cattle. In 1738 there were still two independent congregations, which apparently united about 1740. In 1811 a new church was built in Noordbroek, and in 1840 one in Scheemda, and also a parsonage in Noordbroek. The church in Nieuw-Scheemda was used until 1919. The membership, which stood at 93 in 1733, had sunk to 50 by 1795; in 1840 it had risen to 85, in 1900, 82, and in 1957 decreased to 28. The first minister whose name has come down to us was Albert Feyes (d. 1650), elder; others were Claes Jansen, Hendrik Sybes, Jacob Alberts, preachers in the 17th century, and the preacher Albert Hendriks (d. 1760) serving from 1722, Peter Harms (d. 1768) from 1733, Albert Jans (d. 1770) from 1738, Jan Peters (d. 1760) from 1751, Harm Roelofs (d. 1791) from 1753, Otto Willems 1764-88, Jacob Harkes 1776-96, Hendrik Bavink 1786-89, and Pieter Harmens de Vries 1790-96. Isaack ten Kate (d. 1839), who served here in 1796-1836, was the last untrained preacher of the congregations, the first preacher educated at the Amsterdam Seminary being Jacob Bodisco, who served at Noordbroek and Nieuw-Scheemda 1840-49. He was followed by H. ten Cate Hoedemaker 1850-52, F. J. Klaasesz 1853-58, J. ten Bruggencate 1859-71, P. E. Lugt 1872-74, B. ten Bruggencate 1874-1900, Iz. Hulshoff 1901-3, J. H. van Giessen 1904-6, and J. M. Vis 1907-45. After Vis's resignation the pastor of Sappemeer was charged with the preaching and catechetical service in Noordbroek. vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2146-49; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, passim, see Index; DJ 1840, 52; 1850, 57; DB 1879, 5, 7 f.; ML III, 265.

Noordeind van Graft en Rijp, a Dutch Mennonite congregation: see Graft.

Noordholland, Vriesche (Friesche) Doopsgezinde Sociëteit in, was a conference of Mennonite congregations of the (Old) Frisian branch in the Dutch province of North Holland. It was founded about 1628 to assist in maintaining the old Mennonite principles and practices. In 1639 twelve articles were drawn up, in 1697 somewhat altered and augmented, which summarized these principles. Until 1729 these articles were regularly read at the sessions of the Conference, always being "adopted without comment." After 1729 the reading was omitted.

Another purpose of the Conference was to organize the preaching, baptism, and communion services in the member congregations. For this purpose conference elders (called Landsdienaren), usually two, visited the congregations. After about 1730 three "commissarissen voor den predikdienst" organized the services in congregations where there was no minister. The third, and from about 1730 the most important, business of the Conference was to give financial support to weak congregations.

The Conference was presumably established by the Old Frisian congregation at Hoorn and particularly its Elder Pieter Jansz Twisck (q.v.). The following 19 congregations were members: Amsterdam Frisian congregation (when this congregation merged in 1752 with the Zonist congregation the latter became a member), Aalsmeer aan de Uiterweg, Hoorn, Medemblik, Alkmaar (Ridderstraat congregation), Edam, Zaandam-West (Oude Huys), Westzaan op 't Zuid, Wormerveer op 't Zuid, Oosthuizen (later called Beemster), Middelie and Axwijk, Venhuizen, Twisk and Abbekerk, Lange- and Koedijk, Oude Niedorp, Barsingerhorn and Kolhorn, Huisduinen and Den Helder, Burg and Waal on the island of Texel, Hippolytushoef and 't Stroe on the island of Wieringen. Purmerend was a member in the 17th century and again after 1793. Amsterdam withdrew in 1802.

Until 1798 meetings were held annually, at first on various dates, and after about 1740 on the second Wednesday of June. After 1798 the meetings were held only every two years. Originally they met at different places, then for a long period at Edam, 1709-19 in Alkmaar, and 1719-1804 in rotation at Hoorn, Alkmaar, Amsterdam, Zaandam, and Wormerveer, and 1806-18 in Alkmaar. Since 1818 no meetings have been held. In 1841 the Conference merged with the Rijper Sociëteit (q.v.). vdZ.

Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 70-81, and 223-28 (containing the twelve articles); DB 1872, 53 f.; DJ 1935, 34-45; 1940, 59 f.

Noordhollandsche Ring van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten (North Holland Circle of Mennonite Congregations) is an organization founded in 1844 to arrange for regular services in congregations without a minister, the preachers of the other congregations of the group serving these congregations in rotation. (DJ 1850, 35 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 945-51.) vdZ.

Noordhollandsche Weduwenfonds (Fund for the Relief of Widows of Mennonite Pastors in the Dutch Province of North Holland): see Fonds tot Ondersteuning.

Noordhorn, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen (q.v.), where there is a Mennonite congregation. Not much is known about the origin of this congregation; it was apparently founded in an early period. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 29 or 32 persons here in 1551-82. In 1621 Mattheus Janssen of Noordhorn, who was appointed as a delegate of the Landdag (legislature) of the province of Groningen, was not admitted to its sessions because he was a Mennonite. The Noordhorn congregation was formerly called Humsterland (q.v.) and also Oldehove and Ter Horne, where the old church stood. This old church, which was difficult of access and in need of repairs, was replaced in 1838 by a new one more centrally located in the village of Noordhorn, where a parsonage was also built. Since that time it has been known as the Noordhorn congregation. For a long time, 1818-71, Gerrit Bakker was the preacher here, who took an active part in the organization of the Groningen Sociëteit (Conference) and was its first secretary. During this time the membership rose from 40 to 90. In 1872 a new parsonage was built. In 1877 Noordhorn was one of the few congregations which did not require adult baptism in receiving a member of another creed; it was also one of the first Dutch Mennonite congregations to allow women to vote. The baptized membership was 85 in 1861, 89 in 1900, but only 70 in 1957. During the last half century the following pastors served here: A. de Jong 1898-1910, R. D. Boersma 1912-22, Miss F. Tieks Koening 1936-42, J. H. Rawie 1942-46, and S. S. Smeding 1946- . Since 1946 the pastor of Noordhorn has also been the pastor of the Grijpskerk (q.v.) congregation. To the Noordhorn congregation also belongs the Mennonite Kring (circle) of Oldehove (q.v.). The congregation has a ladies' circle, a youth group, and activities of youth workers (age 12-15). vdZ.

Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2150-53; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 52, 86, 206, 238; II, 40; DJ 1837, 34 f.; 1840, 27 f., 1850, 60; DB 1861, 152; 1877, 148; 1906, 46; ML III, 265.

Noord-Oost-Polder (Northeast Polder), an area of 128,520 acres reclaimed from the Zuiderzee, Netherlands, in 1940, now consisting of fertile arable land. On Jan. 23, 1948, the Mennonites living here formed a Kring (circle), which in 1953 became an independent congregation. Services are held biweekly in a rented hall at Emmeloord. H. H. Gaaikema, the pastor of the Harlingen congregation, has charge of this congregation. The baptized membership in 1955 was 41, and 60 in 1957. vdZ.

Noor(t)dijk, Pieter, b. ca. 1660 at Amsterdam, d. on Nov. 20, 1708, at Amsterdam, a Dutch Mennonite minister, trained for the ministry by Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), was a preacher of the Utrecht congregation in 1685-1704, and of the Lamist congregation in Amsterdam in 1704-8. In January 1699 he was invited to replace Galenus Abrahamsz as the preacher of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation and as a professor of its seminary, but he declined and Galenus retained his position. Again after the death of Galenus (1706) Noortdijk was invited to become a professor of the seminary, but he again refused. vdZ.

H. B. Berghuys, Geschiedenis der Doopsgez. Gemeente te Utrecht (n.p., n.d., Utrecht, 1926) 41, 43-45; H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz (Haarlem, 1954) 169 f., 181, 187, 192; DB 1918, 53, 67.

Norden, a town (pop. 16,800) in East Friesland (q.v.), Germany, in the (formerly Prussian) district of Aurich. It has been the seat of a Mennonite congregation since the second half of the 16th century. The publications of J. P. Müller and Jan ten Doornkaat Koolman give much information on the history of the Norden congregation, which once occupied a leading place among the Mennonites.

Since Anna (q.v.), regent of East Friesland in 1528-40, offered protection to all victims of religious persecution, Mennonite refugees from Holland settled in the town of Emden (q.v.) about 1530; Menno Simons also came about 1542 and preached there until 1545. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) visited Norden three or four times in 1563-65, baptizing 15 persons, and about 1575 two more. In that time, or even earlier, congregations were formed in Emden, Aurich, Leer, and Norden, which were not seriously disturbed until the Thirty Years' War and which were given many a concession by the government.

Under Enno III (q.v.), 1599-1625, when the center of Mennonitism in East Friesland moved from Emden to Norden, the Lutheran clergy began to use their influence upon the authorities to have the Mennonite worship services suppressed, who were accustomed to gather "when the church bells rang and Christian sermons were delivered and thus drew many simple Christians to themselves." The count was persuaded to announce a mandate on Nov. 21, 1612, against the open preaching of Mennonite doctrine. After many years of effort on the part of the Mennonites the count consented to permit the 400 Mennonites living in the principality the free exercise of their religion for ten years in return for a fee of 12,000 Talers; but the services were not permitted to be held publicly.

During the Thirty Years' War, when deep misery passed over the country, the attitude toward the Mennonites underwent a change. Enno's son Rudolf Christian (1625-28) issued a letter of protection on May 26, 1626, for which an annual payment of six Talers was to be made by each Mennonite family.

By the end of the war there were sixty Mennonite families in Norden, who were divided into two branches after the beginning of the 17th century—the moderate Waterlanders (q.v.), and the rigidly traditional Groningen Old Flemish (q.v.). The division was due less to matters of faith than to differences of opinion, especially in matters of dress. After the coming of Uko Walles (q.v.), a peasant with an unusual gift of oratory who belonged to the stricter branch of the Old Flemish and had a great following in Norden after 1633, the clergy of Norden again raised complaint and demanded the expulsion of Uko, but were not successful; instead, Ulrich II gave the Old Flemish a special letter of protection on Nov. 26, 1635.

Because the Mennonites refused to give up the letter of protection when Christine Charlotte assumed the government as princess in 1665, she issued a mandate on June 20, 1666, forbidding them to hold worship services, and threatening expulsion from the country in case of transgression; but the mandate was not enforced. On the contrary, on Dec. 7, 1666, the Old Flemish received their letter of protection upon payment of 400 Talers, and the Waterlanders upon payment of 800 Talers; these were renewed on Dec. 19, 1690, by Prince Christian Eberhard, 1690-1708, in return for a large sum of money.

A petition made by the Mennonites to Prince George Albrecht on Jan. 22, 1709, for permission to admit persons of other churches into the Mennonite brotherhood was refused with the comment that they could hope for such a privilege only if they gave him a gift of 3,000 Talers. In this negotiation the government official explained in defense of the Mennonites that they were much less wealthy than formerly, for the richest had joined the Lutherans, other wealthy ones had died, and the Mennonites were heavily burdened with large families; but on the other hand, they made themselves of use everywhere and were of benefit to the country. On April 10, 1709, the Old Flemish, and on April 16 the Waterlanders, received their letters of protection upon payment of the stipulated sum.

From 1723 on, the center of the brotherhood in East Friesland was gradually transferred from Norden to Leer (q.v.). The Old Flemish congregations of Emden and Norden in the 17th century seem to have been served by the same minister. In 1715 the two congregations separated, and henceforth each had its own minister.

The last prince of East Friesland, Carl Edzard, 1734-44, was friendly toward the Mennonites. The letter of protection of May 30, 1738, shows understanding of both wings. In 1739 the Mennonites were ordered to keep a record of births. Marriages could be performed by the Mennonite preachers, but had to be registered with the pastor of the established church. On Oct. 14, 1739, the Mennonites were ordered to keep church records. After the death of Carl Edzard, East Friesland passed to Prussia on Aug. 19, 1744. For a new letter of protection the Mennonites in Norden and Leer were required to pay 1800 Talers. King Frederick William also gave them a letter in return for a payment of 900 Talers.

The Waterlanders in Norden had a church and a parsonage, as well as an almshouse on the west side of the square. The Old Flemish met for worship in a leased house. When they were notified that the lease could not be renewed, they reached an agreement with the Waterlanders to use their church when the home congregation was not using it. On April 13, 1780, the Old Flemish congregation, which had a membership of 56 besides 49 children, united with the Waterlanders, so that there was in Norden, as there had been for some time in Emden and Leer, a single united congregation, which adopted a constitution on June 29, 1793. Ministers of the Old Flemish congregation in 1715 were Cornelis Eppes and Claes Folkerts. Gerrit Hilbrantsz served until about 1740, Heert Cornelisz (d. 1761) 1721-*ca.*55, Job Abrahamsz 1732-d.67, Jan Warners 1733-*ca.*54, Rijke Jansz 1755-*ca.*68, Harmen Allertsz (Alless) Kremer 1755-*ca.*68. All these ministers had been chosen out of the congregation. The following three ministers, though still untrained, were called in: Nolle Abeles Venema, serving 1768-75, Hendrik J. Blaauw 1775-76, and Daniel Rieken (Ricken), a Swiss Mennonite, 1777-d.79. Concerning the Waterlander congregation the list is not complete: preachers in 1690 were Jan Oom Hendriks (Jan Hendriks Bakker), Jannes Abrams, and Pieter van Geuns. Pieter van Geuns served this congregation from before 1690 until 1740, and Marcus Arisz 1741-85.

The Lutheran clergy continued to interfere in the internal affairs of the Mennonites in Norden and to secure financial advantages for themselves. On May 19, 1795, they presented a long letter of complaint to Frederick William II (q.v.) of Prussia, chiefly on the ground that the Mennonites were having their own preachers deliver their funeral sermons, instead of calling in a Lutheran clergyman and paying him a louis d'or. On Aug. 5, 1795, the king's decision rejected all the points in the Lutheran complaint.

The Mennonites were now seriously planning to replace their old church, which looked more like a barn than a church, with a more suitable edifice. A house was bought, remodeled, furnished with an organ. Services were conducted in Dutch until 1885. Until then the Amsterdam Mennonite hymnal was also used; after 1885 the hymnbook of the Reformed Church in East Friesland was adopted.

In 1802 the Lutherans attempted to require contributions from Mennonites for repair of Lutheran churches. The Mennonites refused, saying that they did not use the Lutheran churches and that they had built their own without Lutheran assistance. The Lutherans replied that the Mennonites had after all used Lutheran services, such as visits to the sick, funeral sermons, etc., and had used the Lutheran church bell for their funerals. Again the Lutheran demands were rejected. In 1826 there was again some difficulty when the Mennonites and Reformed were required to contribute toward the Lutheran almshouse, although they were supporting their own poor. This problem was solved by giving Mennonites and Reformed permission to make use of the Lutheran almshouses.

When the new constitution for Hannover was to be drafted, the Mennonites of Norden presented a petition for equal recognition with other denominations (June 1831). It was refused. But in 1848, in view of the political movements in Germany, which among other things granted equal status to all creeds, a law was passed making civil rights independent of church affiliation.

The membership of the Norden congregation has steadily declined. In the Waterlander congregation 208 took communion in 1698; 116 in 1737. The membership of the Old Flemish church in 1715 numbered about 70 baptized members, 51 in 1733, 56 in 1769 after it had merged with the small congregation of Krummhörn (q.v.), a few years previously. At the merger the baptized membership of the united congregation was 140; in 1890, 104 and 92 children; in 1940 this number had decreased to 68 and 12 children; in 1955 the number was 125. After the merger the united congregation at first was served by the preacher of the former Waterlander congregation, Marcus Arisz, who served until 1785. Other ministers serving here were Hendrik Bavink 1781-86, Arend van Gelder 1785-95, Dirk Huizinga 1802-9, Jan van Hulst 1809-44, Johannes Pol 1847-84, L. Hesta 1884-89, and C. A. Leendertz 1889-1931. In 1934 Abraham Fast, pastor of Emden, took upon himself the charge to serve also in Norden. In 1957 he was succeeded by his son Heinold Fast.

Formerly there were many contacts between the congregations of Norden, both the Old Flemish and the Waterlander, and Holland. In 1681 Galenus Abrahamsz, the minister of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation, was called to Norden to settle a quarrel in the Waterlander congregation. In the following years this congregation was several times financially supported by Amsterdam for the salary of its preachers. In 1686 and again in 1718 both congregations, having been struck in previous years by severe floods, received aid from the Dutch congregations. Johannes Deknatel (q.v.), the pietistic minister of Amsterdam, was a native of Norden. It was Deknatel who trained the Norden preacher Marcus Arisz for the ministry. Both Arisz (1719-85), a native from Amsterdam, and his wife Catharina Leeuw of Haarlem, were influenced by Deknatel and friends of the Moravian Brethren, which caused some conflicts in the Norden congregation.

Among the outstanding Mennonite families of Norden are Cremer (Antje Cremer ten Doornkaat, married to Isaak Brons, was born in Norden), Brouwer (Brouer), ten Doornkaat, and Stroman. (See East Friesland.) Hege, vdZ.

Jan ten Doornkaat Koolman, Kurze Mitteilungen aus der Gesch. der . . . Norder Gemeinde . . . (Norden, 1903); idem, Mitteilungen aus der Gesch. der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Norden im 19. Jahrhundert (Norden, 1904); L. Hesta, "De laatste bladzijde van de Gesch. der Out-Vlaamsche gem. te Norden," DB 1895, 75-100; J. P. Müller, Die Mennoniten in Ostfriesland . . . (Amsterdam, 1887); Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1095, 1147; II, Nos. 1872, 2814-48; DJ 1840, 45 f., 57; 1850, 63; DB 1862, 152; 1863, 102; 1875, 54; 1879, 8; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 226 f.; Zondagsbode XVII (1903-4) Nos. 29-36; ML III, 270-72.

Nordheim (Marinovka), a village in the Memrik settlement (q.v.) in the province of Ekaterinoslav, Russia, which was settled in 1885 by 32 landless and poor Mennonites from the Molotschna and Chortitza settlements. At first the inhabitants had hardly enough to shelter them from the cold and rain; but in a few years they became prosperous through industrious cultivation of a basically good soil. In 1887 the village built a school. In 1912 it had a population of 203. Hege.

D. H. Epp, Die Memriker Ansiedlung (Berdyansk, 1910) 89-91; Neuer Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender (Odessa, 1913) 51; ML III, 272.

Nordheim Mennonite Church (GCM) of Dundurn, Sask., about 30 miles south of Saskatoon, was one of the first churches to be organized after the immigration of Russian Mennonites in 1923, being organized in 1925 by Elder Johann J. Klassen, an immigrant from Russia. This congregation has four meeting places (churches): one in the village of Dundurn; the Pleasant Point Church, 9½ miles northeast of Dundurn; the Hanley Church, 10 miles west of Hanley; and the fourth, 11 miles east of Elbow, Sask. This meetinghouse is owned jointly by the Mennonite Brethren and the General Conference Mennonites. The congregation belongs to the Conference of Mennonites in Canada. It had 285 baptized members in 1956, with G. J. Warkentin as minister in charge. G.J.W.

Nordheim Mennonite Church (GCM), located near Winnipegosis in the rural municipality of Mossy River, 6½ miles northwest of Fork River, Man., a member of the General Conference of Mennonites of Canada, was organized in 1933 with 38 members, under the leadership of Gerhard Goertzen. In 1956 the membership was 114, mostly rural. The meetinghouse, a log structure with a seating capacity of 400, was built in 1935. Other ministers who have served the congregation are Jakob Martens, Abram Bergen, and C. C. Janzen. C.C.J.

Nordhorn, an industrial town in Germany near the Dutch border, where there are a number of Mennonites, mostly engaged in textile industries, e.g., the Stroink family. About 1880 services were occasionally held in a private house, but the plan to found a congregation was never carried out. The Mennonites of Nordhorn have joined the Gronau (q.v.) congregation. vdZ.

Nördlingen, a town (pop. 13,000) in Bavaria, Germany, situated on the Eger, formerly a free imperial city, in which the Anabaptist movement occasionally found a following. Soon after the origin of the Swiss Brethren in Zürich, a congregation of former Catholics was formed in Nördlingen, which left it to the parents to decide whether they would baptize their infants after birth or have them consecrated by the laying on of hands (q.v.) in the presence of the congregation (Roosen, p. 76 and 86), baptism on confession of faith to follow later.

Little is known about this group. Ambrosius Spittelmeier (q.v.), who was seized in Erlangen and executed on Feb. 6, 1528, had planned a visit to the Nördlingen congregation. In 1531 the city authorities succeeded in capturing two foreign Anabaptists, Melchior Gram of Geisslingen and Stephan Baltzer of Weil. They were banished from the city for refusing to swear a required oath. On March 30, 1534, the magistrate issued an order to expel all Anabaptists. Later on the Anabaptists who did not join the state church emigrated to Württemberg and Moravia. Hege.

H. Clauss, "Wiedertäufer in der ehemaligen Reichsstadt Nördlingen," in Jahrbuch des Historischen Vereins für Nördlingen und Umgebung (1933) 144-48; B. C. Roosen, "Pieter Beets über die Einsegnung der neugeborenen Kinder," in Menn. Bl., 1900, 76 and 86; ML III, 275.

Norfolk County is located in southeast Virginia. In the eastern part of the county, about 12 miles from Norfolk and 2 miles from Fentress, a Mennonite settlement of approximately 225 persons was located in 1957. A few families were living across the county line east in Princess Anne County. To the west in the same county was the Portsmouth settlement of approximately 90 persons. The Portsmouth area church is known as Deep Creek and the Fentress church is named Mount Pleasant. Both have Christian day schools. The first Mennonites arrived in the county in 1899 and the first church was dedicated in May 1910. Several Conservative Amish Mennonite families were living in the county. They were affiliated with the larger settlement near Kempsville, Princess Anne County. L.H.W.

Norma Mennonite Mission (MC), located at Norma, near Vineland, N.J., was opened in a Jewish refugee community by the Mission Board of the Lancaster Conference. The meetinghouse is a church, 24 x 40 ft., that had been closed. It was dedicated as a mission in January 1957. Amos Horst is the bishop in charge (1957). D.S.K.

Normal, Ill., a twin city (pop. 12,000) with Bloomington on its south, in McLean County, is the site of Illinois State Normal University. Mennonites living in and around the city are almost all of the Central District Conference (GCM). The First Mennonite Church of Normal with 230 members, is located within the city, at University and Church Streets. Approximately 400 Mennonites live within the trading area of Normal. R.L.H.

Normal First Mennonite Church (GCM), Normal, Ill., was organized in March 1912, with 35 charter members, as the result of the interest and efforts of Peter Schantz, Sr., minister of the East White Oak Mennonite Church, not far from Normal, in providing opportunity for fellowship and worship for Mennonites who then lived in Bloomington and Normal. Services were held in rented quarters until a church was built at the present location, Church and University Streets. This frame structure was remodeled in 1951. The church had a membership of 230 in 1957, with H. N. Harder as pastor. R.L.H.

Normanvillars, a Mennonite settlement on the border of the Sundgau (southern Alsace) and the Territory of Belfort, in a forest area called by that name, some 10-15 miles northeast of Montbéliard, southeast of Belfort, and north of Delle in Switzerland. The settlement was established in 1747-80 by Mennonite families coming from the Swiss Jura to the south and a few Amish families coming from the Montbéliard area to the southwest. By 1791, according to a military census, 23 of the 97 families in the commune of Florimont were Mennonite. By the end of the 18th century the rather extended settlement was divided into two organized congregations, both meeting in homes, the one to the north called La Maie (later Belfort, q.v.), the one in the south called Florimont (q.v.). The first meetinghouse at Normanvillars, the Chapelle des Fermes, was erected in 1849 after many members had emigrated. The beginning of emigration to America was in 1819. A number of families settled in Putnam County, Ohio, others in western Waterloo County, Ont. For a detailed account of the Normanvillars settlement see D. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists and their American Descendants (Scottdale, 1950) 89-95 et passim. H.S.B.

Norris Square Mennonite (MC) Church (formerly Mennonite Home Mission), located in Philadelphia, Pa., began as a mission Sunday school in the spring of 1899, with Joseph Bechtel, a building contractor, as superintendent. It was sponsored by the "Lancaster County Sunday School Mission" (now the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities), who sent Amanda Musselman and Mary Denlinger as full-time city missionaries. The Lancaster and Franconia conferences alternated in supplying preachers for Sunday services until 1922, when J. Paul Graybill was stationed as pastor-superintendent (now bishop of the congregation). Originally at 1930 East York St., the work is now located at 2147-51 North Howard St. and belongs to the Lancaster Conference. The present name was adopted in 1938, an important year in the organization of the congregation, when a deacon, Joseph Bromley, Sr., was chosen from within the congregation. In 1946 Jacob Frederick was chosen minister in a similar way, to assist the pastor-superintendent, Clarence Y. Fretz. Teaching the Bible has been a prominent feature of the work from the first; large-scale literature distribution for the last twenty-five years; and open-air evangelism for the last five years. The summer Bible school movement in eastern Mennonite (MC) churches had its beginning here in 1927, and the weekday Bible school movement in 1931. During the depression of 1932 eighteen hundred families were helped. In 1956 the total baptized membership was 33, with Jacob Frederick as pastor. C.Y.F.

Alta Mae Erb, Studies in Mennonite City Missions (Scottdale, 1937) 38-44; Clarence Y. Fretz, "Mennonitism in Philadelphia," Christian Monitor, June-July, 1945 (Scottdale) 133, 134, 165, 166; Ira D. Landis, The Missionary Movement Among Lancaster Conference Mennonites (Scottdale, 1938) 41-47; John C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937) 333.

Norristown First Mennonite (MC) Church in Norristown, Pa., a member of the Franconia Conference, was founded in 1919 as the Mennonite Gospel Mission, the first mission station in the Franconia Conference. Meetings were held first in a residence purchased at 21 W. Marshall St. In 1924 a one-story brick auditorium annex was erected. In 1949 a Jewish synagogue adjacent to the residence was purchased and renovated and is since then the meetinghouse. In the same year the congregation became self-sustaining. In 1956 there were 71 members.

At the beginning the work was in charge of resident superintendents, among whom were Elmer Moyer (1919-20), Allen Freed (1920-21), Willis K. Lederach (1921-28), William G. Detweiler (1928-31), Llewellyn Groff (1931-34), William Hoffman (1934-35), and Paul Mininger (1935-36), although the pulpit was supplied by visiting ministers until 1936. On Nov. 10 of that year Markley H. Clemmer was ordained for Norristown as the first resident pastor; he is still serving. Harold K. Weaver was ordained deacon in 1941. J. C. Clemens served as visiting pastor in 1929-31, succeeded by several others. Paul M. Lederach was ordained as an associate pastor in 1944. He served until 1950. On Nov. 10, 1956, Paul M. Hackman was ordained to assist in the work. The church at Norristown pioneered in young people's Bible meeting and summer Bible school work in the Franconia Mennonite Conference. It has been largely responsible for the establishment of two other missions—Bridgeport, Pa. (opened in 1946), and Conshohocken, Pa. (opened in 1948). P.M.L.

Norristown (Pa.) State Hospital was the location of Civilian Public Service Unit No. 66, from December 1942 to October 1946. Over 160 men served in this unit, which was under Mennonite administration. The average was 100 men for much of the period. Although the men served primarily as attendants in the mental hospital, after a period of time they were being used in nearly all of the activities of the institution. Files is a 48-page yearbook published by the men in the unit. Norristown has continued to be a center for work for men in I-W service. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 222-23.

North Abbotsford Mennonite Brethren Church, located at Abbotsford, B.C., a member of the Canadian District M.B. Conference, was organized on Dec. 27, 1935, with 24 members. George Rempel was elected leader of the group. Other leaders have been George Doerksen, C. C. Peters, and J. J. Doerksen; assistant ministers have been George Rempel, D. P. Esau, C. C. Peters, G. P. Warkentin, J. J. Doerksen, J. P. Wiebe, A. A. Toews, A. H. Wieler, and G. Giesbrecht. The church has two choirs and an extensive program of Christian activity for the young people. The 1954 membership was 287, with H. H. Nikkel as pastor, assisted by J. F. Redekop.
J.J.D.

North America. The first Mennonites in North America were Dutch "Menists" reported to be in Manhattan (now New York City) and Gravesend, Long Island, near New York City, as early as 1644. Nothing is known of them except these reports, and no permanent settlement was made. Plockhoy's ill-starred colony on the Delaware, south of Chester, Pa. (1663-65), was scarcely Mennonite. Permanent Mennonite settlement began in 1683 (really not until 1685) at Germantown, near Philadelphia, Pa., with a small group from the Lower Rhine and Hamburg (ca. 100 families 1683-1705). The major immigration began in 1707-10 from the Palatinate and Switzerland into the territory north and west of Philadelphia, Pa., continuing until about 1756, when it was relatively stopped by the French and Indian War (1756-63), and was not resumed in force until after the close of the Napoleonic Wars in 1815. By that time Eastern Pennsylvania was filled, and the new groups located west of the Alleghenies and on west to central Illinois or to Ontario. The major element in the migration of 1815-60 was of Amish from Alsace, Bavaria, and Hesse, although also a considerable body of Swiss came in this period to Ohio and Indiana. While the German and Swiss immigration slowed to a trickle after this, a very large migration from Russia brought another ethnic group to North America in 1874-80, followed by a later, still larger movement from Russia in 1922-25, a small one 1930-39, and a larger one again in 1947-50. A minor movement of this ethnic element came from South America (chiefly Paraguay) to North America in 1950-57. (For a fuller account, see Migrations.)

Until 1824 all Mennonite immigrants from Europe to America settled only in the United States. Internal migration from Eastern Pennsylvania to Ontario (q.v.) in 1785-1840 established a substantial Mennonite base there. This furnished the attraction for all later substantial Mennonite movements to Canada. First were the Amish from Alsace-Lorraine and Bavaria in 1824-50, located adjacent to the Pennsylvania Mennonites west of Kitchener. The very large migration from Russia to Manitoba in 1874-80 was made possible largely by the leadership of Jacob Y. Shantz (q.v.), a Mennonite of Kitchener, and the financial aid of the Ontario Mennonites. The large later movements from Russia to Canada (almost all the Russian immigrants of 1922-25 and later came to Canada) were made possible largely by the aid of Russian Mennonites already in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. The freer immigration policy of the Canadian government, in contrast to the restrictive policy of the United States, together with the greater availability of land for settlement in Canada, of course played a major role in the diversion of the 20th-century immigration to Canada. Since 1880 almost no Mennonites have immigrated to the United States, whereas the majority of the Canadian Mennonites are descendants of immigrants who arrived after 1920. This fact, coupled with the conservatism of the Manitoba Mennonites in general has resulted in retention of the German language among the Canadian Mennonites (with the exception of Ontario), in contrast to the United States where the use of German was effectively ended by World War I.

The third country of North America to have Mennonite settlements, Mexico, received them first in 1922 from Manitoba. Except for a very few who came from Russia in 1922-25, all Mennonites in Mexico came from Manitoba and Saskatchewan. All of them are of Russian origin, and all have maintained the German language, including the Kleine Gemeinde group, which came from Manitoba in 1947-49. The only substantial Mennonite emigration from North America has been that of the Old Colony Mennonites from Manitoba and Saskatchewan in 1926-30 (later groups 1945-48) who went to Paraguay.

Internal migration has scattered the Mennonites of North America westward from Pennsylvania, the east-central states, and the midwestern and prairie states and provinces to the Pacific Coast in both the United States and Canada.

In 1956 North America had 215,000 baptized Mennonites, with a total population of some 300,000. The baptized members are distributed as follows by groups and countries.

Body	U.S.	Canada	Total
Mennonite (MC)	70,513	6,586	77,369
Gen. Conference	35,764	14,005	49,769
Menn. Brethren	11,095	12,967	24,062
Old Order Amish	16,794	260	17,054
Old Order Menn.	3,887	1,915	5,802
Ch. of God in Christ	4,161	1,439	5,600
M.B.C. (Pa.)	4,635	———	4,635
Sommerfelder	———	3,785	3,785
Beachy Amish	2,677	———	2,677
E.M.B.	1,564	936	2,500
E.M. (Kleingemeinde)	25	1,900	1,925
Old Colony	———	2,155	2,155
Evan. Menn.	2,210	———	2,210
Rudnerweide	———	1,824	1,824
Chortitz	———	1,408	1,408
K.M.B.	1,527	176	1,703
Reformed	662	218	880
Stauffer	357	———	357
Weaver	60	———	60
Total	155,931	49,844	205,775
Hutterites	2,900	7,560	9,460

(Taken from Mennonite Yearbook and Directory 1957, Scottdale, Pa.)

The above table indicates that North American Mennonitism at the mid-20th century is not unified in one common fellowship. It is true that all, except the Old Colony group in Manitoba and Mexico and the Old Order Mennonites in the United States and Canada, co-operate organizationally in the Mennonite Central Committee in relief work, peace work, and service projects. But denominationally they remain distinct. The present groups are, however, by no means all the result of divisions, at least in North America. The Old Order Amish division and the M.B. and K.M.B. divisions were imported from Europe and have been maintained in North America. The latter two groups have just merged (1957), and a large block of the O.O.A. has gradually merged with the M.C. branch. Of the groups formed by division in North America (see pertinent denominational articles) the Central Conference has merged with the G.C.M. branch (1950), and the E.M. and E.M.B. groups work together in a joint conference (1952), and the Conservative (Amish) Mennonites have practically joined the M.C. The spirit of co-operation and mutual recognition is growing among the various major and minor groups, but no further organic union is in prospect for some time to come.

The history of North American Mennonitism cannot well be viewed as a whole, not only because of the lack of organic union, but also in part because of difference in time of arrival of the successive waves of immigrants, and in part because of the relative isolation geographically and culturally of the various groups from one another. The national boundary between Canada and the United States has had little significance. However, a more detailed account of the general and spiritual history of the North American Mennonites will be found under the articles Canada and United States, so divided for convenience only. H.S.B.

H. S. Bender, "The Mennonites of the United States and Canada," MQR XI (1937) 50-75; C. Henry Smith, The Mennonites of America (Goshen, 1909); idem, The Story of the Mennonites (Berne, 1941).

North Brabant, a Dutch province south of the Maas, population (1947) 1,180,133. There was a slight Anabaptist-Mennonite activity in this province during the 16th century. Anabaptists there were found at 's Hertogenbosch, Breda, Vught, and a few other places, but only in small numbers. In 1571 a small Mennonite congregation at Klundert (q.v.) in the west part of this province was exterminated by persecution. In the 17th century a Mennonite congregation existed, called "Brabandt, Breda en Oosterhout, united with Geertruydenberg." This congregation, belonging to the Flemish branch and regularly supported by the Flemish congregation of Rotterdam, died out shortly after 1670. Now the province of North Brabant is predominantly Catholic (90 per cent of the population in 1947). There are now (1957) only two Mennonite congregations, Breda (q.v.) with 91 members and Eindhoven (q.v.) with 205. There is a Mennonite Kring (circle) at 's Hertogenbosch-Vught, at Bergen op Zoom and at Tilburg. In 1909 there were about 331 Mennonites in North Brabant, in 1930, 452, and in 1947, 758. (DB 1912, 30-44; ML III, 269.) vdZ.

North Carolina, a state in southeastern United States on the Atlantic Coast immediately south of Virginia, population slightly over 4,000,000. Until 1955 no Mennonite congregations had ever been established in the state, except the Negro congregations established through the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren mission work in the far western part of the state near Elk Park since 1899. There are six preachers and eleven deacons in these congregations, with an attendance of about 180 at the Sunday morning services. This group is, however, not directly a part of the K.M.B. conference. In 1955 the Virginia Mennonite Conference established a mission in Hickory, 45 miles northwest of Charlotte, in the west-central part of the state, which in 1956 had 22 members.

Traces of resident Mennonites in North Carolina might be seen in the following facts. In 1778 the Colonial Assembly of North Carolina adopted a resolution stating "that all Quakers, Moravians, Dunkards and Mennonists . . . shall be admitted to the rights of citizens." Again in 1779 a resolution was adopted that the same categories of persons be exempted from the draft. There are other references to "Mennonists," all noted in Records of the Moravians in North Carolina III (Raleigh, N.C., 1926). Further the Herald of Truth for May 1866 reports a conversation with a soldier who knew of a Mennonite congregation in the state. J. F. Funk reported that J. S. Coffman was once sent to visit the supposed Mennonite congregation in North Carolina about 1880. According to Funk's oral report to the writer in 1926, Coffman found the group very much disorganized and not recognizable as Mennonites. H.S.B.

H. S. Bender, "Mennonites in North Carolina," MQR I (July 1927) 69-71.

North Central Conference of the Mennonite Church (MC) was a part of the Missouri-Iowa Conference until the merger in 1920 of all Mennonite (MC) and Amish conferences west of Indiana. It was then organized as the Dakota-Montana Conference in 1921. In 1945, because of its enlarged borders, the name was changed to the North Central Mennonite Conference. This was the smallest of the conferences organized at the time of the merger, and each of the other conferences (four) agreed to send a delegate to the annual conference held the second Thursday in June. In 1946 the Illinois Conference District requested that they be permitted to discontinue sending a delegate because they felt this conference could carry on without their help. The other conferences are still sending delegates, who are greatly appreciated. I. S. Mast served as the only bishop until 1926, when Eli G. Hochstetler was ordained. The district includes congregations in eastern Montana, North Dakota, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, having a total membership in 1956 of 766 in 10 congregations and 12 mission outposts, with 4 bishops, 20 ministers, and 4 deacons. The district annually sponsors a winter Bible school and a fall mission meeting. Since 1945 an annual ministers' conference has been held. F.E.K.

North Clinton Mennonite Church (MC), located one-half mile northwest of Wauseon, Ohio, was organized as a separate congregation under the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference in late 1957 as an extension of the West Clinton congregation, with E. B. Frey as bishop and Olen B. Nofziger as minister in charge. A 40 x 80 brick meetinghouse was erected in 1956, with a seating capacity of 300. The initial membership was about 150. H.S.B.

North Dakota. Mennonites first began to move into this state in the late 1890's. The first group of 10 Swiss Mennonite (GCM) families came from Freeman, S.D., in 1898, and settled in the Starkweather area in Mansey and Cavalier counties. In this same period Low German Mennonites (GCM) also moved in from the Mountain Lake, Minn., and Henderson, Neb., communities. The fact that land was available at reasonable prices seems to have been the special attraction. Land agents of the Great Northern Railroad Company were especially anxious for settlers to come. The first Old Order Amish came in 1894.

The first congregation of the Mennonite Church (MC) was established in 1903 at Minot (Surrey), when a group settlement was made by Amish Mennonites from the vicinity of Belleville, Pa. A second congregation was organized at Kenmare in 1905, which died out about 1939. Later congregations were organized at Wolford in 1916 and at Casselton in 1929.

Settlements were later made in a number of counties in the state, viz., McHenry, Billings, Burleigh, Wells, McLean, Rolette, Sheridan, Pierce, Walsh, Ward, Mountrail, and perhaps others. The settlements in Cavalier County near Alsen, Munich, and Langdon have always been the strongest. In this vicinity there are three General Conference Mennonite churches, one Mennonite Brethren, and one Church of God in Christ Mennonite church. In 1939 several of the churches in this area co-operatively established a Bible school at Munich. For many years the school operated only during the five winter months. One full-time teacher was engaged, usually assisted by several of the local ministers. The peak enrollment (35) was reached in 1941. In 1951 this Bible school became Bethany Bible Academy with G. W. Schroeder as superintendent. In 1954 the Academy had two instructors and 13 students.

While agriculture has remained the predominant vocation through the years, some of the Mennonites have ventured into business, especially in the Alsen and Munich area. Statistically, there are 1,000-1,100 Mennonites in the state, besides the 75 members of the one Hutterian Brethren colony in the state, distributed as follows: G.C.M. 313, M.B. 493, M.C. 218, C.G.C. 36. These congregations are as follows: Bethel (GCM) at Dresden, 40 members; Zion (GCM) at Arena, 31; Salem (GCM) at Munich, 166; Swiss (GCM) at Alsen, 76; Rosehill (MB) at Munich, 70; Harvey (MB), 206; McClusky (MB), 25; Sawyer (MB), 98; Kief (MB), 44; Lakeview (MC) at Wolford, 109; Red River Valley (MC) at Casselton, 45; Fairview (MC) at Minot, 55; Rockway Gospel Chapel at East Minot (MC), 9; North Unity (CGC) at Wales, 28; Grafton (CGC), 8; Old Order Amish at Wolford, 8; Forest River Farm, Hutterian Brethren, at Inkster, 75. J.D.U.

North Dakota Amish. Of the sixteen states which now contain established Old Order Amish communities, North Dakota was one of the last to receive the Amish. An interest in colonization to North Dakota began to manifest itself among the Amish in Indiana in 1893, and in Mifflin County, Pa., about 1896. A delegation of Amishmen from Elkhart County, Ind., consisting of Reuben L. Bontreger, Eli J. Bontreger, R. A. Yoder, J. A. Miller, and D. D. Kauffman, visited North Dakota in 1893. They were favorably impressed with the vast area of level country, recommended the Turtle Mountain district in Rolette County for prospective settlers. In the spring of 1894 four families from Indiana moved to North Dakota—R. A. Yoder, John D. Bontreger, Joni Hershberger, and M. H. Hochstedler, besides an unmarried John A. Yoder. These families settled near Rolla in Rolette County, but later moved to the Island Lake region near Mylo and Wolford.

In 1895 a mass movement of immigrants to North Dakota began, including many members of the Church of the Brethren as well as Amish, from several counties in Indiana and from Ohio and Kansas. Two special trains consisting of about ten coaches and some thirty cars carried the immigrants and their movables. Eli J. Bontreger, who was ordained a minister in 1894, and R. L. Bontreger left Indiana and with their families moved to North Dakota in 1895.

Several families in Mifflin County, Pa., became interested in the Dakotas about 1900. Jonas Renno, who owned and operated the Renno Mill near Belleville, moved there in 1898. Aaron Yoder, who married Renno's daughter, established his home there in 1901. In January 1903 D. D. Miller learned of a considerable group of Mennonites and Amishmen who were contemplating moving from Mifflin County to North Dakota. At Miller's suggestion the Belleville and Allensville, Pa., congregations (MC) met jointly on March 1, 1903, and ordained I. S. Mast to serve as minister for the new congregation about to move to Dakota. This group boarded the train at Reedsville, Pa., on March 30, 1903, and arrived at Surrey, N.D., on April 2. Some of the Nebraska families who moved to North Dakota were David Yoder, Solomon Yoder, and Isaac Kauffman.

For the next eight years families continued to come to Rolette and Pierce counties. Most of them filed claims on government land. The Amish settlement in North Dakota probably reached its peak in 1903, when there were about fifty families in the settlement, and two church districts.

Now (1956) Amish life in North Dakota is almost extinct. In 1903 families began to leave. In 1909 many families left for Colorado and elsewhere. The reasons for the disintegration of this apparently promising Amish community were in part severe winters, in part the limited medical and community service, and in part inability to adjust to the new environment. Many of the remaining members joined the Lakeview Mennonite congregation, organized in 1916, which is largely composed of members of Amish descent.

Eli J. Bontreger served as bishop of the North Dakota Amish church 1895-1910. He was succeeded by Jacob Graber and A. R. Gingerich. Bontreger continued to assist the Amish congregation, visiting the church twice a year until 1936, when Mahlon L. Yoder was ordained bishop. The Amish church in North Dakota now has only three members, and Mahlon L. Yoder is the present minister and bishop.

There was also at one time a small Old Order Amish settlement at Kenmare, N.D., also one at Bloomfield, Mont. F.E.K.

North Dallas Mennonite Brethren Church, sometimes called the Salt Creek Church, located northwest of Dallas, Polk Co., Ore., a member of the Pacific District Conference, was organized in 1904 with 24 charter members. Ministers were Jacob Toews, Abraham Buhler, P. C. Hiebert, H. S. Voth, John Enns, Dietrich Bartel, and H. F. Klaassen. In 1917 a group began to assemble also in Dallas, which organized in 1919 and received the North Dallas congregation into its membership on Jan. 7, 1923, as an integral part of the new Dallas (q.v.) congregation. G.H.J.

North Danvers Mennonite Church (GCM), located three miles northeast of Danvers, McLean Co., Ill., a member of the Central District Conference, was organized in 1871 with a ministry composed of Bishop Joseph Stuckey, John Strubhar, John Stahly, Christian Imhoff, Joseph Stalter, Michael Miller, and Jacob Miller, who represented the three orders of the Amish ministry—bishops, ministers, and deacons. The new church building was erected in 1872, remodeled in 1917. The membership in 1956 was 265, mostly rural. Other ministers have been Joash Stutzman, Peter Schantz, Joseph Clark, Joseph King, John Kohler, and Hugo J. Mierau. William B. Weaver was a long-time pastor, 1923-52. H.J.M.

North Easthope Reformed Mennonite Church is located in Perth Co., Ont., 12 miles northeast of Stratford. The land for the original building was purchased in 1871 under the leadership of ministers Christian Zimmerman of Perth County, and John Honderich of Waterloo County. In 1882 the building was moved and enlarged. In 1902 the building was again moved with an addition. Other ministers who served the congregation were Joseph Wilhelm of Perth County, and Frederick Weicker of Waterloo County. Since the ministers of this group are not assigned to one particular meetinghouse, but rotate in serving the three churches, one in Perth County and two in Waterloo County, the membership worshiping at one church cannot be determined. The present ministers (1955) are Harvey Gamp, Abram Honderich, and Aaron Yost, all of Waterloo County. The membership of the three groups is small. H.Ga.

North End Mennonite Church (MC), Steven Street, Lancaster, Pa., was started at Dillerville in 1934. When the grounds were needed for the expanding Armstrong Linoleum Company, the building was salvaged and used in a larger brick building at the present site. Earl M. Wert, who is still serving (1957), was ordained for this mission group on Feb. 24, 1946. The membership is 38. I.D.L.

North Enid Mennonite Brethren Church, also known as the Enid Country M.B. Church, is located three miles north of Enid in Garfield County, Okla. It is one of two Mennonite Brethren congregations in the area, the other being the City M.B. Church located in Enid.

Shortly after the opening of the Cherokee Strip in north-central Oklahoma, 1893, Mennonites began to settle in this area. Mennonite Brethren from Hamilton County, Neb., some of whom had come to America in the 1874 immigration from Russia, were among the original thirty charter members who organized as a congregation April 5, 1897. Klaas Penner was elected as their first leader in 1895; Peter Regier became the first ordained minister (1897 ff.) to serve this congregation as a pastor. In the years that followed others came from Nebraska as well as Kansas and the Dakotas.

The first meetinghouse was built and dedicated in 1898; this was replaced by a larger building (40 x 60 feet) in 1911, which is still used for worship. Two smaller buildings are used for Sunday-school classrooms. A parsonage in Enid was purchased in 1954. For several decades after 1921 the church operated a Bible school.

Though most of the early members were farmers, now about half of the members live in Enid. In its sixty years of existence more than 400 have been baptized and received into its membership; its present membership (1957) is 212.

The following ministers have served this congregation: Peter Regier, John Bese, John D. Hiebert, Gerhard Voth, P. P. Regier, Cornelius Grunau, G. A. Wiens, D. J. Dick, J. K. Siemens, A. A. Smith, P. C. Grunau, R. C. Seibel, and Clarence Hiebert, the present pastor. C.H.

P. C. Grunau, "North Enid Mennonite Brethren Church," Menn. Life IX (October 1954).

North Fork (Cal.) Civilian Public Service Camp No. 5 was located 50 miles northeast of Fresno and one-half mile northwest of North Fork at an altitude of 2,600 feet, near the base of the Sierra Nevadas. Opened in May 1942, it remained in operation until March 1946. It occupied the site of an abandoned Civilian Conservation Corps camp, and its work was chiefly fire prevention and fire fighting under the direction of the United States Forest Service. During the life of the camp 4,689 man-days were spent in fighting forest fires and 14,232 days in fire suppression. M.G.

Melvin Gingerich, Service for Peace (Akron, Pa., 1949) 138-39.

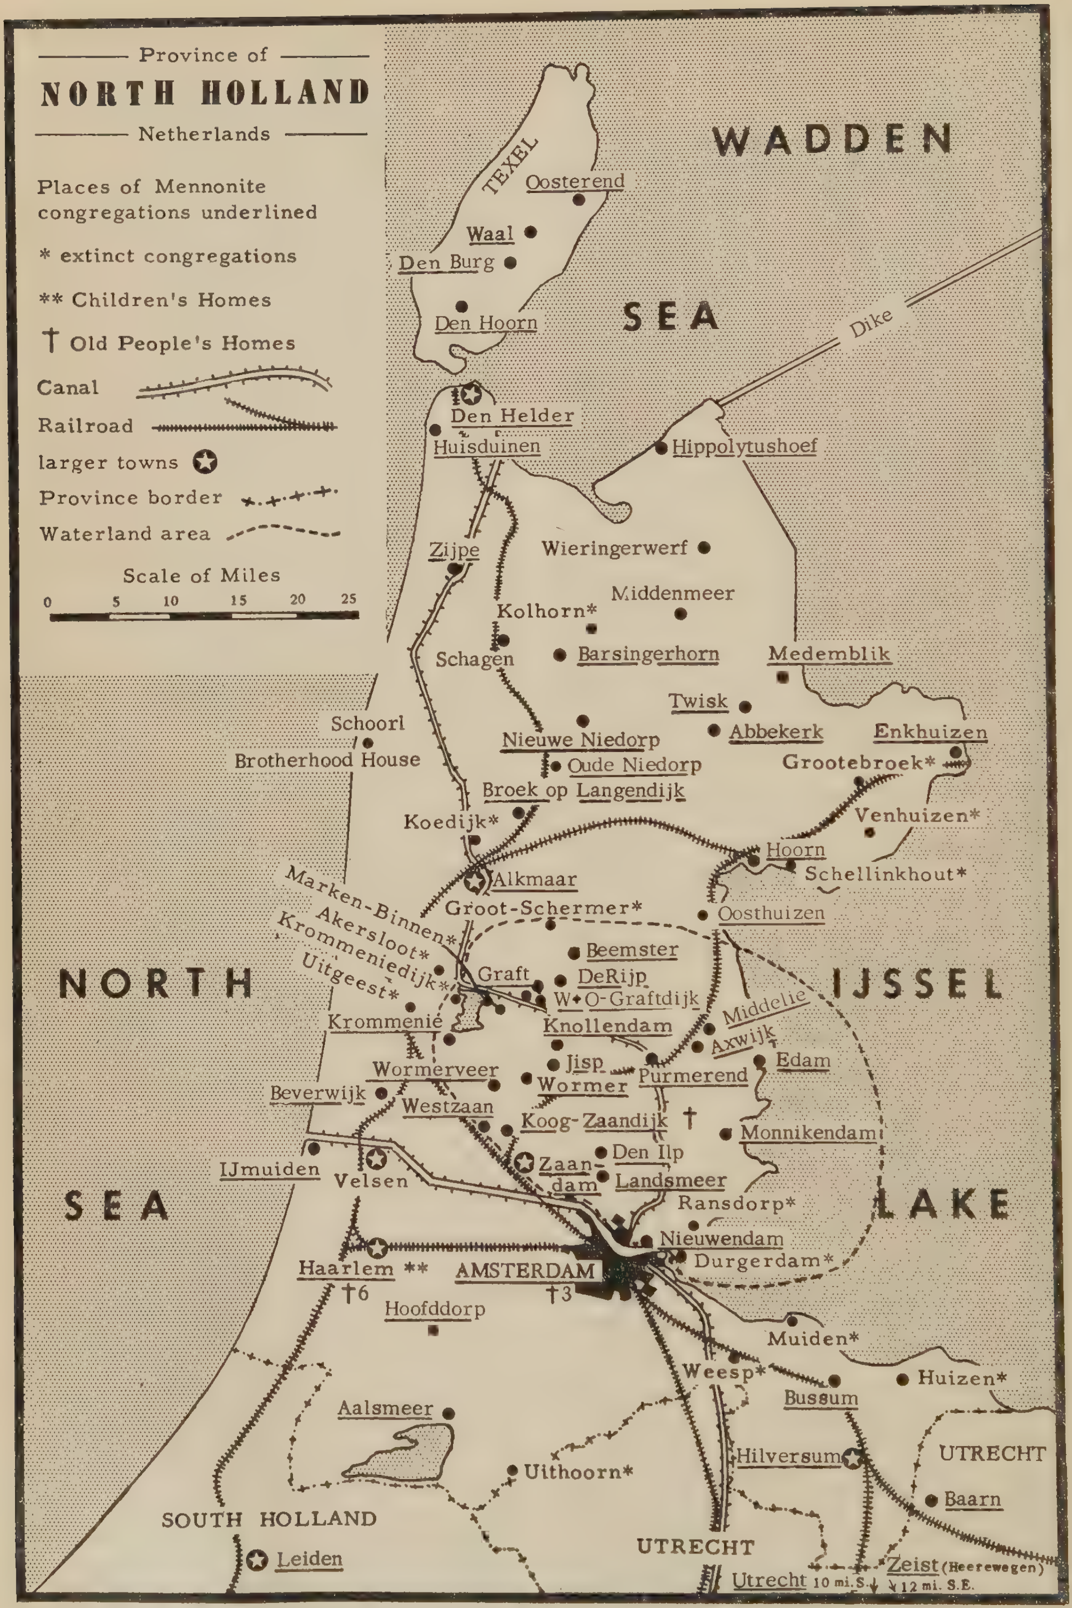
North Georgetown Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, 10 miles southwest of Salem, Ohio, near the village of New Alexandria, Columbiana County, was organized about 1840. In 1858 a small frame building was erected on land donated by Jacob Newcomer. Christian Holdeman (1788-1846), the father of the John Holdeman who founded the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, settled nearby in Knox Township, Columbiana Co., in 1825, moving to Wayne County in 1844. Henry Newcomer and Henry Walters were ministers. In 1879 the membership of this group was reported as about 15 members. The church never had a Sunday school; the last service was held in 1885. W.D.S.

North Goshen Mennonite Church (MC), located on Eighth Street in Goshen, Ind., a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference, is an outgrowth of Sunday-school work begun by the Goshen College



Province of
NORTH HOLLAND
Netherlands
Places of Mennonite congregations underlined
* extinct congregations
 Children's Homes
† Old People's Homes
Canal
Railroad larger towns
Province border
Waterland area
Scale of Miles
0 5 10 15 20 25
WADDEN
SEA
TEXEL
Oosterend
Waal
Den Burg
Den Hoorn
Dike
Den Helder
Huisduinen
Hippolytushoef
Wieringerwerf
Zijpe
Middenmeer
Kolhorn*
Schagen
Barsingerhorn
Medemblik
Twisk
Schoorl
Brotherhood House
Nieuwe Niedorp
Abbekerk
Enkhuizen
Oude Niedorp
Grootebroek*
Broek op Langendijk
Koedijk*
Venhuizen*
Hoorn
Schellinkhout*
Alkmaar
Marken-Binnen*
Akersloot*
Krommeniedijk*
Uitgeest*
Groot-Schermer*
Oosthuizen
Beemster
NORTH
Graft
DeRijp
W+O-Graftdijk
IJSSEL
Krommenie
Knollendam
Middelie
Axwijk
Wormerveer
Jisp
Edam
Beverwijk
Wormer
Purmerend
Westzaan
Koog-Zaandijk
†
Monnikendam
Den Ilp
IJmuiden
Velsen
Zaandam
Landsmeer
Ransdorp*
SEA
LAKE
Nieuwendam
Durgerdam*
Haarlem **
†6
AMSTERDAM
†3
Hoofddorp
Muiden*
Weesp*
Huizen*
Bussum
Aalsmeer
Hilversum
UTRECHT
Uithoorn*
Baarn
SOUTH HOLLAND
UTRECHT
Leiden
Utrecht 10 mi. S.
Zeist (Heerewegen) 12 mi. S.E.

YPCA as early as 1915. In 1936 an abandoned Baptist church near Wayland, Iowa, was hauled to Goshen, rebuilt, and dedicated in May 1937. This building has since been enlarged twice. Paul Mininger was pastor of the congregation when it became independent from the Goshen College Mennonite Church in 1942. The membership in 1957 was 328, with Paul Mininger serving as bishop, and Russell Krabill as bishop-pastor. John C. Wenger also served the congregation as deacon and minister prior to 1951. R.Kr.

North Holland (Noordholland), a province of the Netherlands between the North Sea and IJssel Lake (formerly Zuiderzee), area 1,016.4 sq. miles, population (1947) 774,273, with 28,492 Mennonites. In the Reformation period the area was smaller; but much land has been reclaimed since 1564, including Beemster Lake under the direction of J. A. Leeghwater (q.v.) 1610-14, Purmer 1622, Wormer 1626, Schermer 1632-35, and Haarlem Lake 1848-52. Since the 16th century many a fertile polder has been created; in 1597 Zijpe, 1610 Wieringerwaard, 1847 Anna Paulovnapolder, 1932 Wieringermeerpolder. Many Mennonites settled on these new lands as farmers. The province of North Holland in its present form dates from 1813. Formerly the boundary was formed by the IJ, and during the 17th and 18th centuries the southern part with the cities of Amsterdam and Haarlem belonged to South Holland rather than North Holland. In the following account the present status is understood.

The earliest traces of Anabaptists in North Holland are found about 1530; in that year Jan Volkertsz Trypmaker (q.v.) founded the congregation in Amsterdam; Melchior Hofmann (q.v.) baptized probably 50 persons here in 1531; and Anabaptists are also found in other places. Especially in 1533-34 the number increased rapidly. In Amsterdam 100 baptisms were performed on some days. In Monnikendam (q.v.) two thirds of the population were "contaminated," and in Westzaan about 200 persons were baptized in the winter of 1533-34.

Now the government began its violent measures of suppression and put many to death. Nevertheless the movement grew in strength. In this province, where the Anabaptists were more numerous than in any other Dutch province, the spirit of Münster (q.v.) was evident, but not dominant. To be sure, about 3,000 persons crossed the Zuiderzee on the way to Münster on March 24, 1534, following the call of Jan van Leyden, but these people were not revolutionaries. They were seized at the Bergklooster (q.v.) in Overijssel. Among them were many wealthy persons. The Anabaptist preachers above all rejected violence, as is seen in a ministerial conference held in Spaarndam near Haarlem in late 1534 or early 1535. The small following of Münster in North Holland is seen in the fact that Jan van Geelen (q.v.), the emissary from Münster, in his attempt to storm the Amsterdam city hall (May 10, 1535), actually had only elements from other places at his disposal, and also from the fact that the procurator of the Court of Holland needed only a small number of soldiers for his ruthless persecution. The Anabaptist movement was not eradicated by his raids in 1534 nor by the severe edict of June 10, 1535, which was aimed principally at the Anabaptists.

The Anabaptists remained numerous in North Holland and began to organize congregations. Menno Simons also was influential here. Jan Claesz (q.v.) of Alkmaar, who had some of Menno's books printed in Antwerp, and had distributed 600 copies of them, was executed for this deed in 1544. In 1556 Menno again visited North Holland. The elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized many here. When the outstanding elders, Menno, Bouwens, and Dirk Philips, adopted a stricter application of the ban, many congregations of North Holland were unable to follow their lead and adhered to the more lenient application. These were then known as the Waterlanders (q.v.) because they lived in the area called Waterland (between the IJ River and Hoorn); they were always the most influential and largest Mennonite branch in the province. They differed from the other groups by their individual piety, not considering their own group to be the only true church; they were also less negative to the world and to culture. But the other groups were also found in the province; especially in Haarlem and Amsterdam there were important congregations of the Flemish (q.v.) branch. A considerable number of Frisians were found particularly at Hoorn and Alkmaar.

In North Holland many difficulties remained even after the Spanish had been expelled (about 1580) and the government was in Reformed hands, though there were not so many difficulties as in the other provinces.

Concerning the oath (q.v.), the States-General decided that the Mennonites were to be excused from it in favor of a simple assertion. Regarding marriage it was decided in 1580 that Mennonites must report their marriages to the magistrate or the Reformed pastor. In 1606 marriage within one's own congregation was approved, provided the government was informed of the event. This regulation became the general practice but many difficulties arose in this connection. On the whole the Mennonites were excused from bearing arms, while on their part the Mennonites did all they could to support the government in other ways. Donations of money were repeatedly made. In 1673 the rural churches of North Holland alone raised 30,000 guilders besides clothing and bedding. The strict practice of nonresistance was abandoned. Especially among the Waterlanders it was repeatedly charged in the first half of the 17th century that their merchant ships were furnished with guns to protect them against pirates. Among the stricter branches, however, the principle was held throughout the century and well into the next, though it may have been more theory than practice.

In the early days there was opposition to holding government office, but by 1581 a change was becoming evident among the Waterlanders; in a conference held in that year it was decided that holding minor offices was permissible, provided there was no bloodshed connected with them. In the communities where the Mennonites were in the majority, when they were elected to the offices of bailiff or even mayor, they were permitted to withdraw from the office upon payment of a fine, which was, however, seldom paid. Nevertheless many Waterlanders held important administrative offices in the first half of the 17th century. Until the 18th century the Frisians retained their aversion toward holding government office.

The Mennonites were not recognized by the government; they were merely tolerated. This was the theory; the practice was different. Although there were occasional difficulties regarding marriage, inheritance, and the building of churches, the government protected these citizens, who were of such benefit to the welfare of the country. Thus the magistrate of Amsterdam took their part when the British government refused to give them money due them on the ground that they would not swear to their rights of possession. Again the Amsterdam government in 1642 took steps to aid the oppressed Mennonites in Switzerland. It was also the lenient attitude of the government that prevented the Reformed from undertaking suppressive steps. When the Reformed pastor in 1597 wanted to hold a public debate with Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.), the government forbade it. But when it was a question of Socinianism, the government sometimes interfered. In 1626 Jacques Outerman (q.v.), preacher at Haarlem, and in 1663 Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan had to answer for their teachings at court. The testimony of both was accepted. No wonder that the Dutch Mennonites rejoiced in this privilege; Hans Vlamingh, a Mennonite merchant of Amsterdam, wrote to a friend in Switzerland in 1569, that the Mennonites there were permitted to meet freely, sometimes 2,000 at one time and place, that in Amsterdam and elsewhere they had orphanages and almshouses, free of taxation, that they could perform their ordinances free of molestation; the government accepted their word instead of the oath; they were citizens like anybody else, but exempt from war and military service, for which they paid a certain tax.

The Mennonites were important in the cultural life of North Holland. Famous poets and painters in the Golden Age were Mennonites or of Mennonite descent or were associated with Mennonites. Many were engaged in commerce, thus contributing greatly to the economic prosperity of Amsterdam and Haarlem. The Zaan River region, now an important industrial district, owes its prosperity largely to its Mennonite merchants and manufacturers. Also in shipping and deep sea fishing the Mennonites played a significant part.

The consequence of this was a great prosperity and increasing luxury; the dangers therein were pointed out on many an occasion. Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan complains about the decline of the brotherhood. The complaint was certainly not unfounded. Not only in luxurious living did the changing spirit of the Mennonites express itself. The Mennonites no longer stood outside a world that they considered entirely evil; spiritually, too, contacts had been established with others. There was frequent connection with the Collegiants (q.v.); yet there was also a large proportion of Mennonites who did not favor this connection, and this difference caused strife in many a congregation, Waterlander as well as Flemish.

Another indication of the change in spirit was the fact that in many places the branches began to unite in the 18th century. It is therefore so much the more lamentable that a new division took place in 1664 at Amsterdam between the Lamists (q.v.) and the Zonists (q.v.), which split the congregation into two camps.

The 18th century was a time of decay; many congregations declined rapidly in numbers, especially those around the Zuiderzee, which bloomed in the Baltic trade and nearly perished in its decline. Edam dropped from 80 to 12 members in the 18th century; in Hoorn, where there were four congregations, the total membership dropped from 450 to less than 100. But other congregations also showed a decrease; Amsterdam from more than 2,300 (about 1700) to 1,385 in 1832, Haarlem from 3,000 in 1708 to 485 in 1834.

Twenty small congregations in North Holland died out. Some were combined with others. Many had no preacher in the first half of the 18th century. The various conferences (Sociëteit) performed a good work: the Waterlander or Rijper Sociëteit (q.v.), which must have been organized in the first half of the 17th century, though there is no record of it before 1694; the Frisian Sociëteit of North Holland, which was in existence in 1639 and merged with the Rijper Sociëteit in 1844; the Zonist Sociëteit, which met from 1674 to 1796, and the South Holland or Lamist Sociëteit, which initiated the founding of the Mennonite seminary in Amsterdam, but soon disappeared from the scene. These conferences preserved many a congregation from extinction by looking after the preaching needs.

The organizing of the Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit (q.v.) was also of great significance in North Holland. All the congregations could gradually be provided with educated preachers, and many received financial support. In the 19th century no congregations died out. Still the membership decreased here and there, and rarely did the membership keep pace with the increase in the population. Only in Amsterdam and Haarlem did the rate of increase exceed the rate of increase in the population. In the Gooi district a new congregation was organized at Bussum in 1915; in Hilversum the old Huizen congregation was revived. Also in IJmuiden, a rapidly rising town on the locks of the North Sea canal, there has been a Mennonite congregation since 1909. The Haarlemmermeer congregation dates from 1950; and in the Wieringermeer, reclaimed from the former Zuiderzee, there is now also a congregation. According to the official Dutch census the number of Mennonites (including children) in the province of North Holland was 15,713 in 1849, 26,508 in 1900, and 28,492 in 1947. The baptized membership numbered 5,052 in 1771, 7,800 in 1847, 11,332 in 1900, and 17,722 in 1957. (For a view of the membership of the present congregations in Holland, see the table in the article Netherlands.) (ML III, 272-75.) vdZ.

North Kildonan, Man., a municipality (township) with an area of nine sq. miles, which is a northeastern suburb of Winnipeg, lying immediately adjacent to the city. Mennonites began to settle in this area in 1928 when it was purely rural, and have since built up a rather compact settlement of some 1,500 persons, practically all located in a single ward, which has a total population of about 2,300. Meanwhile the area has become largely urban, and the Mennonites are all workers in the urban area of Winnipeg and its suburbs. Practically all these Mennonites are of the newer immigration from Russia in 1922-25, 1930-31, and 1947-51. There are two Mennonite churches in the district, one Mennonite Brethren, with about 500 members, and one General Conference Mennonite with 340 members. This is a unique urban Mennonite settlement, and is still rapidly growing. A.J.Di.

North Kildonan Mennonite Brethren Church in North Kildonan, a suburb of Winnipeg, Man., a member of the Manitoba Provincial and the Canadian M.B. District conferences, was organized in 1929 by poor Mennonite immigrants from Russia. Immediately they began the erection of a church, which was thrice enlarged by 1937. The last enlargement in 1941 brought the size of the main auditorium to 40 x 62 ft. with a full basement. The baptized membership in 1956 was ca. 500, with W. Falk as the leading minister. H.Ne.

North Kildonan Mennonite (GCM) Church, located in North Kildonan, Man., a suburb of Winnipeg, is a member of the Canadian Conference. It was formerly a subgroup of the Schoenwiese Mennonite Church (q.v.) of Manitoba. The first Schoenwiese families located here in 1929. The first meetinghouse, erected in 1935, was replaced in 1951 by the present meetinghouse on Pentland Ave. In 1956 the membership was 340, with Victor Schroeder as pastor. J.H.En.

North Lima Mennonite Church (MC), formerly known as Metzler's, located one-half mile south of North Lima, Mahoning Co., Ohio, is a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference. The Mennonite community in Mahoning and Columbiana counties began in 1806 or earlier, one of the oldest Mennonite settlements in Ohio. Jacob Oberholser was living there by that year and was the first preacher, organizing soon after arrival the first congregation at what is now called Midway. In 1817 Jacob Nold, a bishop from Bucks County, arrived and located near Leetonia, where a meetinghouse was erected in 1819. The settlement near North Lima was begun in 1821. The first meetinghouse at the present site (Metzler's Church) is thought to have been built about 1824 by a group of families either related to the Metzlers or bearing the name; David Metzler, a deacon, who had come from Lancaster County about 1821, donated the land. Until 1948 the North Lima, Midway, and Leetonia congregations functioned largely as one organization, rotating services (except Leetonia after ca. 1915), the membership being served in a circuit by the total ministry. A. J. Steiner, ordained bishop in 1910, was the last circuit bishop, retiring about 1950, when his son David C. Steiner was ordained (1952) as bishop for North Lima alone. The present (1956) membership is 116. In 1872 a division occurred in the district, the Old Order or Wisler group withdrawing to form the Pleasant View congregation, which used the three meetinghouses jointly with the regular Mennonite congregation until 1898, when it built its own meetinghouse. J.A.S.

James A. Steiner, "Mahoning and Columbiana County Mennonite Churches," in Ohio Evangel X (September-October 1956) 2-4.

North Main Street Mennonite Church (MC), located in Nappanee, Elkhart Co., Ind., is a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference. The early Mennonite families began to settle in Locke and Union townships in Elkhart County about 1853-63. Services were held in a near-by schoolhouse every four weeks. About 1878 a small building was purchased in Nappanee. A Sunday school was organized, which apparently created new interest. On May 15, 1880, David Burkholder was ordained minister, which sets the date when the congregation was organized. In 1893 a new brick building was built by the 43 members of the conregation. Preaching services were now held every two weeks. The first evangelistic meetings were held by J. S. Coffman (q.v.) in 1894. The membership in 1906 was 117. The meetinghouse was enlarged in 1912, 1921, and 1952. It now has a seating capacity of 450.

In 1923, when a division occurred in the church, Ezra Mullet (then pastor) withdrew with a group to the West Market Street Mennonite Church (MC). Members of the West Market Street Church who desired to stay with the conservative group adhering to the conference transferred their membership to the North Main Street congregation. The West Market Street congregation later united with the General Conference Mennonite Church. D. D. Troyer was responsible for the worship services until Homer F. North was ordained as minister on Aug. 1, 1926. North was ordained bishop in 1954.

Bishops who have served in the congregation are David Burkholder, Jacob Christophel, Ray F. Yoder, and Homer F. North; ministers were Frank Hartman, Noah Metzler, Ezra Mullet, and D. D. Troyer. In the fall of 1952 the church sponsored the opening of a mission Sunday school in Osceola, just west of Elkhart, and Maurice Long was ordained in 1954 as minister for the work in Osceola. In 1955 the membership was 372, with Homer F. North as pastor. H.F.N.

North Mennonite settlement, Mexico: see Ojo de lad Yegua Mennonite settlement.

North Newton, a village (pop. about 400) in Kansas, was incorporated as a town in 1935 under a mayor-council form of government in order to provide for utilities (streets, sewers, etc.) on the Bethel College (q.v.) campus and the development of postal services for the college community. The village had grown around the Bethel College campus, established in 1893, and is located immediately north of Newton (q.v.). It includes the Bethel College campus, the residential sections, a business area, the MCC relief center, and the Bethel College Mennonite Church (q.v.). Mayors of North Newton have been J. E. Regier, Paul Baumgartner, Jacob H. Lingenfelder, and John F. Schmidt. J.F.S.

North Salem Amish Mennonite Church, erected 1885, now extinct, was located about 14 miles southwest of Huntsville, Ohio. Among the first settlers about 1874 were the following families: Bishop Jonas Yoder of Lagrange Co., Ind.; Joseph Hartzler, Gideon Zook, and David Hartzler, a preacher, from Noble Co., Ind.; several families from Tennessee, and a little later the I. K. Stoltzfus, E. B. Stoltzfus (q.v.), and David Stoltzfus (preacher) families from Hartford, Kan. In the late 1890's the families began moving to the West Liberty, Ohio, community about 20 miles south. Services were discontinued entirely in 1906, the meetinghouse sold, and even the bodies in the cemetery removed to cemeteries near West Liberty. J.S.U.

North Star (Nordstern) Mennonite Church (GCM) at Drake, Sask., was organized on Feb. 6, 1906, under the leadership of John Gerbrandt with 20 charter members, who had immigrated to Canada the year previously from the Johannesthal and Bruderthal churches in Kansas and Alva, Okla. Gerbrandt had been elder of the Johannesthal congregation and was elected to the same office in his new charge. In 1906 H. H. Bartel, also of the Johannesthal congregation, became assistant minister. During the first two years services were held in the Gerbrandt home. In 1907 a church building was erected four miles west of the village of Drake and in 1928 another in the village. In 1956 a new and larger church was built in the village of Drake and the separate services in the old churches were discontinued. In that year the membership was 270. Paul Schroeder was serving as elder and Edwin S. Bartel and J. J. Friesen were assistant ministers. J.G.

North Unity Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located west of Langdon, Cavalier Co., N.D., began with the coming of Jacob Toews in 1888, at which time the services were conducted in the homes. A Sunday school was organized in 1923. The present church building was purchased in 1926. In 1921 Peter Toews was ordained and has since been the residing minister; until that time the church was served by adjoining congregations. The membership, of Dutch and Norwegian descent, was 31 in 1956. P.T.

North Woolwich Old Order Mennonite Church, located north of the village of Floradale, Woolwich Twp., Waterloo Co., Ontario, was known as the "Hembling appointment" 1857-75. The services were probably first held in a log school, then in a little church purchased from the Evangelical Association about 1868 and moved northward in 1872. In 1900 the site was enlarged and a new brick structure erected. In 1928 this building was lengthened and grounds acquired to provide cemetery space. The ministers in this congregation were Abraham W. Detweiler, Joseph Gingerich, and John B. Bowman. In 1955 the minister was Osias Gingerich (1917-), ordained 1943; the membership was under 200.

This meetinghouse is used also by the Waterloo-Markham Old Order Mennonite group under Bishop Amsey Martin (b. 1899), ordained as minister in 1940 and as bishop in 1941. This membership is approximately 100. The total O.O.M. membership in Ontario in 1954 was 1,071. J.C.F.

Northampton County, Pa., with Easton, its county seat, the seventh county established in Pennsylvania, in 1752, was an Indian purchase, based "on a (1737) walk," which led to the war with the Indians in 1755. It is situated in the east central part of the state, between the Kittatinny and South Mountains, and is watered by both the Lehigh and Delaware rivers. The Scotch-Irish were here by 1732, followed by more Scotch-Irish, Moravians, Mennonites, and other Germans. This was the land of David Brainerd, missionary to the Delawares, and the scenic Delaware Water Gap.

The Mennonite farmers were chiefly in Allen, Lower Mount Bethel, Washington, and Saucon townships. At Hellertown a union schoolhouse was built probably in the middle of the 18th century and a second in 1802, deeded to Samuel Kauffman for "the Menoists" and Samuel Rothrock "for the Baptice Societice." This was burned down and rebuilt in 1854 and again in 1891. Mennonite names are common in the adjoining cemetery.

In Allen Township at Siegfried's Bridge on the Lehigh River a half acre of ground was purchased by Jacob Baer, Jacob Heston, John Ziegler, and Samuel Landis, and with John Ziegler and Samuel Funk as a committee, a school-meetinghouse 26 x 30 ft. was built on it in 1802, for the purpose of leading the children "from the home to the school, the school to the church, and from the church to Heaven." In the first half century the membership varied between 60 and 100. The ministers included Valentine Young, Samuel Musselman, Christian Bliem, John Bechtel, William Gehman, John Oberholtzer, Christian Clemmer, David Henning (1806-81), William Shelly, Henry Diehl, Jonas Musselman, and Samuel Moyer. In 1860-80 the membership dwindled and services were held every four weeks by Samuel Landis, Lewis Taylor, and Jonas Y. Shultz. The cemetery contains the Mennonite names of Bliem, Bechtel, Coppes, Funk, Gerhard, Geisinger, Heistand, Baer, Landis, Latshaw, Scherrer, Seiple, Swartz, Young, and Ziegler. In August 1884 efforts were made to repair the building and improve the burying grounds. By 1908 the building was sold to the school board, but apparently never used as a school.

Siegfried's meetinghouse was built in the borough of Northampton, with Jacob Showalter, Sr., as leader. By 1771 Joseph, John, and Jacob Showalter, Jr., with Peter Bassler moved to Lancaster County, that they might live with coreligionists. With a congregation in 1798 in Mount Bethel Township, a union log house was built in Bangor in 1806 and one of brick in 1822. In 1849 in Lower Mount Bethel Township another was built. Northeast of Bangor, near Richmond, was the Rothrock meetinghouse, torn down in 1916. Although six Mennonite churches once stood in Northampton County with a numerous Mennonite pioneer group, their descendants moved away or left the Mennonite (MC) Church. The only services of this group now held in the county are the two missions started at Bethlehem and Easton since 1951 by the Franconia Mennonites, and at Bender in 1955 by Lancaster Mennonites of the Weaverland congregation.

Northampton County has always been a stronghold, however, of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church of Pennsylvania. Its second largest congregation in Pennsylvania is Bethlehem with 376 members, founded in 1887. Other congregations are Easton with 162 (20 members in 1911) members, Nazareth with 58, Northampton with 38, and Walnutport with 53. Their total in the county is 647 baptized members. I.D.L.

W. H. Egle, The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; D. K. Cassel, Mennonite History (Philadelphia, 1888); J. C. Wenger, History of the Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (Telford, 1937).

Northern District is one of the three districts of the Virginia Mennonite Conference (MC). The entire church in the Shenandoah Valley was originally under one leadership. Around 1840 the territory was divided into three districts. What was north of the highway leading from West Gay Street, Harrisonburg, Va., through Park View to Mt. Clinton, Va., to a point about one and one-half miles west of the Eastern Mennonite College, then with the Hopkins Mill road to Singers Glen, Va., then by an imaginary line somewhat north by west indefinitely, was known as the Lower District (because the valley drains in that direction). By conference action the name was changed in 1942 to its present form.

Among the early family names in this vicinity were Funk, Brunk, Trissel, Showalter, Shank, Rhodes (then Roth), Brenneman, Good, Acker, Geil, Driver, Huber (now Hoover), Wenger, Heatwole, and Kauffman (now Coffman), who settled here in 1773-90 and perhaps still later. Early dates are difficult to verify because of the burning of county records during the Civil War.

The original and oldest congregation in the district is Trissels (1822), with 125 members, followed by Zion (1885) with 138, Lindale (1895) with 183, and Bethel (1915) with 108. Seven additional organized congregations with 466 members and eleven rural missions with 219 members, a total of 675, have been established in the mountains immediately to the west, mostly in West Virginia, the oldest of these outposts going back to 1868, the newest established in 1955. The total baptized membership in the district in 1956 was 1,229, about one fourth of the total Virginia Conference membership.

Originally there was only one bishop in charge of the district. Lewis Shank (d. 1942), bishop in charge in 1901-38, was followed by J. L. Stauffer (ord. 1938), who has been assisted since 1945 by Bishop Timothy Showalter and since 1954 by Bishop J. Ward Shank. T.S.

Northern District Conference of the General Conference Mennonite Church comprises 31 congregations located in Montana, North and South Dakota, Minnesota, and Nebraska. The first impetus to organize the handful of congregations in these states into a conference was given by J. B. Baer, the traveling home missionary for the General Conference, who persuaded Elder Gerhard Neufeld of the First Mennonite Church of Mountain Lake, Minn., to allow a "trial conference" to be held in his church on Oct. 12-13, 1891. Representatives came from at least eight of the churches in the northern area along with guests from other district conferences. Discussion at the conference centered on mission and publication work. Baer served as chairman of the conference while Christian Schowalter, of the Donnelson, Iowa, church, served as secretary. Although a second conference was held the following year, it was not until the third conference session held in South Dakota in 1894, that a committee of three was appointed to draw up a constitution. The ministers J. J. Balzer, Jacob Hege, and Christian Mueller, who were appointed to this committee, presented a document for adoption at the conference held at Mountain Lake in 1895.

The first constitution was, of course, in German. It was translated into English some years later and revised in 1951. In form and scope of organization the Northern District follows the pattern of the General Conference. It believes "in the congregational form of church government, whereby the local church retains maximum freedom of self-determination. It is a deliberative body carrying powers of recommendation but not of legislation." In matters of faith and practice the Northern District Conference has accepted the Statement of Doctrine adopted by the General Conference in 1941. The constitution established the following purpose of the conference: "To unite into one conference all Mennonite congregations not already in another district conference and who desire to affiliate themselves with this conference, in the states of North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Montana. To promote the growth and expansion of the kingdom of God: (a) by establishing one another through mutual instruction and admonition from the Word of God; (b) by the exercise of Christian fellowship among the churches; (c) by co-operation with the work undertaken by the various boards of the General Conference Mennonite Church." Through the years there has been a strong mission emphasis in the Conference. The pioneer General Conference missionaries to India and China came from this district: the P. A. Penners to India, the H. J. Browns and Aganetha Fast to China.

While the Conference has sponsored no schools, congregations in various communities have done so. The congregations in the Mountain Lake, Minn., area established Mountain Lake Bible School; in the Freeman, S.D., area the congregations founded Freeman Academy—later Freeman Junior College; in the Munich, N.D., and Lustre, Mont., areas Bible schools were also established. This was also true at Henderson, Neb., although the Bible school there has become extinct.

The first statistical report (1908) listed 14 congregations with a membership of 1,467; two of these were in Nebraska, three in North Dakota, four in Minnesota, and five in South Dakota. The 1956 Conference Report listed a total of 32 congregations with a combined membership of 6,150 members. Contributions made by these congregations totaled $583,044. The congregations also reported 85 young men in I-W service (q.v.), 28 in noncombatant military service, and 53 in active military service.

J.D.U.

Northern District Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church, organized in 1910, was the former name of the present Canadian Conference of the M.B. Church (q.v.).

Northern Light, authorized as a quarterly publication in 1942 by the Young People's Organization of the Northern District Conference of the General Conference Mennonite Church. Hermie Preheim, Marion, S.D., served as the first editor of the paper. Publication was discontinued in 1950. J.D.U.

Northern Minnesota Mission of the Mennonite Brethren Central District Conference. This mission was begun in 1926 by John H. Wiens, who under the Northern Gospel Mission Union, took over a mission at Mildred, Minn. From there the mission established preaching centers connected with Sunday schools and daily vacation Bible schools. A number of young people have attended Bible schools and have gone out as missionaries to various mission fields at home and abroad. For 30 years this mission has continued with the same workers still on the field.

Another mission center has been opened among the Chippewa Indians at Ponemah on the Red Lakes Indian Reservation. This work had a hard beginning since these Indians were isolated from the white people and resented the white man's religion. Art Unrau and his wife together with Sarah H. Balzer and Marie Peters started Bible classes with the Indian boys and girls at the school. At present (1956) Sam Fast and his wife are in charge of this station. Another mission station was opened at Ericksburg near International Falls, in charge of Tina Ediger and a co-worker.

The conference together with the various Mennonite churches at and around Mountain Lake, Minn., and various mission friends have supported this mission work. H.E.W.

Norwich, capital of the county of Norfolk, England, was in the 16th century an Anabaptist center. There was here a small Anabaptist congregation probably founded by immigrants from Holland, of Flanders, who had left their countries by 1536 because of persecution. For the same reason some Mennonites from Flanders settled at Norwich about 1567. These Anabaptist-Mennonites apparently had a great influence on the population of Norwich, most of which was opposed to the Anglican state church, censuring its moral laxity, its lack of church discipline, the arrogance of its clergy, and the domination by the state in church affairs. This Separatist-Puritan movement in Norwich, with its ideal of the church as a body of believers, free of the state and its interference, was often called Anabaptist by Anglican churchmen and government officers, but this terminology is, strictly speaking, not correct, because these Puritans did not embrace the principle of believers' baptism on confession of faith with rejection of infant baptism. Yet there was some affinity with Anabaptism, especially concerning the free church idea as formulated by Robert Browne (q.v.) in 1582: "The Church planted or gathered is a company or number of Christians or believers, which, by a voluntary covenant made with their God, are under the government of God and Christ and keep His laws in one holy communion."

The following of these "Anabaptists" must have been considerable. In 1571 half of the population of Norwich, including some 3,000 immigrants from Holland and Flanders, are said to have shared the views of the Anabaptists. In 1580 Robert Browne and his friend Robert Harrison were active in Norwich, but in the fall of 1581 Browne and Harrison had to leave England and moved to the Netherlands, first to Middelburg in the province of Zeeland, then to Amsterdam. A number of Puritans accompanied them, and others followed later. Some of them came into contact with the Dutch Waterlander Mennonites at Amsterdam (see John Smyth) and finally joined them in 1615, but most of them in the course of time returned to England. Norwich always remained a strong center of congregationalism, opposed to the hierarchy of the English state church.
vdZ.

J. G. de Hoop Scheffer and W. E. Griffis, History of the Free Churchmen (Ithaca, n.d., 1922) 7 f., 10; H. E. Dosker, The Dutch Anabaptists (Philadelphia, 1921) 293 f.; ML III, 276.

Nospitzer, Georg: see Nespitzer, Georg.

Noviomagus (Geldenhauer) (1482-1542), a professor of theology at the University of Marburg, Germany, was at first a monk and also reader and secretary to Charles V, became a Protestant in 1526, lived for a time in Strasbourg, where he became acquainted with the Anabaptists. After the publication of the imperial mandate of Jan. 4, 1528, he wrote a booklet in Latin, which was translated into German in the same year with the title, Ein sentbrief an Kayser Carol des namens den Fünften, Alzeyt merer des Reichs . . . Gerardi Noviomagi, In welcher wird gehandlet, Ob man ein ketzer mit recht möge peinlich und leyblich strafen oder nicht. Auss dem Latein verteutscht (Nürnberg, 1528, 12 pages).

In the spring of 1529 he published another Latin booklet, which was also translated into German, with the title, Des Desiderius Erasmus von Rotterdam Anmerkungen zu den päpstlichen und kaiserlichen Gesetzen über die Häretiker. Einige Briefe des Gerhard Noviomagus über die evangelische Sache und die Strafen der Häretiker an Kaiser Karl V., an die auf dem Reichstag zu Speyer versammelten Fürsten, an Karl, Herzog von Geldern, an Philipp, den Fürsten von Hessen. A second German translation followed on March 1, 1530, probably printed in Augsburg, by Hieronymus Gebweyler in Hagenau. In the introduction Noviomagus repeated the statements of Erasmus (q.v.) in his book against the Spanish monks, published in the previous year, which annoyed Erasmus, since it would probably lead to the conclusion that he was the author and had attacked the mandate of Charles V of Jan. 4, 1528, which was to be presented to the Diet of Speyer for ratification. To clear himself of this suspicion Erasmus wrote a counter pamphlet with the title Briefe gegen gewisse Leute, die sich falscherweise rühmen, Evangelische zu sein (Freiburg, November 1529), declaring that although he had warned against exaggerated severity, he had not denied the right of the government to kill heretics if it was necessary to secure public tranquillity.

In 1532 Noviomagus entered the service of Hesse. He was made professor of history and in 1534 professor of theology at the University of Marburg. Here he had to deal with the Anabaptist question a number of times, and expressed his lenient attitude, especially in official opinions and at cross-examinations, in opposition to the prevalent views of theologians and jurists. In a letter to Philip of Hesse in 1535 he designated tolerance and gentleness as the most effective means of winning the Anabaptists to the Protestants. Philip heeded this counsel. In an order of early 1536 the officials were directed to have the Anabaptists instructed by the clergy; if they persisted in their belief they should be exiled, but they could keep their property. In early August Noviomagus and pastor Dietrich Fabritius began the indoctrination of the Anabaptists imprisoned in Wolkersdorf—Johannes Schnabel, Peter Lose, and Leonhard Fälber; but their efforts were in vain (see Hesse). HEGE.

L. Prinsen, Gerardus Geldenhauer Noviomagus, Bijdrage tot de kennis van zijn Leven en Werken (The Hague, 1898); Fr. Thudichum, Die deutsche Reformation II (Leipzig, 1909); TA Hesse; ML III, 278.

Novo-Chortitza: see Neu-Chortitza.

Novo-Kovno, a village in the province of Ekaterinoslav, volost Nikolayevka. Since 1888 there had been in the village a branch congregation of the Friedensfeld (Miropol) Mennonite Brethren Church, consisting in 1905 of 11 members and 36 adherents. (Dirks, Statistik, 67; ML III, 278.) C.K.

Novo-Moskovsk, an area in the Alexandrovsk area of the province of Ekaterinoslav, Russia, where Mennonites from West Prussia settled in 1799 and founded the village of Kronsgarten, which served as a model for the native Russian villages around them in the plan of the farms and also in the tilling of the soil. "Externally these [Novo-Moskovsk] Russian villages (like Yodgornoye) are like the Mennonite villages. The same plan of buildings and arrangement of the farm, the gardens before the homes, trees along the streets, orchards, fences along the street, made of red tile and carefully laid drainage tile."

K. Lindemann, Von den deutschen Kolonisten in Russland (Stuttgart, 1924) 59; ML III, 278.

Novo-Nikolayevka, one of two villages comprising the Mennonite Trubetskoye settlement in the province of Kherson, Kazatskaya district, South Russia, founded in 1904.

W. Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitza in Süd-Russland (Munich, 1928) 34; ML III, 278.

Novo-Podolsk, a Mennonite village in the Russian province of Ekaterinoslav, volost Kamenskaya.

Novo-Podolsk Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Kherson province of South Russia in the village of Krivoy, had its beginning about 1895 when the Russian government tried to settle several communities with a mixed population, consisting of one third Mennonites, one third Russians, and one third Jews, in the hope that the Mennonites would teach the others how to be prosperous farmers. These ethnic groups refused, however, to integrate, and the Mennonites organized the Mennonite Brethren Church under the leadership of Franz Peters, who was succeeded by Franz Wieler, assisted by Peter Unger and Gehard Wieler. Most of the first settlers, of whom Peter Unger, Franz Wieler, and Peter Krause are known by name, came to this plains area from the Old Colony near Chortitza to escape population pressure at home. The membership is not known to have exceeded 75. In 1932 most of the ministers and able-bodied men were banished by the Soviet Government, and the congregation disintegrated under the pressure of severe persecution. J.J.T.

Novopokrovsk, a volost in the province of Ekaterinoslav, Russia, in which the Mennonite villages of Elisabeththal and Gerhardsthal were founded in 1860 and 1861, each with about 2,700 acres of land and (in 1926) 126 inhabitants.

Neuer Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender (Odessa, 1913) 50; ML III, 278.

Novosibirsk, formerly Novonikolaevsk, one of the chief cities of Novosibirsk Region, Siberia, Soviet Russia, was founded in 1896. The city is located on the Ob River and the Trans-Siberian railroad, 390 miles east of Omsk and has a population of about 500,000. It is connected by railroad with Barnaul, Semipalatinsk, and Central Asia. The city is sometimes referred to as the "Chicago of Siberia," specializing in the manufacture of agricultural machinery, trade of farm products, and timber. It is also an agricultural and educational center. During World War II entire industrial plants were removed bodily from European Russia to Novosibirsk.

Although Mennonites settled south and east of Novosibirsk at the turn of the century, they hardly reached this territory and city at that time. Under the Soviets, however, many Mennonites were exiled to this region. From correspondence published in Der Bote and the Mennonitische Rundschau, it has become apparent that numerous Mennonites are today located in the city of Novosibirsk and the surrounding regions. Some of the Mennonites work in factories and in the hospital. Now that they are free to move about, some of those from the surrounding areas are moving into the city. According to information, some of the Mennonites came originally from Chortitza, the Molotschna, and other settlements of the Ukraine. Some Mennonites are located in the city of Berdsk, south of the city of Novosibirsk.

Peter Bergmann, born in 1934, Schönsee, Molotschna, sent a picture of himself and his wife which is clear evidence that they are living under satisfactory conditions. Jakob Esau, also formerly from the Molotschna, sent a picture to relatives of eleven young men, five of whom are listed as ministers. He himself writes that after having spent seven years in the "school of Daniel," meaning in a concentration camp, he has now started to preach the Gospel. He is grateful for the Bible which he received. Evidently these young men are all active in the city of Novosibirsk, possibly in the Baptist church. Whether the Mennonites are conducting worship services on their own is not clear. C.K.

Webster's Geographical Dictionary (Springfield, 1955); Der Bote, March 2, 1955, p. 8; Sept. 28, 1955, p. 8; Nov. 23, 1955, p. 7, 12; April 4, 1956, p. 7; April 25, 1956, p. 7; Mennonitische Rundschau, July 19, 1950, p. 3; March 10, 1954, p. 4; Oct. 20, 1954, p. 6; Oct. 12, 1955, p. 6; March 7, 1956, p. 3; March 21, 1956, p. 8; May 2, 1956, p. 11; June 20, 1956, p. 14, 15; Oct. 17, 1956, p. 3; Jan. 30, 1957, p. 5.

Novoslobodka (formerly Rosengart), a village in the Chortitza Mennonite settlement in the province of Ekaterinoslav, Russia, founded in 1824, had in 1912, 238 inhabitants, who belonged to the Chortitza Mennonite Church.

Neuer Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender (Odessa, 1913) 47 and 74; ML III, 278.

Novo-Sofievka (formerly Nikolaithal), a volost (q.v.) in the province of Ekaterinoslav in the Mennonite Borozenko settlement (q.v.), a daughter of the Chortitza settlement, founded in 1865, with the following seven villages: Novo-Sofievka, Felsenbach (Mariapol), Blumenfeld, Steinau, Hamburg, Neubergthal, and Hoffnungsort. Novo-Sofievka had 2,675 acres of land and (1912) 96 inhabitants. HEGE.

W. Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitza in Süd-Russland (Munich, 1928) 49; ML III, 278 f.

Novo-Stepnoye, one of four villages comprising the Mennonite settlement of Samoylovka near Bachmetyevka in the province of Kharkov, a daughter colony of the Molotschna settlement, founded in 1888.

W. Quiring, Die Mundart von Chortitza in Süd-Russland (Munich, 1928) 35; ML III, 279.

Novo-Zhitomir, a Mennonite village in the Russian province of Kherson, volost Krivoi-Rog, Ukraine.

Nuevo Leon Mennonite settlement, located approximately 500 miles southeast of the Manitoba Mennonite settlement near Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua, Mexico, was started in 1944 by 38 families, but was soon discontinued because of lack of water and other unfavorable conditions. C.K.

Nukerke (Nieukerke, in Anabaptist literature mostly called Nijpkerke or Nipkerke), a village (pop. ca. 2,400) in the Belgian province of East Flanders, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 20, or perhaps even 43 persons in 1551-61. Even before Bouwens visited Nijpkerke, there was a Mennonite congregation here, which together with a number of other congregations in Flanders wrote a letter to the ministers at Antwerp (see Kortrijk, Adriaen van). Jan de Swarte (q.v.), executed in 1563 at Rijssel, France, was a preacher of the congregation at Nijpkerke. Nothing is known of the congregation after this execution. It died out probably soon after because the members moved elsewhere for fear of persecution. Nukerke is still a center of the weaving industry; in the 16th century most of its inhabitants were weavers. VDZ.

Nunkirchen, Thieleman von, an Anabaptist martyr: who was executed at Blankenberg in the Duchy of Julich in 1552 by the sword, with three fellow martyrs, William van Bierk, Christophel uyt de Geistens, and Christiaen uyt den Eukeraat. (Mart. Mir. D 148, E 526).

Nürnberg, a former free city (pop. in 1950, 360,017) located in Middle Franconia, Bavaria, Germany. In the Reformation period the city played an important role. It was the center of intellectual life. Great scholars like Willibald Pirkheimer (q.v.), great painters like Albrecht Dürer (q.v.), and great poets like Hans Sachs lived and worked here. The Reformation found early entry into the city, with the preachers Andreas Osiander (q.v.) and Lazarus Spengler (q.v.) as its most important representatives. The imperial diet met here twice, in 1522 and 1524. The most important historical event to take place here was the Peace of Nürnberg of 1532.

Signs of Anabaptism appeared here very early. It is possible that Diepold of Thon, near Nürnberg, a peasant who was holding religious meetings in February 1524 in the neighborhood of Nürnberg with a large attendance, which were forbidden him, and Gallus, a journeyman weaver of Nördlingen, who fared similarly on May 6, 1524, were forerunners of the new movement. For it is known that at the beginning of the Reformation there were Waldensians in and around Nürnberg.

Meanwhile Hans Denk (q.v.) had come to Nürnberg in the fall of 1523. After serving for a year as rector of the school of St. Sebald, he became involved in a theological dispute with Osiander, and was expelled from the city on Jan. 20, 1525. Here in Nürnberg he met Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.), Hans Hut (q.v.), and Hans Schlaffer (q.v.). Hans Hut was working for a book binder named Valantin, and lived in Denk's house at various times. Later, in 1526, after he had been baptized as an Anabaptist at Augsburg by Denk, Hut won Wolfgang Vogel (q.v.), the pastor at Eltersdorf near Nürnberg, for Anabaptism. The city council of Nürnberg ordered Vogel's execution on March 26, 1527, as a seditious person, because he "sought to form an association for the elimination of all the ungodly and establish a new kingdom of Christ, where only equality is to reign."

In 1526 Prince Casimir of Brandenburg issued a proclamation to his subjects in Nürnberg warning them of the "adherents of the malicious company, who held nothing at all of the original baptism of infants, nor of the sacrament of the altar, and supposed that in a short time Christ would return and begin a temporal reign, and that the sword of righteousness (as they called it) would be placed in their hands to destroy and kill all authority and those that did not accept their rebaptism and were not related to their fellowship, also that there is no eternal punishment in sight for the damned and the devil will be saved, together with other improprieties."

The council was also zealous in warning against the Anabaptists. On March 21, 1527, it wrote in a letter to the city of Strasbourg in reply to a question about the Nürnberg church constitution, that in all the towns and villages of the area Christian evangelical preachers had been installed, who had previously been tried and examined as to their possible contamination with Anabaptism, for the Anabaptists believed that Christ was only a man, that He was begotten in sin, that He had not done satisfaction for the sins of mankind, that no Christian could be a ruler, that God will return in person to the earth to establish a physical reign in which all government will be destroyed, and all things should be held in common. No Anabaptist was to be tolerated in the city, because the sect is especially inclined to sedition. In addition, the council forbade the printing, sale, or possession of the booklets of these teachers of false doctrine. In a similar vein the council had three days previously written to the city of Regensburg, mentioning Hans Hut and giving an exact description of him, and on March 26 likewise to the Elector of Brandenburg.

The Nürnberg council was constantly on the alert to counter Anabaptism. On Sept. 11, 1527, it sent George Grün to Erlangen to attend the examination of the imprisoned Ambrosius Spittelmaier (q.v.). On the next day it sent a letter to the city of Ansbach asking for information about Spittelmaier, so that Nürnberg would be able to help in exterminating this "ungodly and misleading faction," and enclosed thirty-five questions which Spittelmaier answered in his examination on Sept. 20, 1527.

On Sept. 23, 1527, another letter was sent to Ansbach, with the intention of "exterminating the poisonous new sect of the Anabaptists with zeal." The letter continued that there would be no purpose in sending to Ansbach the court records of the Anabaptists in prison in Nürnberg, since they were poor peasants who had themselves not baptized but were misled. From Augsburg they had received news that Hans Hut, the leader of the Anabaptists, had been imprisoned, and that they should examine Spittelmaier, who said he was an emissary of Hut, on the enclosed questions. Again on Dec. 21, 1527, Nürnberg wrote a letter to Ulm containing the same unfounded accusations against the Anabaptists as those written to Strasbourg and Regensburg.

At the same time the council had a work published with the title Grundtliche vntterrichtung eins erbarn Rats der Statt Nürnberg Welcher gestalt jre Pfarrher vn Prediger in den Stetten vn auff dem Land das volk wider etliche verfürische lere der Widertauffer in jren predigen auss heyliger Götlicher schrifft zum getreulichsten ermanen vnnd unterrichten sollen. It contains 42 pages. The author is unknown. It obviously stems from Lutheran circles in Nürnberg, for it contains strictly Lutheran teaching. It was published in 1528 or later, for Hans Hut's death in Augsburg is mentioned in it. The introduction to the book reproduced the current accusations against the Anabaptists, charging them with fomenting revolt and sedition. "The evil, devilish poison must be counteracted with state measures and also especially with instruction on the basis of the Word of God." This is followed by a profusely verbose instruction on baptism, based largely on the Old Testament. Then comes a presentation of Anabaptist teaching in twelve points. Point 8: "They say no preacher shall stay in one place but travel about as the apostles did." Point 11: "But some say there is no devil but sin and evil desire and inclination of man." Then these twelve points are refuted, again largely on the basis of the Old Testament. The argument is often picayune and anything but convincing. This booklet shows not an iota of understanding of the Anabaptists, but apparently contributed considerably to the struggle against them.

On Jan. 25, 1528, the council of Nürnberg requested of the council of Regensburg the names of the Anabaptists living there or being held in their prison. Upon inquiry by Dr. Hiltner, the legal adviser of the city of Regensburg in 1530, as to the measures to be adopted in the case of Anabaptists, Nürnberg gave a circumstantial reply describing the procedure within its jurisdiction.

When the captains of the Swabian League received the command in February 1528 to put to death without trial all who were suspected of Anabaptism, the council of Nürnberg protested and proposed milder measures, probably for fear that innocent persons might become victims of these severe measures. Nonetheless it is significant that Nürnberg never again sponsored the death penalty for Anabaptism after the case of Vogel.

In May 1528 six Anabaptists were in the Nürnberg prison. They were visited by Dr. Wenzeslaus Linck (q.v.) and the pastor of St. Clara's Church, who instructed them in Lutheran doctrine. Several Anabaptist expellees from Augsburg who had come to Nürnberg were conducted out of the city on May 16, 1528, by two city soldiers and were compelled to swear that they would never enter the city again.

In July 1528 the city council demanded advice from its lawyers and theologians on the proper punishment of Anabaptists. The jurists met on July 8; three favored the death penalty and three opposed it. Of the theologians, Dominicus Sleupner and Wenzeslaus Linck voted against the death penalty, and Osiander for it. Cartheuser made the decision the duty of the council. This official opinion was given twice. Then on July 14, 1528, the Nürnberg city council issued an edict: "All who recant their error of Anabaptism shall be accepted in mercy; those who persist in it shall be expelled beyond a distance of ten miles from the city."

In January 1529 twenty persons of both sexes were arrested in the country because they had been rebaptized. Thereupon the council, on Jan. 25, 1529, for the third time asked the official opinion of the jurists and the theologians. The reply was to the effect that "since this error was on the increase, punishment should reasonably follow. In addition it might be advisable to issue another mandate ordering that anyone who was rebaptized should have his eyes put out." The twenty arrested Anabaptists not only adhered to their baptism, but also believed that the sacrament did not contain the actual body and blood of Christ; the council then had them given instruction. Those who were converted were left in peace; those who persisted were expelled, contrary to the advice of the clergy and lawyers who wanted more severe penalties; the Anabaptists had to give an oath that they would not again come near the city.

On April 29, 1531, the Nürnberg scholars rendered another official opinion. This time the theologians took a lenient and generous position, and only some of the jurists favored the death penalty. A noteworthy event was the result of the consultation of May 30, 1531, concerning the "dreamers of Windsheim," also called "Puschenhamer." "It is difficult to proceed against them; one does not know whether they may simply have been misled. In this case, if the man in question were in Nürnberg's jurisdiction, he would be expelled from the city. They, however, would leave the decision to the prince." The opinion of the jurists and theologians in the case of the Anabaptists of Baiersdorf (Uttenreuth) issued on June 3, 1531, had a different tone, "It is above all necessary, useful, and fruitful, first of all to institute a church constitution in the margravure." These Schwärmer shall be overcome by the Word of God, taught and indoctrinated. But they must not be released without punishment because, as the example of Müntzer has shown, they are intent upon the destruction of the government. They must therefore not be permitted to gain the upper hand. The originator, Hans Schmid, shall be burned at the stake, the others killed with the sword. But those who are amenable to teaching shall be branded. Above all, the prince is to issue a severe edict.

In April 1535, when it was learned that some were holding a "synagogue" behind St. Jacob's Church, the council had them arrested. The Anabaptists from Carinthia, who were staying at the inn "To the White Rooster" at St. Lorenz, were ordered to leave the city at once. The innkeeper was warned against admitting such guests and ordered to notify the authorities at once if any arrived.

Peter Riedemann (q.v.) was imprisoned in Nürnberg for four years and ten weeks (1532 - July 19, 1537) in the tower called "Lug ins Land." Osiander and other theologians tried in vain to convert him. In 1536 the council had a whole Bible brought to him with Melanchthon's booklet on baptism, but in vain.

In the cross-examination of Jan. 30, 1539, Jakob Hölin of Schorndorf named a Konrad Hefner of Nürnberg as leader of the Anabaptists; nothing else is known about him. During Mosheim's residence in Nürnberg two Anabaptists appeared there on Oct. 9, 1539; they had been imprisoned at Passau and released. The Nürnberg city council had some clergymen examine them on their doctrine, and when they were convinced that these men had repudiated Anabaptist doctrine they were released with the warning not to spread Anabaptist teachings.

In March 1541 the Anabaptists in Nürnberg ventured to come into the light. The council, informed of this matter, had them all arrested. The tailor Lorenz Holzmann, whom three theologians tried to convert, persisted in his Anabaptist ideas and refused to recant. Thereupon the council made him pay the trial fee, swear not to return within a radius of ten miles of the city, and ordered him expelled. On April 19 he was to be led from the city, so that he would not mislead his wife and other people or persuade them to such error. When this sentence was read to Holzmann he asked for the council's permission to appear with his wife before Master Vetter, the preacher of St. Sebald, to discuss the matter with him. This permission was granted, and Vetter succeeded in converting him from his error. Holzmann was then pardoned, but penalized by having to stand on two Sundays before the church with his wife. Heinrich Meilendorfer, another Anabaptist, was punished with four weeks in prison; his wife, who had led him into this error, was forged to a "bench and irons" for four weeks. Others were treated more leniently. Thus Anabaptism was suppressed in Nürnberg. But traces continued to appear for a long time to come.

Since 1948 there has been a small Mennonite congregation at Nürnberg, numbering 25 baptized members in 1956. It has no meetinghouse and is served by ministers from the outside. NEFF.

Beiträge zur bayrischen Kirchengeschichte X (1913) 57 ff.; Hist. Ver.-Blatt für Schwaben und Neuburg (1874); Joh. Heberle, "Johann Denk und die Ausbreitung seiner Lehre," in Theologische Studien und Kritiken (1855) 817-90; Hermann Nestler, Die Wiedertäuferbewegung in Regensburg (Regensburg, 1926); Friedrich Roth, Die Einführung der Reformation in Nürnberg (Würzburg, 1885); TA Brandenburg; Franz von Soden, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Reformation und der Sitten jener Zeit mit besonderem Hinblick auf Christoph Scheurl II (Nürnberg, 1885); Wiswedel, Bilder II; Austin Patterson Evans, An Episode in the Struggle for Religious Freedom, The Sectaries of Nuremberg 1524-1528 (New York, 1924); Grundtliche untterrichtung, eins erbarn Rats der Statt Nürnberg, Welcher gestalt, jre Pfarrher vn Prediger in den Stetten un auff dem Land, das volck, wider etliche verfürische lere der Widertauffer, in jren predigen ausz heyligerr Gotlicher schrifft, zum getreulichste ermannen vnnd vnterrichten sollen (Nürnberg, 1527-28); ML III, 279-81.

Nursing Education. Until recently the training of nurses has been the function of general hospitals who have organized schools of nursing under their direction, using their own clinical facilities in so far as they are adequate, and sending their nursing students away to larger hospitals for specialized clinical experience (called affiliation). Now more collegiate schools of nursing are being established, which are operated by colleges or universities in affiliation either with their own hospitals or independent hospitals.

The first formal training of nurses was that established by Pastor Fliedner at Kaiserswerth, Germany, in 1836. Florence Nightingale's school established in 1860 at St. Thomas Hospital in London was the first significant nurses' training course in an English-speaking country. The first similar school in the United States was established at Roxbury, Mass., near Boston, in 1872. By the turn of the century the original typical one-year training was being extended to three years, and high-school graduation was beginning to be required for entrance.

The first American Mennonite schools of nursing were established in the 20th century in the midst of the rising standards of nursing education. The first was the Bethel Deaconess Hospital (q.v.) School of Nursing (GCM) at Newton, Kan., established in 1908 soon after the hospital was opened. This school has trained and still trains both deaconess and nondeaconess nurses, the number of deaconesses having greatly declined in recent years. It originated in connection with Bethel College and is affiliated with the General Conference Mennonite Church.

The second school was the Mennonite School of Nursing at Beatrice, Neb., established in 1911 and continued to 1929 as a small 3-year school operated by the Mennonite Deaconess Home and Hospital. In 1941-47 a two-year course in practical nursing was offered.

The third school was the La Junta (Col.) Mennonite (MC) Hospital and Sanitarium School of Nursing, established in 1915 and operated by the hospital under the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities until 1949, when it was placed under the Mennonite Board of Education as an independent school. Though it was a quality school of high standards it was forced to discontinue through decline in the patient census at the hospital with which it was affiliated. The last class was to be graduated in 1958. A course in practical nursing was instituted by the hospital in 1957.

The Salem Home and Hospital, founded by the K.M.B. Church at Hillsboro, Kan., in 1918, began a training school for nurses and deaconesses but it was never fully developed and was later discontinued.

The Mennonite Hospital at Bloomington, Ill., an institution supported by the members of the Central Conference of Mennonites and the Evangelical Mennonites in Illinois, which was established in 1920 by taking over the existing Kelso Sanitarium with its school of nursing, has had a school of nursing from its beginning in 1920.

The Mennonite Hospital at Mountain Lake, Minn., also had a training program for a time.

In Russia a three-year training school for nurses was established in 1909 by the Deaconess Home Morija in Neu-Halbstadt, Molotschna. It was a private undertaking, was built primarily with the funds furnished by Peter Schmidt of Steinbach, and was supported by voluntary contributions. It was opened Dec. 3, 1909, but was practically destroyed in 1918 when it was plundered by bandits.

A training school for nurses was established in Filadelfia, Fernheim Colony, Paraguay, in 1945, in connection with the colony hospital, by Mrs. John Schmidt, wife of Dr. John Schmidt. It was operated for only a short time, and offered what was in effect a course in practical nursing.

The Mennonite Church (MC) in India has a school of nursing attached to the Dhamtari Christian Hospital at Dhamtari, M.P., established in July 1951, with a three-year course. H.S.B.

Nussbaumer (Nussbaum), a Swiss Mennonite family name, first recorded as an Anabaptist family in Ichertswil, Lüterkofen district, in the Bucheggberg region of the canton of Solothurn, Switzerland. Most of the Mennonite Nussbaumers are descended from this family. Others have come from various villages in the Emmental, especially Gross Höchstetten. The Emmental family may have been the forerunners of the family in the Bucheggberg. As early as the mid-16th century Anabaptist members of this family were living near Péry in the Jura. Barbli Nussbaum of Allmendingen had to pay a fine of 100 pounds in 1563 because she was an Anabaptist. The records speak of several members of the family who had difficulties with the authorities in the early part of the 18th century for the same reason.

Members of the Nussbaumer family moved to Basel and Alsace, where they have furnished a number of ministers for the Mennonite churches. An outstanding leader of the Swiss Mennonite Conference for many years was Samuel Nussbaumer (q.v., 1866-1944), Basel. His son, Hans Nussbaumer, a prominent elder in the Alsatian Mennonite churches, has served as secretary of the Alsatian Conference for many years.

The first party of the 19th century, consisting of four Swiss Anabaptist families, who left their Jura homes in 1817 for America, included Hans Nussbaum, who settled in Wayne Co., Ohio. Later this family moved to Ashland Co., Ohio, where Hans served the Mennonite Church as a minister.

Various immigrants of this family settled in each of the 19th-century Swiss Mennonite settlements: Sonnenberg, Wayne Co., Ohio; Allen-Putnam Co., Ohio; and Berne, Ind., where some have become leaders in the church. D.L.G.

D. L. Gratz, Bernese Anabaptists (Scottdale, 1953) 129-30.

Nussbaumer, Samuel (1866-1944), outstanding elder and leader of the Swiss Mennonites, was born July 5, 1866, as fifth child of Daniel and Marianne Gerber Nussbaumer at Wittwald near Eptingen in the canton of Baselland, Switzerland. The family moved to a farm in the Bernese Jura in 1889 located near Montfaucon. He was baptized in the Sonnenberg congregation in 1889, and here ordained as a preacher shortly thereafter and in ca. 1900 as elder. He attended the St. Chrischona Bible School 1890-91. In February 1897 he married Elise Scheidegger. Among the six children who grew to maturity is Elder Hans Nussbaumer of Schweighof, Altkirch, Alsace. In 1904 the family moved to Les Fontaines near Tramelan, and in 1911 near Basel, where they occupied the farm called Sternenhof at Dornach and where he became the elder of the Schänzli Mennonite congregation at Basel. He served many years (ca. 25) as president of the Swiss Mennonite Conference, and was widely known, respected, and loved as a preacher, pastor, Bible teacher, and leader. He was an also an outstanding farmer, and for a number of years member of the cantonal legislature as a representative of the Evangelical People's Party. (Zum Andenken an Samuel Nussbaumer, ca. 1944.) H.S.B.

Nusslau (Nussla, Nuslau; Czech, Nosislava), a market town in Moravia between Selowitz (q.v.) and Nikoltschitz (q.v.), belonging to the lands of the Zierotin family. As in Nikoltschitz, the Brethren began to settle here in 1570 and contributed a substantial fee to the owners of the land.

According to the chronicles the Brethren in Selowitz also moved to Nusslau, probably because they wanted to cultivate vineyards and hop farms here under the favor of the lords. The fate of this Bruderhof is closely connected with that of Nikoltschitz. In July 1600, much of their goods was consumed by the compulsory quartering of troops, in 1601 by the quartering of 5,000 foot soldiers in the neighborhood. Five years later the Hohenlohe and Münsterberg armies plundered the Bruderhof.

The "good time" was over with the death of Frederick of Zierotin. His successors were too much concerned with their own advantage; this created tensions. In 1615 the Brethren thought very seriously of emigrating, "because with inadequate food, with much robot labor, also all sorts of gifts and fees, they were hard pressed and also with the lords there were always strife and unpleasantness, so that one could not trust himself to endure it." The school and tannery were already located at another place. But in the end the baron promised them better food and treatment, and they decided to stay.

In the rebellion the Hutterite Bruderhofs suffered great misfortune. On Jan. 5, 1621, imperial troops plundered Nusslau and "laid it in ashes." An aged sister died in it. On March 30 Polish auxiliaries struck down the superintendent of the Nusslau mill and an apprentice. In September 1622 the expulsion of the Brethren from Moravia led to the complete abandonment of the Bruderhof. P.De.

Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 282.

Nut, Het: see Maatschappij tot Nut van't Algemeen.

Nyabasi (Tanganyika) Mennonite Church (MC), located 46 miles east of Shirati, is in the Kuria tribe. Work in this tribe was begun by Clinton Ferster on Jan. 1, 1940. Doctor Noah Mack joined them in June of the same year. The beginning of the church dates from Nov. 17, 1940, when two were received into church fellowship and the first communion service was held. Noah Mack had pastoral oversight of the church until Simeon Hurst arrived June 13, 1941, who has had charge since that time. The present (1956) membership stands at 24. E.W.S.

Nycolson, John: see Lambert.

Illustrations

Contents

I. Martyr Scenes, Plates I to III 3-5
- Maria and Ursula van Beckum, Deventer, 1544
- Dirk Willemsz Rescuing His Captor, 1569
- Johan Knel, 1550
- Jaques d'Auchy, Leeuwarden, 1559
- A Camouflaged Church Service, Holland
- Unknown Martyr, Holland

II. Mandates, Plates IV and V 6-7
- Mandate of King Ferdinand of Austria, 1528
- Mandate of the City of Regensburg, 1539
- Mandate against Menno Simons, 1542
- Mandate of the City of Bern, 1597

III. Manuscripts, Plates VI to VIII 8-10
- A Menno Simons Letter, ca 1549
- Maeyken Wens' Letter, Holland, 1573
- Johann Reimer, Motto, Blumenort, Russia, 1832
- A Christopher Dock Motto of ca. 1750
- A Deep Run, Pa., School Motto of 1783
- A Songbook Title Page, Deep Run, Pa., School, 1828

IV. Portraits, Plates IX to XI 11-13
- Muller, Samuel, Amsterdam, Netherlands (1785-1875)
- Nieuwenhuizen, Jan, Haarlem, Netherlands (1724-1806)
- Mannhardt, Jakob, Danzig, Germany (1801-85)
- Nijdam, Cornelis, Amsterdam, Netherlands (1884-1946)
- Kroeker, Jakob, Wernigerode, Germany (1872-1948)
- Mannhardt, Hermann Gottlieb, Danzig, Germany (1855-1927)
- Möllinger, David, Monsheim, Germany (1709-68)
- Nussbaumer, Samuel, Basel-Dornach, Switzerland (1866-1944)
- Jansen, Cornelius, Beatrice, Neb. (1822-94) GCM
- Mosiman, Samuel K., Bluffton, Ohio (1867-1940) GCM
- Janzen, Jacob H., Waterloo, Ont. (1878-1950) GCM
- Jansz, Pieter, Kaju-Apu, Java (1820-1904)
- Lohrenz, Henry W., Hillsboro, Kan. (1878-1945) MB
- Johns, Daniel J., Goshen, Ind. (1850-1942) MC
- Kauffman, Daniel, Scottdale, Pa. (1865-1944) MC
- Miller, Daniel D., Middlebury, Ind. (1864-1955) MC
- Klassen, Cornelius F., Abbotsford, B.C., and Frankfurt, Germany (1894-1954) MB
- Neff, Christian, Weierhof, Germany (1863-1946)

V. Book Title Pages, Plates XI and XII 13-14
- Pilgram Marpeck's Explanation of the Testaments, 1550
- An Anti-Hutterite Work, C. A. Fischer's Taubenkobel, 1607
- Menno Simons' Foundation Book, first Dutch edition, 1539
- Menno Simons' Foundation Book, first German edition, 1575
- Martyrs' Mirror, first Dutch edition, 1660
- Martyrs' Mirror, first American edition in German, 1748

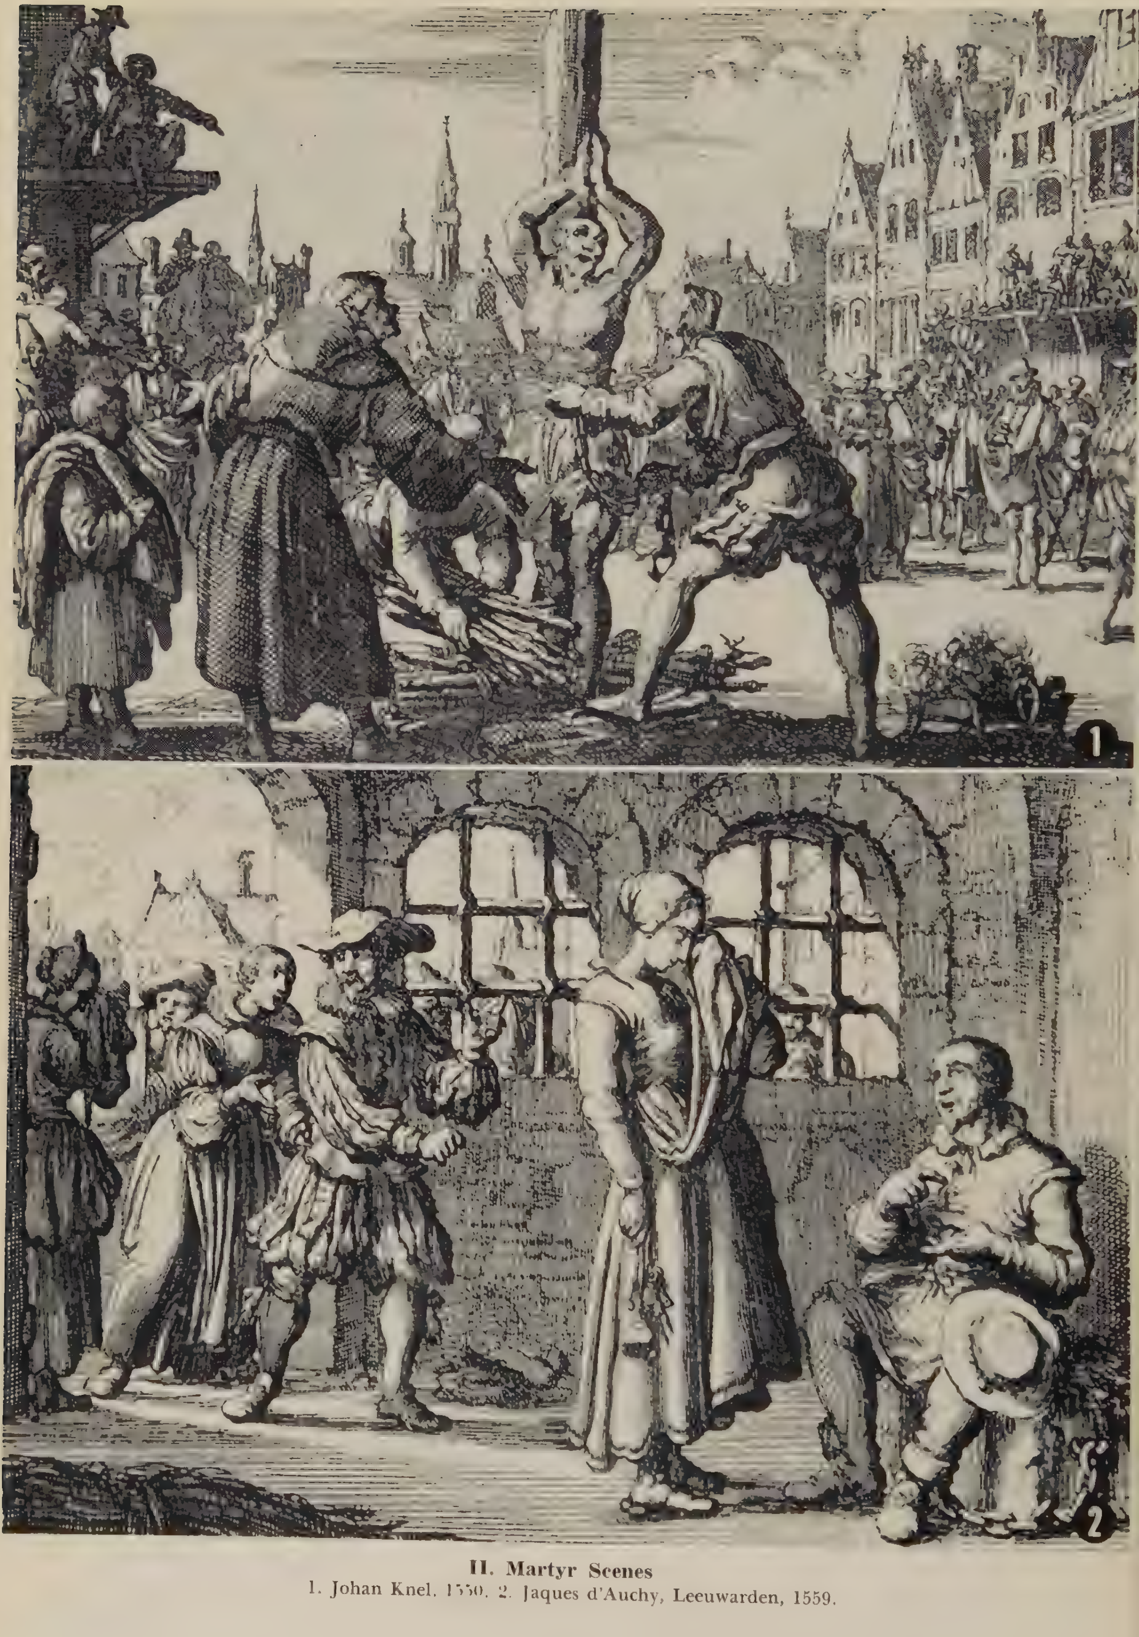
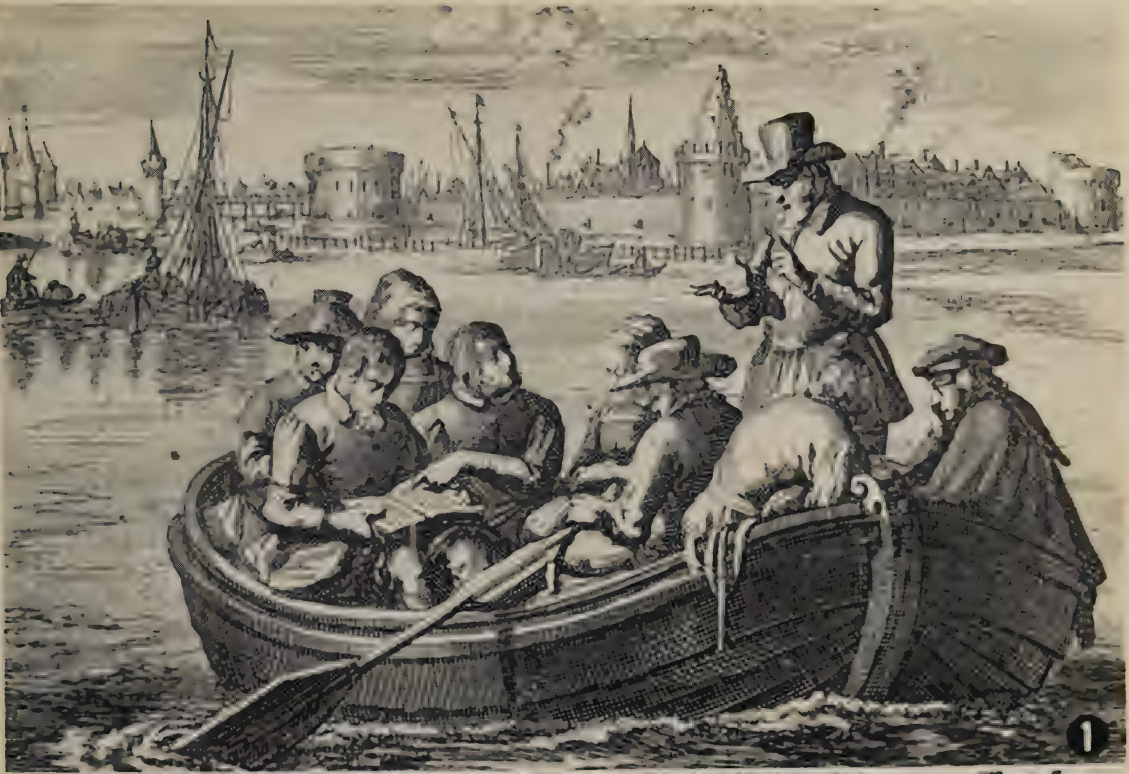
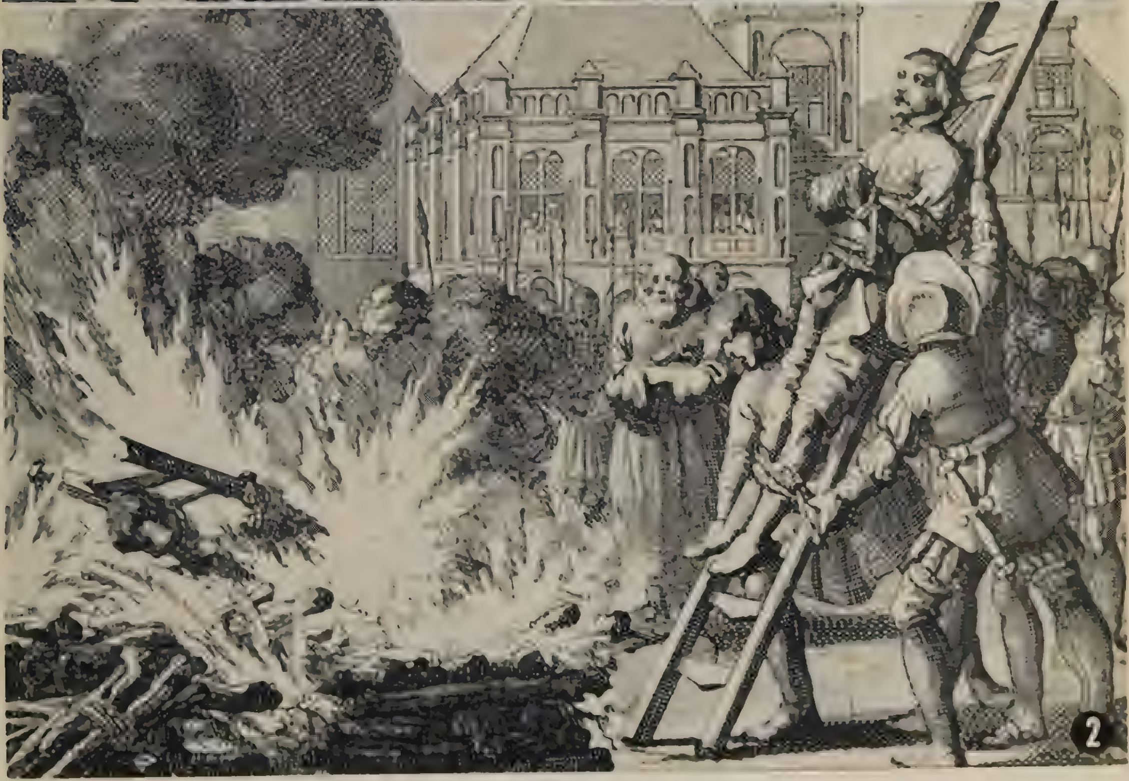
I Martyr Scenes

1. Maria and Ursula van Beckum, Deventer, 1544; 2. Dirk Willemsz Rescuing His Captor, 1569



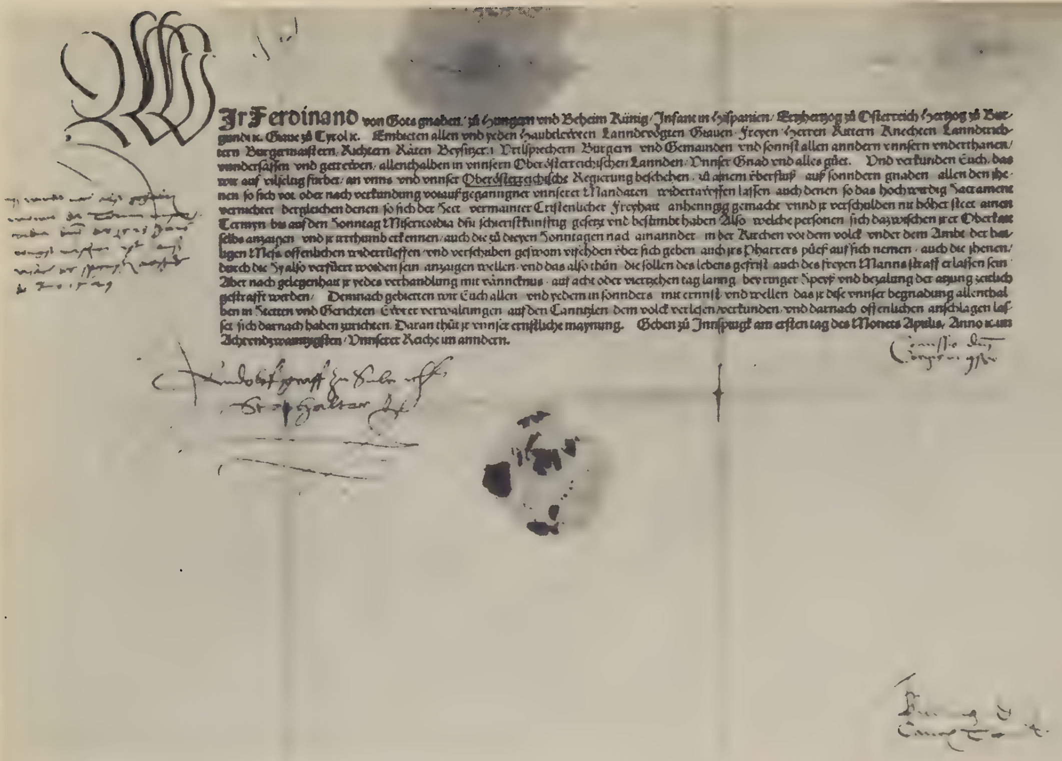
II. Martyr Scenes
1. Johan Knel. 1550. 2. Jaques d'Auchy, Leeuwarden, 1559.





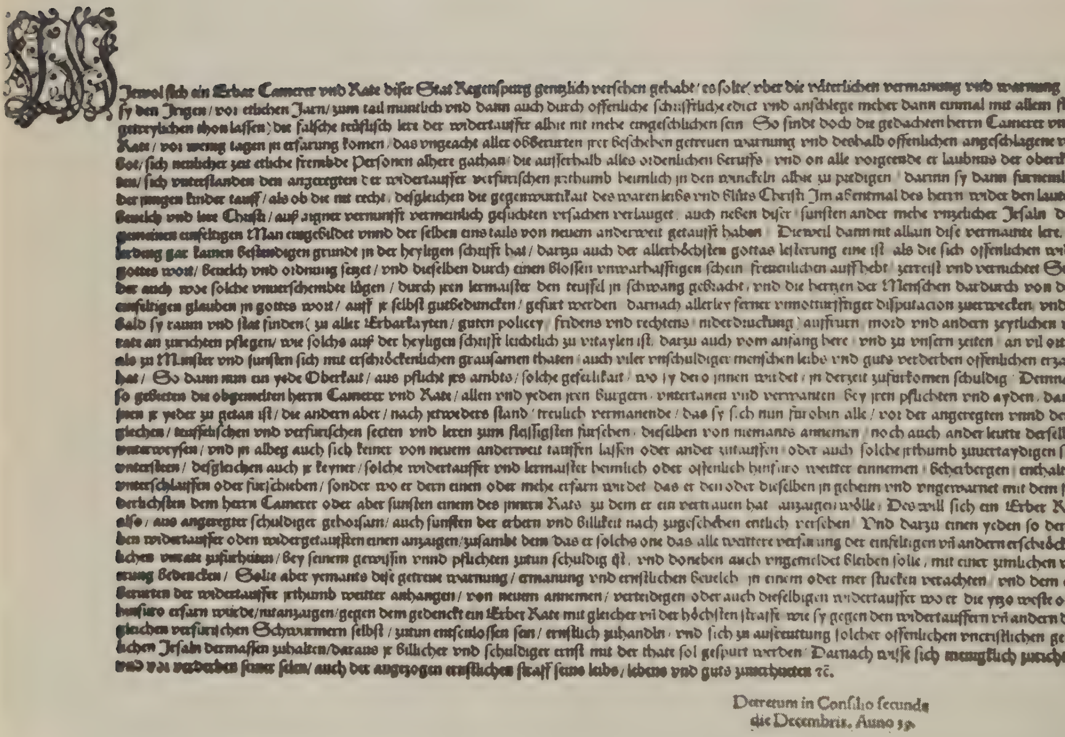
III. Martyr Scenes

1 A Camouflaged Church Service, Holland; 2 Unknown Martyr, Holland.



WIr Ferdinand von Gots gnaden, zů Hungern vnd Beheim Künig/ Infant in Hiſpanien/ Ertzhertzog zů Öſterreich/ Hertzog zů Burgundi ꝛc. Grave zů Tyrol ꝛc. Embieten allen vnd yeden Haubtleuten Lanndtvögten Grauen Freyen Herren Rittern Knechten Lanndtrichtern Burgermaiſtern, Richtern Räten Beyſitzern Vrtlſprechern Burgern vnd Gemainden vnd ſonnſt allen anndern vnnſern vnderthanen/ vnderſaſſen vnd getrewen, allenthalben in vnnſern Oberöſterreichiſchen Lannden: Vnnſer Gnad vnd alles gůt. Vnd verkunden Euch, das wir auf vilfeltig fürbet an vnns vnd vnnſer Oberöſterreichiſche Regierung beſchehen, aus ainem überfluß aus ſonndern gnaden allen den jhenen ſo ſich vor oder nach verkundung vorauſgegangner vnnſerer Mandaten widertauffen laſſen auch denen ſo das hochwirdig Sacrament verachtet dergleichen denen ſo ſich der Sect vermainter Criſtenlicher Freyhait anhenngig gemacht vnnd jr verſchulden nit höher ſteet ainen Termyn bis auf den Sonntag Miſericordia dñi ſchierſtkünfftig geſetzt vnd beſtimbt haben. Alſo welche perſonen ſich dazwiſchen jrer Oberkait ſelbs anzaigen vnd jr irrthumb erkennen, auch die zů dreyen Sonntagen nach ainannder in der Kirchen vor dem volck vnder dem Ambt der heiligen Meſs offenlichen widerrüeffen, vnd verſchreiben geſworn vrfehden über ſich geben auch jrs Pharrers půeß auf ſich nemen, auch die jhenen/ durch die Sy alſo verfüert worden ſein anzaigen wellen, vnd das alſo thůn die ſollen des lebens gefriſt auch des freyen Manns ſtraff erlaſſen ſein. Aber nach gelegenhait jr yedes verhandlung mit väncknus auf acht oder viertzehen tag lanng bey ringer Speyß vnd bezalung der atzung zeitlich geſtrafft werden. Demnach gebietten wir Euch allen vnd yedem in ſonnders mit ernnſt vnd wellen das jr diſe vnnſer begnadung allenthalben in Stetten vnd Gerichten Ewrer verwaltungen auf den Canntzlen dem volck verleſen/ verkunden, vnd darnach offenlichen anſchlagen laſſet ſich darnach haben zurichten. Daran thůt jr vnnſer ernſtliche maynung. Geben zů Innſprugk am erſten tag des Monets Aprilis, Anno ꝛc. im Achtundzwaintzigiſten/ Vnnſerer Reiche im anndern.

①



WIewol ſich ein Erber Camerer vnd Rate diſer Stat Regenſpurg gentzlich verſehen gehabt/ es ſolte/ über die väterlichen vermanung vnd warnung die ſy den Jrigen/ vor etlichen Jarn/ zum tail mundtlich vnd dann auch durch offenliche ſchrifftliche edict vnd anſchlege meher dann einmal mit allem fleiß getreylichen thon laſſen/ die falſche teufliſch lere der widertauffer albie nit mehr eingeſchlichen ſein. So findt doch die gedachten herrn Camerer vnnd Rate/ vor wenig tagen jn erfarung komen/ das vngeacht aller obberurten jrer beſchehen getreuen warnung vnd deshalb offenlichen angeſchlagenen verbot/ ſich neulicher zeit etliche frembde Perſonen alhere gethan/ die auſſerhalb alles ordenlichen berüffs/ vnd on alle vorgeende erlaubnus der oberkait/ ſich vnterſtanden den angeregten der widertauffer verfüriſchen jrthumb heimlich jn den winckeln albie zu predigen/ darinn ſy dann fürnemlich der jungen kinder tauff/ als ob die nit recht, deßgleichen die gegenwurtikait des waren leibs vnd blůts Chriſti Jm abentmal des herrn wider den lautern beuelch vnd lere Chriſti/ auß aigner vernunfft vermeinlich geſuchten vrſachen verlauget/ auch neben diſer ſunſten ander mehr vnzelicher Jrſaln dem gemainen einfeltigen Man eingebildet vnnd der ſelben eins tails von neuem anderweit getaufft haben. Dieweil dann nit allain diſe vermainte lere, als die gar kainen beſtendigen grundt jn der heyligen ſchrifft hat/ dartzu auch der allerhöchſten gottes leſterung eine iſt/ als die ſich offenlichen wider gottes wort/ beuelch vnd ordnung ſetzet/ vnd dieſelben durch einen bloſſen vnwarhafftigen ſchein freuenlichen auffhebt/ zerreiſt vnd vernichtet. Sunder auch wo ſolche vnuerſchembte lügen/ durch jren lermaiſter den teuffel jn ſchwang gebracht, vnd die hertzen der Menſchen dardurch von dem einfeltigen glauben jn gottes wort/ auff jr ſelbſt gutbedüncken/ gefürt werden/ darnach allerley ferner vnnottürfftiger diſputacion zuerwecken, vnd ſo bald ſy raum vnd ſtat finden (zu aller Erbarkayten/ guten policey/ fridens vnd rechtens niderdruckung) auffrurn/ mord vnd andern zeytlichen vnrate an zurichten pflegen/ wie ſolchs auß der heyligen ſchrifft leichtlich zu vertaylen iſt, dartzu auch vom anfang here/ vnd zu vnſern zeiten/ an vil orten/ als zu Münſter vnd ſunſten ſich mit erſchröckenlichen grauſamen thaten/ auch viler vnſchuldiger menſchen leibs vnd guts verderben offenlichen erzaigt hat/ So dann nun ein yede Oberkait/ aus pflicht jrs ambts/ ſolche geferlikait/ wo ſy der jnnen wirdet/ jn der zeit zufürkomen ſchuldig. Demnach ſo gebieten die obgemelten herrn Camerer vnd Rate/ allen vnd yeden jren Burgern/ vnterthanen vnd verwanten bey jren pflichten vnd ayden, damit ſy jnen jr yeder zu getan iſt/ die andern aber/ nach jetwedern ſtand/ treulich vermanende/ das ſy ſich nun fürohin alle/ vor der angeregten vnnd dergleichen/ tauffeiſchen vnd verfüriſchen ſecten vnd leren zum fleiſſigſten fürſehen/ dieſelben von niemants annemen/ noch auch ander leutte derſelben vnterweyſen/ vnd jn albeg auch ſich keiner von neuem anderweit tauffen laſſen oder ander zutauffen/ oder auch ſolche jrthumb zuuertaydigen ſich vnterſteen/ deßgleichen auch jr keyner/ ſolche widertauffer vnd lermaiſter heimlich oder offenlich hinfüro weitter einnemen/ beherbergen/ enthalten/ vnterſchlauffen oder fürſchieben/ ſonder wo er dern einen oder mehr erfarn wirdet/ das er den oder dieſelben jn gehaim vnd vngewarnet mit dem fürderlichſten dem herrn Camerer oder aber ſunſten einem des jnnern Rats/ zu dem er ein vertrauen hat/ anzaigen wölle. Des will ſich ein Erber Rate alſo/ aus angeregter ſchuldiger gehorſam/ auch ſunſten der erbern vnd billikeit nach zugeſchehen entlich verſehen. Vnd dartzu einen yeden ſo derſelben widertauffer oder widergetaufften einen anzaigen/ zuſambt dem das er ſolchs one das alle weittere verfürung der einfeltigen vñ andern erſchröcklichen vnrats zufürkomen/ bey ſeinem gewiſſen vnnd pflichten zutun ſchuldig iſt/ vnd doneben auch vngemeldet bleiben ſolle/ mit einer zimlichen verehrung bedencken/ Solte aber yemants diſe getreue warnung/ ermanung vnd ernſtlichen beuelch jn einem oder mer ſtucken verachten/ vnd dem obberurten der widertauffer jrthumb weitter anhangen/ von neuem annemen/ verteidigen oder auch dieſelbigen widertauffer wo er die yetzo weiſte oder hinfüro erfarn würde/ nit anzaigen/ gegen dem gedenckt ein Erber Rate mit gleicher vñ der höchſten ſtraffe wie ſy gegen den widertauffern vñ andern dergleichen verfüriſchen Schwärmern ſelbſt/ zutun entſchloſſen ſein/ ernſtlich zuhandln/ vnd ſich zu außreutung ſolcher offenlichen vncriſtlichen geferlichen Jrſaln dermaſſen zuhalten/ daraus jr billicher vnd ſchuldiger ernſt mit der thate ſol geſpürt werden. Darnach wiſſe ſich menigklich zurichten/ vnd vor verderben ſeiner ſelen/ auch der angezogen ernſtlichen ſtraff ſeins leibs/ lebens vnd guts zuuerhüten ꝛc.

Decretum in Conſilio ſecunda die Decembris. Anno 39.

②

IV. Mandates

1. Mandate of King Ferdinand of Austria, 1528; 2. Mandate of the City of Regensburg, 1539.

Ein Mandadt vnnd
Ordnung võ Schultheiſſen klein
vnnd groſſen Rhat der Statt
Bernn/ der Widertöuferen
wegen.

V. Mandates

1. Mandate against Menno Simons, 1542; 2. Mandate of the City of Bern, 1597.

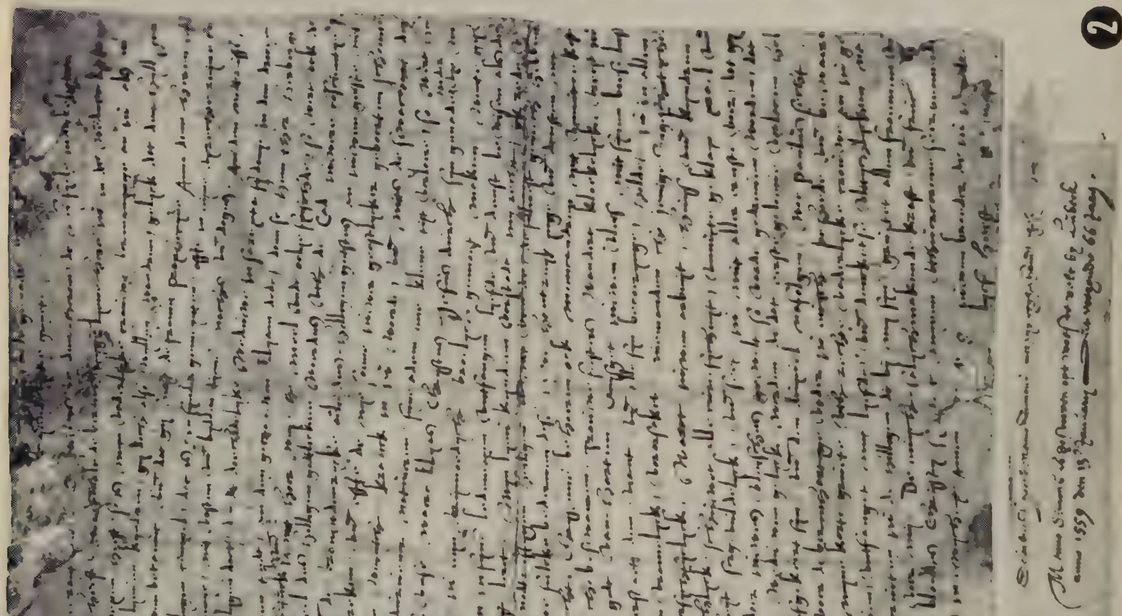
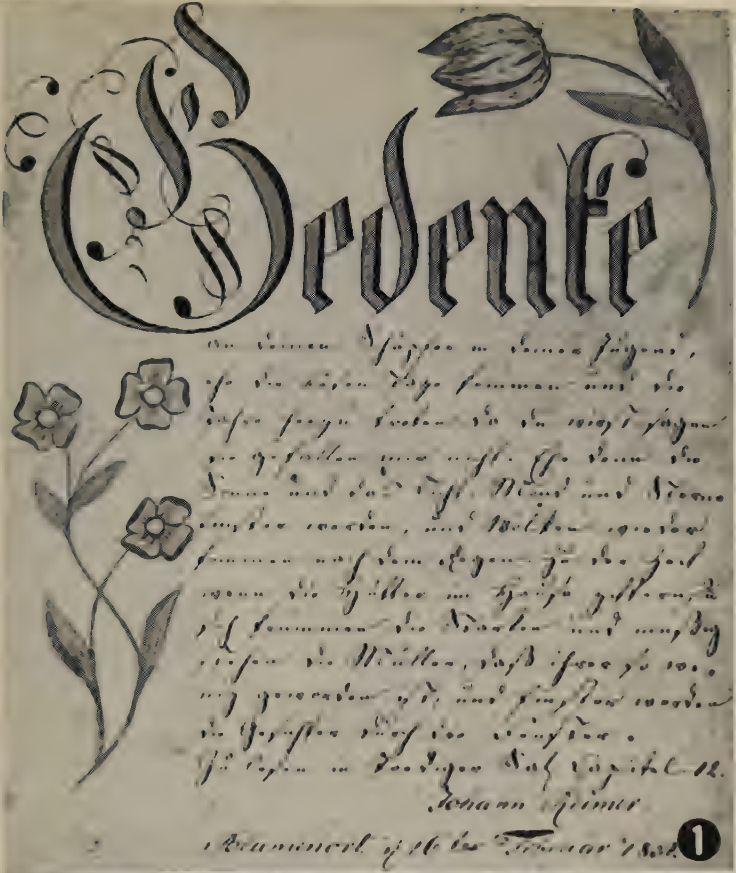
①



②

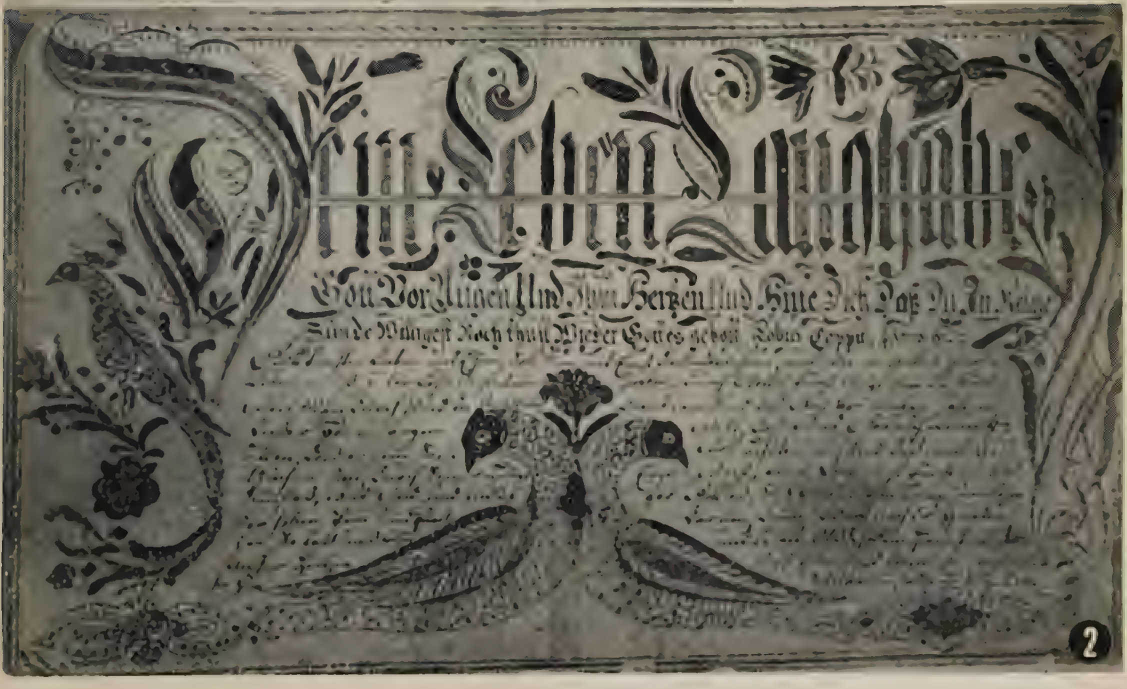
VI. Manuscripts
1. A Menno Simons Letter, *ca.*1549. 2. Maeyken Wens' Letter, Holland, 1573.



Gedenke

Johann Reimer

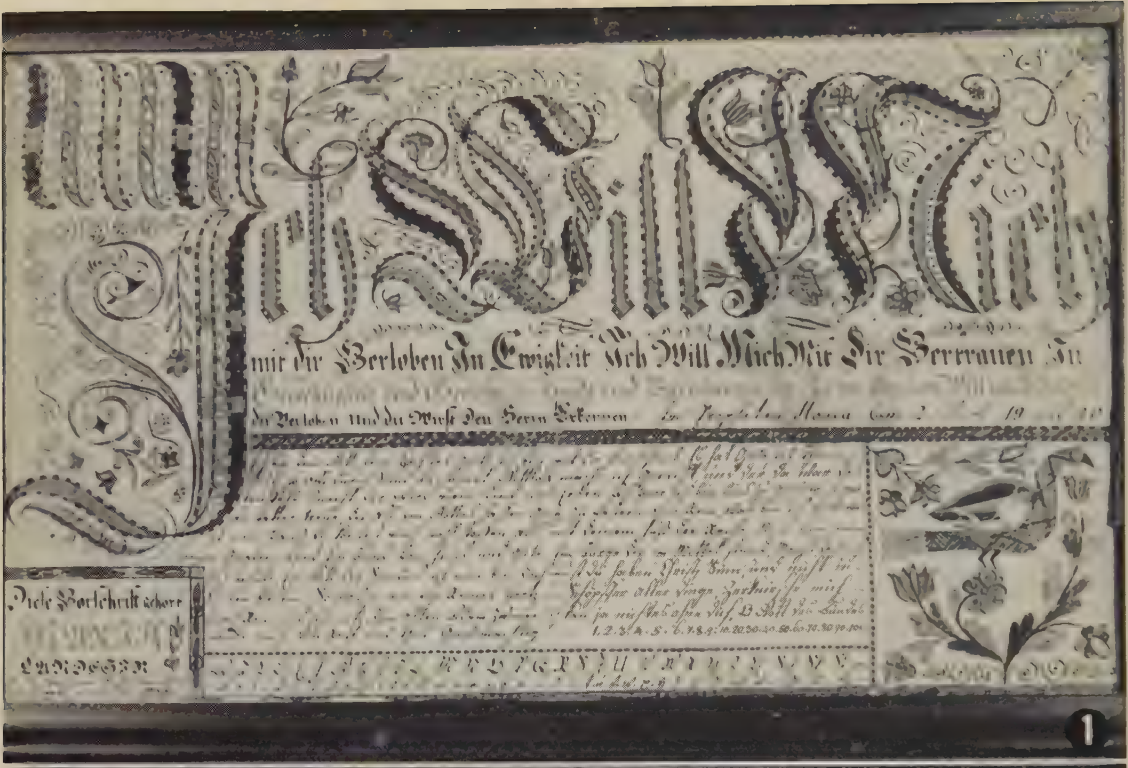
1



2

VII. Manuscripts

1 Johann Reimer, School Motto, Blumenort, Russia, 1832; 2. A Christopher Dock School Motto of *ca.*1750.

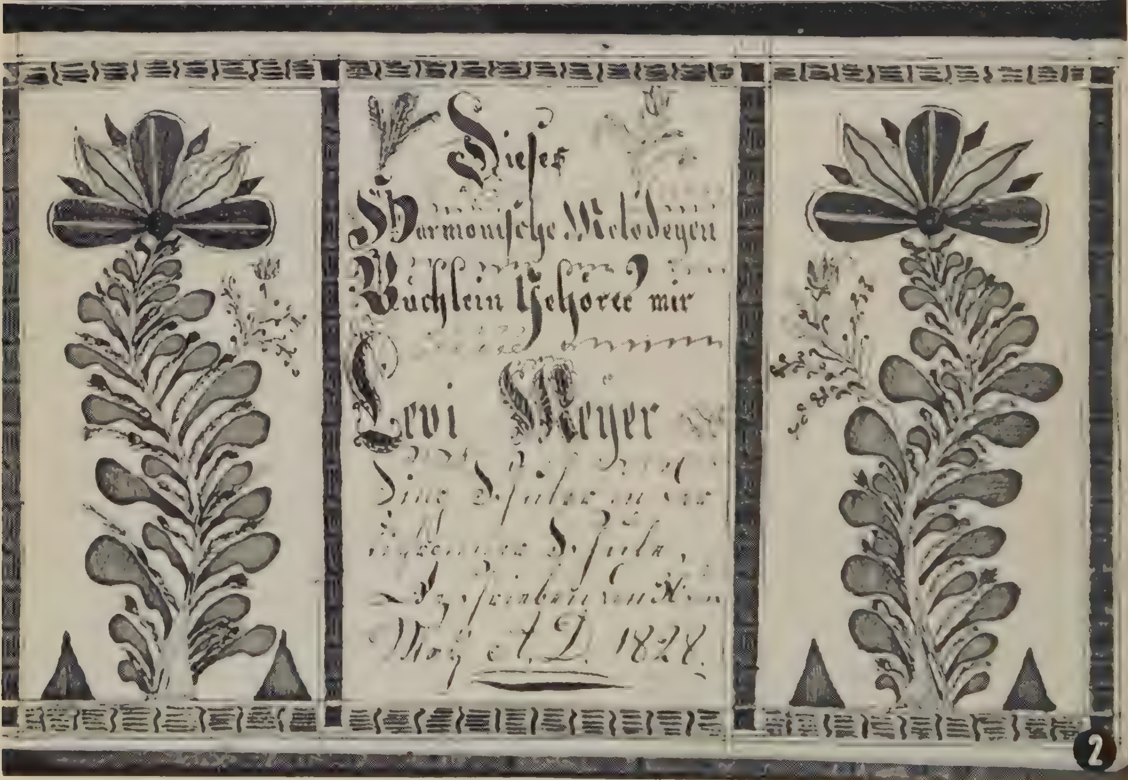


Ich Will Mich

mit dir Verloben In Ewigkeit Ich Will Mich Mir Dir Vertrauen In

dir Verloben Und du Wirſt den Herrn Erkennen

Dieſe Vorſchrift gehört

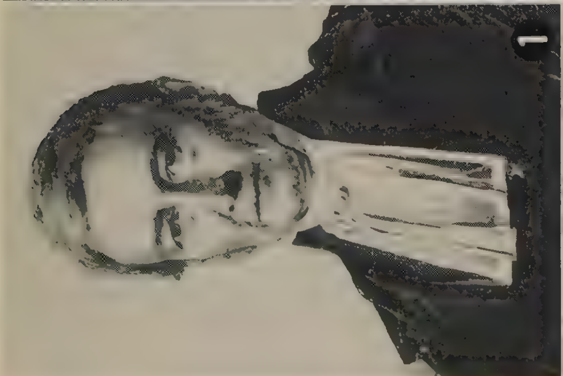


Dieſes
Harmoniſche Melodeyen
Büchlein Gehöret mir
Levi Meyer

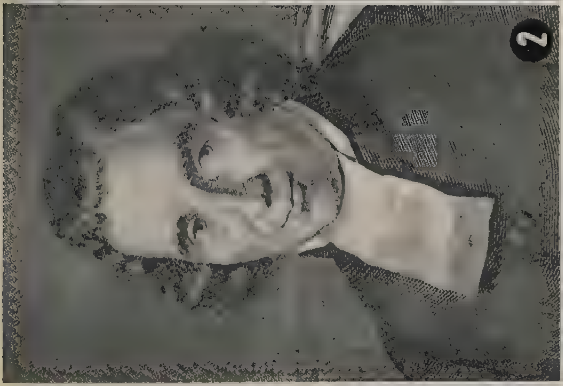
A.D. 1828.

VIII. Manuscripts

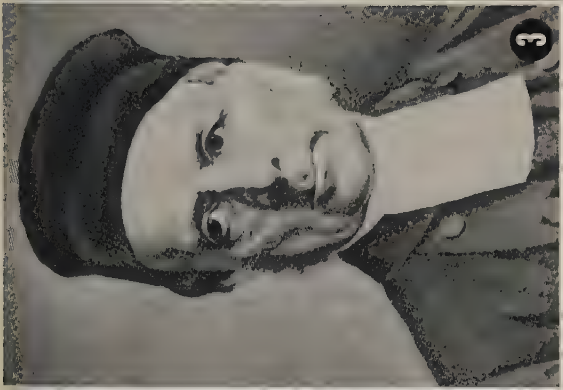
1 A Deep Run, Pa., School Motto of 1783; 2. A Songbook Title Page, Deep Run, Pa., School. 1828.



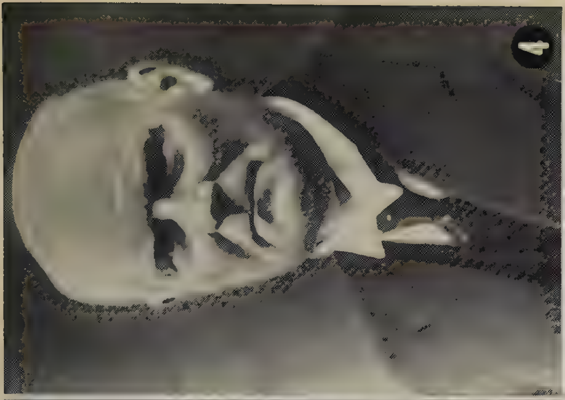
1



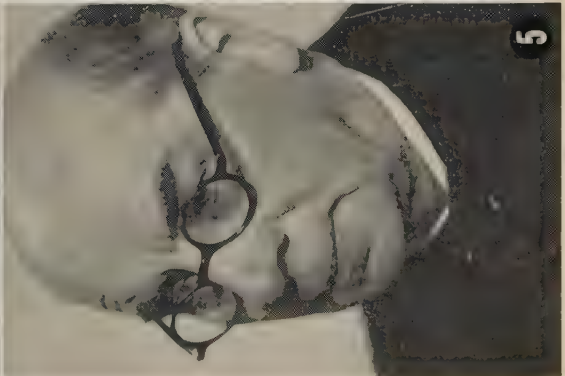
2



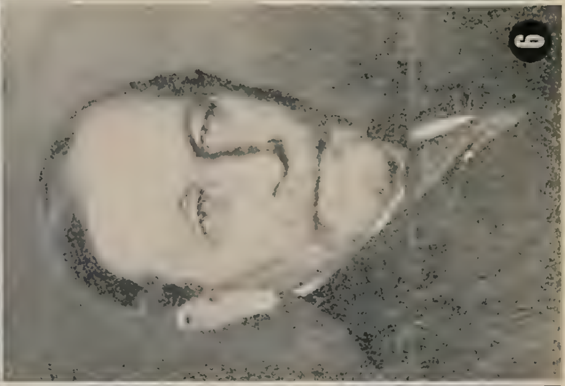
3



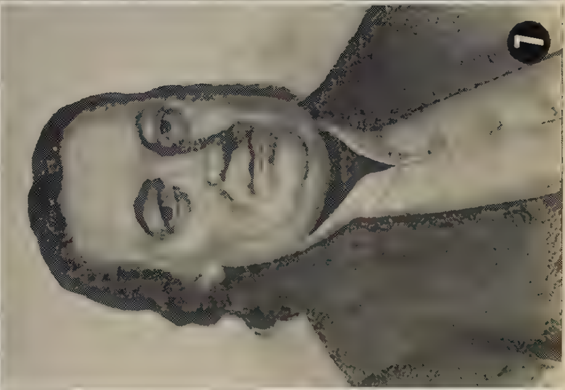
4



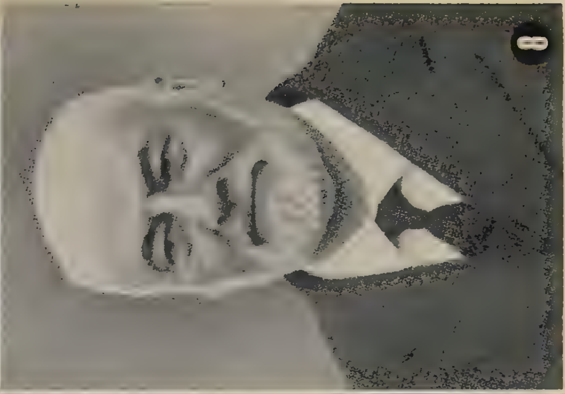
5



6



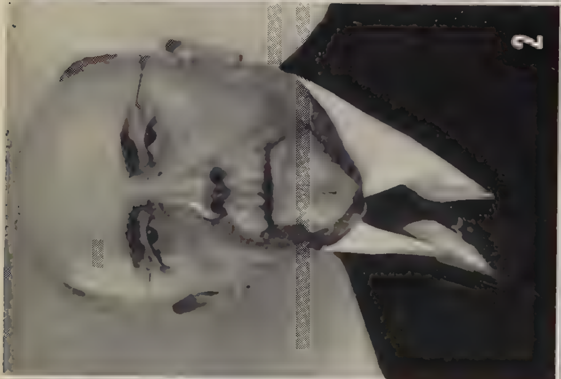
7

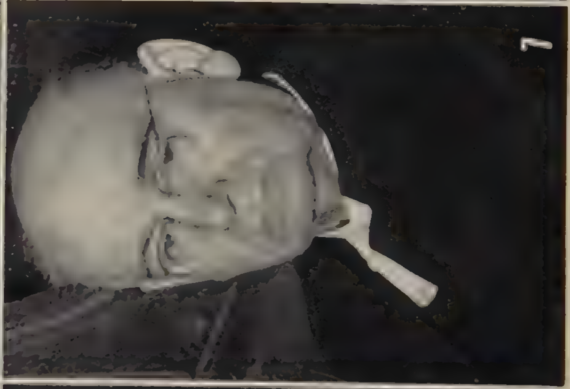


8

IX. Portraits

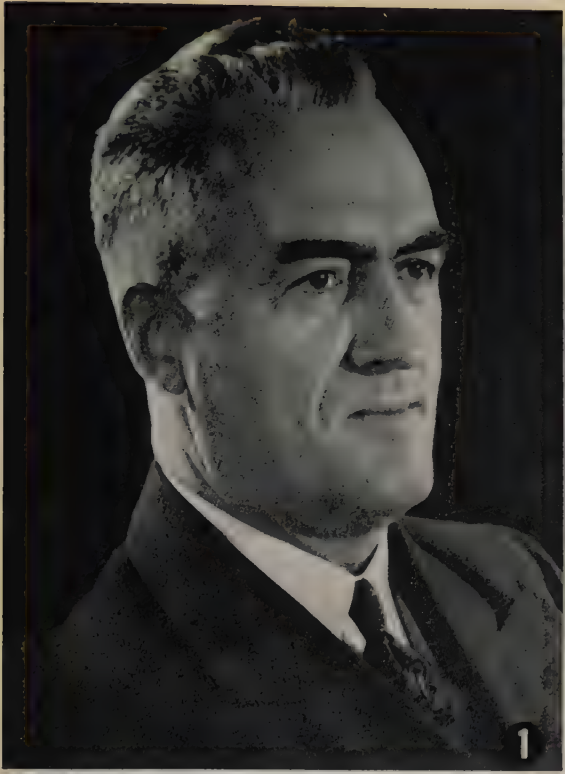
1. Samuel Muller (1785-1875), Amsterdam, Neth.; 2. Jan Nieuwenhuizen (1724-1806), Haarlem, Neth.; 3. Jakob Mannhardt (1801-85), Danzig, Ger.; 4. Cornelis Nijdam (1884-1946), Amsterdam, Neth.; 5. Jakob Kroeker (1872-1948), Wernigerode, Ger.; 6. Hermann Gottlieb Mannhardt (1855-1927), Danzig, Ger.; 7. David Möllinger (1709-68), Monsheim, Ger.; 8. Samuel Nussbaumer (1866-1944), Basel-Dornach, Sw.



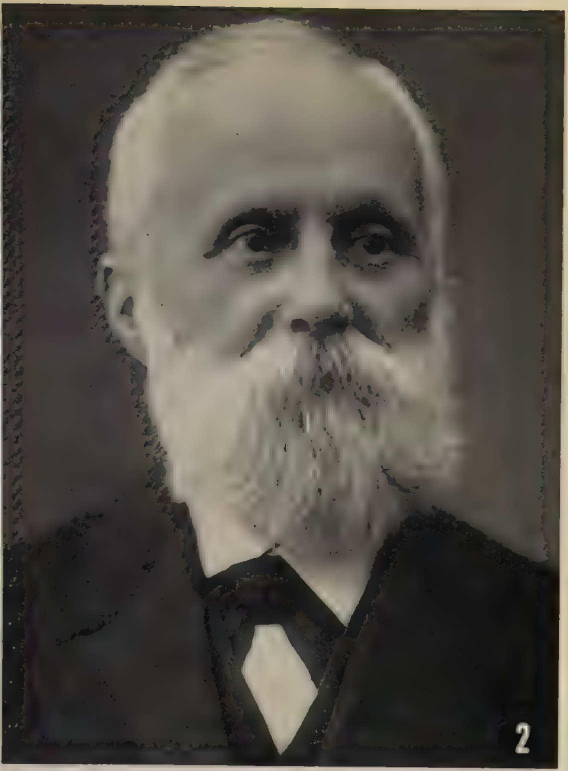


X. Portraits

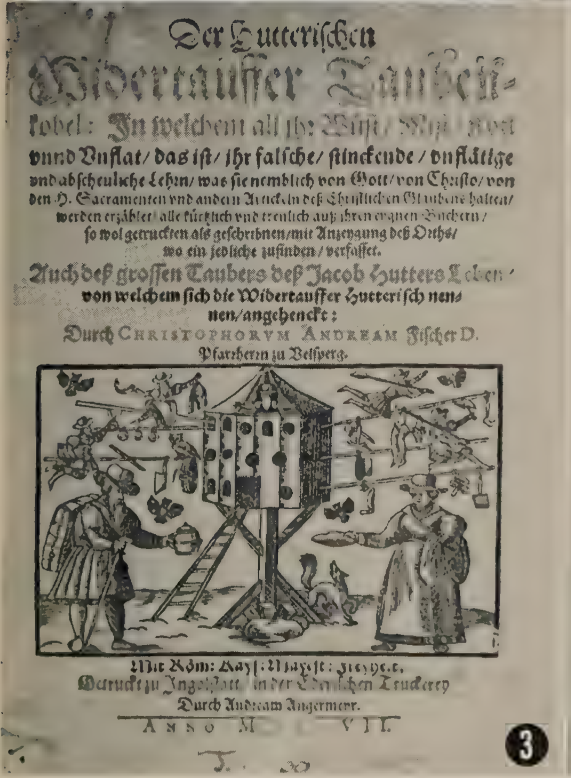
1. Cornelius Jansen (GCM) (1822-94), Beatrice, Neb.; 2. Samuel K. Mosiman (GCM) (1867-1940), Bluffton, Ohio; 3. Jacob H. Janzen (GCM) (1878-1950), Waterloo, Ont.; 4. Pieter Jansz (1820-1904), Kaju-Apu, Java; 5. Henry W. Lohrenz (MB) (1878-1945), Hillsboro, Kan., 6. Daniel J. Johns (MC) (1850-1942), Goshen, Ind., 7. Daniel Kauffman (MC) (1865-1944), Scottdale, Pa.; 8. Daniel D. Miller (MC) (1864-1955), Middlebury, Ind.



1



2



Der Hutteriſchen
Widertauffer Tauben-
kobel: In welchem all jhr Wüſt / Miſt / Kott
vnnd Vnflat / das iſt / jhr falſche / ſtinckende / vnflätige vnd abſcheuliche Lehren / was ſie nemblich von Gott / von Chriſto / von den H. Sacramenten vnd andern Artickeln deß Chriſtlichen Glaubens halten / werden erzählet / alle kürtzlich vnd treulich auß jhren eygnen Büchern / ſo wol getruckten als geſchribnen / mit Anzeygung deß Orths /
wo ein jedliche zufinden / verfaſſet.
Auch deß groſſen Taubers deß Jacob Hutters Leben / von welchem ſich die Widertauffer Hutteriſch nen-
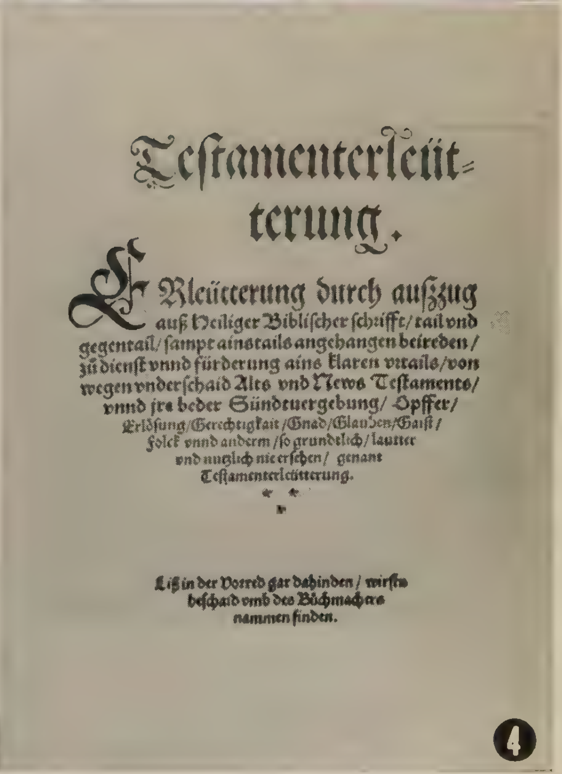
nen / angehenckt:
Durch CHRISTOPHORUM ANDREAM Fiſcher D.
Pfarrherrn zu Velſperg.

Mit Röm: Kayſ: Mayeſt: Freyheit.
Getruckt zu Ingolſtatt / in der Ederiſchen Truckerey
Durch Andream Angermayr.
ANNO M. DC. VII.

3



Teſtamenterleüt-
terung.
ERleüttrung durch außzug
auß Heiliger Bibliſcher ſchrifft / tail vnd gegentail / ſampt ainstails angehangen beireden / zů dienſt vnnd fürderung ains klaren vrtails / von wegen vnderſchaid Alts vnd News Teſtaments /
vnnd jrs beder Sündvergebung / Opffer /
Erlöſung / Gerechtigkait / Gnad / Glauben / Gaiſt /
Volck vnnd anderm / ſo grundtlich / lautter
vnd nutzlich nie erſehen / genant
Teſtamenterleütterung.

* *
*

Liß in der Vorred gar dahinden / wirſtu beſchaid vmb des Bůchmachers nammen finden.

4

XI. A. Portraits

1. Cornelius Franz Klassen (MB) (1894-1954), Abbotsford, B.C., and Frankfurt, Ger.; 2. Christian Neff (1863-1946), Weierhof, Ger.

XI. B. Book Title Pages

3. An Anti-Hutterite Work by C. A. Fischer, Taubenkobel, 1607. 4. Pilgram Marpeck's Explanation of the Testaments, 1550.

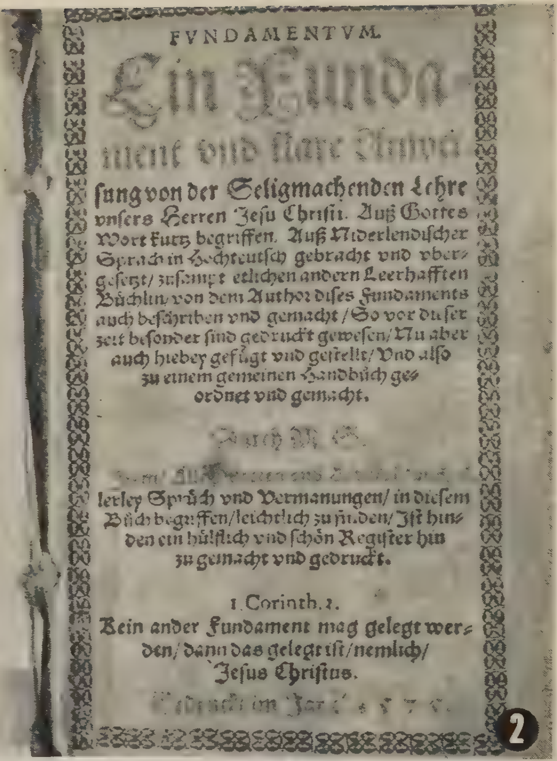
Dat Fundament des Christelycken leers

Door Menno Simons op dat al [illegible]

[illegible] gescreven.

Anno. M. D. XL.

①



FVNDAMENTVM.

Ein Funda-
ment vnd klare Anwei-
ſung von der Seligmachenden Lehre
vnſers Herren Jeſu Chriſti. Auß Gottes
Wort kurtz begriffen. Auß Niderlendiſcher
Sprach in Hochteutſch gebracht vnd vbergeſetzt/ zuſampt etlichen andern Leerhafften
Büchlin/ von dem Author diſes Fundaments auch beſchriben vnd gemacht / So vor diſer zeit beſonder ſind gedruckt geweſen/ Nu aber auch hiebey gefügt vnd geſtellt/ Vnd alſo zu einem gemeinen Handbůch ge-ordnet vnd gemacht.

Durch M. S.

[illegible] al-
lerley Sprüch vnd Vermanungen/ in dieſem
Bůch begriffen/ leichtlich zu finden/ Iſt hin-den ein hülflich vnd ſchön Regiſter hin zu gemacht vnd gedruckt.

1. Corinth. 3.
Kein ander Fundament mag gelegt werden/ dann das gelegt iſt/ nemlich/
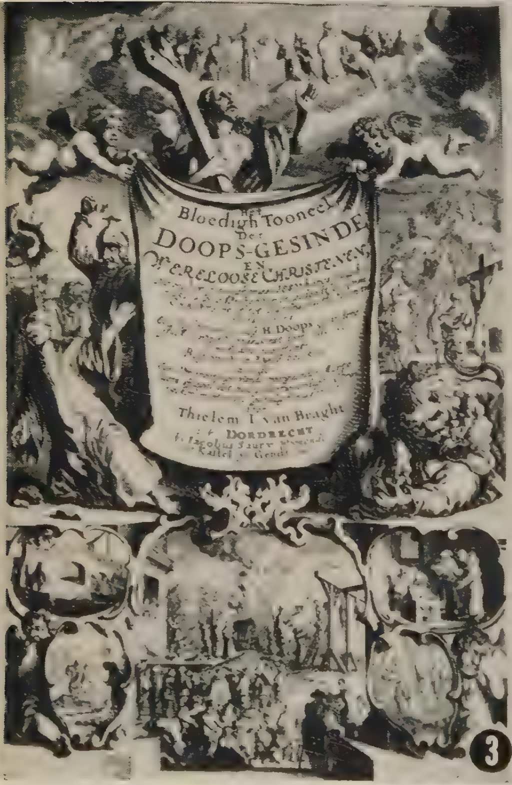
Jeſus Chriſtus.

Gedruckt im Jar [illegible]

②



Het Bloedigh Tooneel Der DOOPS-GESINDE EN WERELOOSE CHRISTENEN

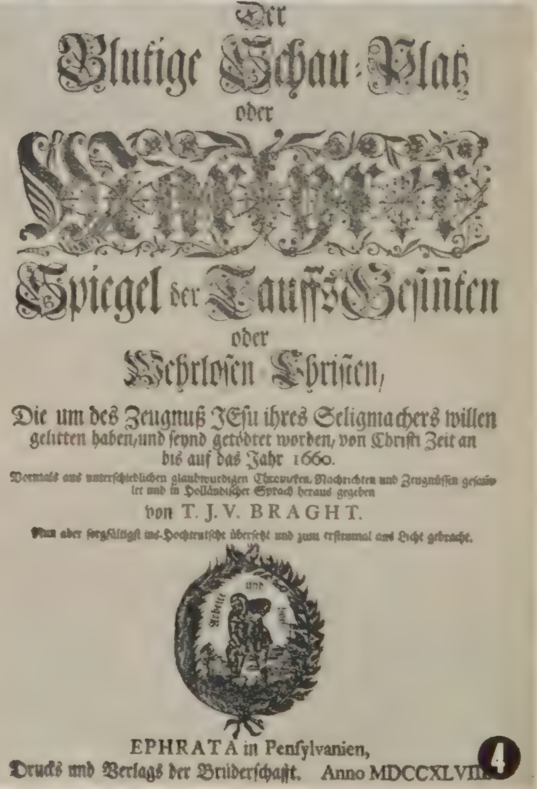
[illegible]

Thielem I. van Braght

DORDRECHT

[illegible]

③



Der
Blutige Schau-Platz
oder
Märtyrer
Spiegel der Tauffs-Geſinnten
oder
Wehrloſen Chriſten,
Die um des Zeugnuß JEſu ihres Seligmachers willen gelitten haben, und ſeynd getödtet worden, von Chriſti Zeit an bis auf das Jahr 1660.
Vormals aus unterſchiedlichen glaubwürdigen Chronicken, Nachrichten und Zeugnüſſen geſammlet und in Holländiſcher Sprach heraus gegeben
von T. J. V. BRAGHT.
Nun aber ſorgfältigſt ins Hochteutſche überſetzt und zum erſtenmal ans Licht gebracht.

EPHRATA in Penſylvanien,
Drucks und Verlags der Brüderſchafft. Anno MDCCXLVIII.

④

XII. Book Title Pages

1. Menno Simons' Foundation Book, first Dutch edition, 1539; 2. Menno Simons' Foundation Book, first German edition, 1575; 3. Martyrs' Mirror, first Dutch edition, 1660; 4. Martyrs' Mirror, first American edition in German, 1748.

Index of Illustrations

Asterisk (*) indicates a portrait; italics, a book

Beckum, Maria and Ursula van, 3
Bern, Mandate of the City of, 7
Book Title Pages, 13-14
Deep Run, Pa., School Motto, 10
Deep Run, Pa., Songbook Title Page, 10
Dirk Willemsz, 3
Dock, Christopher, A School Motto, 9
Explanation of the Testaments, 13
Ferdinand, King of Austria, Mandate, 6
Fischer, C. A., Taubenkobel, 13
Foundation Book (Dutch), 14
Foundation Book (German), 14
Illuminated Manuscripts, 10-11
Jansen, Cornelius*, 12
Jansz, Pieter*, 12
Janzen, Jacob H.*, 12
Jaques d'Auchy, 4
Johan Knel, 4
Johns, Daniel J.*, 12
Kauffman, Daniel*, 12
Klassen, Cornelius Franz*, 13
Kroeker, Jakob*, 11
Lohrenz, Henry W.*, 12
Maeyken Wens' Letter, 8
Mandates, 6-7
Mannhardt, Hermann Gottlieb*, 11
Mannhardt, Jakob*, 11
Manuscripts, 8-10
Marpeck, Pilgram, Explanation, 13
Martyr Scenes, 3-5
Martyrs' Mirror (Dutch), 14
Martyrs' Mirror (German), 14
Maria van Beckum, 3
Menno Simons, A Letter, 8
Menno Simons, Mandate against, 7
Miller, Daniel D.*, 12
Möllinger, David*, 11
Mosiman, Samuel K.*, 12
Mottoes, 9-10
Muller, Samuel*, 11
Neff, Christian*, 13
Nieuwenhuizen, Jan*, 11
Nijdam, Cornelis*, 11
Nussbaumer, Samuel*, 11
Portraits, 11-13
Regensburg, Mandate of the City of, 6
Reimer, Johann, Motto, 9
Songbook Title Page, Deep Run, Pa., 10
Taubenkobel, by C. A. Fischer, 13
Unknown Martyrs, Holland, 5
Unknown Martyr, Holland, 5
Ursula van Beckum, 3

Explanation of Illustrations

The illustrations in the MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA appear as pictorial supplements at the end of each of the four volumes. They are grouped according to the topics they illustrate. For instance, pictures of Mennonite colleges are grouped under the heading "Colleges," and appear in Volume 1, since this volume includes the letter "C." In the case of portraits, however, pictures are presented only for those persons for whom articles appear within the volume. An alphabetical index indicates the location of the pictures by pages in the supplement. In the text of the volume itself, the symbol (†) at the end of the article indicates that an illustration for the article appears in the pictorial supplement of that volume. The choice of illustrations has been limited by availability.

The co-operation of the many individuals and institutions who have secured or contributed pictures is here gratefully acknowledged, even though individual recognition is not given. The larger number of illustrations have been drawn from two chief sources: the Bethel College Historical Library, North Newton, Kan. (Cornelius Krahn, director) and the Goshen College Mennonite Historical Library, Goshen, Ind. (Nelson Springer, curator). In addition the Archives of the Mennonite Church at Goshen College (Melvin Gingerich, custodian), the Library of the United Mennonite Church at Amsterdam, Netherlands (N. van der Zijpp, director), and the Library of the Mennonite Research Center at Göttingen, Germany (Ernst Crous, director), deserve recognition for their contributions. The following periodicals kindly granted us the use of pictures which they had published: Mennonite Life, North Newton, Kan., and Der Mennonit, Frankfurt a.M., Germany.

The principle of selection of pictures has varied according to the type of matter to be illustrated. Thus, only a few typical dwellings were chosen, in cases where the dwelling represents a distinct type. But in the case of meetinghouses and institutions, age, historic importance, style, and regional and denominational representation, have all played a part in the decision, along with the availability of good photographs. Under "Art" only works of genuine merit, and artists of established reputation, have been chosen. For title-pages chiefly first editions, where available, of titles of historic significance have been used.

The Martyr Scenes presented on Plates I, II, and III are taken from the Dutch edition of the Martyrs' Mirror of 1685, and are reproductions of the Jan Luyken etchings. The mandates on Plates IV and V are reproduced from the originals in the Goshen College Library, as are the book title pages on Plate XI:3 and Plate XII:2, 3, and 4. The manuscript letters on Plate VI are reproduced from Bethel College photographs of the originals in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. The mottoes on Plates VII and VIII are specimens of the illuminated manuscripts discussed in the article under that title. The first specimen is reproduced from the original in the Bethel College Library; the third and fourth specimens are from originals in the Goshen College Library; the second specimen is from the Henry Borneman Collection, reproduced from Borneman's book, Pennsylvania German Illuminated Manuscripts (Norristown, 1937), and is printed by permission of the publishers, the Pennsylvania German Society.

GTU LIBRARY
3 2400 00640 1503

FOR REFERENCE

NOT TO BE TAKEN FROM THIS ROOM